The second question in the case grows out of the order granting plaintiff leave to amend his complaint. Under the former practice, demurrers were of two kinds, general and special. The first went to the substance and the latter to the form. Upon a judgment on the first, amendments were not allowed; upon the latter, however, they were generally permitted—the distinction being the fact that the one was founded on substance, showing the absence of a cause of action, which was fatal, and the other on a mere matter of form, which could be remedied. In Frazer v. Legaré, Bail. Eq., 389, it was held that where demurrer for want of parties is sustained, leave may be granted to amend so as to make necessary parties. In Mobley v. Mobley, 7 Rich., 431, it was held, that before judgment rendered on general demurrer, leave to amend may be granted. See also Macfarland v. Dean, Cheves, 64, as to special demurrer. But after judgment on general demurrer, a motion to amend could not be allowed. Chalk v. McAlily, 10 Rich., 92. On general demurrer to a declaration, the court has no power to permit the plaintiff to amend. Bagley v. Johnston, 4 Rich., 22. Still more, an order granting leave to amend generally (as in this case) without stating in what particular, is irregular. Thompson v. Malone, 13 Rich., 252.

Thus stood the law under the former practice. Have the courts any greater power under the reformed procedure? The two sections in the code which have special reference to amendments, are sections 193 and 194. The first more especially refers to amendments by the parties themselves. This is not a case of that kind, and therefore that section need not be considered. *The second, to wit, 194, is the one which expressly gives power to the courts to permit amendments, and is therefore the one which we must consider. That section provides: "That the court may, before or after judgment, in furtherance of justice, and on such terms as may be proper, amend any pleading, process, or proceeding, by adding or striking out the name of any party, or by correcting a mistake in the name of a party, or a mistake in any other respect, or by inserting other allegations material to the case, or when the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defence, by conforming the pleading or proceeding to the facts proved."

*241

Has the leave to amend here been granted in accordance with this section? The section authorizes amendments either before or after judgment. There is no limit, therefore, as to the time or the stage of the proceeding; but this general latitude does not extend to the character of the amendment. On the contrary, the section specifies the character, and therefore the power of the court conferred therein only extends to amendments of the character thus specified. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. The name of any party may be added, stricken out, or corrected, as also a mistake in other respects. Other allegations material to the case may be inserted, or when the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defence, the pleading or proceeding may be conformed to the facts proved. And these amendments, as we have stated, may be allowed either before or after judgment.

Does it appear that the leave granted here was intended to meet any one of these specifications? The leave in its terms was general and permits any amendment which the plaintiff may be advised to be necessary. This, we think, went beyond the intent of the section under consideration. But confining the leave to the requirements of the section, does it appear that the complaint was defective in any of the particulars mentioned as the subject of amendment therein, and to which the leave could apply? Would any amendment to the complaint, by adding, striking out, or correcting the name of any party, be of any service? Is there any mistake to be corrected? Were there any allegations material to the case as made left out? Were there any facts proved, to which the pleadings might be made to conform? We must *give a negative answer to all of these questions. There is certainly no name to be added, corrected, or stricken out. Nor is there any mistake to be corrected. Nor have any allegations material to the case as made been omitted.

*242

The plaintiff's case is one for reformation of the paper, not for cancellation, and he cannot now in any event make a new claim, or state a new cause of action. He must stand or fall upon the cause of action with which he started out, and especially must this be the case when, as we think, the judgment of the court below should have been a dismissal of the complaint. We must look at the case in that aspect. Suppose the Circuit judge had sustained the demurrer and dismissed the complaint, could he then, after such judgment, have permitted, under the section supra, an amendment by which the case could be restored with a new cause of action? We think not. This section is intended to perfect a proceeding in which the plaintiff has been successful, and not when he has lost the case. It is intended to have the judgment of the court completed and perfected, and not as the means of obtaining a new trial upon a new cause of action after the case has been lost on the cause upon which it was instituted. We think it was error to allow this general leave to amend under the circumstances of the case.

This case may be distinguished from the recent case of Bischoff & Co. v. Blease, 20 S. C., 460, in the fact that there a material allegation to the case made was wanting. The plaintiffs sued as partners, but neglected to allege in terms a partnership, though that fact was stated in the title.

It is alleged in the complaint that the defendants have violated the agreement. If this be so, it may afford an opportunity to the plaintiff to bring action for such damages as he may have sustained thereby; but it is not a fact which in any way strengthens the cause of action upon which he relies in the present case, and which we have held to be insufficient.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the complaint below be dismissed.

Mr. Justice McIVER concurred generally, but Mr. Justic McGOWAN only in the result.

---

21 S. C. *243

*HARLEY v. WEATHERSBEE.

(November Term, 1883.)

[Exemptions ⇐108.]

A tenant indebted to his landlord for rent cannot claim a chattel exemption against a distress warrant duly issued by the landlord to enforce the payment of such rent—a distress warrant not being an attachment, nor a mesne or final process issued from any court.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Rookard v. Atlanta & C. A. L. R. Co., 89 S. C. 371, 376, 71 S. E. 992.

For other cases, see Exemptions, Cent. Dig. § 129; Dec. Dig. ⇐108.]

Before Wallace, J., Barnwell, November, 1883.

This was an action of claim and delivery by Philippa H. Harley against A. J. Weath-ersbee and W. E. McMichael, to recover a piano, or its value and damages, the piano having been seized on plaintiff's premises by McMichael, under a distress warrant issued to him by Weathersbee requiring a distress for rent in arrears due by Mrs. Harley.

Mr. H. M. Thompson, for appellant.

Mr. J. J. Brown, contra, cited Const., art. II., § 32; Gen. Stat., §§ 1999, 2000; 4 McCord, 378; 17 S. C., 454.

April 26, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The question involved in this appeal is whether a tenant, indebted to his landlord for unpaid rent, can claim a homestead exemption in personal property against a distress warrant issued by the landlord to enforce the payment of said rent. It is admitted that the plaintiff, though a married woman, was the tenant of the defendant, and at the time of the taking under the distress warrant was indebted to defendant to the amount of $76 for rent in arrears for the preceding six months. These facts distinguish this case from the case of Wallace v. Johnson, 17 S. C., 454, and therefore the principle applied there can have no application here. The Circuit judge held that the plaintiff was entitled to the exemption, and the appeal brings up the single question stated above.

The constitutional provision in reference to homesteads, and the acts which have been passed in accordance therewith, embrace the law under which the right of homestead exists, and by which a claim for homestead is to be determined. As has been fre*quently announced heretofore, no new estate is created by these enactments in the debtor. On the contrary, his title and interest in the property exempted remains precisely as before the exemption, and the effect of the enactments is simply to exempt the property from certain modes of enforced sale by creditors, i. e., from attachment or sale on any mesne or final process issued from any court. This being the only effect of the homestead law, before a debtor can successfully invoke the benefit of this law he must show that his property is endangered by an attachment or threatened by levy and sale on some mesne or final process issued from a court.

*244

In the case before the court it is not claimed that the property of the plaintiff was threatened with levy and sale by any mesne or final process of a court; it is therefore clear that the plaintiff cannot have the benefit of that exemption. Can the term "attachment" afford the protection? The exact language of the constitution on the subject of homestead is as follows: "The General Assembly shall enact such laws as will exempt from attachment and sale under any mesne or final process issued from any court," &c., &c. Art. II., § 32. It will be observed that this is an entire sentence, and that both attachment and sale is subject to the limitation of the process being issued by a court. This view is strengthened by the fact that at the time of the adoption of the constitutional provisions referred to the right of a landlord to enforce payment for rent in arrears by a distress warrant existed. This distress warrant, as was known too, was not a process, mesne or final, issued from a court, but it is a proceeding which the landlord issues by his own act and upon his own responsibility.

We must conclude, therefore, that while a distress warrant for rent does not fall under the inhibition of the constitution in terms, it must have been omitted intentionally, the omission being founded on a reason analogous to that on account of which the purchase money of a tract of land may be enforced against the land purchased, notwithstanding the homestead exemption as to other debts. But whatever may have been the reason, it is apparent that there is nothing in the terms of the constitution or in the acts on this subject which inhibits a landlord from enforcing *his claim for rent by the summary proceeding allowed him by the act on that subject. That act has not been repealed, but is now of force, and the defendant should not be deprived of his rights thereunder.

*245

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

---

21 S. C. 245

ADICKES v. ALLISON & BRATTON.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐964.]

A Circuit judge having by statute the right to adjourn his court to a future day in case "a dangerous and general disease" is prevailing, and an adjournment of a regular term to a future day having been ordered, no inquiry can be made as to whether the conditions existed that authorized the exercise of this power; and a judgment rendered at such adjourned term is not void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3834; Dec. Dig. ⇐964.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⇐1007.]

In a case at law tried by the Circuit judge without a jury, his findings of fact cannot be reviewed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Witte v. Weinberg, 37 S. C. 590, 17 S. E. 681.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3860-3876, 3955-3995½; Dec. Dig. ⇐1007.]

[3. Principal and Agent ⇐51.]

The power of attorney in this case held to give the attorney authority to consent to a sale of his principal's property, and to the application of the proceeds to executions in a stated order; and such consent being given, and by all parties acted on for ten years, the principal is estopped from claiming a different application by law of such proceeds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 83; Dec. Dig. ⟸51.]

[4. Limitation of Actions ⟸94.]

An action was commenced against a partnership, but one of the partners, being out of the state, was not served; judgment was rendered against the partnership and the partner served. Several years afterwards, the absent partner having returned to the state, summons was served upon him to show cause why he should not be bound by this judgment, and in his return he pleaded the statute of limitations as a defence. Held, that the claim not being barred when the action was commenced, the plea could not be sustained. Code, § 380.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Adams v. Richardson, 32 S. C. 141, 10 S. E. 931; Pope Mfg. Co. v. Charleston Cycle Co., 55 S. C. 536, 33 S. E. 787.

For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 471, 472; Dec. Dig. ⟸94.]

[5. Judgment ⟸20.]

The decision of the Circuit judge disposed of all the issues, directed judgment for the balance due on a former judgment particularly stated in the record, and ordered execution to issue, but referred it to the clerk to calculate the interest and ascertain such balance. Held, that it was a final judgment and in proper form.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Small v. Usher, 77 S. C. 114, 57 S. E. 623; Jones v. A. H. Williams & Co., 89 S. C. 581, 72 S. E. 546.

For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. ⟸20.]

[6. Reference ⟸102.]

Such a reference was a mere incident to the enforcement of the judgment already rendered, and did not require confirmation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. §§ 181–187; Dec. Dig. ⟸102.]

[7. Trial ⟸387.]

In an action at law tried by the court, the decision of the judge is not the formal judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 903–907; Dec. Dig. ⟸387.]

*246

[8. Interest ⟸22.]

*It was error to make the interest due on the former judgment an interest bearing sum from the time the absent partner was declared individually liable. The form of judgment in such cases suggested.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Brown v. Rogers, 80 S. C. 292, 61 S. E. 440.

For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. §§ 43–53; Dec. Dig. ⟸22.]

[9. Courts ⟸117.]

[The court of common pleas is a court of general jurisdiction, and its records are absolute verities not to be impugned.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 374; Dec. Dig. ⟸117.]

Before Kershaw, J., York, March, 1883.

The decision of the Circuit judge was as follows:

The plaintiff, H. F. Adickes, in the above stated case, obtained judgment therein on February 14, 1874, on two promissory notes of the defendants, as copartners, for the sum of $641 and costs, $22.70, the principal of said judgment bearing interest from February 11, 1874. The summons in said case was served only on James B. Allison, and the judgment was entered against the firm. The plaintiff died, and Mary L. Adickes, the executrix of his will, having duly qualified, issued a summons against the defendant, J. R. Bratton, requiring him to show cause why he should not be bound by said judgment in the same manner as if he had been originally served with summons in said action; which said summons was served on the defendant Bratton in March, 1882.

The said defendant answered the summons, and resisted its demands on several grounds: 1. He denied that any such judgment was recovered by the plaintiff. 2. He claimed that if any such demand ever existed, it had been paid and satisfied from sales of his property. 3. He alleged that this proceeding was not commenced within the time limited for the commencement of civil actions or proceedings. These are not literally, but substantially, the propositions contained in the answer.

The cause was heard upon testimony and the arguments of counsel. For convenience, the facts will be grouped under the several heads, and stated in connection with the conclusions of law upon each point presented. Under the first head, the point made by the defendant is, that the Court of Common Pleas for York county was not in session at the time the alleged judgment was rendered, as claimed; and hence, that the paper described as a judgment was not a judgment. The facts are these: the time fixed by the statutes for holding the Court of Common Pleas for the winter term of 1874 was the Wednesday after the second Monday of January. On the second day of January, 1874, the presiding judge of that Circuit wrote a letter to the clerk, direct*ing him after he should have opened the Court of General Sessions on the second Monday of January, pursuant to law, to adjourn the same to the second Monday of February, 1874, and to open the Common Pleas and adjourn the same to the Wednesday after the second Monday in February, and to make due publication thereof.

*247

On Thursday, January 8, the said letter, with a proper heading, was published by the clerk in the Yorkville Enquirer, and the publication continued for five issues of that paper, being a weekly newspaper published at Yorkville. Wednesday, January 14, 1874, the Court of Common Pleas was opened by the clerk of York county, and adjourned to the Wednesday after the second Monday in February then next ensuing, at 10 o'clock, a. m., and such action was entered upon the minutes. Wednesday, February 11, 1874, the court met pursuant to adjournment, the Hon. T. J. Mackey, Judge of the 6th Circuit, presiding: which also appears upon the minutes. During the term thus opened, on February 14, 1874, the judgment above stated was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and duly entered under the direction of the court, by default of defendant to answer or demur.

On February 24, 1874, an order was entered, signed at chambers, made on the motion of W. C. Beatty, Esq., attorney for plaintiffs in the cases of W. H. Schieffelin & Co. v. Allison & Bratton, William McGill and Thomas McGill v. same, and H. F. Adickes v. same, reciting that a levy had been made by virtue of the said executions upon property of the firm, some of which was of a perishable nature, and ordering that the said property be sold by the sheriff on March 13, next after the date of said order. This order was consented to in writing by the defendant, James B. Allison, and by John T. Lowry, who signed the name of J. R. Bratton, per John T. Lowry.

John T. Lowry was made the attorney in fact of the defendant, J. R. Bratton, by letters duly executed, bearing date January 18, 1872. These letters authorized the said attorney to do the following acts for his said principal: to sell, transfer, and deliver all his personal property in the county of York, in said state; to ask, demand, levy, and require, recover, and receive all moneys, debts, goods, wares, merchandise, effects, and things, due, owing, *payable, and belonging and coming unto the said Bratton; to sell and convey all his real estate in said county, whenever, in his discretion, it should become advisable to do so, or, if the said attorney should deem best, to make a deed of gift of the real estate to Mrs. Bratton for life, with remainder to the children that he, said Bratton, should beget of her; to sign, execute, and deliver all such deeds and conveyances as the said attorney should deem fit and expedient for the purpose of carrying out the powers conferred; to use all due means, course, and process in law for the full, effectual, and complete execution of all the business aforesaid, and, in the name of the said Bratton, to make and execute due acquittance and discharge; to appear for the said principal, and to represent him before the governor, judges, justices, officers, and magistrates of the law in any court or courts of judicature, and, on his behalf to answer, defend, and reply to all actions, causes, matters, and things whatever relating to the premises. Also, to submit any matter in dispute, respecting the premises, to arbitration or otherwise, &c., &c.; and generally to say, do, act, transact, determine, accomplish, and finish all matters and things whatsoever relating to the premises, as fully as he, the said Bratton, ought or might personally do if present, although the matter should require more special authority than therein comprised; he, the said Bratton, ratifying, allowing, and holding firm and valid whatsoever his said attorney should lawfully do, or cause to be done, in and about the premises, &c.

*248

The firm of Allison & Bratton was dissolved June 3, 1872, and due notice thereof given in the newspapers. By the said notice, all demands against the firm were required to be presented for payment to Dr. J. B. Allison or John T. Lowry, the latter of whom (it stated) "was legally authorized to represent Dr. J. R. Bratton in all settlements." This notice was signed by J. R. Bratton and J. B. Allison.

From the time of its rendition, the said judgment was regarded and acted upon by all parties as good and valid and of force, without any question until these present proceedings were instituted. Sales were made by the sheriff by virtue of the levy recited in the above-mentioned order; and moneys derived from other sales made by the sheriff, under executions in his office, *have been applied to this execution; and the judgment was relied on as a subsisting judgment, having a lien to sustain a sale of land, in the case of Adickes v. Lowry, 12 S. C., 107, to the printed briefs of which the court has been referred, by consent of counsel, for some of the facts in this case. Upon this point I conclude, as matter of law, that for the purpose of this decision, the said judgment is sufficient to constitute a basis for this proceeding.

*249

The next point to be considered is, as to whether the said judgment has been paid or satisfied. The following judgments were proven by the production of the judgment rolls:

a. Hugh Galloway v. J. R. Bratton, entered and execution issued thereon January 15, 1871, for $100.60.

b. Schieffelin & Co. v. J. B. Allison and J. R. Bratton, judgment entered and execution issued May 22, 1872, for $354.36.

c. Dowie, Moise & Davis v. same, judgment entered and execution issued July 28, 1873, for $194.49.

d. L. M. Grist v. same, judgment entered and execution issued July 29, 1873, for $125.40.

e. McGills, administrators, v. same, judgment entered and execution issued September 30, 1873, for $675.05.

f. Agnes B. Harris v. J. R. Bratton, judgment entered February 11, 1874, for $666.95, and execution issued February 14, 1874.

g. H. F. Adickes v. James B. Allison and J. R. Bratton, judgment entered and execution issued February 14, 1874, for $663.76.

Of these, the judgment of Agnes B. Harris was paid from other sources, and need not further be considered.

The following executions were levied on land of the defendant, J. R. Bratton, at the dates hereinafter named, to wit: Grist v. Allison & Bratton, September 22, 1873; Dowie. Moise & Davis v. same, the same day; Schieffelin & Co. v. same, November 5, 1873; McGills v. same, the same day. From the recitals of the consent order above mentioned, dated February 24, 1874, it is in proof that levies had been made of the executions of Schieffelin, McGills, and Adickes, on the personal property of the firm of Allison & Bratton, prior to that date.

*250

*The levy in the case of Schieffelin was the first made. This execution, therefore, was entitled to the proceeds of the sale of the personalty, if the levy was valid. It was recognized by the consent order aforesaid. Mr. Beatty, the attorney for the plaintiffs in all three executions, directed this application of the proceeds to that execution, and the sheriff so applied them, except the sum of $25.00 paid to the plaintiff, H. F. Adickes, for rent. The first levy made under this execution of Schieffelin was on land of defendant Allison, August 27, 1873.

So far as any facts in evidence here inform us, that execution had lost its active energy before that period, and no valid levy could then or thereafter be made without renewal, as the law then stood. (See case of Adickes v. Lowry, supra.) The proceeds of the sales of personalty, therefore, would have been applicable to the other two executions levied upon it, pro rata, except for the effect of the consent of Bratton to the order, by his attorney, Lowry, recognizing the levy and sale under the execution of Schieffelin and the others therein named.

Lowry was authorized to represent Bratton in all settlements of the copartnership affairs, as appears from the published notice of dissolution above mentioned. As that order and the proceedings under it related to the business of the copartnership, and were in effect, to the extent they went, a settlement of the copartnership affairs, it was competent for Lowry to consent for Bratton to the application of the personalty as above set forth. This view is greatly strengthened by the acquiescence of Bratton for so many years. I conclude, therefore, that the judgment and execution of plaintiff herein are not entitled to be considered as affected by the levy and sale of the said personal property of the firm, and the applications of the proceeds to the execution in favor of Schieffelin & Co.

The other payments made, which are hereinafter to be stated, still leave a portion of the debt of the plaintiff unpaid and the judgment unsatisfied. On this point, it may be proper to remark that the levy and sale, and the application of the proceeds of the sale of the Dennis tract of land of the defendant Bratton, can in no wise be treated as payment or satisfaction of plaintiff's judgment in this case, beyond the money paid to plaintiff therefrom, because *the judgment and execution thereon could only affect the joint property of Allison & Bratton and the individual property of the defendant Allison. The separate property of Bratton could not have been levied on by virtue of the judgment, nor could the sheriff apply the proceeds of such property, when sold, to such judgment or execution, when it appeared from the record that he had not been served with process in the case.

*251

The next question to be disposed of is that of the effect of the statute of limitations. If that defence had been set up to the action when originally commenced, it would not have been applicable, because the causes of action were not then barred. If, however, the action is to be regarded as having been commenced at the date of the service of the present summons upon the defendant Bratton, the result would be quite different.

As this question is new here, reference has been made to decisions made elsewhere, showing how it has been dealt with by the courts of New York, from which state we derive these provisions of our code. The case of Bruen v. Bokee, 4 Denio, 56, relied on by the counsel for defendant Bratton, does not appear to me to apply to the case here. That was a proceeding by action on a joint judgment against a party not served in the original action. Such was the remedy provided by the statutes of New York at that time. The plea was "that the cause of action" upon which the suit was brought "did not accrue at any time within six years next before the commencement of this suit." The question presented, therefore, was, did the judgment prevent the running of the statute of limitations? Upon the authority of Carma v. Townsend, 6 Wend., 206, it was held that the plea was good.

The case of Berlin v. Hall, 48 Barb., 442, is more to the point. The code in New York, prior to 1847, authorized the proceeding by summons, as here, and allowed the party summoned to answer, denying the judgment, or setting up any defence which may have arisen subsequently; and, in addition thereto, if he be proceeded against according to section 375, he may make the same defence which he might have originally made to the action. By an amendment to this section, adopted in 1849, the following words were added: "except the statute of *limitations." It was contended in Berlin v. Hall that the proper construction of the section, as amended, required that the words added should be considered as transferred to the first paragraph, so as to qualify that portion of the section authorizing the party to interpose defences arising subsequently to the judgment. The court held otherwise; and, arguendo, remarked that the code, by its literal rendering, precluded the defence of the statute of limitations when it arose before the commencement of the original action, but allowed it when it arose subsequently. If this were correct, the judgment would have the effect of renewing the causes of action, but leaving them subject to the statute from that time, as in the case of a new contract. It proceeded upon the principle that the suffering of a judgment by a joint debtor was equivalent to an admission of the debt, which, under the decisions there, as here, would renew the debt against all the parties to the contract. In order to give effect to the five words added to this section of the New York code by the amendment of 1849, this construction was necessary and not unreasonable.

*252

Since the decision in Berlin v. Hall (1867), these words have been stricken out by a subsequent amendment, and our code has the section as last amended. In lieu of the words "except the statute of limitations," we have the following: "If the summons were originally commenced, and such defence had been then interposed." (See Code, § 380, formerly 396.) A party proceeded against, in a case of this character, is allowed to answer, "denying the judgment," or "setting up any defence which may have arisen subsequently," and also any defence which he might have made to the action, if the summons had been served on him at the time when the same was originally commenced, and such defence had been then interposed to such action. If the defence of the statute had been "then interposed," it would not have been good, and under this section no greater effect can be given to it now when it is a defence which has arisen since the judgment and sufficient time has elapsed to make it a good plea. The language employed by the court in Berlin v. Hall is applicable to this case: "It had long been held that a payment or a promise by one member of a firm revived the debt and barred the statute, although the firm had been long dissolved at the time of the pay*ment or promise. * * * The amendment gives the same effect to a judgment, which is in effect a confession of the debt by record evidence." The language of our code as effectually excludes the plea of the statute as the express exception inserted by the amendment of 1849, and the effect is the same as that given to the exception by the decision in Berlin v. Hall.

*253

The summons against the defendant Bratton was served March, 1882. The judgment against Allison & Bratton was entered February 14, 1874. The defendant, J. R. Bratton, left the state October 15, 1871. He returned in June, 1872, remained one month, and again left the state, and did not return until November 19, 1878. Regarding the entry of judgment as a new starting point for the statute, and deducting the period of Dr. Bratton's absence, the bar of the statute was not complete when the present summons was served. Hence the statute of limitations is not a valid defence.

Another and simpler answer to the statute is that it is not a new action, but the service of a summons upon a joint debtor to show cause why he should not be bound by a previous judgment recovered against his co-contractor in an action commenced before the bar of the statute was complete. For the purposes of the statute, the action was commenced, as to Bratton, when the summons was served upon his co-defendant, Allison. Code, § 120. The action was not barred then, and that is the time to which reference must be had. The statute does not run pendente lite.

It has been supposed that the execution of plaintiff should be credited with the amount derived from the sales of personal property under the order dated February 24, 1874. I arrive at a different conclusion. The application of that money to the execution of Schieffelin & Co., though improper, was virtually assented to by Lowry, as the attorney of Bratton, acting within the scope of his authority, and was in like manner approved by the long acquiescence of Dr. Bratton without complaint. Plaintiff, without any fault on his part, and without prospect of recovery, would suffer the loss if that application of the money were now set aside.

The defendant Bratton, by his attorney, recognized the levy of the execution of Schief-

*254

felin & Co. That levy was the first *made upon the goods in question, and, if a levy at all, constituted the first lien on them. That lien having been recognized by the other parties interested, and having been acted on by the sheriff, without notice of dissent or complaint until after a lapse of six years, when the sheriff, if he were held liable for the same, could no longer protect himself by a recovery of the money from the party to whom it was paid, and the plaintiff himself would be without remedy, the defendant Bratton and all the other parties so consenting and acquiescing, are equitably estopped from asserting that the said application was not correct. Doe v. Oliver, 2 Sm. Lead. Cas., 562; Bollmann v. Bollmann, 6 S. C., 46.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the said plaintiff, Mary L. Adickes, executrix of H. F. Adickes, deceased, have judgment against the defendant, J. R. Bratton, for the amount of the aforesaid judgment recovered by the said H. F. Adickes against the said Allison & Bratton, for the amount of said judgment and interest thereon now remaining due and unpaid; that it be referred to the clerk of this court to compute the amount so due and unpaid, in accordance with the principles herein declared; and that the plaintiff have judgment for the same, together with the costs of these proceedings, to be adjusted by the clerk, and that plaintiff have execution therefor.

From this decision, J. R. Bratton appealed on the following exceptions:

1. Because of error in holding that the Court of Common Pleas for York was legally holden on February 14, 1874, and the judgment then rendered in favor of H. F. Adickes against Allison & Bratton was a valid judgment.

2. Because of error in holding that said judgment, if properly rendered, had not been satisfied, in whole or in part, by the sales of personal property, levied under the execution thereon in March, 1874.

3. Because of error in holding that the dormant execution of Schieffelin & Co. against said firm was entitled to be paid out of the proceeds of sales of personal property, by reason of a consent order for said sale, in preference to valid existing executions of active energy.

*255

*4. Because of error in holding that a consent to sell, made on February 24, 1874, could give validity and priority to a void levy alleged to have been previously made under a dormant execution.

5. Because of error in admitting oral evidence of a levy under a dormant execution, when such execution, on being produced, contained no evidence of such levy.

6. Because of error in holding that J. T. Lowry had authority, as attorney in fact, to consent to a renewal of an execution against the firm of Allison & Bratton under the power produced, which limited his authority to the individual concerns of J. R. Bratton.

7. Because of error in holding in effect that a consent to renew a dormant execution gives it vitality, without taking out new process from the court.

8. Because of error in holding that the defendant Bratton had acquiesced in the illegal application of moneys to a judgment not of force against him, and while he was absent from the state.

9. Because of error in not holding that the statute of limitations could be interposed as a bar to plaintiff's claim.

10. Because the judgment rendered against the defendant is a nullity, inasmuch as it fails to specify any sum whatever to be inserted therein.

Messrs. Hart & Hart and Giles J. Patterson, for appellant, cited 15 Stat., 325, 456; Const., art. IV., § 16; 3 S. C., 567; 7 Id., 374; Gen. Stat. of 1872, ch. XXII, § 20; Freem. Judg., § 121; 20 Ark., 77; 1 Bail., 142; 2 McMull., 156; Dudley, 46; 19 S. C., 461; 2 Bail., 361, 413; Code (1870), §§ 306–316; 3 Hill, 283, 292; 3 McCord, 560; 13 S. C., 120; 5 Id., 58.

Mr. C. E. Spencer, contra.

April 26, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. [Omitting the statement of facts, which is fully given in the Circuit decision.] Exception 1 makes the point that the original judgment of H. F.

*256

Adickes against *Allison & Bratton was illegal and void, for the reason that the court which rendered it did not have jurisdiction to do so. [Here follows a statement of the facts as given in the Circuit decision, ante, p. *246.] Did the court have jurisdiction to render the judgment at the time it was rendered? "The power to hear and determine a cause is jurisdiction; it is coram judice whenever a case is presented which brings this power into action; but before this power can be affirmed to exist, it must be made to appear that the law has given the tribunal capacity to entertain the complaint against the person or thing sought to be charged or affected." Freem. Judg., § 118. There is no doubt here as to the subject matter and the parties being within the jurisdiction of the court or as to the alleged judgment having been rendered according to the usual practice in such cases. But the technical objection is raised that its date shows that it must have been rendered when the tribunal which undertook to do so was not in judicial harness or possessed of that peculiar virtue known as judicial power.

The Court of Common Pleas is a court of general jurisdiction, and the records of such courts are absolute verities, not to be impugned by averment or proof to the contrary. In a collateral proceeding, nothing shall be intended to be out of the jurisdiction of a superior court but that which expressly appears to be so. Freem. Judg., § 124. But it is said that the record itself here shows that the alleged judgment was rendered on February 14, 1874, which the statute shows was a time not within the regular term for York county. That is true; but the same record shows that the Circuit judge directed the court to be adjourned to another day, which he had the power to do under section 30 of the code of procedure (1870), which provided that "the judge of the Circuit Court shall have power to direct any Circuit Court in his Circuit to be adjourned over to a future day designated in a written order to the clerk of said court, whenever there is a dangerous and general disease at the place where such court is usually holden." The judge of the Circuit Court in this instance exercised that power, and no inquiry is admissible as to whether there was or was not "a dangerous and general disease" at Yorkville at the time fixed for the regular term of *the court. It was in the province of the judge to determine that matter for himself, and we are not at liberty to assume that he decided it wrong. Even if in that regard he committed error in fact, we do not see that it should follow that a judgment regularly entered at the adjourned term would for that reason necessarily be void in the absolute sense. See Freem. Judg., § 122, and notes.

*257

Exceptions from 2 to 8, inclusive, complain of the decision of the Circuit judge adverse to the plea of payment. That was a question of fact, and this being a proceeding at law, this court has no right to review the evidence upon that subject. The decision of the Circuit Court must stand as the special verdict of a jury. It is alleged, however, that there was involved in the finding an error of law in this that the Circuit judge held in effect that consent to renew a dormant execution gave it vitality without taking out new process by the court and that J. T. Lowry, as attorney for Bratton, had the authority to consent to the renewal of an execution against the firm of Allison & Bratton under his power, which limited his authority to the individual concerns of Bratton. In very general terms the facts are that certain personal property, perishable in its nature, drugs, &c., had been levied by the sheriff under the executions of Schieffelin & Co., McGill's administrators, and the aforesaid execution of H. F. Adickes; and on February 24, 1874, John T. Lowry, the agent of John R. Bratton, consented to an order, setting out all these executions according to their dates, reciting the levy and directing sale of said articles so levied; which sale was made and the proceeds applied to the execution of Schieffelin & Co., which was the oldest, and, as stated, had been first levied.

Under these circumstances, it was urged for the defendant Bratton, that the execution of the plaintiff Adickes (though junior in date) should have been credited with the amount of said sales, and, that not having been done by the sheriff, the said judgment to that extent must be regarded as ipso facto paid. We think that in this objection the precise point ruled by the judge is overlooked. He did not hold that the consent to the sale in the terms of the order directing it, was intended or had the effect, without new process, actually to renew the execution of *Schieffelin & Co., to which the money was applied. But as we understand it, he held, first, that the very general and comprehensive terms of the power of attorney to Lowry, authorized him to consent to the sale, which under the circumstances was a virtual consent to the application of the proceeds as made; and second, that after such consent had been given and acted on by all parties, it estopped Bratton himself from afterwards objecting to it, precisely as if he in person had given that consent. Taking this view of the rulings of the Circuit judge, we cannot say that he committed error of law, either as to the right of Lowry under the power of attorney from Bratton to give his consent to the sale, or as to the effect of that consent so given and acquiesced in by all parties since 1874—ten years ago.

*258

Exception 9 objects that the Circuit judge committed error in not holding that the statute of limitations could be interposed as a bar. Upon this subject the decision of the Circuit judge is so full and clear that we can add nothing to it. Section 380 of the revised code (1882) provides in such case as this as follows: "Upon such summons any party summoned may answer within the time specified therein, denying the judgment, or setting up any defence thereto, which may have arisen subsequently to such judgment, and in addition thereto, if the party be proceeded against according to section 377, he may make any defence which he might have made in the action if the summons had been served on him at the time when the same was originally commenced, and such defence had been then interposed to such action." If the defence of the statute "had been then interposed," it would not have been good, and under this section no greater effect can be given to it now, when it is a defence which has arisen since the judgment, and sufficient time has not elapsed to make it a good plea. We concur with the Circuit judge in his interpretation of this section of the code.

The last exception is: "Because the judgment rendered against the defendant is a nullity, inasmuch as it fails to specify any sum whatever to be inserted therein." A judgment is registration of what the court decides. In order to authorize an execution, its first requisite is that it must be final. Section 266 of our code defines a judgment to be "the final determination of the rights of *the parties in the action." And in reference to what is such a final determination, Mr. Freeman, at section 12 of his work on judgments, says: "Any judgment or decree, leaving some further act to be done by the court before the rights of the parties are determined, is interlocutory; but if it so completely fixes the rights of the parties that the court has nothing further to do in the action, then it is final." See Ex parte Farrars, 13 S. C., 258. Taking this as the test, it seems to us that the decision of Judge Kershaw was a final judgment. It disposed of every issue in the case, directed judgment for the amount remaining unpaid upon the first judgment of H. F. Adickes against Allison & Bratton, and ordered execution to issue. Nothing else was left for the Court to do.

*259

But it is suggested that, although the whole case was decided, the decision was not sufficiently definite, inasmuch as it failed to name the precise amount in dollars and cents. The objection really goes to the form rather than the substance. The decision did give judgment for a particular amount, to wit, the balance due on a record of the court, which in the summons was set out particularly. Nothing was lacking but a calculation of the interest, which was not necessary; but if so, being a mere clerical matter, it was referred to the officer of the court, whose duty it was to enter the formal judgment of the court. It is a proper case for the application of the maxim: Id certum est quid certum reddi potest.

We agree that there is no longer a provision of the code declaring that the decision of a referee upon the issues submitted "shall stand as the judgment of the court." But this was not a reference of issues, as to which confirmation was necessary. On the contrary, it was a mere incident to the enforcement of the judgment already rendered; somewhat like the taxation of costs, or a reference to the clerk in our old practice under the act of 1809, to ascertain the precise amount due after order for judgment by default upon a liquidated demand, which could be done by a mere inspection of the paper. In an action at law tried by the court, we do not understand that the decision is the formal judgment in the case under the seal of the court. It is required *to be filed and "judgment upon the decision shall be entered accordingly."

*260

We do not think the decision of the Circuit judge was fatally defective for want of particularity in stating the amount adjudged to the plaintiff; but we think it was error to add the interest to the principal, and thus make the interest, at the time the absent partner, Bratton, was declared liable, an interest bearing amount. Section 377 of the code declares that the partner not served in the first instance, but summoned afterwards, "shall be bound by the (first) judgment in the same manner as if he had been originally summoned." As this is the first case which has reached us, under sections 377 and 378 of the code, we think it may be well to settle the practice; and in order to avoid the necessity of entering two judgments upon one joint cause of action, that the judgment against the partner not served in the first instance, should run somewhat in this form: The judgment herein of H. F. Adickes, having been recovered against the partnership of Allison & Bratton and also against James B. Allison, who alone was served with process, and the other partner, J. R. Bratton, now having been served and heard, it is adjudged, that the said Bratton be bound by the aforesaid judgment against the partnership of Allison & Bratton from this date; and it is further ordered that the plaintiff have leave to enter execution on said judgment against the said Bratton personally.

Taking the view that under the code the defendant Bratton was simply adjudged "to be bound by the first judgment against Allison & Bratton," there should have been no addition of interest to the amount due at the time of the second judgment. Bratton was liable, but the order for the execution to issue should have been for the balance of the first judgment, viz.: $511.58, with interest from April 3, 1877, until paid.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be so modified as to conform to the conclusions herein announced, and that in all other respects it be affirmed.

---

21 S. C. *261

*McPHERSON v. McPHERSON.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐712.]

This court will not consider alleged refusals to charge when the requests and refusals so to charge nowhere appear in the "Case," but only in the exceptions.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Anderson, 26 S. C. 603, 2 S. E. 699; Arthur v. Screven, 39 S. C. 84, 17 S. E. 640; Sloan & Son v. Courtenay, 54 S. C. 345, 32 S. E. 431.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2951; Dec. Dig. ⇐712.]

[2. Execution ⇐272.]

At a sheriff's sale an attorney gave notice that the land was claimed by his client, a third person, saying he held in his hands two deeds for this land. On being asked by A permission to see them, he refused, saying, "They are on record." A then purchased the land. As recorded, one of these deeds was without seal, but the original was sealed. Held, that A was not remitted by the attorney to the record as a substitute for the actual notice given, and was therefore not a purchaser without notice. McIver, A. J., concurring in result.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 785; Dec. Dig. ⇐272.]

[3. Fraudulent Conveyances ⇐91.]

A party, indebted to several persons, conveyed a tract of land to his sister, in payment of two notes given for gold borrowed several years before, and at the date of his deed barred by the statute of limitations. Held, that adding to the notes the premium on gold at the time they fell due, and paying the notes when barred, were not badges of fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 235; Dec. Dig. ⇐91.]

[4. Fraudulent Conveyances ⇐74.]

In charging the jury that a consideration, as to the adequacy of which persons may differ, will not avoid a deed on the ground of inadequacy, but that it must be a grossly inadequate consideration to be a badge of fraud, the Circuit judge committed no error.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in McGhee v. Wells, 57 S. C. 285, 35 S. E. 529, 76 Am. St. Rep. 567.

For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 187; Dec. Dig. ⇐74.]

[5. Fraudulent Conveyances ⇐102.]

When an insolvent brother had conveyed his home place to his sister, in payment of an antecedent debt, and a few days afterwards the sister reconveyed to a trustee in trust for the wife and children of such brother, who continued to occupy the place, the judge charged that, if the deed to the sister was made without agreement for the reconveyance, and was not induced by her promise to reconvey, but was really in satisfaction of the debt, the deed would not be avoided, even though the brother expected that his wife and children would receive some donation from his sister. Held, that in this there was no error.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in McElwee v. Kennedy, 56 S. C. 170, 34 S. E. 86.

For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 331; Dec. Dig. ⟸102.]

[6. Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸146.]

If after such reconveyance the brother remained in possession by permission of the trustee, managing the property as agent for his wife and children, his possession was the possession of the wife and children, and would not avoid the deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 471; Dec. Dig. ⟸146.]

[7. Appeal and Error ⟸969.]

In charging a jury, the judge may arrange and classify the testimony, and in doing so, much must be left to his discretion. It cannot be declared error of law that the judge, in the opinion of counsel, stated the facts on one side with more fulness, clearness, and emphasis than he did on the other.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Kaminitsky v. Northeastern R. Co., 25 S. C. 66.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3845–3848; Dec. Dig. ⟸969.]

Before Pressley, J., Marion, October, 1883.

*262

*The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. G. W. Dargan, J. J. Ward, and C. A. Woods, for appellant.

The charge of the presiding judge was a violation of the constitution, art. IV., § 26. 16 S. C., 148, 629; 15 Id., 392; 18 Id., 108. The facts here proved fraud, and Miss McPherson and those claiming under her took nothing. Gen. Stat., § 1786; 1 Hill, 380; 2 Bail., 324, 118; 1 Hill, 24; McMull. Eq. 31; 1 Hill Ch., 304; 2 Id., 34; 2 Bail., 205; 4 S. C., 257; 16 Id., 610. Notice, to supply the want of registration, must be full, explicit, and clearly proved. Speer Eq., 212; 3 Strob., 266, 565; 6 Wall., 91. Notice that defendants had title was not actual notice of the existence of the deed, and was constructive notice only of what the record showed. 2 Pars. Cont., 671. Plaintiff having asked to see the deed and been refused, had no further means of acquiring the knowledge desired, and therefore had no notice, actual or constructive. On the record there was no seal. She pursued her inquiry, but was refused an inspection of the original. Her means of information were therefore exhausted. 6 Rich. Eq., 181; 7 Id., 519; 10 Id., 149; 37 Wisc., 449; 46 Mo., 472.

Messrs. W. W. Sellers and Johnson & Johnson, contra.

August 15, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. C. E. McPherson owned a tract of land, containing 818 acres, known as his "Home place," and also another tract known as the "Willow Creek place." He was in debt, owing his sister, E. Ann McPherson, two promissory notes, one bearing date in January, 1867, for $444, and the other a few days after, in May, 1867, for $245. These notes were given for gold borrowed at the dates indicated. C. E. McPherson also owed a large debt to Wm. K. Ryan, secured by a mortgage of the Willow Creek place, about $2,500 to Samuel McPherson as administrator, and about $800 to Samuel McPherson individually.

On January 4, 1876, more than six years after the notes for *the gold bore date, a statement of Miss McPherson's debt was made, which, adding a premium of 30 per cent. for gold and counting the interest at what was then customary, 12 per cent., amounted to $1,850; and in payment and satisfaction of this debt, C. E. McPherson conveyed to his sister the Home place aforesaid by deed bearing date January 4, 1876, which was recorded on January 8, 1876. The said Miss Ann McPherson, on January 7, 1876, in consideration of her love and affection for the wife and children of her brother, C. E. McPherson, and the nominal sum of $10, conveyed the said land to J. P. Gregg, as trustee for them. Jerome P. Chase drew both deeds—that to Miss McPherson and hers to Gregg, trustee. Miss McPherson wanted her debt settled, and the land conveyed for the benefit of her brother's wife and children, so that he could no more endanger it by his bad management. C. E. McPherson said he expected to remove to Willow Creek, which was mortgaged to Ryan, but concluded to remain on the Home place after he learned that it was conveyed for the benefit of his wife and children; and he with his family did remain upon it. It seems that the record of the deed to Miss Ann McPherson had no seal attached, but the deed itself, the original, had a seal.

*263

At the time of these transactions, C. E. McPherson had not been sued; but afterwards, on October 30, 1881, Samuel McPherson, as administrator, recovered a judgment against him for $2,626.61; and under the execution based on this judgment, the said Home tract of land was levied and sold by the sheriff, as still the property of the defendant in execution. On the day of sale, Mr. Sellers, as attorney for defendants, forbade the sale, on the ground that C. E. McPherson had previously sold and conveyed the land. Before the sale, when asked to show the deeds, he declined, saying that they were "on record"; but when he gave notice of the title of the defendants, he had both deeds, the originals, in his hands. The sheriff sold, and Mrs. Frances A. McPherson bid off the land for $100, took sheriff's title and brought this action against C. E. McPherson and his wife and children and their trustee, Gregg, to recover the premises.

Much testimony was offered on one side to impeach the bona fides of the deeds to and by Miss Ann McPherson, and on the *other to sustain them. Under the charge of the judge the jury found for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

*264

I. Because his honor refused to charge the following propositions:

1. "If the plaintiff did not have actual notice of a duly executed deed, she stands in the position of a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, and the verdict should be for the plaintiff.

2. "The statement by the defendant's attorney, at the sheriff's sale, referring to the record, which was without a seal, and refusing at the same time to allow the plaintiff's attorney to inspect the original papers then in his hands, does not affect the plaintiff with notice of a duly executed deed, and the verdict should therefore be for the plaintiff.

3. "To defeat the plaintiff's recovery, notice of the deed must be proved, other than the record and the statement made at the sale by the defendant's attorney.

4. "If the defendants had a valid title, derived from C. E. McPherson, and refused to supply the defects in the records by allowing the plaintiff to inspect the deed before her purchase, they are now estopped from setting it up against her.

5. "A deed is fraudulent when made to defeat the collection of a debt, and the law implies fraud—(1) When the property is immediately reconveyed for the benefit of the debtor's family. (2) When an absolute conveyance is made in payment of an antecedent debt. (3) When the debtor and grantor remains in possession of the property conveyed. (4) When there is a reconveyance to a trustee for the benefit of the debtor's family, and the trustee and all parties concerned totally disregard and ignore the terms of the trust deed, and the debtor retains the possession and management of the property without any contract with the trustee, and without any accountability to him.

6. "If C. E. McPherson retained possession of the land in dispute, using it as her own, after he had conveyed it to his sister, E. A. McPherson, in consideration of a pre-existing debt, he being at the time heavily in debt, the law infers fraud, and the inference is incapable of being rebutted by proof.

*265

*II. "And his honor erred in charging the jury:

1. "That the notice given by Mr. Sellers at the sheriff's sale was sufficient.

2. "That the consideration in this case must be grossly inadequate to constitute a badge of fraud.

3. "That even where a deed is made by a debtor in payment of an antecedent debt, for the purpose of defeating other creditors, the deed is valid unless the grantee was a party to the fraud.

4. "That the adding of thirty per cent. premium for gold, and the calculation of interest at twelve per cent. per annum on notes which were not payable in gold, which expressed no rate of interest, and which may have been barred by the statute of limitations, do not of themselves constitute badges of fraud.

5. "That the proof was that Miss McPherson frequently applied for payment, and C. E. McPherson frequently promised to pay.

6. "That Miss Ann McPherson did not know of the indebtedness of C. E. McPherson at the time of the execution of the deed.

7. "That in order to avoid the deed of C. E. McPherson to his sister, there must be not only an expectation on his part, but an express promise that she should reconvey for the benefit of his family.

8. "That it was a fulfilment of the terms of the trust deed, and not a badge of fraud, for C. E. McPherson to remain in the occupation and enjoyment of the land, if he remained there, not claiming it as his own, but in right of his wife and children.

9. "Because his honor erred in charging the jury—(1) In stating fully, and in the strongest possible terms, all the testimony relied on to show that the consideration of the deed was bona fide and adequate, while he stated very incompletely and in the weakest possible light the testimony tending to show the inadequacy of the consideration, thus intimating his own estimate of the testimony on the subject. (2) In intimating to the jury that the deed from C. E. McPherson to his sister, and from her to J. P. Gregg, trustee for his wife and children, were not parts of the same fraudulent transaction, and in stating as strongly as possible all the testimony relied on to show that there was no understanding that the land should be reconveyed for the benefit *of McPherson and his family, while none of the testimony tending to prove the fraudulent transaction was stated. (3) In stating in the strongest possible way all the testimony in behalf of the defendants, in explanation of C. E. McPherson's possession, while no allusion is made to the testimony on behalf of the plaintiff on this point.

*266

10. "Because the presiding judge erred in charging the jury with respect to all matters of fact involved in the controversy and submitted to their determination.

11. "Because the judge charged the jury that if they believed C. E. McPherson remained in possession of the land, in dispute, working it as the agent of his wife and children, by permission of the trustee, such possession would not be a badge of fraud, though there was no pretence that the so-called trustee ever gave such permission, and no testimony whatever going to show that the so-called trustee had any knowledge even of the existence of the so-called trust deed.

12. "Because, although the judge undertook to state to the jury all the material testimony, he omitted to allude even to the uncontradicted testimony of J. P. Chase, a witness for defendants, as well as of the plaintiff, which testimony was to the effect that about the time of the so-called deed from C. E. McPherson to Ann McPherson, the said C. E. McPherson told the witness that his reason for executing the so-called deed was, because he was afraid that the Willow Creek place would not sell for enough to pay Ryan's mortgage, and Ryan was mean enough to sell his other property."

This is an action at law for the recovery of a tract of land, and the question involved being one of alleged fraud, and the testimony somewhat conflicting, it was peculiarly proper for the decision of a jury. This court has no jurisdiction to review the testimony and weigh its force and effect, but only to consider alleged errors of law in the charge of the judge.

As to the error of law charged on the part of the judge in refusing certain requests to charge. These alleged requests are printed in the brief, but among the plaintiff's exceptions. They are not in the "Case" prepared for this court. The judge makes no allusion whatever to them in his charge, which fortunately touched all *the points of the case and is reported in full. Under these circumstances we are not authorized to consider that these requests were regularly made and refused by the judge. It is a rule absolutely necessary to the proper and satisfactory dispatch of the large business of this court that nothing can be considered here except what appears in the official record. Exceptions of counsel and the argument thereon, as we have repeatedly held, are no part of the "Case," but in their nature must be ex parte. As was said in the case of the State v. Wilder, 13 S. C., 347: "It must be manifest to every one that we have no right to decide a case upon facts which do not appear in the record, and can only be learned from ex parte statements of counsel made in the argument;" and see the case of Thompson v. Thompson, 6 S. C., 279.

*267

It was stated at the bar, that the requests were read in court, but it seems, not until after the judge had made his charge to the jury, and that he took no notice of them. We suppose the judge, having charged the jury on all points deemed necessary, was unwilling to repeat what he had already said to the jury. Rule XI. of the Circuit Court requires that "all requests for instructions to the jury shall be submitted to the court in writing, without comment, by counsel on either side, at the close of the arguments." Fortunately, from the charge being printed in full, it appears that the judge did charge on all the points indicated in the paper containing the requests, and also what he charged, so that the objections made can be considered under the exceptions to the charge.

Exception I. complains that the judge charged that the notice given by Mr. Sellers at the sheriff's sale was sufficient. On that subject the judge charged as follows: "Was not Mr. Sellers' notice sufficient notice to her? The testimony is, Mr. Sellers appeared at the sale with two papers in his hands, and gave notice that he had two papers in his hand conveying that property, and forbade the sale. The attorney for the plaintiff, Mr. Woods, approached Mr. Sellers and said, 'Let me see the deed.' Mr. Sellers petulantly refused and said, 'They are on record.' I do not think that is such a reference to the record as to bind Mr. Sellers to the notice there given. The inclination of my opinion is, that a verbal notice was sufficient at that sale. I don't remember any case in which I have given such notice. At all events, *having no light upon the subject, I now charge you that the verbal notice of Mr. Sellers, that the land had been conveyed, was sufficient notice to put the party on the inquiry. It would not have been so if Mr. Sellers had referred him to the record under such circumstances as would have bound him to what the record said. If his intention was to stand by the verbal notice, he had a right to do so, and his verbal notice was sufficient," &c.

*268

We suppose that the seal on the deed to Miss McPherson, having been omitted on the registry book, the record furnished no notice of that deed; or rather, the record gave notice of a paper as it was on record, that is to say, of a paper which was no valid conveyance. This, however, was no fault of Miss McPherson and did not actually avoid her deed, which had a seal. But the effect was the same as if there had been a total failure to record it. It is too well settled now to be controverted that express notice of a deed will stand in the place of recording as to all persons claiming to be subsequent creditors or purchasers. Tart v. Crawford, 1 McCord, 265; McFall v. Sherrard, Harper, 295; Knotts v. Geiger, 4 Rich., 34; Barr v. Kinard, 3 Strob., 73; Reeves v. Sims, 10 S. C., 308.

It is urged, however, that this was not explicit notice, that it was not sufficient for Mr. Sellers to stand up with two deeds (originals) in his hands, and saying "that he ha[d] two papers in his hands, conveying that property, and forbade the sale." We think this was sufficient notice to all present not to buy the property—that it was claimed by others. Could any one present and buying after this notice, properly claim that he had purchased without notice? We do not think so. As was said by Judge Withers in Barr v. Kinard, supra, "The notice required under former acts has been characterized in Tart v.

Crawford, as necessary to be 'actual' and 'explicit.' But notice of what? Scarcely of the particulars, but rather, it seems to us, of the fact that there was an existing lien, of a particular description, in favor of a certain party, upon the property, in the view of one about to become subsequent creditor or purchaser. Would not this subserve all the purposes supposed to be in contemplation of the law, the leading end being to admonish the purchaser or creditor of a snare?" In the case of Reeves v. Sims, supra, it *seems to have been held sufficient simply to forbid the sheriff's sale.

*269

But admitting that the notice was sufficient generally, it is insisted that it was not sufficient as to the plaintiff, for the reason that at the sheriff's sale her attorney asked Mr. Sellers "to let him see the original deeds," and Mr. Sellers refused, saying, "They are on record"; that the plaintiff is not, like others present, bound by the notice of the original deeds in the hands of Mr. Sellers, but can say that she had no notice whatever except that afforded by the imperfect registry; that the clients of Mr. Sellers, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, lost all benefit of the actual notice by his saying, "They are on record." It seems to us that this would be a narrow construction and not required by the facts of the case. There is no evidence that Mr. Sellers knew that the record was imperfect, or that, by making the statement that the deed was on record, he meant to substitute that record, whether true or false, for the actual notice he was then in the act of giving. If it had been the intention to rely upon the record as constructive notice, there would have been no need of the actual notice then given. We suppose that, by the statement, "They are on record," Mr. Sellers meant no more than to give a sort of reason for withholding the originals.

It is very apparent that the plaintiff did have actual notice that there was a claim of title to the land under an alleged conveyance. It is not claimed that as to the existence of such paper she was without notice; but, assuming the perfect correctness of the registry, she proceeded on the ground, the legal theory, that the deed was void for the want of a seal. It turned out that in this she was mistaken, or it may be misled—not, however, with the knowledge and consent of the defendants, or by any intentional act on their part, but by the accidental omission in the registry of the deed. It was probably as great a surprise to the defendants that the record was without seal as it was to the plaintiff that the original had a seal. Under the charge of the judge, the jury found that Mr. Sellers "intended to stand by his verbal notice, and not to adopt the notice afforded by the record," and we cannot say that such notice was insufficient.

Exceptions 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 complain of the judge's *charge on the different badges of fraud, which makes it necessary to ascertain what he did charge on the different points indicated.

*270

(1) As to the manner in which the gold debt of Miss McPherson was ascertained, the judge charged as follows: "The question is, was there any fraud in computing that transaction by adding 30 per cent. as a premium for the gold? You have heard the testimony, and you must judge that for yourselves. If that was the premium upon gold at the date, one day after the day of lending, and if the law in reference to the computation of the value of Confederate money is to govern in the matter, then the adding of 30 per cent. to the money was not unfair and unlawful in him; but if, on the contrary, that was an afterthought, if you come to the conclusion, from all the circumstances, that in 1876 that matter was arranged for the purpose of raising the supposed amount of the consideration, then the adding of that in order to make the consideration look large would be a badge of fraud." We cannot say this was error, or that there was error in reference to the statute of limitations. C. E. McPherson was under no moral obligation to plead the statute against his sister, even if he could have done so. Weinges v. Cash, 15 S. C., 44.

(2) As to the alleged inadequacy of the consideration, the judge charged: "Another badge of fraud is the inadequacy of the consideration. Well, upon that point my opinion is that a consideration about which persons may differ as to whether it is adequate or otherwise is not such a one as will avoid a deed. The term used is 'grossly inadequate consideration,' &c. It must be a consideration so far short of the value of the property as to arouse a presumption in the mind that the person who takes that property takes it under some kind of secret trust. When property is conveyed for a grossly inadequate consideration, then that becomes a strong badge of fraud, and one which warrants the jury in setting it aside," &c. It seems to us that this ruling was in conformity to the settled law.

(3) As to the second conveyance for the benefit of the wife and children of the vendor, C. E. McPherson, and the effect of his remaining in possession after the execution of the deed to his sister, the judge charged as follows: "This is a conveyance by *one in debt to a creditor for a precedent debt, and although the law says very clearly that a debtor who cannot pay all his debts may appropriate his property so as to pay those whom he prefers to pay, yet he cannot do so lawfully if the consideration of his doing so is that he is to receive some benefit for himself. In other words, where a man owes another a debt, and his creditors are about to take his property, and he goes to that creditor and arranges with him, saying, 'I will make a preference to you if you will allow me to use the property and keep it, or if you will allow me to hold it until I can buy it back'—all arrangements of that kind are looked upon as fraudulent. Inasmuch as such arrangements cannot always be proved —generally they are hard to be proved—the law says that certain things shall be regarded as evidence, as badges of fraud. * * * It will hold not only that the debtor himself intended to defraud, but concludes that the debtor remaining in possession, the creditor also was a party to the fraud, and therefore they are both tainted with the fraudulent matter. and the deed will be set aside because both debtor and creditor intended to defraud. That is one badge of fraud, and is regarded as a conclusive badge of fraud. * * * One of these deeds was executed on January 4th and the other on the 7th, and both recorded on the same day. Are they now the same transaction? In other words, was the whole thing agreed upon between them before the first deed was executed? If it was so agreed upon as that the making of the second deed was a part of the consideration of the first, then that is such a badge of fraud as will avoid the transaction; but if it was not a matter agreed upon, if he really made this deed to his sister in order to satisfy that debt with her, and she received it in settlement of the debt, without intending at that time to make his wife and children her beneficiaries in reference to that land, the deed should not be avoided, unless that matter was communicated to him as a motive for making that deed. In other words, the mere expectation on his part that his wife and children might receive some donation from his sister would not make the deed void," &c. We cannot say that this was error. It will be observed that the land was not reconveyed to the vendor himself, but to a trustee for the benefit of his wife and children.

*271

*272

*In regard to his remaining in possession, the judge charged: "Did he remain there in his own right, retaining possession of the property as he did before, or did he remain there with his wife and children with the permission of the trustee, he managing the property as the agent of his wife and children, as any other husband would have done under the circumstances? · If so, then it was the possession of the wife and children," &c. This seems to us to be in conformity to the doctrine of Jones & Briggs v. Blake & wife, 2 Hill Ch., 629, where it was held that "the decision in Smith v. Henry, 1 Hill, 16, that a debtor in giving a preference by conveyance of his property to one creditor over another, shall not secure an advantage to himself at the expense of creditors as the price of such preference, means a certain direct benefit or advantage to be derived from the use of the property. And therefore where a debtor transferred slaves to his daughter in satisfaction of a precedent debt, and retained possession of them under an agreement to pay hire, the conveyance was held to be valid, and was sustained against the other creditors. If the possession is satisfactorily explained, it will not necessarily avoid the deed. Pregnall & Bro. v. Miller & Kelly.[1]

But assuming that the law was charged correctly, all the other exceptions complain that the Circuit judge violated art. IV., § 26, of the constitution, in charging the jury "in respect to matters of fact." No particular words or phrases are pointed out as constituting the alleged violation; but an opinion is expressed that the judge, in charging upon the different alleged badges of fraud, "stated fully and in the strongest possible terms" all the testimony in favor of the defendants, while he omitted to call the attention of the jury to some evidence tending to favor the view of the plaintiff, and that which he did state was referred to "very incompletely and in the weakest possible light," &c. As was said in the case of the State v. Summers, 19 S. C., 94, "there is no more difficult duty imposed upon this court than that of deciding questions arising under this section of the constitution, the chief difficulty arising from the vague nature of the subject, as to what is properly embraced in the right 'to state the testi*mony.' Who can fix with certainty the exact limit and apply it to the infinite combination of circumstances which may exist?"

*273

But there are some general boundaries. It has been decided more than once that the Circuit judge has the right to arrange and classify the evidence under proper heads, in order that the jury may properly judge of its force and apply the law. Benedict v. Rose, 16 S. C., 629. It has also been recently decided, even in a state case, that there is no rule requiring the judge "in summing up" to make express reference to all the evidence in the case on pain of having the verdict set aside. As admonished by numerous decisions of this court, the Circuit judge should not in any way indicate his opinion of the facts to the jury; but he has the right to arrange the testimony, and in doing so something must necessarily, from the nature of the case, be left to the judgment and impartial discretion of that officer who is personally present, and before whom the testimony is offered. If desirable, it would not be practicable to take an absolute control over that discretion, which properly exercised and in due subordination to the rule of the constitution is beyond the reach of this court. It would be said in every case that important testimony had been omitted.

We cannot declare it error of law that counsel are of opinion that in referring to the evidence thought to be important the Circuit judge stated it with more fulness, clearness, and emphasis on one side than on the other. Opinions of opposing counsel would not be likely to agree upon that subject. Most of the questions of fact were so evenly balanced that differences of opinion might well be entertained. They were delicate in their nature, and properly for the jury, which, under a long and careful charge, has decided them; and we see no error of law so gross as to justify us in setting aside the verdict and reopening this family controversy.

[1] This case will be found at a subsequent page of this volume. [21 S. C. 385, 53 Am. Rep. 684.]

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred.

Mr. Justice McIVER. I concur in the result, but I cannot *agree to what is said in the opinion in reference to the notice given at the sale by Mr. Sellers, on behalf of the defendants. If he had simply contented himself with forbidding the sale, or giving verbal notice that the land had been previously conveyed, the notice would, as held in Reeves v. Sims, 10 S. C., 308, have been sufficient. It would have put a purchaser upon the inquiry, and that would have been sufficient, as is held in numerous cases. The purchaser then would have been regarded as affected with notice of whatever facts such inquiry, properly prosecuted, would have disclosed.

*274

But when such inquiry was commenced, as it was by Mr. Woods, in behalf of the plaintiff in this case, asking for an inspection of the deeds, and the inquirer was misled, whether intentionally or not, is of no consequence (and knowing Mr. Sellers well, I would not think of imputing to him an intention to deceive), then the inquirer can only be regarded as having notice of such facts as could be discovered by pursuing the channel pointed out to him by the party giving the notice. Mr. Sellers having declined, on request, to permit an examination of the original deeds, and having said they were on record, in effect referred Mr. Woods to the record for the information he was seeking, and Mr. Woods and his client could only be regarded as having such knowledge as the record furnished.

I do not see how any other view can be taken of the effect of Mr. Sellers' reply to the request of Mr. Woods. It seems to me that it is the same as if he had said, "I will not allow you to see the original deeds, but here are copies of them which you can look at;" and surely if the copies had no seals to them, Mr. Woods could only be regarded as affected with such knowledge as the copies furnished. So here, when he was referred to the record, as I think he unquestionably was by the reply of Mr. Sellers, he can only be regarded as having such notice as the record would afford. It seems to me, therefore, that the plaintiff in this case, through her attorney, can only be regarded as having notice that C. E. McPherson had undertaken to convey to his sister the land in question by a paper purporting to be a deed, lacking the essential requisite of a seal. Now, while such a paper would not be sufficient to pass the legal title, yet it might be sufficient to create *an equitable title in Miss Ann McPherson, and notice to the plaintiff, through her attorney, of such an equity would be sufficient to defeat her claim of being a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. For this reason I concur in holding that the notice was sufficient.

*275

Judgment affirmed.[2]

---

[2] This completes the cases of November Term, 1883.—REPORTER.

---

21 S. C. 275

COPELAND v. YOUNG.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐846.]

No appeal lies to this court from the findings of fact by a Circuit judge in a case involving a purely legal demand, triable by jury, but improper conclusions of law from such findings, and mere errors of calculation may be here corrected.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3347; Dec. Dig. ⇐846.]

[2. Money Paid ⇐1.]

Where A advanced money at the request of B to redeem lands of B held by a purchaser at tax-sale, and A, to secure this debt, took deed to himself from such purchaser, A may bring action against B to recover the amount so advanced, without a tender to B of such title as he (A) had.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Money Paid, Cent. Dig. § 16; Dec. Dig. ⇐1.]

[3. Set-Off and Counterclaim ⇐34.]

If an unsuccessful action to recover land could, in any case, be proper ground to sustain a suit for damages, that, as also interference with defendant's possession of such land, would be torts, and could not be set up as counterclaims to an action on contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Set-Off and Counterclaim, Cent. Dig. §§ 56, 57; Dec. Dig. ⇐34.]

[4. Set-Off and Counterclaim ⇐44.]

Plaintiff brought action against two defendants, who set up as a counter-claim money due to them for the use and occupation of land which was held by them as tenants in common. Plaintiff having recovered judgment against only one of the defendants, held, that the counterclaim was a joint demand of defendants, and could not be set up against the debt due by only one of them to the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Humbert v. Brisbane, 25 S. C. 513.

For other cases, see Set-Off and Counterclaim, Cent. Dig. § 82; Dec. Dig. ⇐44.]

[5. Pleading ⟸372.]

The court cannot adjudicate the title to land, where such title is not put in issue and is not within the scope of the pleadings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1212–1216; Dec. Dig. ⟸372.]

[6. Appeal and Error ⟸1151.]

Mere inadvertences and errors of calculation in the Circuit judgment, corrected.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4498–4506; Dec. Dig. ⟸1151.]

[This case is also cited in Garlington v. Copeland, 32 S. C. 70, 10 S. E. 616, as to issues involved.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Laurens, February, 1883.

At the hearing of this appeal, Honorable T. B. Fraser, judge of the Third Circuit, sat in the place of the Chief Justice, who had been of counsel in the cause.

*276

*The case is fully stated in the Circuit decree, which was as follows:

The complaint herein substantially alleges:

I. That plaintiff, on October 16, 1875, at the instance and for the benefit of the defendants, George F. Young and Mary Garlington, paid the sum of $377.07 for the redemption of a certain tract of land in Newberry county, before then sold for taxes, whereby said defendants recovered the possession of said land.

II. That plaintiff, on December 21, 1875, at the instance and for the benefit of the defendants above named, paid one Mathews $1,136.30 for the redemption of the Calmes Quarter tract of land in Laurens county, which had been sold and purchased by said Mathews at delinquent land sale, May 18, 1874, and conveyed by the auditor to Mathews February 24, 1875, whereby said defendants obtained full possession, and have since possessed said land.

III. That on February 12, 1878, plaintiff took from said Mathews a title deed for said land as evidence of the final redemption of the same and to secure repayment of redemption money paid as aforesaid.

IV. That at delinquent land sale for Laurens county, May 3, 1875, plaintiff bought about 1,000 acres of land for which he paid $757.51 cash, upon agreement between plaintiff and the last named defendant, that plaintiff was to retain of said tract under the purchase aforesaid about 550 acres thereof, originally belonging to estate of Wm. R. Young, for the benefit of said estate, of which estate plaintiff was administrator with will annexed, and defendants were to take possession of the remainder of said tract, about 450 acres, whereby defendants became indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $340.91, their proportionate share of said purchase money, and then agreed to pay same.

V. That for the benefit of said last named defendants, plaintiff paid taxes on the aforesaid lands in Laurens county, in possession of said defendants, from February 10, 1876, to February 10, 1879, amounting to $241.71.

VI. That plaintiff is justly entitled to repayment by said defendants of the several sums of money set forth, with interest, all of which remaining unpaid, and on January 16, 1881, with interest, amounts to $2,828.38.

*277

*VII. That defendant, Mary Garlington, is the wife of the defendant, Stobo D. Garlington.

VIII. That Mary Garlington has a valuable estate in her own right that has been benefited by the payments made as aforesaid, and should be held liable for the satisfaction thereof. Plaintiff prays judgment against defendants for the sum of $2,828.38, together with costs, and for such other relief as justice may demand.

Defendants, in their joint answer, substantially submit—

I. The defendant, Mary Garlington, states she has no knowledge of the allegations of paragraph I. of complaint. The defendant, George F. Young, admits that plaintiff redeemed the Newberry land for said defendant Young.

II. Defendant, Mary Garlington, has no knowledge of allegations in paragraph II. of complaint. The defendant Young alleges that plaintiff did agree to redeem for defendant Young the land referred to in said paragraph II., but took title in his own name. The defendants Young and Stobo D. Garlington allege that plaintiff brought action to recover this land under the deed from Mathews, and by said action and in other ways plaintiff subjected defendants to $1,000 damages by interfering with defendants' possession. Defendants say they have no knowledge of amount paid by plaintiff to Mathews, or the necessity thereof, and demand proof.

III. Defendants deny so much of paragraph III. as alleges plaintiff took title from Mathews as evidence of redemption of land and to secure repayment of redemption money.

IV. Defendants admit plaintiff bid off 1,000 acres of land as set forth in paragraph IV., but deny that it forms any part of the 1,000 acres admitted by plaintiff on day of sale to have been bid off. They allege that the 1,000 acres was bid off for defendant Young, and was so publicly announced at the bidding. Defendants deny all other allegations in paragraph IV. of complaint.

V. Defendant, Stobo D. Garlington, admits that plaintiff did pay certain taxes in 1876, but denies taxes paid as set forth. He alleges he protested against plaintiff's paying taxes after 1877. The defendants Young and

*278

Mary Garlington have no knowledge *of allegations in paragraph V. (payment of taxes) of complaint, and demand proof.

VI. Defendants deny their indebtedness to plaintiff as alleged in paragraph VI. of complaint.

VII. Defendant, Mary Garlington, admits she is seized of an estate in her own right, but has no knowledge of payments made by plaintiff, and if made, does not know that her estate has been benefited thereby, and demands proof of same.

The defendants set up as counter-claim $6.71, taxes paid in 1880 on plaintiff's land, still due, and also for rents and profits of the 550 acres, known as the Wm. R. Young tract, from 1875, referred to in paragraph IV. of complaint. Defendants allege that plaintiff agreed to pay rent, and that they are entitled to 52 bales lint cotton for rent, for which they could have realized $2,650. The defendants allege that all the lands referred to in plaintiff's complaint are part and parcel of the estate of Samuel Young, and that defendants hold said lands by virtue of a deed from Wm. Young, executor of Samuel Young. Defendants also allege that the lands referred to by plaintiff were sold for delinquent taxes, and said lands had not been declared forfeited before sale. Defendants allege that the rental value of the Wm. R. Young tract is not less than 10 bales of lint cotton of 425 lbs. each. Defendants deny indebtedness to plaintiff, but demand judgment against plaintiff for $3,656.71 and costs.

The plaintiff in reply denies that he ever agreed to pay defendants rent for the W. R. Young tract of land, as well as the other allegations of the answer inconsistent with the allegations of the complaint.

I have attempted to give in substance the allegations of the complaint and answer to indicate the nature of the action as well as the issues involved. It appears from the order of reference in the case that by consent of counsel it was referred to the master to take and report this testimony to the court. In the order of reference the master is directed to report in full all transactions between the parties, as to advancements, the sale of the land, and the title to the same, that the court may determine all the equities arising between the parties. The master has merely reported the testimony as directed, and the cause came on to be heard, *without a jury, at February term, 1883, of the Common Pleas for Laurens county.

*279

The plaintiff's complaint is on a money demand, a legal action based upon an alleged contract or agreement whereby plaintiff claims to have paid and advanced certain sums of money for defendants at their instance and request. The defendants' answer seeks to change the character of plaintiff's claim from a legal to an equitable action. Whilst defendants have the right to interpose an equitable defense, they have no right by their answer to change a legal into an equitable action. There has been no order or amendment of the complaint, and plaintiff, upon the hearing, insisted upon the legal character of his demand. I do not think the order of reference, merely to take and report testimony, would change the character of the action as presented by plaintiff. I must therefore consider this as a legal action based upon contract or agreement between plaintiff and defendants. Taking this view as to the legal character of this action, it is not deemed necessary, nor is it intended herein, to adjudicate the title to any of the lands referred to in complaint, or the validity or regularity of the delinquent land sales referred to in the complaint.

The first question to be considered and determined as made by the complaint is, whether or not plaintiff paid or advanced the several sums of money, or any part thereof, to the defendants, or either of them, at their instance and for their benefit, as alleged in the complaint. To determine this, reference must be had to the testimony taken by the master. From a review of the testimony I am satisfied and conclude that plaintiff did not pay or advance at the instance or request of either of the defendants, Mary Garlington or Stobo D. Garlington, any sums of money, nor does it appear that there was any contract or agreement between plaintiff and said defendants, Mary Garlington and Stobo D. Garlington, with reference to plaintiff paying money for them, or either of them, as alleged in the complaint. The plaintiff having failed to establish by the testimony his demand against the said defendants, the complaint should be dismissed with costs as to the defendants, Mary Garlington and Stobo D. Garlington.

*280

*The testimony, however, does show, and I must conclude, that under an agreement between plaintiff and the defendant, George F. Young, plaintiff did pay and advance for the defendant, George F. Young, the following sums, to wit: On May 3, 1875, the sum of $661.89 to enable said defendant to redeem certain lands of the estate of Samuel Young, then sold at delinquent land sale, of which said sum plaintiff in his complaint only demands the sum of $340.91, and in his recovery against defendant plaintiff must be limited to the demand as set forth in his said complaint; that on October 16, 1875, under agreement between plaintiff and defendant, George F. Young, plaintiff paid for said defendant, George F. Young, the sum of $377.07, to enable said defendant to redeem a certain tract of land of the estate of Samuel Young, in Newberry county, that had been sold for taxes; that on December 21, 1875, under an agreement between plaintiff and defendant, George F. Young, plaintiff, at his instance, paid for the said George F. Young to one B. H. Mathews, who had purchased the Calmes Quarter tract of land in Laurens county of the estate of Samuel Young, sold at delinquent land sale, to enable said defendant to redeem said land, the sum of $1,136.30.

Under the agreement between plaintiff and the defendant, George F. Young, the said George F. Young was to pay plaintiff the amount of money advanced and paid as aforesaid, with interest thereon, and no part of the money paid or advanced by plaintiff as aforesaid or interest has ever been paid by the said George F. Young. Plaintiff, in the 5th paragraph of his complaint, alleges that he paid certain taxes on the delinquent lands sold as aforesaid for the benefit of defendant. It is not alleged by plaintiff, nor does it appear from the testimony, that the payment of said taxes was embraced in the agreement between plaintiff and the defendant aforesaid, nor does it appear that said taxes were paid at the instance and request of either of the other defendants, Mary Garlington or Stobo D. Garlington. The evidence as to the payment of taxes on delinquent lands sold as aforesaid is not clear, as in many instances the tax alleged to have been paid is embraced in tax receipt, including plaintiff's own lands. As the testimony fails to show any agreement or *authority from defendants to plaintiff to pay said taxes, plaintiff's demand for taxes alleged to have been paid in 5th paragraph of complaint cannot be allowed.

*281

It was contended by defendants' counsel that the statute of frauds presented a bar to plaintiff's recovery; that plaintiff, having title and never having tendered titles to defendants, could not recover; that the sale of delinquent lands, May 18, 1874, was irregular and void, and that plaintiff could not acquire a valid title to land sold at said delinquent sale. Roddy v. Purdy, 10 S. C., 137. These are matters that might avail defendants if plaintiff in this action was setting up title to land, or seeking to enforce a lien upon land. The testimony shows that plaintiff advanced the $1,136.30 to defendant, George F. Young, long after Mathews had purchased at delinquent land sales, and defendant failed to pay plaintiff. Plaintiff alleges he took title from Mathews February 12, 1878, merely as evidence of redemption, and to secure from defendants the repayment of money advanced and already paid for defendant Young. When plaintiff paid the money to Mathews for the defendant, George F. Young, it does not appear as part of the agreement between the parties that the liability of Young to plaintiff depended upon the validity of said tax sale. The payment was made for the benefit of the defendant, George F. Young, and plaintiff should not lose his money on account of irregularity of tax sale, when he is not asserting title to land sold, or attempting to enforce a lien upon the land. But, as already stated, these matters cannot arise or be adjudicated in this action to recover money paid by plaintiff at the instance of defendant.

Defendants in their answer, by way of counter-claim, allege that in 1880 they paid $6.71 taxes on plaintiff's lands. The evidence of such payment is a tax receipt for second instalment of taxes paid by defendant, Stobo D. Garlington, November 15, 1880, on 2,850 acres of land assessed against plaintiff, the amount of taxes being $34.80. There is no testimony that plaintiff authorized or requested defendants to pay said taxes, and the counter-claim of $6.71 cannot be allowed.

Defendants further allege and set up in their answer, by way of counter-claim, that plaintiff promised and agreed to pay de-fen*dants a certain number of bales of cotton as annual rent for the Wm. R. Young tract of land for the year 1875, and the intervening years up to and inclusive of the year 1880, which rent has never been paid by plaintiff, and that defendants are entitled to judgment against plaintiff for the sum of $2,650 the value of said rent. It appears from the testimony that the William R. Young tract of land was conveyed by the executor of Samuel Young to the defendants, George F. Young and Mary Garlington, jointly. Under the code, a defendant can set up a counter-claim where a cause of action exists in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff, between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of one of the following causes of action: 1. A cause of action arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim or connected with the subject of the action. 2. In an action on contract any other cause of action arising also on contract and existing at the commencement of the action.

*282

Did the plaintiff, as matter of fact, promise or agree to pay defendants rent for the William R. Young tract of land? Plaintiff testifies positively that he did not. It appears that in order to effect a settlement of the money advanced for defendant, George F. Young, as aforesaid, plaintiff did propose to defendant, Stobo D. Garlington, at a time subsequently to the transaction with George F. Young, May 3, 1875, to account for rent received by plaintiff from the William R. Young land, but it does not appear that this was a part of the original agreement between plaintiff and George F. Young, but was merely a proposal to effect a settlement which was never accomplished. The defendant, George F. Young, testifies that he regarded plaintiff as acting in his own interest, but states positively that there was no understanding about plaintiff taking possession of the Billy Young tract of land any more than his taking possession of anything else he (defendant) had. The testimony fails to show that plaintiff ever promised or agreed to pay rent as such to defendants for the William R. Young tract of land, and the counterclaim cannot be allowed. But even if there was satisfactory evidence that plaintiff agreed to pay defendants rent, the counter-claim as set up in defendants' answer could not be sustained *in this action, for the reason that plaintiff's claim herein established as set forth in the answer would be in favor of defendants jointly. I must therefore conclude that the counter-claim, as set up in defendants' answer, cannot be allowed under the code of procedure.

*283

Defendants further allege in their answer that they have sustained damages by reason of plaintiff's seeking to eject them from the Calmes Quarter tract of land, under the deed from Mathews, and by other interference with defendants' possession of said land. The alleged conduct of plaintiff is in the nature of a tort that cannot be set up as a defence to plaintiff's action.

I find as matters of fact:

I. That plaintiff did not pay or advance money to the defendants, Mary Garlington and Stobo D. Garlington, or either of said defendants, at their instance, as alleged in his complaint.

II. That plaintiff, at the instance and request of the defendant, George F. Young, did pay for and advance to the said George F. Young the following sums of money, which said sums of money and interest the defendant, George F. Young, agreed to pay plaintiff, to wit: May 3, 1875, the sum of $340.91; October 16, 1875, the sum of $377.07, and on December 21, 1875, the sum of $1,136.30, which said several sums of money still remain due by defendant to plaintiff, and with interest up to January 16, 1881, amounts to $2,537.54.

I find as matters of law:

I. That the defendants, Mary Garlington and Stobo D. Garlington, are not indebted to plaintiff, as alleged, and that the complaint should be dismissed with costs as to the defendants, Mary Garlington and Stobo D. Garlington.

II. That the defendant, George F. Young, is indebted to plaintiff for money paid and advanced at his instance and request, in the sum of $2,537.54, with interest from January 16, 1881, together with the costs of this action.

III. That the counter-claim set up in the answer of defendants should not be allowed.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, That George P. Copeland, the plaintiff, have judgment, with leave to issue execution against the defendant, George F. Young, for the sum of *$2,537.54, with interest from January 16, 1881, together with costs. It is further ordered and adjudged, That plaintiff's complaint be dismissed with costs as to the defendants, Mary Garlington and Stobo D. Garlington.

*284

From this judgment the defendants appealed on the following exceptions:

Because it is respectfully submitted—

1. His honor erred in giving judgment in favor of plaintiff, and against the defendant, George F. Young, for $1,136.30—money paid by plaintiff to Mathews in connection with Calmes Quarter tract of land.

2. His honor erred in giving judgment in favor of plaintiff, and against defendant, George F. Young, for $340.91—money alleged to have been paid by plaintiff in connection with delinquent land sales made on May 3, 1875.

3. His honor erred in not finding that plaintiff must tender title, or such title as was in him, to the lands in connection with which the alleged moneys were advanced, before he can maintain this action against the defendants for the enforcement of his legal rights, or the recovery of the moneys advanced as alleged.

4. His honor erred in not finding the sale of lands sold as delinquent on May 18, 1874, and on May 3, 1875, not only irregular, but null and void.

5. His honor erred in not finding that there was no agreement between plaintiff and George F. Young touching the disposition of lands bid off by plaintiff on May 3, 1875, at the sale of delinquent lands.

6. His honor erred in not finding as void any verbal agreement entered into between plaintiff and George F. Young for the disposal of the 1,000 acres of land, or any part thereof, and bid off by plaintiff at the sale of delinquent lands on May 3, 1875.

7. His honor erred in not finding that if George F. Young had entered into any verbal agreement with plaintiff under a misapprehension of his legal rights, he could withdraw from such agreement and assert his rights in an action to enforce legal rights.

*285

*8. His honor erred in not finding the legal title to the 1,000 acres of land, of which the W. R. Young tract is alleged by plaintiff to be a part, and bid off by plaintiff at sale of delinquent lands on May 3, 1875, to be in the defendants, George F. Young and Mary Garlington, and that they are entitled to the rents and profits of the W. R. Young tract of land.

9. His honor erred in finding that the damages resultant to the defendants from the action brought by plaintiff to eject Stobo D. Garlington and others from the Calmes Quarter tract, were resultant from conduct in the nature of a tort and cannot be set up as a counter-claim in this action.

10. His honor erred in finding that the counter-claim set up by the defendants for the rents and profits of the W. R. Young tract of land cannot be maintained in this action.

11. His honor erred in not finding and adjudicating the equities of the parties as revealed by the pleading and the evidence in this action.

Mr. J. W. Ferguson, for appellants.

Messrs. Holmes & Simpson, B. W. Ball, and H. L. Farley, contra.

June 10, 1884. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Justice FRASER. Only a brief outline of the facts will be necessary in this opinion, as the case is very fully stated in the decree of the Circuit judge. Samuel Young, late of Laurens district, died in 1865, leaving in force a will by which, in certain contingencies, he gave his estate, real and personal, to his son, William Young, charged with pecuniary legacies of $20,000 each, to his two grandchilren, the defendants, George F. Young and Mary Young, who has intermarried with the defendant, Stobo D. Garlington. Finding this charge on the estate in his hands a very heavy one, in consequence, we suppose, of the changed condition of affairs at the close of the Confederate war, William Young conveyed, in April, 1876, the whole estate, reduced to about 8,000 acres of land and a small amount of personalty, to *the defendants, George F. and Mary L., as "tenants in common," in payment for the said legacies.

*286

The real estate consisted of a large number of parcels or tracts of land, and, amongst them, some land known as the "Calmes tract" of 1,300 acres, and the "Wm. R. Young tract" of 550 acres. This tract of 550 acres had been the property of W. R. Young, who died in 1863, and had been sold as a part of his estate under some proceedings and in some way not material here, and conveyed to the said Samuel Young in his life-time, and by William Young conveyed to George F. and Mary L., with the other property of his estate. These defendants having failed to pay, in due time, the taxes assessed on these lands, and the lands or a portion of them having been sold as delinquent, the plaintiff furnished the money on several occasions to redeem them, or so much of them as had been sold for taxes.

The complaint alleges that the money was advanced on an agreement between the plaintiff, who is the respondent in this case, and the defendants, George F. and Mary L., two of the appellants, to repay the money and interest. The Circuit judge has rejected several of the sums claimed in the complaint, and he has also found as a fact that there was no agreement made by Mary L. to repay these moneys. He has found, however, as a fact that George F. did promise to pay and is liable for $377.07, and interest from October 16, 1875, the money loaned by plaintiff to redeem a tract of land in Newberry county, for $1,136.30, and interest from December 21, 1875, the money paid to B. H. Mathews to redeem the Calmes tract, which he had bought at a tax sale, and $340.91, and interest from May 3, 1875, money advanced to buy in at a tax sale a portion of the said real estate at the same time that plaintiff claims to have bought in the W. R. Young tract for himself or for parties whose interest he claims to represent as executor or administrator of W. R. Young. These sums, with interest, amount on January 16, 1881, to $2,539.90, and for this sum and interest from January 16, 1881, to the date of the decree, the Circuit judge has given judgment.

The plaintiff's claim, thus adjudicated, is a purely legal demand, triable by a jury, and in such cases when the case has been tried, as this case has, by the Circuit judge instead of a jury, *there can be no appeal to this court from his findings of fact. Mere errors of calculation, however, or improper conclusions of law from the facts found by the Circuit judge as will hereafter appear, may be corrected in this court without any infringement of the rule which does not permit this court to review the findings of fact by a Circuit judge in a jury case.

*287

Besides the general denial of the plaintiff's cause of action, the defendants set up in their answer by way of defence, 1. That on the occasion when plaintiff advanced the sum of $1,136.30, December 21, 1875, to redeem the Calmes tract, B. H. Mathews, who had purchased the same at the tax sale, made a title, such as he had, to the plaintiff for the same, and that it was incumbent on the plaintiff in any action to recover the money to tender back to defendant such title, and that he has failed to do so here. 2. By way of counter-claim, defendants allege that plaintiff had, before the commencement of this action, brought an action against the defendant, Stobo D. Garlington, and the tenants, to recover possession of the Calmes tract; that by this action and other interference with the possession, plaintiff had caused damage to the defendants to the extent of $1,000, for which amount the defendants set up a counter-claim in this action. 3. Further, by way of counter-claim, the defendants allege that the plaintiff has been in possession of the said W. R. Young tract, and has received the rents and profits thereof from the year 1875, including that year, to the present time; that the title to the said W. R. Young tract is in the defendants, George F. and Mary L.; that the rents and profits of the said land for the time plaintiff has been in possession thereof are worth $2,650; that plaintiff agreed to pay the same; and for this sum defendants set up a counter-claim. 4. Defendants also set up as a counter-claim the sum of $6.50, money advanced for plaintiff in the payment of some taxes.

The Circuit judge has rejected this defence and all of these counter-claims. There has been no appeal as to the items in the complaint rejected by the Circuit judge, or as to the item of $377.67, advanced October 16, 1875, or as to the counter-claim of $6.50.

The appeal brings up all the other questions in the case on exceptions by the defendants.

*288

*1. The first two exceptions are as to the findings of fact by the Circuit judge on the plaintiff's cause of action, and have been disposed of above.

2. The 3d, 4th, and 9th exceptions relate to the failure of the plaintiff to tender back title to the Calmes tract, and damages to the possession thereof. It is clear from the testimony that B. H. Mathews conveyed to plaintiff such title as he had to the Calmes tract only as a security for the repayment of the money, $1,136.30, advanced by plaintiff to the defendant, George F., for its redemption, the said George F. going into possession thereof and retaining it, either by himself or others. If this had been an agreement between the plaintiff and George F. for the sale to George F. of the Calmes tract on the payment of $1,136.30, there would have been good reason for the claim now made by George F., that plaintiff should have tendered title either before action or, at least, in his complaint, in which he sues for the purchase money, before he could be allowed to recover. A creditor who holds a claim secured by a mortgage of real estate, or other collaterals, is under no obligation to resort to his mortgage or other collaterals, in the first instance, if he is satisfied to sue for and obtain a purely personal judgment against his debtor. Neither is he under any obligation to tender back title to the mortgaged property or a delivery of the collaterals, in his complaint, as a condition of his right to recover a judgment for his debt. If the defendant, the mortgagor, is apprehensive of injury or loss, as he might well be when the mortgage has been made by way of a deed absolute on its face, or when the property pledged for the payment of the debt consists of negotiable securities, the proper remedy for the defendant is to tender in his answer the money due to the plaintiff and demand, by way of counter-claim, a reconveyance of his land unincumbered by the plaintiff, or a redelivery of his securities.

It is not difficult to conceive of circumstances which would make this course necessary and proper on the part of the defendant in order to protect himself against a loss of his securities after he has paid the debt for which they were pledged; but in such cases it would be the duty of the defendant debtor and not of the plaintiff creditor to tender performance as the foundation *of his demand for judgment. It was not the duty of the plaintiff in this case in his complaint to tender back such title as he has to the Calmes tract, and which, it seems, he has once failed to establish in the courts, but of the defendant, George F., to tender payment, in his answer, of the amount secured by such title. If this had been done, the court might have ordered a reconveyance as a condition of a payment for this sum in favor of plaintiff, but not otherwise.

*289

3. Defendants also set up a counter-claim for damages growing out of an action brought by plaintiff against the defendant, Stobo D. Garlington, and certain tenants, to recover the possession of the Calmes tract, and other alleged interference with the possession of defendants. If any action would lay in this or in any other case for merely bringing an action to recover possession of land, which proves unsuccessful, or if there has been any thing in the conduct of the plaintiff in reference to the possession of the Calmes tract, as shown by the testimony taken in this case, on which an action could be founded, such action cannot, in any proper sense, be said to be founded on contract. If any thing, these matters are torts, either trespass or case, and are not proper subjects of a counter-claim in an action founded on a contract for the payment of money loaned.

Exceptions 5, 6, 7, 8, and 10, refer to the title of the W. R. Young tract and the counter-claim set up in reference to the rents and profits of said tract while in possession of the plaintiff. We will consider first the counter-claim for rent. It appears that this tract of land was at one time the property of W. R. Young, and after his death was conveyed by some process, the validity of which is in dispute between the plaintiff and the defendants, to Samuel Young, and was conveyed by William Young, who claimed under the will of Samuel Young, to the defendants, George F. and Mary L., "as tenants in common." Assuming, for the purposes of this case, so far as the question of rent is concerned, that the title of Wm. R. Young has passed to Samuel Young, and that Samuel Young's title has passed to defendants, George F. and Mary L., under the deed made by William Young, and that there has been no valid conveyance of the W. R. Young tract to plaintiff, the title remains in George F.

*290

Young and Mary Young *Garlington, "as tenants in common." They have this title if any, and no other.

There has been no proof of any express contract on the part of plaintiff to pay to George F. or Mary L., or either of them, rent for the W. R. Young tract. They can stand, therefore, only upon the implied agreement based upon the plaintiff's use and occupation of the land, the title to which is in them "as tenants in common." Their claim for rent on an implied promise is joint, and not several. "As each (tenant in common) has a separate and distinct freehold, if they have been disseized and seek to recover the estate they must bring separate actions and may not join. And if one tenant in common recover judgment for possession in an action for the whole land, he can recover damages pro rata according to his actual interest in the estate. But as they have one possession, they must join in actions for injuries to this, as trespass quare clausum fregit, nuisance, and the like." 3 Wash. Real Prop., 572. To the same effect, see 1 Chit. Pl., 13, note 1, with the authorities cited. The wrong done here was to the possession, and the tenants in common are permitted to elect to sue on the implied contract instead of the trespass. Their possession is one, and any claim based on this possession must necessarily be joint.

If there had been an express contract, the case would have been different, and the contract would have been joint or several according to the agreement of the parties. The claim for rent of this land is therefore one for which George F. and Mary L. could only have sued jointly, and the question now is, can this joint demand be set up in this action, in which it is found that plaintiff has a valid demand against only one of these defendants. It is conceded, that if the plaintiff had failed entirely in his action against all and each of the defendants, such a counter-claim, though it be joint, could be set up against him. Pom. Rem., 739. In the case before the court, the plaintiff has established his demand against one and only one of the defendants. By setting up a counter-claim, the defendants become, in reference thereto, the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs become quoad hoc defendants. Plyer v. Parker, 10 S. C., 464.

The general rule laid down in Pom. Rem.,

*291

761, is this: *"Fifthly, when two or more persons have a joint right of action and unite as plaintiffs to enforce the same, a counter-claim cannot be admitted against one or some of them in favor of any or all the defendants." According to this rule, if defendants had brought a joint action for rent and established their demand, plaintiff could not have set up his several claims against one of them as a counter-claim. These two matters cannot be adjudicated in the same action, and one of them must be rejected. Plaintiff has come into court to enforce his demand, and cannot be deprived of his right by the presentation of a counter-claim, the allowance of which would have the effect of remanding him to another action. If either party must resort to another action, the defendants in this case must do so. Plaintiff has chosen his ground for the contest, and if he has rights, they must be accorded to him here. There may perhaps be cases of insolvency, or other circumstances where the application of this rule might be practically a total defeat of the party, who is turned out of court for the reason here assigned, but no such circumstances or special equity have been alleged by the defendants here.

These exceptions also allege as error that the Circuit judge did not settle the questions between plaintiff and defendants as to the title to the W. R. Young tract. We have examined the pleadings in the case carefully and do not find any such issue raised by them; whatever is said in reference to this subject is merely by way of recital to explain the matters above alluded to, and as to which relief is sought. The complaint is not framed with any view to enforce the performance of any contract in reference to the W. R. Young tract, and the answer is not framed with any view to recover possession of said land. While parties may have any relief to which it appears by the evidence they are entitled, it must be something within the scope of the pleadings. There was, therefore, no error in refusing in this action to adjudicate the title or possession of the W. R. Young tract.

All that it is intended to decide in reference to these counter-claims, and as to the titles to the Calmes tract and the W. R. Young tract is, that these are not proper matters to be adjudicated in this action.

As above intimated, there are several errors or mere inadver*tencies apparent on the face of the Circuit decree which should be corrected. 1st. The whole amount paid by plaintiff on May 3, 1875, as found by the Circuit judge, was $661.89, and not $757.59, as alleged in the complaint. The defendant, George F., was to pay of this amount in the proportion which 450 acres bears to 1,000 acres of land. The true sum, from this finding of the Circuit judge, should have been $297.85, and not, as stated in the decree, $340.91. The total of the principal will therefore be $1,810.96, and of the interest $667.70, in all, $2,478.68, and not $2,529.90, as stated in the decree. 2d. Of this sum only the principal should bear interest from January 16, 1881, the date of the commencement of the action, to the date of the decree, August 30, 1883, while the Circuit decree allows interest on the whole sum, principal and interest. The judgment should have been for $2,478.66, and interest on $1,810.96 from January 16, 1881, to August 30, 1883.

*292

Subject to these modifications as to the amount of the plaintiff's demand, it is ordered and adjudged that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

21 S. C. 292

STATE v. BERLIN.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Constitutional Law ⊜205, 207, 240.]

An act of the legislature prohibiting the sale of spirituous or intoxicating liquors outside of incorporated cities, towns, and villages, while permitting such sale under license within cities, towns, and villages, does not violate article I., section 12, of the constitution of this state, nor the 14th amendment of the United States constitution.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Kaminitsky v. Northeastern R. Co., 25 S. C. 64, 65; Utsey v. Hiott, 30 S. C. 366, 9 S. E. 338, 14 Am. St. Rep. 910; Town Council of Summerville v. Pressley, 33 S. C. 66, 11 S. E. 545, 8 L. R. A. 854, 26 Am. St. Rep. 659; Stehmeyer v. City Council of Charleston, 53 S. C. 280, 31 S. E. 322; Brown v. Tharpe, 74 S. C. 209, 54 S. E. 363.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 591-624, 631, 698; Dec. Dig. ⟸205, 207, 240.]

[2. Intoxicating Liquors ⟸15.]

Laws regulating the sale of liquors are police regulations, and the legislature may prescribe different regulations in different localities; but such laws must apply equally to all persons within the territorial limits affected.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Town Council of McCormick v. Calhoun, 30 S. C. 95, 8 S. E. 539.

For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 17, 18; Dec. Dig. ⟸15.]

Before Wallace, J., Berkeley, June, 1883.

This was an indictment under the act of 1880, against Carl Berlin and G. Staevens for selling liquors without a license. The defendants pleaded in bar, that the act was void because contrary *to the constitution of this state (Art. I., § 12), and of the United States (14th Amendment). The State demurred to the plea, which was overruled. The case then went to the jury. The evidence showed that defendants were owners of a store upon Edisto Island, which is outside of any incorporated city, town, or village, and that a clerk in the employment of defendants sold to witness a drink of whiskey. The judge charged the jury that the act of 1880 was constitutional, and that if they believed from the evidence that the defendants authorized the sale, they should find against them. The jury found the defendants guilty. The defendants appealed upon two grounds, which were substantially as follows:

*293

1. Because said act is contrary to the constitution of this state in that it prohibits the sale of liquors in the country, while it permits such sale in cities and towns; and said act is unequal and unjust, and is contrary to the common rights of citizens of the state, in that it confers a privilege upon one citizen which it denies to another.

2. Because said act is contrary to section 1 of article XIV., of the amendments to the constitution of the United States.

Mr. B. J. Whaley for appellants.

The question here made is not res adjudicata, because the grounds now taken were not raised in the cases heretofore decided, 16 S. C., 482; 18 Id., 103. The sale of liquors may be regulated and licenses required, 5 How., 504; 2 McMull., 233. But this law is objectionable because violating the constitutional provisions stated in the plea. Cool. Con. Lim (4th edit.), 489-494, 732; 18 Cent. Law J., No. 11; 2 McMull., 236.

Mr. Solicitor Jervey contra, cited Cool. Con. Lim., 182; 42 Md., 71; 18 S. C., 81; Ibid, 103; Cool. Tax., 128; Burr. Tax., 69, 147; 29 La. Ann., 283; 30 Id., 991; 22 Minn., 312; 35 Ark. 69; 2 McMull., 233; 4 Strob., 241.

June 23, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The sole question raised by this appeal is as to the constitutionality of the first section of the act of *1880 (17 Stat., 459), incorporated in the general statutes as section 1731. Although the constitutionality of this law has been twice before affirmed by this court (State v. Mancke, 18 S. C., 81, and State v. Turner, Ibid, 103), yet, as the counsel for the appellant seems to think that the attention of the court was not directed, in the argument of those cases, to the ground upon which they now assail the constitutionality of the act, we have not been unwilling to reconsider the question.

*294

That ground is, that inasmuch as the first section of the act absolutely forbids the sale of spirituous liquors outside the limits of incorporated cities, towns, and villages, while in a subsequent section it provides for the granting of licenses to sell such liquors within the limits of incorporated cities, towns, and villages, it establishes a discrimination in favor of one class of persons as against another, and is therefore in conflict with the provisions of article I., section 12, of the constitution of this state, as well as the provisions of the 14th amendment of the constitution of the United States. The provision of the 12th section of article I., which this law is supposed to violate is expressed in the following words: "No person shall be * * * subjected in law to any other restraints or disqualifications, in regard to any personal rights, than such as are laid upon others under like circumstances;" and the language of that portion of the 14th amendment, with which this law is supposed to conflict is as follows: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States, and of the state wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Appellants contend that their privileges and immunities, as citizens of the United States, are abridged by the law in question, which is therefore in violation of the constitution of the United States, and that the restraints and disqualifications imposed by the act upon their personal rights are in violation of the provisions of the constitution of the state. It will be observed that the act in question makes no discrimination whatever *in regard to persons or to classes of persons as such, but that it only discriminates as to localities, leaving the rights, privileges, and immunities of all persons in each locality precisely the same. It must also be remembered that laws regulating the sale of spirituous liquors are to be regarded as police regulations, over which the state has absolute control, limited only by some constitutional prohibition. The state, therefore, in the exercise of this police power, may pass laws absolutely prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors, except unbroken packages while in the hands of the importer, and except, perhaps, where the rights of property, existing at the time of the passage of the law, might be destroyed, or it may throw around such traffic such restraints as in the judgment of the legislature may be most conducive to the peace and good order of society, by preventing the evils which might flow from an unrestrained traffic in such articles. License Cases, 5 How., 504 [12 L. Ed. 256]; Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 18 Wall., 129 [21 L. Ed. 929]; Heisembrittle ads. City Council, 2 McMull., 233; City Council v. Ahrens, 4 Strob., 241.

*295

The practical question, therefore, presented in this case is, whether the legislature can, in the exercise of the police power, prescribe different regulations for the sale of spirituous liquors, in different localities within its borders. It is quite clear that regulations which might prove very effective in one locality, might be found very inefficient in another; and it would seem, therefore, that to render the exercise of this admitted power most effective, the regulations should be adapted to the wants and conditions of the different localities to which they are to be applied. It seems to us that the rule upon this subject has been well expressed by Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations (2d edit.) at page 390: "Laws, public in their objects, may, unless express constitutional provision forbids, be either general or local in their application. * * * The authority that legislates for the state at large must determine whether particular rules shall extend to the whole state and all its citizens, or, on the other hand, to a subdivision of the state or a single class of its citizens only. The circumstances of a particular locality or the prevailing public sentiment in that section of the state, may require or make acceptable different police regulations from those *demanded in another. * * * The legislature may therefore prescribe different laws of police * * * in each distinct municipality, provided the state constitution does not forbid. These discriminations are made constantly; and the fact that the laws are of local or special operation only is not supposed to render them obnoxious in principle. * * * If the laws be otherwise unobjectionable, all that can be required in these cases is, that they be general in their application to the class or locality to which they apply; and they are then public in character, and of their propriety and policy the legislature must judge." The whole matter is well summed up in a note on the same page, in the following words: "To make a statute a public law of general obligation, it is not necessary that it should be equally applicable to all parts of the state; all that is required is, that it shall apply equally to all persons within the territorial limits described in the act."

*296

The same principle has been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States and applied to a case of a different character from that now under consideration, in Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S., 22 [25 L. Ed. 989]. It seems that by the laws of Missouri, an appeal lies to the Supreme Court of the state, from a final judgment of a Circuit Court in the state, except those held for the counties of St. Charles, Lincoln, Warren, and St. Louis, and the city of St. Louis, for which counties and city a separate court of appeals is established, called the "St. Louis Court of Appeals," and from its decisions, no appeal lies to the Supreme Court, except in certain specified cases, of which the case before the court was not one. It was contended that this provision of the Missouri law was in conflict with the 14th amendment of the United States constitution, because it denies to suitors in the courts of St. Louis and the counties named, the equal protection of the laws, in that it denies to them the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the state in cases where it gives that right to suitors in the other one hundred and nine counties of the state. It was held that this provision of the Missouri law was not in conflict with the 14th amendment or any other provision of the constitution of the United States.

Mr. Justice Bradley, in delivering the opinion of the court *uses this language, which may well be applied to the case now under consideration: "Each state has the right to make political subdivisions of its territory for municipal purposes, and to regulate their local government. As respects the administration of justice, it may establish one system of courts for cities and another for rural districts, one system for one portion of its territory, and another system for another portion. Convenience, if not necessity, often requires this to be done, and it would seriously interfere with the power of a state to regulate its internal affairs to deny to it this right. * * * We might go still further and say, with undoubted truth, that there is nothing in the constitution to prevent any state from adopting any system of laws or judicature it sees fit for all, or any part, of its territory. * * * If every person residing or being in either portion of the state should be accorded the equal protection of the laws prevailing there, he could not justly complain of a violation of the clause referred to. For, as before said, it has respect to persons and classes of persons. It means that no person or class of persons shall be denied the same protection of the laws which is enjoyed by other persons, or other classes in the same place and under the like circumstances."

*297

The same principle has been applied in the state of Alabama, in Davis v. State (68 Ala., 58, 44 Am. Rep., 128), where it was held that a statute making it unlawful to transport or remove cotton in the seed, in certain counties, after sunset and before sunrise of the succeeding day, was not in conflict with any provision of the state or federal constitution.

If, as we have seen, the legislature has the power to prescribe different police regulations for different localities within the territory of the state, we do not see how the law in question can be said to violate section 12 of article I. of the constitution of this state. It does not subject any person to any restraint or disqualification in regard to any personal right, to which all persons in the same locality and under the like circumstances are not subjected, but all in that locality stand precisely upon the same footing, and no one has any right to complain of any infraction of his constitutional rights. To use the language of Judge Cooley quoted above, while it is true that the statute in question is not *"equally applicable to all parts of this state," it is equally true that it does apply "equally to all persons within the territorial limits described in the act."

*298

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit be affirmed.

---

21 S. C. 298

MITCHELL v. FOWLER.

(April Term, 1884.)

[Justices of the Peace ⇐176.]

Where the defendant in a trial justice's court did not admit the plaintiff's case, but on appeal to the Circuit Court and on trial there de novo, orally admitted the execution of the note sued on and the plaintiff's ownership of it, defendant is not entitled to open and reply, not having admitted "by his pleadings" the plaintiff's case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 700; Dec. Dig. ⇐176.]

Before Hudson, J., Spartanburg, October, 1883.

Action by C. W. Mitchell against W. D. Fowler, commenced in a trial justice's court on September 18, 1880, and there tried in October, 1880. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Wofford & Jennings for appellant.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, contra.

June 23, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The error assigned in this case is the refusal of the Circuit judge to allow the defendant to open and reply. The action was on a note and originally brought in a trial justice's court, where the plaintiff proved his case and the defences were, first, usury and, second, that the defendant, who was the surety on the note, had been discharged by an agreement between the plaintiff and the principal for an extension of time. The trial justice rendered judgment for the plaintiff and, the defendant appealing, the case came on for trial de novo in the Circuit Court. The pleadings were altogether oral, and at the trial in the Circuit Court the plaintiff stated as his cause of action the note which he exhibited, and stated that the plaintiff was the *owner of the note. Counsel for defendant admitted the execution of the note by the defendant and the plaintiff's ownership of it, and pleaded as his defences, usury and discharge by extension of time to the principal. Thereupon he claimed the right to open and reply, which being objected to, defendant's counsel stated that he admitted plaintiff's right to recover, unless he introduced testimony as to the defences interposed, and again claimed the right to open and reply. This was refused by the Circuit judge, who held "that the defendant is entitled to open and reply only when he admits the plaintiff's case, and takes upon himself the burden of proof; that this must be done in the defences set up, and that the defences here set up did not admit but denied the plaintiff's case; that admitting the execution of a note and its ownership by the plaintiff did not admit the plaintiff's case, but the defence struck directly at the validity of the note as against the defendant in its origin, as well as owing to the subsequent dealings of principal and payee."

*299

After this decision was announced the plaintiff was introduced as a witness and proved the signature to the note, and his ownership of it. After testimony was heard on the part of the defendant in support of his defences, to which the plaintiff was permitted to offer evidence in reply, judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant appeals, upon the ground that the Circuit judge erred in refusing to allow the defendant to open and reply, and in allowing that privilege to the plaintiff.

While we concur with the Circuit judge in the conclusion which he reached, we prefer to rest our judgment upon a different ground from that adopted by him. The practice in regard to the right to open and reply is regulated by Rule 59 of the Circuit Court, which provides that the defendant shall have this right "where he admits the plaintiff's cause by the pleadings, and takes upon himself the burden of proof." In a trial justice's court, "the pleadings may be oral or in writing; if oral, the substance of them shall be entered by the trial justice in his docket; if in writing, they shall be filed by him, and a reference to them shall be made in the docket." Code, § 88, subdiv. 2. Whether the practice as prescribed by Rule 59 can be applied to cases in a *trial justice's court, especially where the parties have proceeded by oral, rather than written, pleadings, is a question which we are not called upon to determine, inasmuch as in this case there was no admission of the plaintiff's cause of action in that court, either "by the pleadings" or otherwise, but, on the contrary, it is stated in the "Case" that when the case came on for trial before the trial justice, "the plaintiff proved his case, the defendant pleading usury," &c.

*300

When the case was carried by appeal to the Circuit Court there were no new pleadings, but it was tried upon the pleadings as they stood in the trial justice's court, and as it is conceded that the defendant did not, by his pleadings, in the trial justice's court admit the plaintiff's cause of action, it is quite clear that the defendant did not bring himself within the rule which entitled him to open and reply. For the rule is explicit that the admission of the plaintiff's cause of action must be made "by the pleadings," so that it may be matter of record; and such has been the construction placed upon the rule by the decisions of this court. Brown v. Kirkpatrick, 5 S. C., 267; McConnell v. Kitchens, 20 Id., 430 [47 Am. Rep. 845]. There can be no oral pleadings in the Circuit Court, and therefore the fact stated in the record that the defendant, at the trial in that court, orally admitted the execution of the note sued upon, as well as the plaintiff's ownership of it, cannot affect the question under consideration. The foundation of the defendant's right to open and reply is the rule of court above referred to, and unless he brings himself within the terms of that rule, as construed by the decisions of this court, he cannot successfully claim any such right.

The case of Bennett v. Sandifer, 15 S. C., 418, relied upon by appellant, does not touch the question involved in this case. The only points there decided were, first, that the mere fact that the defendant was appellant, in a case originating in a trial justice's court and carried by appeal to the Circuit Court, did not constitute him the actor in such a sense as would entitle him to the right to open and reply in the Circuit Court, under the provisions of Rule 59; and, second, that an error in ruling this point was appealable.

*301

*The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

21 S. C. 301

CAMPBELL v. SLOAN & SEIGNIOUS.

(April Term, 1884.)

Executors being sued for a debt of their testatrix, a devisee in possession obtained from his wife the amount due upon the note in suit, and paid it to the attorneys of the payee; the suit was then dropped, and the note taken by the devisee to his wife with the statement, "This is your property," but there was no written assignment. After this the husband, with the wife's knowledge and acquiescence, mortgaged the land acquired under such devise, and she renounced her dower to the mortgagees, who knew nothing of her claim; afterwards she brought action against the executors on this note, obtained judgment by default, and then sought to subject this land to the payment of this note and to enjoin the foreclosure of such mortgage—meantime the personal assets of testatrix were lost or wasted. Held,

[1. Payment ⟸50.]

That the action could not be sustained, because the circumstances showed that the note was not purchased from the payee, but was satisfied by the husband with money given to him by the wife for that purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. § 132; Dec. Dig. ⟸50.]

[2. Payment ⟸66.]

That twenty years having elapsed from the last credit endorsed upon the note to the commencement of plaintiff's action against the executors, her right to bring this action was barred by lapse of time.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Shaw v. Barksdale, 25 S. C. 205, 214.

For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 176–188; Dec. Dig. ⟸66.]

[3. Mortgages ⟸413.]

That the laches of plaintiff, and that of the original payee, were sufficient to bar this action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 1187–1201; Dec. Dig. ⟸413.]

[4. Husband and Wife ⟸129.]

That by renouncing dower on the mortgage, she is estopped from setting up her stale claim against the mortgagees.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 283; Dec. Dig. ⟸129.]

Before Kershaw, J., Laurens, June, 1883.

The facts of this case are fully stated in the opinion of this Court. The Circuit decree, omitting such statement, was as follows:

From these facts I conclude that the note is paid by lapse of time. Notwithstanding the judgment against the executors, Sloan & Seignious may avail themselves of it. Bird v. Houze, Speers Eq., 250; Gilliland v. Caldwell, 1 S. C., 197. The action is upon the sealed note of the testatrix, and that is pre*sumed to be paid by the lapse of twenty years from the date of the last payment. The omission of the executors to plead to the action against them, and the consequent judgment, cannot affect the right of defendants, Sloan & Seignious. As against them, the note will be treated as paid. Boyce v. Lake, 17 S. C., 482 [43 Am. Rep. 618].

*302

There has been such gross laches in the prosecution of this claim that the action will not be entertained in a Court of Equity. There was most abundant personal assets to pay this and all other debts of the testatrix. These parties holding the notes have stood by for over twenty years and seen the property turned over to the legatees, and all lost or wasted but this tract of land, and took no action until it was about to be subjected to the debt of Sloan & Seignious. The primary fund for the payment of debts is the personal estate. If a creditor stands by and sees it wasted, he cannot subject lands in the possession of the heirs or devisee to the payment of his debt, even when he has judgment against the executors. Mobley v. Cureton, 2 S. C., 146; Bird v. Houze, Speers Eq., 250.

The circumstances show that John B. Campbell had control of the negotiations for the settlement of the note, and it does not appear that his wife did not intend the money with which he took it up as a gratuity. If she so intended, or if he used her money without authority to take up the note, it was paid, and could not afterwards be set up as a subsisting demand. Her silence, acquiescence, and participation in the mortgage, show that she considered she had no claim against the land. It was evidently an afterthought to set it up. The only way to account for her conduct is to assume this. Her rights will be postponed to those of Sloan & Seignious. She can claim no better position than if she was a prior encumbrancer at the time of the mortgage, or holding a prior title to the land. And even in that case, she would be postponed to the defendants, Sloan & Seignious. Pom. Eq. Jur., 780, 781.

If, holding such prior title, the party being informed of the purpose of another to invest in the land, and being brought in contact with and made cognizant of the transaction, he simply keeps silent and permits the person to contract, he will be compelled to release in favor of the purchaser. Plaintiff is estopped *in equity from enforcing this claim against the land in derogation of the rights of Sloan & Seignious, under their mortgage. She stood by and allowed the mortgage to be given, and joined in the security by renouncing her dower therein; and if she had an equity to be first paid out of the land, she should have made it known then. Hand v. Railroad Company, 12 S. C., 351; Lead. Cases Eq., 64; Big. Est., 500, 511.

*303

Plaintiff has established no title to the note. It was not assigned, nor was it transferred by delivery. It was paid to the attorneys at law of the obligee, and by them delivered to Campbell for the plaintiff. The attorneys would have had no right to assign, and, a fortiori, could not transfer it by delivery. Mayer v. Blease, 4 S. C., 14. At most her title was purely equitable, and could not prevail against a legal right acquired for valuable consideration without notice. In such a case the equities would be at least equal, and the court could not interfere. Any of these principles are conclusive against the recovery sought by the plaintiff.

It is ordered and decreed, That the complaint herein be dismissed, and that the plaintiff pay the costs of the proceeding; that the order of injunction herein granted be set aside, and that the defendants, Sloan & Seignious, be allowed to proceed to enforce their remedies against the said land.

From this decree the plaintiff appealed upon the following exceptions: 1. Because his honor erred in holding the settlement of 1863 a settlement of Sally M. Hall's estate. 2. Because his honor erred in holding the sealed note paid by lapse of time. 3. Because his honor erred in holding that there were abundant personal assets to pay this sealed note and all other claims, and that the plaintiff stood by and allowed these assets to be wasted. 4. Because his honor erred in holding that the plaintiff stood by and saw the property turned over to legatees, and took no action until it was about to be subjected to the debt of Sloan & Seignious. 5. Because his honor erred in holding that the plaintiff intended the money which took up the A. R. Simpson note, as a gratuity to defendant Campbell, or that he used her money without authority. 6. Because his honor erred in holding that the *plaintiff's silence and participation in the mortgage show that she considered that she had no claim in the land. 7. Because his honor erred in holding that the plaintiff kept silent and permitted Sloan & Seignious to invest in the land. 8. Because his honor erred in holding that plaintiff stood by, allowed mortgage to be given, and joined in the mortgage by renouncing her dower without making known her claim. 9. Because his honor erred in holding that Sloan & Seignious, for a valuable consideration without notice, acquired a legal right in the land. 10. Because his honor erred in holding that the A. R. Simpson note was neither assigned, transferred, nor delivered to plaintiff, and therefore she could not maintain this action. 11. Because his honor erred in holding that Sloan & Seignious could avail themselves of lapse of time, judgment having been rendered against the executors. 12. Because his honor erred in holding that the rights of the plaintiff must be postponed to those of Sloan & Seignious, or that she is estopped.

*304

Mr. J. W. Ferguson, for appellant.

Messrs. James Farrow and B. W. Ball, contra.

June 25, 1884. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. Sallie M. Hall departed this life in the latter part of 1857, having first duly made and executed her last will and testament, of which Dr. E. G. Simpson and Dr. William Phillips were the duly qualified executors. The testatrix left a very considerable estate, both real and personal, the great bulk of which, including the tract of land which is the subject matter of the present controversy, she gave to her grandson, the defendant, John B. Campbell, to be kept by the executors under their control until he arrived at the age of twenty-one years, when it was to be turned over to him absolutely. The testatrix, at the time of her death, owed but few debts, the principal one being a note under seal to A. R. Simpson for $1,000, payable one day after its date, and bearing date February 17, 1857. Upon this note a credit, dated April 6, 1858, for $70 is endorsed, as received from E. G. Simpson, executor.

*305

*In October, 1862, the defendant, John B. Campbell, the principal legatee and devisee under the will, having attained the age of twenty-one years, the executors turned over to him the whole estate, although all the specific legacies and debts were not then paid, since which time, both of the executors testify, they have in no way interfered with the estate of the testatrix, Sallie M. Hall. Sometime after this, though at what particular date does not appear, each of the executors made separate returns in the ordinary's office of their receipts and expenditures as such, which was probably about September 16, 1863, as the interest seems to be calculated up to that day. A suit having been commenced by A. R. Simpson on the note above mentioned against the executors of Sallie M. Hall and John B. Campbell, the defendant, John B. Campbell, testifies "that he went to the office of Simpson & Simpson in June, 1869, and took up said note with money belonging to plaintiff, paying $1,000; that he took the note home and gave it to plaintiff, saying, 'This note is your property;' that it had been property of plaintiff from that time to present." The only other witness who testified as to this matter said, "That she was with plaintiff when Campbell returned from Laurens, the day that he took up the A. R. Simpson note; that he handed the note to plaintiff, saying, 'This note belongs to you; Colonel Simpson says that you had better take care of this note, it may be worth something to you some day.'"

On February 19, 1876, the defendant, John B. Campbell, executed a mortgage on the land in question to his co-defendants, Sloan & Seignious, and the plaintiff, who is the wife of said John B. Campbell, indorsed upon said mortgage a relinquishment of her dower in the said land, as against the mortgage debt. In 1877 the A. R. Simpson note was placed by John B. Campbell in the hands of attorneys for collection, although no action was commenced thereon until the early part of 1881, when suit was instituted against the executors of Mrs. Hall, and judgment by default obtained against them in February, 1881. On March 18, 1882, judgment of foreclosure and sale was obtained by Sloan & Seignious against John B. Campbell, and the object of the present action is to subject the tract of land in the possession of John B. Campbell, devised to him by the will of Mrs.

*306

Hall, *to the payment of her note to A. R. Simpson, of which the plaintiff claims to be the owner and holder, and also to enjoin the sale of said land under the judgment of foreclosure by Sloan & Seignious.

Although one of the questions made in the case is, whether the note which constitutes the foundation of the plaintiff's claim shall be presumed to be paid by lapse of time, yet, singular to say, it nowhere distinctly appears precisely when the present action was commenced. The date is stated in the Circuit decree, but it is manifest that it is incorrectly stated (probably through a misprint), and as corrected by the admission of counsel, it seems to be inconsistent with a succeeding statement in the decree. For, as corrected by counsel, it is fixed at August 31, 1881, but as the decree states that one of the objects of the action was to enjoin the sale of the land under the judgment of foreclosure, which was not obtained until March 18, 1882, it must have been commenced after that date, and accordingly we find that in the statement of facts prefixed to the appellant's "Points and Authorities," the date of the commencement of the present action is fixed at June 5, 1883. Fortunately, however, it happens in the present case, that this confusion as to dates will work no injury to the parties, for whether the action was commenced in 1881 or 1883 will make no practical difference.

The Circuit judge rendered a decree dismissing the complaint and dissolving the temporary injunction previously granted upon the several grounds considered therein, and from this judgment the plaintiff appeals upon various grounds set out in the record.

It is very manifest that the fundamental inquiry in this case is whether the plaintiff ever became the owner of the A. R. Simpson note, for it is quite clear that unless she did she has no cause of action, and the other questions discussed cannot properly arise. The Circuit judge seems to have reached the conclusion that she never bought the note, but simply furnished the money with which it was paid as a gratuity to her husband and to relieve him from a liability then pressing upon him; and in this conclusion we fully concur. It is not pretended that the note was ever assigned to her, or that there was any agreement or understanding that it should be; and although a formal assignment *might not be necessary, yet the fact that none was taken and none was asked for, is a circumstance of no little weight in considering what was the true nature of the transaction. The testimony as to what occurred at the time the note was obtained, all of which is set out above, is very far from indicating that the mission of John B. Campbell was to buy up the note for his wife, to be held by her as a debt against him, but point rather to the conclusion which we have adopted. The expression "took up" the note, used by both of the witnesses who testified as to this matter, was much more appropriate to the payment rather than the purchase of the note.

*307

Then, too, the subsequent conduct of the plaintiff points to the same conclusion. Although the note was then in suit and costs had been incurred, yet instead of allowing the note to go into judgment, and obtaining a lien upon her husband's land, which she could enforce or not as occasion might require, the suit is dropped and the note goes into her possession, where it remains unheard of for about eight years, until after a creditor of her husband has taken a lien upon the land, with her knowledge and acquiescence, as evidenced by her relinquishment of dower, when the note is resurrected and placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, and even then, for some unexplained reason, it was allowed to slumber for four years longer before any action was commenced upon it. All the circumstances point to the conclusion adopted by the Circuit judge, that this effort on the part of the plaintiff to set up this note as a debt due to her, in derogation of the rights of her husband's creditors, is an afterthought which cannot avail her.

But even if we were able to reach the conclusion that the plaintiff did in fact purchase the note in question, we think it clear that her right of action thereon is barred by lapse of time. Twenty years from the date of the payment indorsed on the note expired in 1878, and we see nothing in the case to rebut the presumption arising from such lapse of time. The judgment obtained against the executors of Mrs. Hall certainly cannot have such effect, for the action in which such judgment was obtained was not commenced until nearly three years after the twenty years had run out. Bird v. Houze, Speers Eq., 250;

*308

Gilliland *& Howell v. Caldwell, 1 S. C., 198; Wilson v. Kelly, 19 S. C., 160.

Again, we think that the laches of the plaintiff and of her alleged assignor, of which she must bear the consequences, is sufficient to bar her action. Mobley v. Cureton, 2 S. C., 140.

So, too, we agree with the Circuit judge that the plaintiff, by joining with her husband in the mortgage is estopped from setting up this stale claim against the mortgagees.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

21 S. C. 308

GLENN v. GLENN.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Wills ⟸498.]

A testator by his will gave power to his son to sell a tract of land "to any of my issue and to make a good fee simple title to the purchaser." The son conveyed this land in fee to his son, a grandson of testator. Held, that the grandson was embraced in the word "issue," and that he took a good fee simple title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1088; Dec. Dig. ⟸498.]

[2. Powers ⟸36.]

The conveyance having been made to such grandson, who, two days afterwards, conveyed it to G, who was not a descendant of testator, G took a good title, even if the deed to the grandson was intended merely as one of the links in the chain to carry title to G.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Powers, Cent. Dig. § 139; Dec. Dig. ⟸36.]

[3. Wills ⟸603.]

Quere: Would a devise to "A for and during his natural life, and after his death to his issue forever, which issue shall take per stirpes," give to A a fee conditional, or would it give a life-estate?

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1351–1359; Dec. Dig. ⟸603.]

Before Wallace, J., Newberry, November, 1882.

The facts are stated in the opinion. The Circuit decree was as follows:

It will be seen on reference to the sixth clause of David Glenn's will that any of the sons was authorized to sell the land, if he did not wish to reside on it, to any of the issue of David Glenn. The fact that William Glenn resided in Alabama and sold the land shows that he did not wish to reside on it. The fact that he sold the land to his son, who two days afterward sold and conveyed to G. W. Glenn, sr., shows that he intended to conform to the condition of his power to convey.

*309

*Is A. J. Glenn, the son of William Glenn and grandson of David Glenn, embraced in the words "any of my issue"? "'Issue' is nomen collectivum, and a word of very extensive import. The term embraces descendants of every degree wheresoever existent, and unless restricted by the context cannot be satisfied by being applied to descendants at a given period." 3 Jarm. Wills, 200. So unless there are terms to restrict the word "issue," it certainly would include "grandsons." By the term "issue" occurring in the second clause of the will copied above, it is obvious from a mere inspection that the testator meant more than children. Nor is there anything in the will which shows an intent to restrict the sons in a narrower circle than is described by the term "issue" in its unrestricted sense. The sale to the son, then, by William Glenn was in accordance with the direction of the will and conveyed a good title.

Other questions as to the nature of the estate that the sons took under the will, and the statute of limitations, need not be discussed. It is ordered and adjudged that the complaint be dismissed.

Mr. M. A. Carlisle, for appellant.

Messrs. Jones & Jones and Geo. S. Mower, contra.

June 26, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. David Glenn, late of Newberry county, departed this life in 1862, leaving a will, by which, among other things, he devised as follows: "I will and devise all my land to my three sons (Posey, John, and William), to be equally divided according to valuation among them, which valuation shall be fixed by five disinterested appraisers, to be appointed by the ordinary of Newberry district, and each of said sons shall have and hold such share as may be assigned him by the said appraisers for and during his natural life; and after his death to his issue for ever, which issue shall take per stirpes; but in case of the death of either of my said sons without leaving issue of a predeceased child or grandchild, then the land of such son shall go to and vest in fee simple in his children living at his *death, share and share alike. * * * Sixth. That in case either of my sons shall be desirous of changing his place of residence, or not wish to come to the same to reside on it, he is authorized to sell the land I have given him to any of my issue, and to make a good fee simple title to the purchaser, but the proceeds of such sale to be reinvested by my said son in property, either real or personal, subject to the same limitations as are imposed on the land in the second clause of my will, but this provision is not to authorize said land to be sold for debt or any other purpose than as herein provided," &c.

*310

The land was divided among the three sons, and William went into possession of the part assigned to him, described as a tract of land in Newberry county, containing 177 acres more or less, &c. A. J. Glenn, testified, subject to exception, that he resided with his father in Talladega, Alabama; that after he got possession of his part of the land, his father, the said William, on December 25, 1862, made a conveyance of the land to him (A. J. G.), and that by previous arrangement he, immediately thereafter, conveyed it to his uncle, George W. Glenn, sr., for a consideration, which was not paid to him, but under some arrangement was made to his father, the said William Glenn.

In 1877 William Glenn died intestate, and his surviving children, the plaintiffs, instituted these proceedings to recover the land and the rents and profits thereof, claiming that their father William had only a life estate in the land under the will of his father, and that his conveyance to his son, A. J. Glenn, and that of A. J. Glenn to George W. Glenn, sr., were unauthorized by the will; that the life tenant had only the power to sell to "any of the issue" of the testator David, and that A. J. Glenn, being a grandson, and not a son, was not in the category of such "issue." But if it should be so held, they insist that it is perfectly certain that George W. Glenn, sr., was not of the "issue" of the testator, and that he was really the purchaser of the land; that the two conveyances, first to A. J., and then by him to his uncle, George, were in truth only one from William to George W., which corrupt combination to do by indirection what could not be done directly, was an abuse of the power in the will, and void.

The cause was heard by Judge Wallace, who held that A. J. *Glenn, a grandson of the testator, was, nevertheless, included in the class of "the issue" of the testator, and that his father's conveyance to him was not in violation of the will, but was good as the execution of the power created by the sixth clause thereof, and dismissed the complaint. From this judgment the plaintiffs appeal to this court upon the following exceptions:

*311

1. "Because the Circuit judge construed the will of David Glenn to include by the words 'my issue,' grandsons as well as sons, and that the context of the will did not limit or restrict it to the children of David Glenn.

2. "Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that William Glenn, the son of David, by the sale and conveyance of the land to A. J. Glenn and in two days afterwards by A. J. Glenn to G. W. Glenn, sr., executed the power conferred upon him under the will, and in that manner showed that William Glenn intended to conform to the power.

3. "Because the Circuit judge erred in construing that the power was fully executed, when the investment of the proceeds of the sale of the land was a part of the execution of the power.

4. "Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that William Glenn could convey to his son, under the power conferred by the will," &c.

After giving the land to William for life, with certain limitations over to his issue, the testator superadded the power to sell the land "to any of my issue and to make a good fee simple title to the purchaser," &c. Without reference to the other questions raised in the case, the Circuit judge held that this power was well executed by the conveyance of the devisee, William, to his son, A. J. Glenn, a grandson of the testator, and that he took "a good fee simple title." In this view we concur with the judge for the reasons given by him. The word "issue" does not embrace simply children, but grandchildren as well. "The word 'issue,' when not restricted by the context, is co-extensive and synonymous with descendants, comprehending objects of every degree." 2 Jarm. Wills, 25; 2 Redf. Wills, 396; Burleson v. Bowman, 1 Rich. Eq., 111. We see nothing in the will which requires us to construe "issue" as limited to children.

It seems that the judge below did not think it necessary to *consider the view that the conveyance to A. J. Glenn should be entirely ignored, and that alone considered which was made by him to George W. Glenn, as if it had been directly made to him by William himself. Whether the testimony of A. J. Glenn was or was not competent, it is possibly true that the deed from William to A. J. Glenn, was intended merely as one of the links in the chain to carry title to George W. Glenn; but even on that assumption we think we have no right to disregard that conveyance. As William had the power under the will to convey to A. J. Glenn, who was one of the issue and remaindermen, the land after such conveyance undoubtedly became his property, with which he could do as he pleased. He conveyed it to his uncle George, and although he may now be willing to repudiate the act, the court is not at liberty to do so and to hold that it was illegal and void.

*312

Such circuitous conveyances are not unknown in the law. Our old Court of Appeals held, that a married woman who, under the act of 1795, was incapable of conveying her inheritance to her husband directly, yet might do so indirectly—that is to say, join her husband in conveying to a third person, who, by previous understanding, might immediately reconvey to the husband. Garvin v. Ingram, 10 Rich. Eq., 130. In that case Chancellor Wardlaw, in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "But it is argued that as the conveyance must be to a third person, the purpose to benefit the husband is unlawful and annuls a conveyance nominally to a third person, but really for the husband's profit. This conclusion is illogical. The act makes no change of the common law, inhibiting one from conveying to himself, (Fryerson v. Fryerson, 3 Strob., 461), but it authorizes, or at least does not inhibit, the power of the wife to bestow her whole estate upon her husband indirectly. * * * Dr. Blackstone remarks (2 Bl. Com., 88), that the donee of fees conditional were careful to alien the estate as soon as they had performed the condition of having issue, and afterwards re-purchased the estate, to enable it to descend to heirs general by the common law; and Judge Evans, in Kottman v. Ayer, 1 Strob., 570, says: 'I have known more than one case where the forms of law (1795) have been observed, merely to invest the husband with the fee of the wife's land, by a reconveyance from a pretended purchaser.'"

*313

*It was further contended for the defendant, that the very terms of the direct devise to William, under the operation of the rule in Shelley's case, gave him a fee-conditional in the land, and after the performance of the condition by the birth of issue, he had the absolute right to alienate generally, without any regard to, and independent of, the limited power given for that purpose in the sixth clause of the will. The terms of the devise are "for and during his natural life, and after his death to his issue for ever, which issue shall take per stirpes." At first view, it would seem that this is a case within the very terms of the rule, which declares that "where an estate of freehold is given to the ancestor, and a remainder be thereon limited to his heirs * * the heirs of his body or his issue, such remainder is immediately executed in possession in the ancestor, so taking the freehold, and he takes an estate in fee or in tail according to the terms of the limitation." But in opposition to this view it is earnestly urged that there are other words in the will, which limit the generality of the word "issue," and evince an intention that it should be taken to express a class as purchasers, creating a new stock of inheritance, and not to indicate an indefinite line of descent. See McIntyre v. McIntyre, 16 S. C., 290. The question is not free from difficulty, and as it is not necessarily involved in the decision of the case, we prefer to reserve our judgment, and to make no ruling upon it.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

21 S. C. 313

GODFREY v. FIELDING.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Improvements ⇦4.]

In the assertion of a claim under the betterment act, great promptness is required; and there is no authority for substituting heirs or purchasers in the place of the plaintiff in the original action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Improvements, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. ⇦4.]

[2. Ejectment ⇦148; Improvements ⇦4.]

The words "final judgment" in the betterment act, are not used in their strict technical sense, but mean the final determination of the rights of the parties as to the land. Therefore, where the claim for betterments was made on the day of the entry of the formal judgment, but four years after verdict rendered, the act *in question afforded neither the authority nor machinery to enable the defendant to make his claim either against the purchasers in possession, or the heirs-at-law of the original plaintiff.

*314

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. § 517; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃148; Improvements, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃4.]

Before Fraser, J., Laurens, February, 1884.

The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. W. H. Martin, for plaintiff.

Messrs. Holmes & Simpson, contra.

June 26, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action by Jesse Godfrey against the defendants for "betterments," under the act of 1870, "to protect the rights of persons lawfully in possession of lands and tenements," re-enacted in the General Statutes from section 1835 to 1841, inclusive.

The complaint stated, "That heretofore, to wit, on November 18, 1879, and for several years previous to that time, he, the plaintiff, was seized and possessed of a tract of land, known as a part of the Laurens side of the Van Patton Shoals, which he had purchased, supposing at the time the title was good in fee. And still further confiding in the said title, he erected valuable improvements upon said tract of land, to wit, grist mill, cotton gin, &c., &c., and thereby enhanced the value of said land four thousand dollars.

II. "That subsequent to said purchase and the erection of said improvements, one John Fielding instituted proceedings against the plaintiff herein (Godfrey) for the recovery of the possession of said tract of land. And at the extra November term of the Court of Common Pleas for Laurens county, 1879, to wit, November 18, 1879, the said cause was heard by Mr. Justice Thomson and a jury, and a verdict was rendered by said jury for the recovery of the possession of said tract of land in favor of the said John Fielding against the plaintiff herein, and judgment was entered thereon on October 4, 1883.

III. "That thereafter the said Fielding died intestate, and his widow, Harriet W. Fielding, was duly appointed administratrix *of the goods and effects of said John Fielding on the day of , 18 .

*315

IV. "That the defendants, Jesse Leatherwood and O. P. Westmoreland, are in possession of said tract of land, and claim title through the said John Fielding, as plaintiff is informed and believes." And claiming four thousand dollars as the value of the said improvements.

The defendants, Jesse Leatherwood and O. P. Westmoreland, demurred upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Judge Fraser sustained the demurrer and dismissed the complaint as to the defendants before the court, but added to the order a provision allowing the complaint to stand for whatever relief as against the heirs-at-law of the deceased John Fielding or the land mentioned, to which Jesse Godfrey may show himself entitled. Both parties appealed—the defendants, because the judge did not dismiss the complaint out and out, but added to the order a provision allowing the complaint to stand for whatever relief, as against the heirs-at-law of the deceased John Fielding or the land, which Jesse Godfrey may show himself entitled to.

The plaintiff appeals upon the following grounds:

1. "Because his honor erred in sustaining the oral demurrer and dismissing the complaint, when the motion was based on the ground that the verdict was the final judgment, and not the entry of judgment thereon.

2. "Because his honor erred in sustaining the oral demurrer and dismissing the complaint as to Harriet W. Fielding, as administratrix, when she had not appeared by attorney or otherwise in the cause, and she being the widow and an heir of the said John Fielding, deceased.

3. "Because his honor erred in sustaining the oral demurrer and dismissing the complaint as to Jesse Leatherwood and O. P. Westmoreland, when they are in possession of the land and betterments erected by the plaintiff, claiming title to the same through and under the said John Fielding, deceased, the plaintiff in the original action for the recovery of the land.

4. "Because his honor erred in sustaining the oral demurrer, and dismissing the complaint as to all the defendants, when they *are proper parties for an ultimate determination of these proceedings.

*316

5. "Because his honor erred in sustaining the oral demurrer and dismissing the complaint on the ground that the heirs at law of the said Fielding, deceased, were the only parties defendant in these proceedings, and not allowing the plaintiff leave to amend his complaint, and make the heirs at law of the said John Fielding parties defendant."

The statements of the complaint must be taken as true so far as they are clearly made. It is not precisely set forth when Fielding, the plaintiff in the action for the land, died or the land was sold. It must have been after the verdict, for upon any other supposition the verdict could not have been rendered; and it must have been before the formal judgment was entered, for on that day process was issued against his administratrix. Taking all the statements of the complaint to be true, we think the plaintiff failed in several particulars, to show himself entitled to recover. The land having been recovered from him, there was no authority for his action for the value of improvements but the special statute upon the subject; and in order to entitle him to the benefit of that, it was necessary for him to conform to its provisions. Kennedy v. Reames, 15 S. C., 552.

The statute, among other things, provides that "after final judgment in an action to recover lands and tenements, &c. * * * the defendant in such action shall, within forty-eight hours after such judgment, or during the term of the court in which the same shall be rendered, file a complaint against such plaintiff for so much money as the lands and tenements are so made better, in the office of the clerk of the court, which shall be sufficient notice to the defendant in such complaint to appear and defend against the same. * * * The court on the entry of such action shall stay all proceedings upon the judgment obtained in the prior action," &c. The nature of the proceeding as a cross-action, as well as the whole tenor of the act, shows that in the assertion of the claim great promptness is required. It will be observed that action is authorized only against the plaintiff in the land action; no express authority is given to substitute his heirs in his place. No provision is made for impleading purchasers, who have come *into possession under the plaintiff or his personal representative. The case of "the plaintiff" being still in court, no new summons is necessary, but the complaint may be filed at once against him. It is assumed that the defendant is still in possession, as the proceedings therein are to "be stayed" until the question of improvements is decided, and if decided for the defendant, there is a lien upon the land for the amount recovered.

*317

But it is urged that all these provisions, indicating the necessity for prompt action, must yield to those words in the act, "after final judgment," which it is insisted can only mean the entry of the formal judgment in the clerk's office, and fixes the time at which the cross-action must be commenced, without regard to the condition of things or of the parties at that time. We cannot accept this view. The verdict for the land had been rendered nearly four years before the formal entry in the clerk's office of the judgment thereon. In the meantime the verdict had been acted on as the final determination of the contest as to the land. The plaintiff had recovered the land and sold it. The defendant had yielded the possession, and, being out, instituted these proceedings as an original action against the administratrix of the plaintiff who recovered the land, and the purchasers from him, basing his right to recover solely upon the ground that he commenced his action upon the very day on which the formal judgment was entered in the clerk's office, years after the verdict had been rendered which finally determined the rights of the parties.

It seems to us that the interpretation sought to be given to the words "final judgment," would not be in accord with the spirit of the act, but would defeat the manifest intention of the legislature. It is out of our power to amend the law, even if it were considered desirable. We must take it as we find it. The question is not as to the proper meaning of the words taken separately and as applicable to all cases, but as to the proper construction of the act taken as a whole: whether as used in the act the words "final judgment" must be taken in their strict technical sense, or as intended to express the idea of a final determination of the rights of the parties as to the land. We are obliged to adopt the latter as the only construction which makes all the parts of the act consistent, and gives proper effect to the words

*318

*"rendered" and "obtained," which cannot be correctly said to express the simple "entry" in the clerk's office of the formal judgment. The act contemplated the verdict as the final judgment as to the rights of the parties to the land, or assumed that such formal judgment would be promptly entered. Its framers could not have supposed that the right to the cross action for improvements only arose upon the entry of judgment in the clerk's office, which might be never done, or delayed for years.

In reference to this same act, the title of which is, "To protect the rights of persons lawfully in possession," this court has held that the word "final in the phrase 'final judgment' should not be construed technically as 'relating to the end,' 'ultimate,' 'last,' &c., but taking the whole provision together, we cannot doubt that the words were intended to apply to the Circuit and not to the Supreme Court." Garrison v. Dougherty, 18 S. C., 488.

The plaintiff failed to make his claim for betterments at the proper time and in the proper manner, and the act does not afford either the authority or machinery for enabling him to do so now either as against the purchasers in possession or the administratrix or the heirs of John Fielding, deceased.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court, in so far as it sustained the demurrer, be affirmed; and that in so far as it retained the complaint as against the heirs at law of John Fielding, deceased, it be reversed and the complaint dismissed.

21 S. C. 318

INFORMATION against OLIVER. SAME against SAME. SAME against SAME. SAME against SAME.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Municipal Corporations ⇐639.]

Where, in an information in the City Court of Charleston for doing business without the prescribed license, it substantially appeared that the proceeding was in the name of the State, the objection that there was no plaintiff was properly overruled.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Information against Jager, 29 S. C. 441, 7 S. E. 605.

For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1406; Dec. Dig. ⇐639.]

[2. Trial ⇐76.]

The proper time to object to evidence is when it is offered.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Brasington v. South Bound R. Co., 62 S. C. 329, 40 S. E. 665, 89 Am. St. Rep. 905.

For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 172, 183–190, 237; Dec. Dig. ⇐76.]

*319

[3. Evidence ⇐32.]

*An ordinance of the City Council of Charleston may, without proof, be brought to the attention of the municipal courts of that city.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in City Council of Charleston v. Ashley Phosphate Co., 34 S. C. 551, 13 S. E. 845; State v. Williams, 35 S. C. 354, 14 S. E. 819.

For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 42; Dec. Dig. ⇐32.]

[4. Licenses ⇐42.]

Under information for carrying on a business without the license required by a city ordinance, the prosecuting attorney proved that defendant had carried on such business, but did not prove that defendant had no license. Held, That defendant was properly convicted, the burden of proof as to the license being on him.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Chavis, 34 S. C. 135, 13 S. E. 317.

For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. § 91; Dec. Dig. ⇐42.]

[5. Constitutional Law ⇐26, 87, 287; Licenses ⇐7.]

An act of the Legislature authorizing a municipal corporation to impose a license tax upon business occupations does not violate sections 12, 14, or 41, of article I., nor section 33 of article II. of the constitution of this state.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Information against Jager, 29 S. C. 443, 7 S. E. 605; Thomas v. Town of Moultrieville, 52 S. C. 185, 29 S. E. 647; Hill v. City Council of Abbeville, 59 S. C. 426, 38 S. E. 11; Cowart v. City Council of Greenville, 67 S. C. 44, 45 S. E. 122.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 30, 159, 831; Dec. Dig. ⇐26, 87, 287; Licenses, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. ⇐7.]

[This case is also cited in Information against Jager, 29 S. C. 446, 7 S. E. 605, without specific application, and in Fairly v. Wappoo Mills, 44 S. C. 255, 22 S. E. 108, 29 L. R. A. 215, as to facts.]

Before Pringle, Recorder, Charleston, July, 1883.

The opinion fully states the four cases.

Mr. W. M. Thomas, for appellant.

Mr. Geo. D. Bryan, contra.

June 26, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. These were informations in the City Court of Charleston for alleged violations of ordinances of the city, two for carrying on the business of publishing a newspaper and the other two for carrying on the business of a job hand printer, without having paid the license required therefor. The cases involving the same points were heard together, and will be so considered, what is said in one being understood as applying to all the cases.

The report of the recorder was follows:

"State of South Carolina, County of Charleston, City of Charleston. } In the City Court.

"At a stated term of the City Court of the city of Charleston, for the city of Charleston, begun and holden on the first Monday of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, Geo. D. Bryan, corporation counsel for the city of Charleston, comes into court here, and upon his oath of office, gives said court to understand and be informed, that W. J. Oliver, late of the city of Charleston, state aforesaid, on the 28th *day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, and on divers other days in said year at Charleston, in said state of South Carolina, and within the jurisdiction of this court, was the publisher of a newspaper worked by hand, and unlawfully did carry on the business of publishing a newspaper worked by hand without having paid the license tax therefor, imposed by the ordinance of the city of Charleston, entitled 'An ordinance to regulate licenses for the year 1882,' ratified the 27th day of December, A. D. 1881, as in that behalf required by the said ordinance, contrary to the said ordinance, and against the peace and dignity of the state of South Carolina.

*320

"G. D. Bryan,

"Corporation Counsel City of Charleston."

Indorsed:

"The State of South Carolina, Charleston County, City of Charleston. } In the City Court.

"On hearing the above information, and on motion of G. D. Bryan, corporation counsel,

"It is ordered, That the same be filed and the case fixed for trial on the first Monday of November, A. D. 1882, at 10 o'clock a. m., and that a copy of said information and this order be forthwith served upon the said W. J. Oliver. October 14, 1882, W. Alston Pringle, recorder, * * * The case was finally fixed for trial on July 2, 1883, and was tried before a jury empannelled and sworn according to law. The corporation counsel, in proving his case to the jury without objection, read the following sections of an ordinance, entitled 'An ordinance to regulate licenses for the year 1882':

"Section 1. Be it ordained by the mayor and aldermen of the city of Charleston, in city council assembled, That every person, firm, company, or corporation engaged in, or intending to engage in, any trade, business, or profession hereinafter mentioned, shall obtain, on or before the 20th day of January, A. D. 1882, a license therefore, in the manner hereinafter prescribed. Any person, firm, company, or corporation, commencing business after the said 20th day of January, A. D. 1882, shall obtain a license therefor before entering upon such trade, business, or profession.

*321

*"Sec. 3. If any person or persons shall exercise or carry on any trade, business, or profession, for the exercising, carrying on, or doing of which a license is required by this ordinance, without taking out such license as in that behalf required, he, she, or they shall, besides being liable to the payment for the license, be subject to a penalty equal to fifty per cent. of the amount required to be paid for the license, to be sued for and collected in this city court, or any other court of competent jurisdiction, or to imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, as may be adjudged by the recorder or court trying the case.

"Sec. 11. Class 54. Papers worked by hand, $25.

"The corporation counsel examined O. R. Levy and Sol Blank, who testified as to the defendant publishing the newspaper called the 'Charleston Mercury,' and put in evidence copies of the said newspaper (of dates August 3, 1882, September 13, 1882, December 11, 1882, November 9, 1882, and August 12, 1882,) in all of which the name of W. J. Oliver was published and appeared as editor and manager. No evidence for the defendant. I therefore charged the jury that this was a question of fact, which remained with them to determine. That if from the evidence they found that the defendant did publish a newspaper worked by hand without a license, they would find him guilty, otherwise not guilty. The jury found a verdict of guilty.

"On the 7th of July, 1883, the defendant, through his counsel, moved for arrest of judgment and for a new trial, both of which were refused and the defendant sentenced 'to pay the sum of thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents, or thirty days in jail—county jail of Charleston, &c.

"(signed) W. Alston Pringle, "Recorder."

From this sentence the defendant appealed to this court upon the following grounds: "1. There was no plaintiff. 2. Because the city ordinance was not proved. 3. Because the defendant was not proved 'not to have paid' for a license, or to have received none. 4. Because this license law is unconstitutional as in violation of article 1, sections 12 and 14, of the state constitution. 5. Because the information being lodged in 1883 and the offences *alleged in 1882, another remedy was provided by the city ordinances. 6. Because the defendant having already been tried by a jury for these offences, and verdicts rendered, he cannot be tried a second time. Exceptions five and six were properly abandoned in the argument here.

*322

First. It is claimed that there was no plaintiff. This objection goes more to the form than the substance. The proceeding was in the City Court of Charleston in a case arising under an ordinance of the City Council. In such case the City Council and the recorder have the right to regulate the practice under section 2131 of the General Statutes, which provides as follows: "It shall be lawful for the City Council and the said recorder to prescribe, and from time to time to regulate, the practice of the said court, and of the attorneys therein, conformably to this chapter, and as nearly as may be to the forms and rules used in the Circuit Courts of this state, and the proceedings shall be the same substantially in like cases, except in cases for the violation of ordinances when imprisonment is imposed in addition to, or in the alternative of, a fine, in which cases the prosecution shall be in the form of an information on the official oath of the corporation counsel." In accordance with the above provision this was an "information on the official oath of the corporation counsel."

An information is the declaration of the charge or offence against any one at the suit of the king, filed by a public officer, without the intervention of a grand jury. State v. Starling, 15 Rich., 132. Although the title of the information was not endorsed on the information, there can be no doubt that it was in the name of the state. The information both commences and ends in the name of the state, and sets forth that the offence charged was "against the peace and dignity of the state of South Carolina." It has been held with reference to a writ of venire, which must issue in the name of the state, that "if it anywhere appears in the writ that it issued in the name of the state, there is a sufficient compliance with the constitutional requirement; and surely the mere location of the words upon the paper can have no special virtue. Nor can the addition in the caption of the words 'county of Spartanburg' impair the validity of the *mandate, for they may well be regarded as mere surplusage." State v. Hill, 19 S. C., 441; State v. Gilreath, Ibid, 603.

*323

Second. The point is made that the city ordinance was not proved. In presenting the case to the jury, it was read without objection. The proper time to make objection is when evidence is offered. Burris v. Whitner, 3 S. C., 510. Besides, this proceeding was in the City Court of Charleston, and in that court it was no more necessary to offer proof of a public ordinance, under the seal of the city council, than in the courts of the state to prove a public act of the legislature. Municipal ordinances are private laws when brought before the superior judiciary of a state, but not when brought before a city court. 1 Whart. L. Evid., § 293.

Third. Objection is made that it was not shown affirmatively that the defendant had not paid for a license, or had not in fact received one. There is no complaint as to the charge of the recorder. Upon the proof that the defendant had been engaged in the business as alleged, and nothing being offered by the defendant by way of defence, the recorder submitted the case to the jury with the remark "that it was a question of fact for them to determine; that if from the evidence they found that the defendant had published a newspaper, worked by hand, without a license, they would find him guilty; otherwise, not guilty." Under this charge, the jury found that he had published the paper without a license; and his motion for a new trial was refused. It is simply a question as to the sufficiency of proof upon a point of fact, which, as often ruled here, this court in a law case has no right to consider.

It is urged, however, that it appears that there was no proof whatever upon one of the main allegations of the information, and therefore the conviction must necessarily have been illegal. Can it be properly said that there was no proof in view of the presumption allowable from the character of the fact itself and the conduct of the defendant? It will be observed that the allegation is negative in form, that there was no regular issue in the case, that the defendant did not formally plead to the information, made no denial, and offered no proof. The information contained two allegations: that the defendant had carried on the *business, and that he had not paid the license tax. The first was proved, and the defendant did not prove that he had paid the tax and taken a license.

*324

Under these circumstances, upon whom was the onus of making the proof upon the subject? Was it on the state to prove that the defendant had not paid the tax, or upon the defendant, if the fact were so, to prove that he had paid it? The general rule certainly is, that he who affirms must prove, and that one is not required to prove a negative. It is true there are certain exceptions to this rule, in which the proposition, though negative in its terms, must be proved by the party who states it, and notably in that class of cases in which the plaintiff grounds his right to recover upon a negative allegation, where of course the establishment of this negative is an essential element in his case. But even in this class of cases, Mr. Greenleaf says, "it is obvious that plenary proof on the part of the affirmant can hardly be expected, and therefore it is considered sufficient if he offer such evidence as, in the absence of counter-testimony, would afford ground for presuming that the allegation is true," &c.

But even this exception does not embrace that precise class of cases to which this belongs. "But when the subject matter of a negative averment lies peculiarly within the knowledge of the other party, the averment is taken as true unless disproved by that party. Such is the case in civil or criminal prosecutions for a penalty for doing an act which the statutes do not permit to be done by any person, except those who are duly licensed therefor: as for selling liquors, exercising a trade or profession, and the like. Here the party, if licensed, can immediately show it without the least inconvenience; whereas if proof of the negative were required, the inconvenience would be very great." 1 Green. Evid., § 79. Among the many cases cited in the margin to sustain the proposition is one from our own state, that of State v. Geuing, 1 McCord, 574, where the precise point was held that "on an indictment for retailing spirituous liquors without license, the state need not prove that the defendant had not a license, as the defendant must prove he had one," &c.

Fourth. This exception raises the question that the act of the General Assembly, under which the license ordinance of the City *Council was passed, is in violation of section 12, article I., of the state constitution, which declares that "no person shall be prevented from acquiring, holding, and transmitting property," &c. Also of section 14 of the same article, which declares that "no person shall be deprived of his life, liberty, or estate, but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land," &c. Also of section 41 of the same article, which declares that "the enumeration of rights in this constitution shall not be construed to impair others retained by the people, and all powers not herein delegated remain with the people," &c. And also of section 33, article II., which declares that "all taxes upon property, real or personal, shall be laid upon the actual value of the property taxed, as the same shall be ascertained by an assessment made for the purpose of laying such tax," &c.

*325

This certainly opens a very wide field. These are all important provisions of the constitution, but every point now made has been already considered and decided by this court, and we think it could result in no good to open the argument and renew the discussion. It concerns the interest of all that the law and its interpretation should be settled. In the case of State v. Hayne, 4 S. C., 403 (1872), after full and careful consideration. it was decided that "a tax on professions or avocations is not forbidden by the constitution of this state either in terms or by implication; and that for the non-payment of a tax on business, a penalty may be imposed to be recovered by an indictment as for a misdemeanor."

In the case of State v. Columbia, 6 S. C., 1 (1874), it was held that the legislature is not forbidden by the constitution from empowering municipal corporations to enforce taxes on business and avocations and to fix a different rate for each distinct class of persons subject to the tax. That whatever in this regard the state herself could do, she might authorize a municipal corporation to do within its limits. In this case, no doubt has been suggested that the act of the legislature, if constitutional, does not fully authorize the ordinance of the City Council, under which these proceedings were instituted.

Then followed the case of Charleston v. Oliver, 16 S. C., 50 (1881), which being against this same defendant, recognized and *followed the cases of Hayne and the City of Columbia, above referred to, in the doctrines therein announced. The court said: "The general question of the power of the legislature to impose a license tax has been conclusively settled in the case of State v. Hayne, 4 S. C., 403, where most of the constitutional objections raised in this case were considered and disposed of. This case was followed by that of State v. Columbia, 6 S. C., 1, in which it was held that the legislature could empower a municipal corporation to impose a license tax on persons, following particular callings, or pursuing particular occupations, within the corporate limits of such municipality. So that we consider that many of the constitutional questions raised by the appellant in these cases have already been adjudicated, and it is only necessary for us to refer to the cases in which these questions were determined."

*326

It is true that it was held in that case that the act of the legislature, under the supposed authority of which the ordinance then under consideration was passed, did not authorize the municipality to impose a license tax on occupations, and upon that ground alone the judgment was set aside. But since that time the act of 1881 (17 Stat., 582) has been passed, which is free from the constitutional objection that prevailed in that case, and which by its terms undoubtedly authorizes the City Council to pass such an ordinance. By authority of this latter act the ordinances of 1882 and 1883 imposing a license tax were passed, and the penalties now claimed in the information were incurred for alleged defaults subsequently made. We cannot see that any of the constitutional objections made can avail the defendant in refusing to pay the license tax imposed by the city authorities.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the recorder of the City Court be affirmed, and that the same judgment be regarded as entered in each of the three other cases stated in the caption herein.

---

21 S. C. *327

*WILSON & CO. v. DEAN.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐966.]

During the reading of a commission it was discovered that the cross interrogatories had not been propounded, whereupon, on objection made by defendant and sustained, the Circuit judge, on plaintiff's motion, withdrew the case from the jury and ordered a continuance. Held, that such order was within the judge's discretion, and that his discretion was properly exercised.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Lowndes v. Miller, 25 S. C. 123; Trustees of Wadsworthville Poor School v. Orr, 33 S. C. 275, 11 S. E. 830; Latimer v. Latimer, 42 S. C. 209, 20 S. E. 159; Booth v. Langley Mfg. Co., 51 S. C. 416, 29 S. E. 205.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3837; Dec. Dig. ⇐966.]

[2. Assignments ⇐78.]

An assignment of a note carries with it all the securities which the assignor holds for its payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. § 145; Dec. Dig. ⇐78.]

[3. Guaranty ⇐4.]

Defendant agreed to sell fertilizers for plaintiffs on a credit, guaranteeing the securities to the extent of his commissions, and afterwards collected in part these securities. Held, that the agreement was not strictly a guaranty, and that plaintiffs' action on this agreement should be regarded as an action for money had and received, in which they would be entitled to recover all moneys received by the defendant until fully paid the amount due to them from these securities.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Carroll County Savings Bank v. Strother, 28 S. C. 515, 6 S. E. 313.

For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. §§ 3–6; Dec. Dig. ⇐4.]

[4. Guaranty ⇐70.]

If an action on a guaranty, the plaintiffs might be required to show that they had used due diligence to collect the notes, before resort could be had to the guarantor; but however regarded, the fault and laches of plaintiffs in returning the notes to defendant for collection were pertinent to the issue, and, if sustained, a good defence; and there being some evidence upon these matters, they should have been submitted to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 78; Dec. Dig. ⇐70.]

[This case is also cited in Agnew v. Adams, 24 S. C. 89, without specific application.]

Before Hudson, J., Spartanburg, October, 1883.

This was an action by R. T. Wilson & Co. against Alvin H. Dean, commenced September 2, 1880. The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

After the jury is charged, a case cannot be withdrawn, but plaintiff may take a non-suit. Defendant was not liable as guarantor of the uncollected notes. 2 Dan. Neg. Inst., § 1753; 17 S. C., 4; Abb. Tr. Evid., 474; 1 Wait's Act. & Def., 584; 3 McCord, 236; 2 Pars. Bills & N., 140; Brandt Sur., §§ 83, 84; 1 Hill, 59. The note and guaranty are separable, and the promise to guarantee did not amount to a guaranty that could be sued upon, but if it did, the guaranty did not necessarily pass under *the assignment. 22 Barb., 516; 26 Wend., 425. The liability of the plaintiffs for not forwarding the notes for collection in proper time was a proper defence, and the judge should have allowed the jury to consider the same in making up their verdict. 2 Dan. Neg. Inst., § 1753. Under his contract, defendant could not be held liable to pay plaintiffs more money or cotton than he actually received on the notes put in his hands for collection. All of these matters his honor took away from the jury.

*328

Mr. M. F. Ansel, contra.

The matter complained of in the first and second exception was within the discretion of the Circuit judge. The guaranty passed with the assignment of the notes. 10 Rich. Eq., 585; 5 S. C., 346; 14 S. C., 66, 142. Defendant, as agent of plaintiffs, was bound to exercise good faith in taking the notes, and to collect all that was possible. Plaintiffs had nothing to do with them after they were turned over to defendant.

June 27, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. The defendant was appointed by the Atlantic and Virginia Fertilizer Company their agent for the sale of fertilizers at Vernonsville, South Carolina. The terms of the agreement, under which he was so acting, are to be gathered from a letter of the company to the defendant, setting forth the terms proposed, and his reply thereto, agreeing to such terms, with a modification therein stated. According to these terms, the defendant was to sell the fertilizers furnished him by the company on a commission of $6 per ton, he guaranteeing the notes taken therefor to the extent of his commissions only, after allowing certain specified expenses, which notes were to be turned over to the company. In pursuance of this agreement seventy-six tons of fertilizers were sent to the defendant by the company, amounting, at the price at which the article was to be sold, to the sum of $5,320, and the defendant forwarded to the company notes to the amount of $5,120.12, which were received by them.

This agreement seems to have been entered into on February 26, 1877, but at what time the notes were forwarded to the company does not appear, though it must have been some time prior to *November 9, 1877, for on that day the plaintiffs, to whom the company had previously transferred the notes, took from the defendant a receipt in the following words: "Received by express from R. T. Wilson & Co., of New York, for collection, sundry notes, bonds, liens, and accounts, amounting in the aggregate to fifty-one hundred and twenty 12-100 dollars, and we agree to act as agents and trustees for the said R. T. Wilson & Co., in collecting the same, and bind ourselves to send forward to the said R. T. Wilson & Co., at New York, all cotton and money received in settlement of the same, as fast as the same comes into our possession, without retaining any portion for our commissions and services until they are fully paid off."

*329

This action was commenced on September 2, 1880, to recover an alleged balance due on the notes thus entrusted to defendant for collection. During the progress of the trial the testimony of a witness for the plaintiffs, which had been taken by commission, was being read, when it was discovered that the commissioners had failed to propound the cross interrogatories to the witness, whereupon the defendant objected to the commission, which objection was sustained. The plaintiffs then moved to withdraw the case from the jury and continue the case, which motion was granted and the defendant excepted. The defendant then agreed that, subject to his exception, the testimony by commission might be received, and the trial proceed.

The plaintiffs offered testimony showing the amount of fertilizers delivered to the defendant for sale, and that in November, 1879, a partial settlement was made with the defendant by plaintiffs' agent, in which, after allowing him credit for the cotton delivered, and certain expenses, together with his commissions and the amount of uncollected notes then estimated to be on hand, left the defendant indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $469.85, which subsequently he paid before this action was commenced. The plaintiffs then closed, and the defendant made a motion for a non-suit, on the ground that plaintiffs had proved no cause of action against the defendant, which motion was refused.

The testimony on the part of the defendant was to the effect that in June or July, 1879,

*330

he had a settlement in full of his *guano transactions with the plaintiffs, who took the notes on hand, but subsequently returned them to defendant, begging him to collect them if possible; that defendant could not collect them because they were sent to him too late in the season; that the notes on hand, uncollected (which were produced at the trial), amounted to $741.40, upon which assignments to the plaintiffs by the Atlantic and Virginia Fertilizer Company were indorsed; that none of said notes have any guaranty of defendant indorsed upon them; that defendant had paid out for plaintiffs sundry expenses specified; that "all money or cotton received have been turned over to principals;" that defendant never guaranteed the notes; that at the time of the partial settlement made with plaintiffs' agent, defendant did not have with him the uncollected notes, and the amount ($623.60) then set down as the amount of the uncollected notes was only an estimate, the correct amount, as shown by the notes produced at the trial, being, as stated above, $741.40; that defendant had written to the attorney for the plaintiffs, asking whether the notes should be put in suit, who replied that he would let him know, but never did so, and that the notes were never sued. In addition to this testimony from the defendant himself he also offered the evidence of another witness to the effect that the notes could have been collected, if they had been on hand early in the season.

"The defendant requested his honor to charge that if through the fault of the plaintiffs, and without fault of the defendant, the $741.40 of notes on hand were not collected, then Dean's rights are the same as though the notes were collected, and the money in plaintiffs' hands. His honor said that if the facts warranted it, this proposition of law was correct, but it was difficult to apply such proposition to the testimony in this case, and charged that the liability of the plaintiffs for not forwarding the notes for collection in proper time could not come in in this action. He charged that if the notes were transferred by the Atlantic and Virginia Fertilizer Company, the guarantee of the notes by Dean followed such transfer; that if the transfer was made, and the defendant had not paid to the plaintiffs, or their assignor, the amount of the notes taken by him, to the amount of his commissions ($456), then the jury might find a verdict for the plaintiffs for $456; *that if there was a settlement with A. H. Dean and plaintiffs at the time when Mr. Ansel was present, and the amount between them was settled, except the $623 of notes still on hand, and Dean failed to collect and return said notes then, under his guarantee, Dean is now responsible to the plaintiffs for $456, the amount of his commissions."

*331

The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $456, and the defendant moved for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was excessive, and was contrary to the testimony and the charge of the presiding judge. The motion was refused, and judgment being entered on the verdict, defendant appeals, alleging that the Circuit judge erred in the following particulars: "1. In allowing the plaintiffs the right to withdraw the case from the jury after they were charged with the case. 2. In not granting a non-suit herein. 3. In charging that if the notes were transferred by the Atlantic and Virginia Fertilizer company, then the guarantee of the notes by Dean followed the transfer. 4. In charging that if such transfer was made, and the defendant had not paid to the plaintiffs, or their assignor, the amount of the notes taken by him to the amount of his commissions ($456), then the jury might find a verdict for the plaintiffs for $456. 5. In charging that if there was a settlement with A. H. Dean and plaintiffs at the time when Mr. Ansel was present, and the amount between them was settled, except the $623 of notes still on hand, and Dean failed to collect and return said notes, then, under his guarantee, Dean is now responsible to the plaintiffs for $456, the amount of his commissions. 6. In ruling that the defendant's request to charge was not applicable to the testimony in this case. 7. In charging that the liability of the plaintiffs for not forwarding the notes for collection in proper time could not come in in this action. 8. In refusing to charge that if through fault of the plaintiffs, and without fault of the defendant, the $741 of notes on hand were not collected, then Dean's rights are the same as though the notes were collected and the money in plaintiffs' hands. 9. In refusing a new trial."

The first ground of appeal presents a question of practice which we think is conclusively settled adversely to the appellant by the case of Cook v. Cottrell, 4 Strob., 61. In that case the *action was on a foreign judgment, and after the trial had been commenced it was discovered that there was a defect in the judge's certificate authenticating the record, whereupon the plaintiff moved a continuance of the case in order that the certificate might be amended, which motion was granted, notwithstanding the defendant insisted upon his right to a non-suit. On appeal the court held that this was a matter within the discretion of the Circuit Court, saying, amongst other things, that "without a discretion over the whole subject, to be carefully exercised by the court, trials might be made the means of defeating justice instead of dispensing it, and the court itself become an instrument to entrap the unwary or reward the contrivances of the dishonest. It must be supposed that discretion was properly exercised on the circuit; the circumstances which have been dwelt on here show no reason for controlling it." The appeal was therefore dismissed. The present case is much stronger than the one cited. There the defect complained of might have been discovered before the trial, while here it could not have been, as no one had a right to open the commission until it was published by the order of the court, and there was no reason to suppose that the commissioners had neglected to perform their duty. It is quite clear that the whole matter was within the discretion of the Circuit judge, and it is equally clear that his discretion was properly exercised.

*332

The second, third, fourth, and fifth grounds of appeal present substantially the same questions, and will be considered together. There is no doubt of the legal proposition that the assignment of a note or bond carries with it all the securities which the assignor holds for its payment. (See the cases cited by the counsel for the plaintiffs.) When, therefore, the notes in question were transferred to the plaintiffs by the Fertilizer Company, any security which it then held for the payment of such notes, enured to the benefit of the plaintiffs.

We think, however, that the true nature and effect of the agreement between the company and the defendant was not that the latter should, in the strict sense of the term, guarantee the payment of the notes. That was the proposition in the letter of the company to the defendant, but in his reply he modified that proposition in these words:

*333

"It is, however, understood that I *only guarantee to the extent of my commissions on all the sales I make. In other words, I am not to lose any more than my commissions on the sales for the season amount to." The real agreement, then, between the company and the defendant was that the latter was to sell the fertilizers furnished him by the former, on the terms agreed upon, collect the notes taken and forward proceeds to the company, retaining nothing for his commissions until the company had received the full amount of the sales, less the commissions and certain specified expenses. This, too, is the proper construction and effect of the receipt given by defendant to the plaintiffs on November 9, 1877, set out above.

If, therefore, the defendant had failed to collect a single dollar on the notes, we do not see what cause of action the plaintiffs could have against him, unless, perhaps, they were able to show that the failure to collect was the result of the defendant's default; and the only penalty the defendant would incur would be the loss of his commissions. It seems to us, therefore, that it is a mistake to regard this as an action on the guaranty of defendant, but that it should rather be regarded as an action for money had and received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiffs. Under the view which we have taken of the effect of the agreement between the parties, the defendant had no right to retain a single dollar for his commissions until he had fully paid and satisfied the plaintiffs the amount due to them. Whatever amount he may thus have retained was not his money, but was the money of the plaintiffs, received by him to their use, and for that he would be liable.

The sixth, seventh, and eighth grounds of appeal, involving the same principles, will be considered together. If the action could be regarded as an action on defendant's guaranty of the notes, to the extent of the amount of his commissions, then it seems to us clear, under the legal principles regulating the law of guaranty, that the question whether the failure to collect the notes was the result of the fault or laches of the plaintiffs, was quite pertinent to the issue; in fact, if the action was based upon the guaranty, the plaintiffs might have been required to show, affirmatively, that they used due diligence to collect the notes before resort could be had to the guarantor. But even regarding the action as we do, *as not based upon the guaranty, as it is called, but as an action for money had and received, still the question whether the failure to collect the notes was due to the negligence of the plaintiffs in returning them to the defendant in time to enable him to collect them was an important one, and should have been left to the jury, as there was testimony on the part of the defendant tending to show that the notes could have been collected if they had been sent to the defendant earlier in the season.

*334

The defendant had a pecuniary interest in collecting the whole amount of the notes, for upon his doing so depended his compensation. If, therefore, he was prevented from collecting the notes by the fault of the plaintiffs, and thereby lost his time and service, the extent to which he was thus a loser would certainly be good defence to the action of the plaintiffs for money received by him to their use. We think, therefore, that the Circuit judge erred in refusing to charge as requested, and instructing the jury that the question whether the plaintiffs were in fault in not forwarding the notes for collection in proper time could not be considered in this action.

The remaining ground of appeal has been so often ruled upon by this court that it requires no further notice.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

---

21 S. C. 334

DILLING, BAKER & CO. v. FOSTER.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Execution ⇨393.]

Copy order to appear before referee served upon defendant in supplementary proceedings had not the seal of court to the clerk's certificate. Held, that this furnished no ground for dismissing the proceedings, nor, after appearance and examination, could defendant object to the service.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1146; Dec. Dig. ⇨393.]

[2. Execution ⟸355.]

Levy upon goods was released by plaintiff because the goods had been previously mortgaged and the condition of the mortgage was broken. Held, that the levy was properly disposed of, and therefore the execution was not satisfied.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Thompson v. Brown, 56 S. C. 310, 33 S. E. 454.

For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1080; Dec. Dig. ⟸355.]

*335

[3. Execution ⟸406.]

*On the hearing of the referee's report in supplementary proceedings, the judge may appoint a receiver, without specific notice having been given that such appointment would then be applied for.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1164; Dec. Dig. ⟸406.]

[4. Appeal and Error ⟸909.]

A receiver having been appointed in supplementary proceedings, this court will assume, in the absence of all testimony upon the point, that the Circuit judge did his duty and ascertained that no other supplementary proceedings were then pending against this defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3675; Dec. Dig. ⟸909.]

[5. Execution ⟸407.]

The examination in supplementary proceedings having disclosed sufficient property in the debtor's hands, subject to levy and sale, to satisfy the judgment, a receiver might nevertheless, under the present practice, be appointed; and when appointed, he should be the receiver of all the defendant's property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1160; Dec. Dig. ⟸407.]

[6. Receivers ⟸51.]

It is the usual and better practice to require bonds from such receivers, but it is not essential.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. § 86; Dec. Dig. ⟸51.]

[7. Execution ⟸415.]

Section 321 of the code does not authorize a fee to plaintiff's attorney, and the "fixed sum as costs" therein provided for must be fixed by the judge, and not by the clerk of court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1194; Dec. Dig. ⟸415.]

[8. Appeal and Error ⟸9; Costs ⟸215.]

Taxation of costs can be corrected only by motion, but an order of the judge directing an erroneous taxation, and a taxation thereunder, may be brought up by exception, and the error corrected.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Dauntless Mfg. Co. v. Davis, 24 S. C. 539, 542; Cooke v. Poole, 26 S. C. 326, 2 S. E. 609; Crocker v. Collins, 44 S. C. 502, 22 S. E. 719; Burgess v. Crumpton, 93 S. C. 563, 77 S. E. 356.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 25; Dec. Dig. ⟸9; Costs, Cent. Dig. § 797; Dec. Dig. ⟸215.]

[9. Execution ⟸393.]

The mortgagee of the judgment debtor was not a necessary party to the proceedings, as the order did not interfere with the mortgaged property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1146; Dec. Dig. ⟸393.]

[10. Receivers ⟸47.]

After paying the debts, the receiver should return to the debtor all property remaining in his hands, but it was not error of law to omit such a direction from the order appointing the receiver.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. § 72; Dec. Dig. ⟸47.]

[11. Receivers ⟸130.]

A receiver should not be authorized to sell choses in action, unless they represent "desperate debts." Rule 70 of the Circuit Court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. §§ 225, 226; Dec. Dig. ⟸130.]

Before Wallace, J., Spartanburg, December, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

Messrs. Carson & Bomar, contra.

June 27, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. On July 7, 1883, the plaintiffs obtained judgment against the defendant for the sum, including costs, of $86.75, and issued execution therefor. The sheriff, on July 16, 1883, endorsed upon this execution a levy "upon a lot *of merchandise, &c., a list of which is attached within." By written endorsement on the execution the plaintiffs' attorneys released this levy upon the ground that the property was claimed by another person, and then the sheriff, on July 20, 1883, made a return of nulla bona upon the execution.

*336

Upon the usual affidavit, Judge Wallace, at chambers, made an order requiring the defendant to appear before a referee named, on July 25, 1883, or on such other days as he might appoint, to be examined touching his property, and directed the referee to report the testimony and his conclusions of fact. He also directed a copy of the order to be served on the defendant, and that in the meantime, and until the further order of the judge in the premises, that the defendant be enjoined from disposing of his property. The copy of this order served upon the defendant was not certified under the seal of the court. At a reference held on August 2, 1883, the defendant made a motion to dismiss the proceedings, because of the want of the seal to the copy of the order served upon the defendant. The motion was refused, and the examination of the defendant was taken at length, all of which is set out in the "Case."

The facts as reported by the referee, so far as the questions involved in this case are concerned, are substantially as follows: That the stock of goods, wares, and merchandise, to the estimated value of about $600, which had been levied upon by the sheriff, and the levy subsequently released, were covered by a mortgage to one Dreyer, dated February 8, 1883, given to secure a note for $500, payable February 9, 1883; that the merchandise levied upon, after it was released from the levy, was not returned directly to the defendant, but was taken charge of by the mortgagee Dreyer, who placed the defendant in charge of it to sell as his agent; that the goods levied upon were nearly sufficient to pay off both Dreyer's mortgage and the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs; that the defendant was the owner and in possession of property, consisting of choses in action to the amount of $917, a considerable portion of which would not be due until November 1, 1883, and a portion not due for two years, and other personal property of the estimated value of $112, besides a crop of growing cotton, twenty-five acres, the value of which was not estimated.

*337

*On hearing the report of the referee, the judge ordered that a receiver be appointed of all the property of the defendant set forth in the report, "with power and authority to sell the same, including the proceeds of the crop above named, or so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy the judgment in the above stated case, with interest thereon, and all the costs and disbursements of this action: * * * that the receiver above named have leave to bring action for the recovery of property of the defendant in execution in the hands of any other person; * * * that the defendant, W. C. Foster, deliver and turn over all of the said property to the said receiver immediately upon the service of this order, and that from the proceeds of said sale the said receiver shall pay all the costs of this action, including the costs of proceedings supplementary to judgment and ———dollars fee for attorneys of plaintiffs, to be taxed by the clerk of court, together with the judgment and interest thereon and disbursements." After this order the clerk, without holding any reference or taking any testimony, made a taxation of costs, in which, amongst other items, was the following: "Judgment-creditor, under section 321 of code (fixed sum), $15.00."

The defendant appeals upon sixteen grounds set out in the record, but which need not be repeated here, as several of them involve the same questions. We will therefore proceed to consider the various questions which we understand to be raised by the grounds of appeal.

The first is whether there was error in refusing to dismiss the proceedings upon the ground that the copy of the order requiring the defendant to appear before the referee and answer touching his property had no seal to the clerk's certificate. It is very clear that this defect in the copy served furnished no ground for dismissing the proceedings. It could, at most, only avail the defendant on a motion to set aside the service of the order as not a true copy of the original, or as not duly authenticated, so as to require a new service. But as the defendant appeared and was fully examined, and as the object of the service was to give the defendant notice, it is now too late to make even that objection.

The second, eighth, and ninth grounds are based upon the proposition that the execution was satisfied by the levy on the *stock of goods. It is quite true that a levy is prima facie satisfaction to the extent of the value of the property levied upon, but when it is shown that the levy has not produced satisfaction, and has been otherwise disposed of, the presumption of satisfaction is rebutted. May v. Hancock [1 Bailey, 299] 1 Rice Dig., 303; Peay v. Fleming, 2 Hill Ch., 99; McElwee v. Jeffreys, 7 S. C., 228. Here the levy had been properly disposed of, by being released upon the ground that the property levied upon belonged to another person, inasmuch as it was covered by the mortgage in favor of Dreyer, the condition of which had been broken, whereby the legal title had become vested in the mortgagee. Reese v. Lyon, 20 S. C., 17, and cases there cited.

*338

The third, tenth, and sixteenth exceptions raise the question as to the right to appoint a receiver of all the property of the defendant. The position of the appellant seems to be, first, that a receiver could not be appointed without notice of a motion to that effect. We do not understand that defendant claims that he had no notice of the hearing before Judge Wallace of the report of the referee and the exception thereto: but simply that he had no notice that upon such hearing the appointment of a receiver would be asked for. It seems to us that the terms of the statute prescribing the course of proceeding in such cases, was sufficient notice that an application for a receiver would be made, as that was one of the legitimate, if not necessary, steps to be taken, and, therefore, no specific notice that a receiver would be applied for was necessary.

Secondly, the appellant contends that the judge could not appoint a receiver without first ascertaining whether any other supplementary proceedings were pending. Section 318 of the code prescribes that before the appointment of a receiver, "the judge shall ascertain, if practicable, by the oath of the party, or otherwise, whether any other supplementary proceedings are pending against the absent debtor." The object of this provision is to prevent the appointment of two receivers for the same property, and although it does not, affirmatively, appear that inquiry was made as to whether any other proceedings were pending against the debtor in this case, yet neither does the contrary appear, and in the absence of any evidence to the contrary we must presume *that the judge did his duty, and did ascertain (whether by the oath of the debtor, "or otherwise," is immaterial) that no other proceedings were pending at the time.

*339

Thirdly, the appellant contends that the examination of the judgment debtor disclosed sufficient property, subject to levy and sale, to pay the plaintiff's judgment, and therefore no receiver should have been appointed, or at least all of the property of the judgment debtor should not have been turned over to him. It is true that there are authorities cited by appellant which would seem to support this view, but these cases are based upon the analogy of proceedings in a creditor's bill, for which supplementary proceedings are to some extent a substitute, but they are not subject to all the rules governing the chancery practice under a creditor's bill. Hence, while under that practice, where property was found subject to levy and sale under execution, the court of chancery would, at one time, have granted an order suspending the proceedings until the creditor could proceed to sell under his execution, this was because of the fact that equity and law were administered by different tribunals, and as the powers of the court of equity were only invoked, in aid of the law court, such powers would not be exercised where such aid was not necessary. But since the same court now possesses the powers of both of the former courts, the former practice is inapplicable, and there is now no reason why property subject to levy and sale may not be reached under supplementary proceedings. Heroy v. Gibson, 10 Bosw., 591; Todd v. Crooke, 4 Sandf., 694; 1 Code Rep., N. S., 324.

As to the objection that a receiver should not be appointed for all of the property, but only for so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the debt, we can only say that we know of no authority for such a proceeding, which would be somewhat anomalous in character, and involve unnecessary expense and delay, for it is difficult to understand how the court could, in advance and without an inquiry on the point, ascertain how much would be necessary; in fact, the only certain means of ascertaining it would be by a sale.

The fourth exception assigns as error the failure to require the receiver to give bond. The statute does not require that a bond *shall be exacted of the receiver, and although it is the usual and far better practice to require a bond, yet it is not essential. High Rec., §§ 118, et seq. We cannot, therefore, say that there was any error of law in failing to require the receiver to give bond.

*340

The fifth, sixth, and twelfth exceptions raise the question as to allowing a fee of $15 to the attorneys for the plaintiffs. Section 321 of the code provides: "The judge may allow to the judgment creditor, or to any party so examined, whether a party to the action or not, witness fees and disbursements, and a fixed sum in addition, not exceeding thirty dollars, as costs." It will be observed that under this provision, "the judge may allow * * * a fixed sum * * * as costs." And the allowance is "to the judgment creditor, or to any party so examined" —not as a fee, but as costs. We see no authority under this section for the allowance of any fee to the attorneys for plaintiffs; and even if it could be so construed, the sum must be a sum fixed by the judge, and not by the clerk, for the judge having heard the case, has better means as well as better capacity to determine the amount which should be allowed, than the clerk, and this is the express provision of the statute, doubtless for the reason above indicated. We think, therefore, that the judge erred in allowing a fee to the attorneys for the plaintiffs in an amount to be fixed by the clerk. The order appealed from should be modified in this respect.

It is true, as held in Bradley v. Rodelsperger, 6 S. C., 291, that where it is desired to review a taxation of costs by the clerk, the proper practice is by motion, in the court below, to correct such taxation, and the appeal should be from the decision on such motion; but where, as in this case, the clerk has undertaken to carry out an erroneous order of a Circuit judge, in reference to the taxation of costs, such erroneous order may be appealed from, and the taxation thereby corrected.

We are not able to perceive the relevancy of the seventh exception,[1] but as matter of fact, the referee did find that the levy was made subject to Dreyer's mortgage, and the Circuit judge does not controvert such finding, so that we do not see upon what this exception rests.

*341

*The eleventh exception complains that the costs of the referee and of the plaintiffs were erroneously taxed. No specific errors are pointed out either in the exception or the argument, and the exception is too general to require notice. But in any event, under the case of Bradley v. Rodelsperger, supra, we could not inquire into the correctness of the taxation of costs, there having been no motion below to correct such taxation.

The thirteenth exception claims that there could be no order disposing of the judgment debtor's property without making Dreyer a party. As the order does not purport to interfere in any way with the property covered by Dreyer's mortgage, we are unable to perceive what interest he could possibly have in the matter.

The fourteenth exception assigns it as error that the order appealed from contains no provision for the return of such property as may not be necessary for the payment of plaintiffs' debt and costs. The receiver being but "the hand of the court," we must assume that the proper disposition of what property may remain, after satisfying the claim of plaintiffs, will be made, and we cannot say that there was any error of law in failing to incorporate such a provision in the order.

[1] "In not holding that the sheriff's levy was subject to Dreyer's mortgage."

The fifteenth exception alleges error in ordering the receiver to sell the property mentioned in the order. The point of this exception, as developed in the argument, seems to be that there was error in ordering a sale of all of the property mentioned in the order, embracing choses in action, as well as other personal property. Rule 70 of the Circuit Court, in reference to the powers of receivers, clearly indicates that a receiver should not be authorized to sell choses in action, unless they represent "desperate debts;" but that his duties, in respect to that class of property, are to sue for and collect the same, or "to compromise and settle such as are unsafe and of a doubtful character." We think, therefore, that the terms of the order appealed from, which are broad enough to authorize the receiver to sell any or all of the choses in action, should be modified in this respect, so as not to authorize the sale of any of the choses in action, except those which represent "desperate debts."

The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from be *modified according to the views herein announced, and that in all other respects it be affirmed.

*342

---

21 S. C. 342

FINCH v. FINCH.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. New Trial ⇐52.]

A motion for a new trial was made upon the conjecture that the jury had reached a verdict by each juror putting down a certain amount, and by then adding these amounts together and dividing their sum by twelve. Held, that the motion was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 104; Dec. Dig. ⇐52.]

[2. New Trial ⇐2.]

A Circuit judge has the power to grant a new trial nisi in cases sounding in damages, as well as in actions on contracts.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Stuckey v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 57 S. C. 401, 35 S. E. 550; Hall v. Northwestern R. R. Co., 81 S. C. 533, 62 S. E. 848.

For other cases, see New Trial, Cent Dig. §§ 4, 5; Dec. Dig. ⇐2.]

[3. Libel and Slander ⇐29.]

In an action for slander the trial judge committed no error in charging the jury "that if one should repeat a slanderous charge concerning another, saying at the same time, 'I do not believe it to be true,' he would nevertheless become a publisher of a slander, and liable to an action therefor, though the damages in such a case might be light."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 105; Dec. Dig. ⇐29.]

[4. Libel and Slander ⇐56.]

In charging the jury that "the fact that words are spoken in passion will not excuse a malicious slanderer from liability," the trial judge committed no error. Passion, suddenly excited by mutual recrimination, might mitigate, but it cannot, in all cases, excuse.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 154; Dec. Dig. ⇐56.]

[5. Libel and Slander ⇐57.]

If defendant undertakes to justify the slander and fails because the justification is unsupported by the evidence, it may be considered as a circumstance of aggravation and of continued malice, and may be properly considered by the jury in estimating damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 157; Dec. Dig. ⇐57.]

[6. Trial ⇐255.]

It may be that, under section 186 of the code, defendant may introduce evidence to show his belief in the truth of the charge made, in mitigation of damages, and that evidence introduced for that purpose, even if it failed to sustain the charge, would not aggravate the offense, but no such point was raised in this case by any request to charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 627–641; Dec. Dig. ⇐255.]

[7. Libel and Slander ⇐100.]

In an action of slander it is sufficient if the words be proved substantially as laid; it is not necessary to prove the words exactly as alleged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 263; Dec. Dig. ⇐100.]

[8. Libel and Slander ⇐124.]

A charge to the jury "that passion does not justify slander, but might be taken into consideration in mitigation," was as favorable to the defendant as the law allows.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 365–370, 372, 373; Dec. Dig. ⇐124.]

Before Hudson, J., Spartanburg, November, 1883.

This was an action by Ellen E. Finch against Benjamin Finch, commenced September 13, 1881. The opinion states the case.

*343

*Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, for appellant.

Messrs. J. S. R. Thomson and G. W. Nicholls, contra.

July 1, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, respondent, brought the action below against the defendant, appellant, for slander, and recovered a verdict for $4,666.66. The alleged slanderous words imputed a want of chastity to the plaintiff. The defendant, in his answer, denied the words as alleged, but admitted that he did say, after being charged himself with crime by the plaintiff, "I reckon you must be a whore yourself"; and he further stated, by way of mitigation, "that the charge as thus admitted was true, as defendant was informed and believed, and that the words spoken were spoken in the belief of their truth and in self-vindication, and not from any motives of malice towards the plaintiff."

A new trial was moved by defendant upon two grounds: 1. Because the jurors reached their verdict by each juror putting down a certain sum and then dividing by twelve. 2. Because the damages were excessive. The motion was granted unless the plaintiff would within forty days enter a remittitur of so much of the verdict as exceeded $2,500. The remittitur was entered within the time, and the defendant appealed upon several exceptions, which will be considered seriatim:

1. "Because his honor, the Circuit judge, erred in not granting a new trial on the ground that the jurors reached their verdict in the way stated above."

The Circuit judge had no evidence whatever before him that the verdict was reached as alleged; nor do we see how, in the face of Sheppard v. Lark, 2 Bail., 576, and State v. Tindall, 10 Rich., 212, he could have entertained the motion.

2. "Because his honor erred in not granting a new trial unconditionally, the damages being excessive." This exception is based upon the position that new trials nisi for excessive damages can be granted only in cases where the circuit judge has the means of ascertaining the exact amount which should be allowed, as in suits on notes and other contracts, and it is con*tended that the case before the court was not of that character. This principle may be correct in a general sense, but the difficulty is in its application. Who is to say when the Circuit judge is unable to fix the amount of damages but the judge himself? No doubt in a given case, when this inability existed, the new trial, if granted, would be granted unconditionally; but whether the judge is unable to fix that amount is a matter for him; and if he grants it nisi, instead of unconditionally, we must assume that he had evidence before him sufficient to control his judgment.

*344

True, in cases sounding in damages, where the damages are more or less dependent upon the opinion of witnesses, the rule by which the damages are to be measured is not as accurate as in some other cases; but even in such cases, we see no reason why the Circuit judge should not be as competent to determine the true amount as the jury—or at least there is no such insuperable difficulty in the way as to require us to say that in no such case shall the Circuit judge grant a new trial nisi. The Circuit judge certainly has the power to grant a new trial for excessive damages, and the practice has long prevailed of granting new trials nisi. Parker v. Walker, 12 Rich., 138; Warren v. Lagrone, 12 S. C., 45; Nettles v. Harrison, 2 McCord, 230. The power to determine that damages found in a given case are excessive involves the further power of saying what proportion of said damages would not be excessive, and consequently of fixing the amount which should have been found.

3. "Because his honor erred in charging: (1) That if one repeats a slanderous charge, saying at the same time, 'I don't believe it,' he is guilty of slander. (2) In charging that words spoken in sudden heat and passion is no justification. (3) In charging that if the defendant undertakes to justify the slander and fails because the justification is unsupported by the evidence, it may be considered as a circumstance of aggravation, and of continued and express malice, and may be properly considered by the jury in estimating the damages."

As to the first specification above, we do not find that the Circuit judge charged in the broad terms as therein stated. The language of the charge was as follows: "So jealous is the law of the good name and reputation of the citizen that even if one *should repeat a slanderous charge concerning another, saying at the same time, 'I do not believe it to be true,' he nevertheless would thus become a publisher of a slander, and liable to an action therefor, though the damages in such a case might be light." We see nothing objectionable in this.

*345

Nor was there error in that portion of the charge which has given rise to the second specification above, i. e., in charging "that words spoken in sudden heat and passion is no justification." Here again the exception is broader than the charge. What the judge said was this, "The fact that words are spoken in passion will not excuse a malicious slanderer from liability." There was certainly no error in this. The essence of slander is malice, and where that appears, whether deliberate or under the cover of passion, the case is actionable; and whether this malice is present or not, is a question for the jury. Passion suddenly excited by mutual recrimination might mitigate, but it cannot excuse, as matter of law, in all cases.

Third specification, that his honor erred in charging "that if the defendant undertakes to justify the slander and fails because the justification is unsupported by the evidence, it may be considered as a circumstance of aggravation, and of continued malice, and may be properly considered by the jury in estimating damages." There can be no doubt about the correctness of this proposition as a general rule. See the recent case of Burckhalter v. Coward, 16 S. C., 435. It may be that since the adoption of the code, with its 186th section of force, which permits the defendant, in actions like this, to allege in his answer both the truth of the matter charged as defamatory, and also any mitigating circumstances, to reduce the amount of damages, and whether he proves the justification or not, allows him to give in evidence the mitigating circumstances, that evidence tending to show that the defendant had reason to believe the truth of the charge made might be introduced, not as justification, but in mitigation, and in such case, when really relied on for that purpose, such evidence, though it failed to support the charge, would not aggravate the offence. But there was no request made by the defendant as to this distinction. If the defendant's answer or plea was subject to the application of such a principle, he *should have called the attention of the judge to it by a direct request. In the absence of such request, the Circuit judge laid down the general proposition in which, as we have said, there was no error, and that is the only matter before us.

*346

4. Exception fourth, "in refusing to charge as requested: (1) That the jury must be satisfied that the defamatory words alleged in the complaint to have been used by the defendant have been proved exactly as alleged. (2) If the jury are satisfied from the whole testimony that the plaintiff and defendant were engaged in a sudden quarrel, and that each published defamatory matter against the other whilst under the influence of angry feelings, then the verdict shall be for the defendant. (3) If the jury believe that the language used by the defendant was provoked by the language or conduct of the plaintiff, and was the result of sudden heat and passion, the verdict ought to be for the defendant."

The refusal to charge specification one is sustained by Kyzer v. Grubbs, 2 McCord, 307, and Morgan v. Livingston, 2 Rich., 580. In the latter case, O'Neall, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The first ground of appeal is that the words were not proved on the trial as laid in the declaration. The rule is now well settled that if the words be proved substantially as laid, it will be sufficient." This applies here.

The other two exceptions raise the same objection. As to these his honor charged that passion does not justify slander, but might be taken into consideration in mitigation. This, we think, was as favorable to the defendant as the law allowed.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

21 S. C. 346

MAYBIN v. MOORMAN.

(April Term, 1884.)

[Partnership ⇐67.]

A partner of a mercantile firm, who was also its salaried book-keeper, drew $1,000 from the firm and purchased in his own name ten shares of bank stock, charging himself with this amount on the books, which were open to the inspection of the other partners. This partner died and the firm proving insolvent, the other partners sought *to have this bank stock declared partnership assets. Held, that the stock was not the property of the firm, but of the individual estate of the deceased partner; especially so, as at the time of his purchase his salary to a large amount was due and unpaid.

*347

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Boozer v. Webb, 25 S. C. 82, 88, 89.

For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 97; Dec. Dig. ⇐67.]

Before Wallace, J., Newberry, November, 1882.

The opinion fully states the case. The Circuit decree, omitting its statement of the facts, was as follows:

First, as to the bar of the statute. The money was withdrawn on June 29, 1871. Mr. Moorman died October 5, 1873. This action was commenced in May, 1878. If the statute commenced to run on June 29, 1871, more than six years and nine months elapsed before the commencement of the action, and it would be barred. But if the statute began to run on October 5, 1873, the date of the death of Robert Moorman, and the date, therefore, of the dissolution of the partnership, only four years and seven months elapsed from that date to the commencement of this action, and it would not be barred.

One partner cannot sue another at law, and because he has no right of action the statute of limitations does not run against what does not exist. At law they were one person. In equity, where their accounts must be settled, each partner is considered as holding for all others, and never, while the partnership lasts, as against any other. Hence, as to partnership assets the statute cannot begin to run during the partnership. When the partnership is dissolved the joint tenancy is ended, and the statute attaches to their subsequent transactions as it does to the transactions of others who do not sustain partnership relations. Montgomery v. Montgomery, Rich. Eq. Cas., 64. According to this rule the action is not barred by the statute.

The next question, did the circumstances of this case have the effect to make the bank stock the private property of Robert Moorman? is not settled by any case in our own reports to which I have been referred. In the case of McCauly v. McFarlane, 2 DeSaus., 239, the court refused to decree restitution of money taken out of one firm and expended for stock put in another, the goods purchased being undistinguishable from the goods purchased with other funds.

*348

When capital is put into a partnership *by agreement among the partners, each has an interest in it proportioned by the terms of agreement. For one partner to take out a part and apply to his private use without the consent of the other partners would be applying the property of others to his private use. And if by so doing the property thus taken became the private property of the individual partner, the partnership assets might be suddenly transferred from primary liability to firm creditors to primary liability for the individual debts of the partner. It would seem, therefore, consonant to reason and justice that when one partner takes to his own use and benefit assets of the firm, restitution should be decreed, unless intervening equities, as in our case of McCauly v. McFarlane, supra, prevent.

The decisions in many of the other states are to the same effect. The rule laid down in Wait's Actions and Defences, 119, and in support of which a large number of cases from different states are cited, is as follows: "So one of the partners cannot use the partnership property or funds to operate for his own private benefit, or purchase with them property in his own name; but he would be required to account to the firm, not only for the funds and property, but also for the profits."

It may be added, that as each partner is the agent of the firm within the scope of the partnership, if he purchases property with the funds of the principal, the property is the principal's. In this case the bank stock, in which the funds of the partnership were invested, still stands upon the books of the bank just as it was entered. There have been no transfers, and there is no difficulty about its identification.

It is but just that I should add that the master finds, and it was outspoken by counsel at the hearing, that there is no intentional wrong-doing intended, even to be suggested by this proceeding. The partners were life-long, intimate friends, with absolute confidence in the perfect integrity of each other. Three of them are dead, and the parties to this action, with unimpaired confidence in and affection for those who have died, simply desire that the legal right to the bank stock may be settled for the benefit of creditors.

It is adjudged and decreed, that the bank stock of the Newberry Bank purchased by Robert Moorman with funds of the *partnership between himself and A. G. Maybin and Reuben S. and Pettus W. Chick, and still standing on the books of the bank in the name of Robert Moorman, together with the dividends thereon, is the property of the late firm, and that A. G. Maybin, as survivor, is entitled to recover the possession of it. It is ordered, that plaintiff have leave to apply at the foot of this decree for such further orders as may be necessary to carry it into effect. It is further ordered, that the costs be paid out of the proceeds of the bank stock.

*349

From this decree defendant appealed upon the following grounds: Because his honor erred in holding, 1. That the bank stock described in the pleadings is the property of the firm of R. Moorman & Co.; whereas, it is submitted, it belongs to the separate estate of Robert Moorman. 2. That the plaintiff's right of action therefor was not barred by the statute of limitations when he commenced this action; whereas, it is submitted, whether the bank stock was or was not in equity the property of the said firm and liable for its debts, the plaintiff's right of action therefor was so barred.

Messrs. Suber & Caldwell, for appellant.
Mr. Y. J. Pope, contra.

July 1, 1884. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. A mercantile firm, consisting of the plaintiff, Albert G. Maybin, Reuben S. Chick, Pettus W. Chick, and R. Moorman, was formed in 1869, in Newberry county. The business was a general grocery, and continued until some time in 1873, when, Mr. Moorman having died, it was wound up. The two Chicks also died some time after Mr. Moorman. The partnership proved insolvent, and the surviving partners, consisting at that time of Maybin and the two Chicks, had to contribute from their private estate to the payment of the outstanding debts against the firm. During the existence of the partnership, to wit, on June 29, 1871, Mr. Moorman, who was the active business manager of the concern, and especially of the financial department and bookkeeping, being a subscriber for ten *shares in the bank of Newberry, charged himself with $1,000, drawn from the firm and used by him in paying for this stock, which stock has been since standing on the books of the bank as the individual property of Moorman, the dividends thereon having been received by him up to his death in 1873, and paid to his executor since up to 1878, the subsequent dividends still remaining in the bank.

*350

Under this state of facts, the plaintiff, as survivor, instituted the action below in May, 1878, against the executor of R. Moorman, in which he prayed that the stock and dividends accrued since July 1, 1878, be adjudged the property of the firm, and be turned over to the plaintiff as survivor thereof. In other words, the action, though presenting some of the features of an equity proceeding, is in substance an action for the recovery of personal property, and must therefore be governed by the law as applicable to such actions, and especially the right of action must stand or fall upon the question of title, legal or equitable, in the plaintiff. The defendant, appellant, in his answer, claims title, and further pleads the statute of limitations.

The case was referred to the master, who reported the above facts, and the additional facts that in October, 1873, after the death of Mr. Moorman, the private accounts of the partners stood as follows: Robert Moorman, $3,368.10, subject to a credit for services unpaid $3,600, leaving to his credit $231.90;

Albert G. Maybin, $4,178.50, less credit for services $4,000, leaving him indebted $198.05; R. S. Chick's account, $237.29, and Pettus Chick's, $2,335.27. The $1,000 drawn out by Mr. Moorman was included in his account of indebtedness above. After the dissolution of the firm, and after applying all available assets to the debts, there was still a balance of indebtedness outstanding of $9,959.35, to which the surviving partners contributed out of their private estate as follows: A. G. Maybin, $4,490.15; P. W. Chick, $2,245.07, and R. S. Chick, $2,245.07, leaving still a balance of $979.36 unpaid. It further appeared in evidence that A. G. Maybin's bank stock, and also that of P. W. Chick, each for $1,000, was paid out of the firm funds at the same time and in the same way as that of R. Moorman's.

Upon these facts, the master held as

*351

matter of law, first, that *the ten shares in the bank of Newberry having been purchased with partnership assets, and not having been accounted for by the deceased partner, belonged to the partnership; and, second, that the statute did not begin to run until the death of Moorman, October, 1873, and the plaintiff having commenced his action within six years thereafter, the action was not barred. Upon exceptions, the Circuit judge sustained the master as to both of these principles of law, and gave leave to the plaintiff to apply for such orders as might be necessary to obtain the stock, with costs to be paid out of the proceeds of said stock.

The main question involved in the appeal is as to the title to the stock. Has the plaintiff such title, either legal or equitable, as would authorize a recovery on his part? This is a very different question, it will be observed, from the accountability of the estate of Moorman for the money which he drew out and used in purchase of the stock. That question might be raised in a different proceeding, but it is not involved here. Is the title of this stock in the plaintiff as survivor of the partnership? It is conceded that the stock was taken by Mr. Moorman as an individual and in his own name. It was so entered when the subscription was made, and it has so continued ever since, the dividends being paid to him during his life, and to his executor since his death up to 1878. It is clear, therefore, that as to the legal title the plaintiff has no standing. In fact the recovery is not urged upon that ground, but it is contended that, Mr. Moorman having used partnership funds in the purchase of this stock, the partnership has an equitable title which may be enforced by the proceeding below, and the effort is to bring the case under the operation of the principle which allows trust funds to be followed into the property in which it may be invested in violation of the trust.

This principle is a correct principle, and has been long established, but does it apply here? Was Mr. Moorman a trustee in the sense of this principle, and was it a violation of his duty as one of the partners to draw from the firm assets the sum which he did, and appropriate it to his own use in the purchase of this stock? This is the turning point of the case. There is no doubt that each partner can bind the firm within the scope of the *partnership. By the partnership itself they hold each other out to the world as worthy of confidence. This is necessary to the success of enterprises involving associated capital, and in the absence of fraud or conspiracy they can each draw from the common till for their own and individual purposes, charging themselves at the same time with the amount so drawn. They can pay their individual debts by giving credit to their creditor on a claim due by him to the concern when bona fide done. "One of several copartners can discharge his individual debts to a third person by releasing or giving a receipt to such person for a debt due by him to the firm." Survivors of Halls, Kirkpatrick & Co. v. Coe, Green & Randolph, 4 McCord, 137.

*352

There is no allegation or intimation, springing either from the testimony or presented in the argument, of fraud or conspiracy on the part of Mr. Moorman; on the contrary, this is especially disclaimed on all hands, and it is apparent that there was no concealment of the transaction by Mr. Moorman from his partners. He drew the money from the till and promptly charged himself with the amount. It is true he kept the books, but they were open to the inspection of the other members of the firm, and if they failed to become acquainted with this fact, this was due as much to their own negligence and inattention as to any default of duty on the part of Mr. Moorman.

In the absence of concealment of the transaction, and of all purpose secretly and improperly to appropriate a portion of partnership assets to his own use, and in the presence of the fact that he charged himself upon the books with the amount drawn out, we think, under the law applicable to partnerships and the facts of this case, he had the right to do so, and having done so, he became a debtor to the concern for said amount; that the stock purchased became his individual property, and is not subject to the equitable claim of the plaintiff. This would be the law independent of the fact that Mr. Moorman was a salaried employé of the concern, with his salary as salary unpaid at the time; but with this fact appearing, there is still greater reason why the transaction should be unimpeachable.

Under the view which we have taken of the case above, it is unnecessary to discuss the question of the statute of limitations *raised in the appeal. We think the judgment of the Circuit Court, that the bank stock in question, with the unpaid dividends thereon, is the property of the late firm of R. Moorman & Co., was error, and therefore on that ground said judgment should be reversed.

*353

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

---

21 S. C. 353

STATE v. BUTLER.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Embezzlement ⇐26.]

An indictment charged that the defendant, being secretary of a certain society, received the sum of $20, which he took possession of and held for the use of said society as such secretary, and that he did fraudulently and feloniously steal, take, and carry away, and convert to his own use, the said sum of money, whereby he committed a breach of trust with fraudulent intent, and by force of the statute in such case made and provided was guilty of the crime of grand larceny, contrary to the form, &c. Held, that the indictment was sufficient under the statute that declares breach of trust with fraudulent intent to be larceny.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Embezzlement, Cent. Dig. §§ 37, 38; Dec. Dig. ⇐26.]

[2. Embezzlement ⇐2.]

This statute did not create any new offence, but only extended the crime of larceny at common law to cases in which the property stolen was in the legal possession of the accused at the time of its conversion.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Posey, 88 S. C. 318, 70 S. E. 612.

For other cases, see Embezzlement, Cent. Dig. § 2; Dec. Dig. ⇐2.]

[3. Estoppel ⇐64.]

One who has acted as secretary of a society cannot deny the existence of such society when prosecuted for a fraudulent breach of his trust.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 154; Dec. Dig. ⇐64.]

[4. Embezzlement ⇐5.]

To constitute breach of trust a criminal offence, there must be a fraudulent intent. Therefore the Circuit judge erred in refusing to charge the jury, when so requested, "that the mere fact of not paying over the money by the defendant was not sufficient evidence in itself to convict him of a breach of trust with fraudulent intent."

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Murray v. Aiken Mining & Porcelain Co., 37 S. C. 487, 16 S. E. 143; State v. Davenport, 38 S. C. 353, 17 S. E. 37.

For other cases, see Embezzlement, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. ⇐5.]

Before Fraser, J., Spartanburg, March, 1884.

The indictment in this case was against Howard Butler under the statute which declares breach of trust with fraudulent intent to be larceny. The opinion states the case.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Duncan, contra.

*354

*May 6, 1884. The following order of the Court was passed by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. It is ordered that the judgment of the Circuit Court in this case be reversed, and that the case be remanded for a new trial. The reasons for this judgment will be given in the opinion hereafter to be filed. Let the remittitur be sent down immediately.

July 1, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The defendant was indicted for an alleged breach of trust. He was tried and convicted at a Court of Sessions for Spartanburg county in 1884. The indictment contained two counts, in each of which it was alleged substantially that, being the secretary of the "Star Banner Lodge of the Independent Order of the Knights of Wise Men," he received the sum of twenty-three dollars, which he took possession of and held for the use of the said order as said secretary; and that he did fraudulently and feloniously steal, take, and carry away, and convert to his own use, the said sum of money, whereby he committed a breach of trust with fraudulent intent, and by force of the statute in such case made and provided was guilty of the crime of grand larceny, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the said state.

The questions involved in the appeal are, first, as to the sufficiency of the indictment, i. e., whether grand larceny can be charged in an indictment under the breach of trust act; second, whether the defendant by acting as secretary was estopped from denying the incorporation of the order; and, third, whether it was error on the part of the Circuit judge to refuse to charge as requested, "that the mere fact of not paying over the money by the defendant was not sufficient evidence in itself to convict him of a breach of trust with fraudulent intent."

We think the indictment was sufficient. The act on the subject of breach of trust makes the offence larceny in general terms, and we think when it placed it under the general head of larceny, it partakes of all the incidents thereto, and is governed by the law applicable to larceny as one of the classes of crime whether statutory or common law. Indeed, when the nature and purpose of *the act is considered, such must have been the intention of the legislature. Larceny at common law is defined to be, the taking and carrying away the personal goods of another with felonious intent. Under this general definition, before a party could commit the crime, it was necessary that the property should be in the actual or constructive possession of the owner, or of some one else than the thief. Consequently, it was held at common law that where a party was in the legal custody of the property of another, he could not commit larceny upon it, although he should fraudulently appropriate it to his own use, for the reason that he could not take it from the other, being already in legal possession himself.

*355

The object of the breach of trust act, as we understand it, was not to create any new offence in its nature and essence, but simply to remove the technical difficulty in the way of conviction, suggested above. The larceny which the act denounces is the same in all of its features as common law larceny. It is not simply the non-payment of a debt, but it is the appropriation of the property of another to the use of the accused, with the intent to make it his own, and to destroy the title of the true owner, under circumstances which would make it larceny at common law, except for the fact that he had obtained possession in the first instance in some legal way. In morals there is no difference between a theft committed upon property over which one has a charge or custody, and property in the possession of another. The act recognizes this fact, and it simply strips from the former class the defence of legal possession which it had before the act, and declares it to be larceny. When so declared, it must be governed in every respect by the laws applicable to the general crime of larceny, one of which is the division into grand and petit.

Upon the second question, the Circuit judge charged, that if the jury, from the testimony, came to the conclusion that the defendant acted as the secretary of the order named, it would be too late for him to say now that there was no such society, but it was a question for the jury whether the defendant was the secretary of such society. This was in accordance with the case of State v. Sellers, 7 Rich., 368, where it was held that an officer who had assumed the duties of an office could not himself dispute *the validity of his own appointment, even when proceeded against criminaliter.

*356

As to the last exception, we think the defendant was entitled to the distinct charge requested, the refusal to charge which forms the third ground of appeal. The object of the breach of trust act, as we have said, was not to make criminal the failure to pay a debt. This often happens from misfortune, or from other causes far removed from fraud or crime; and the mere fact of non-payment affords no ground whatever upon which to base a charge of larceny or breach of trust. To constitute this offence as to property, there must be an appropriation thereof, accompanied with a fraudulent purpose to destroy the right of the true owner. This is not a necessary inference from mere non-payment, and the defendant was entitled to have it declared to the jury as matter of law, that failure to pay, in itself, did not constitute the offence charged.

Let this opinion be filed with the judgment heretofore pronounced reversing the judgment of the Circuit Court.

---

21 S. C. 356

HILL v. PERRIN.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Limitation of Actions ⇐15.]

The bar of the statute of limitations being pleaded by defendant, plaintiff offered to prove by parol that defendant, in consideration of forbearance, had agreed that if the amount was not paid before six years after the maturity of the account, he would not plead the statute. Held, that the Circuit judge committed no error in excluding the parol testimony offered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 62–65; Dec. Dig. ⇐15.]

[2. Limitation of Actions ⇐146.]

A parol promise not to plead the statute cannot operate as a waiver, or as an agreement, or by way of estoppel, to subvert the declared policy of the statute. Code, § 131.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 594; Dec. Dig. ⇐146.]

Before Hudson, J., Abbeville, February, 1884.

Action by A. M. Hill against L. W. Perrin, administrator of Joel S. Perrin. The judgment was for defendant, and plaintiff appealed upon his exception to the judge's ruling at the trial, as stated in the opinion of this court. The opinion states the case.

*357

*Mr. Eugene B. Gary, for appellant, compared section 131 of the code of procedure with the 4th section of the statute of frauds (Gen. Stat., § 2019), and cited 4 Min. Inst., 506; 16 S. C., 213; Big. Est., 533, 534, 440, 441; 3 Hill, 54; 3 S. C., 298; 13 Id., 37; Wood Lim., § 76.

Mr. T. P. Cothran, contra, cited Code, § 131; 2 Abb., 277; Wood Lim., 80, 209, § 84; 1 Add. Cont., § 410; 7 Bing., 163; Big. Est. (2d edit.), 437, 439; 9 How. Pr., 550; 31 Barb., 169; 29 Me., 50; 26 Conn., 324; 42 N. Y., 443.

July 1, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The action below was commenced in November, 1883, upon an account contracted by the defendant's intestate between January, 1874, and July, 1875. The defendant relied on the statute of limitations. This was resisted, on the ground that the defendant, in consideration of forbearance, had agreed that, in case the amount was not paid before six years after the maturity of the account, he would not plead the statute, and parol testimony was offered to prove this verbal agreement. This was objected to by the defendant, on the ground that no such evidence could be offered unless in writing. The judge ruled that no acknowledgment or promise tending to establish a new or continuing contract was admissible unless the same were contained in some writing signed by the defendant or his intestate, and he excluded the testimony offered. Was this error? is the only question raised in the appeal.

The code, section 131, provides in terms "that no acknowledgment or promise shall be sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract whereby to take a case out of the operation of this title, unless the same be contained in some writing signed by the party to be charged thereby." The ruling of the Circuit judge was not only in accordance with this provision of the code, but was almost in the precise language thereof, and unless there is force in the ingenious argument of the appellant, in which he attempted to apply the doctrine of estoppel to the case, said ruling must be affirmed. So that the real question is, can the doctrine of estoppel be made to apply?

*358

*It is very clear that it was the intention of the legislature, in the section of the code referred to, to declare in absolute terms that no verbal promise or acknowledgment should revive or continue a contract otherwise subject to the statute of limitations. This, in fact, is the positive and emphatic declaration of the act, and there can be no question as to its meaning. It is equally clear, therefore, that if the doctrine contended for by the appellant is admissible upon the ground stated, this would be equivalent to expunging this section from the code; because if a verbal promise to pay a debt and not to plead the statute estops a debtor from denying that the promise was in writing, then the very mischief which the section was intended to prevent, the possibility of a renewal or continuance of contracts by verbal promises, would be revived in a new form, and the section of the code referred to would be rendered nugatory, thereby defeating the declared public policy on that subject.

In Hodgdon v. Chase, 29 Me., 50, it was held that a parol promise founded upon a valuable consideration made by defendant to waive the statute of limitations and to take no advantage of the same would not preclude him from setting up the statute as a defence. See also the cases of Shapley v. Abbott, 42 N. Y., 443; also 22 N. Y., 249. In this last case the decision was put upon the broad ground of public policy, and it was held that the agreement to waive the benefit of the statute of exemptions could not operate in any way, either as a waiver, or as an agreement by way of estoppel, for the reason that it would subvert the policy of the law. In Shapley v. Abbott, supra, it was held that the same reason would apply in that case.

The policy of the statute requiring that every promise or acknowledgment to take a case out of the statute shall be in writing signed by the party to be charged, is to prevent frauds and perjuries, and it is the duty of the courts so to administer the law as to uphold this policy. If a parol promise not to plead the statute is to be held operative, either as a waiver or as an agreement, or by way of estoppel, to subvert the statutes, then all the mischief will be let in which it was the policy of the law to shut out. It will be observed that the language of the section above referred to does not stop simply at verbal promises to pay *a debt barred, or about to be barred, by the statute, but it includes every and all verbal promises intended to defeat the statute, and therefore includes a promise not to plead the statute, as well as a promise in terms to pay a debt, and renders both inoperative.

*359

We see no error in the rulings excepted to. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

21 S. C. 359

WARDLAW v. ERSKINE.

(April Term, 1884.)

[Equity ⟸405.]

Parties to a cause are entitled to notice of a reference to be held by the master, and of the filing of his report, notwithstanding the reference involves only the examination of records in the case for the purpose of ascertaining the indebtedness of such parties.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Gee v. Humphries, 49 S. C. 256, 27 S. E. 101.

For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 882; Dec. Dig. ⟸405.]

Before Kershaw, J., Anderson, October, 1883.

The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Moore & Wardlaw, for appellants.
Messrs. Scudday & Simpson, contra.

July 3, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In August, 1870, a bill was filed for the partition of the real estate of H. H. Wardlaw, late of Anderson county, among his children, twelve in number, and a son and daughter of a deceased son, H. C. Wardlaw, his heirs-at-law.

Upon the return of certain commissioners appointed to make the partition, all the parties interested having been made parties, Judge Orr, presiding, ordered the report of the commissioners to be accepted and filed, and that the land be assigned and conveyed to seven of the children, upon their entering into bond to the clerk of the court in the penalty of $7,000, conditioned for the payment of $3,500, twelve months after date with interest payable annually, &c., "and when said bond was settled, for the *benefit of the other heirs of Hutson C. Wardlaw, the interest of the assignees and donees in said land to be credited with their respective interests in said land, the clerk to hold the purchase money when collected, subject to the further order of the court."

*360

In October, 1871, Judge Orr seems to have granted a further order, "that it be referred to A. O. Norris, Esq., special referee, to investigate and report what portion of the real estate of H. H. Wardlaw will be required in aid of the personal estate to pay debts." No proceeding was taken under this order and the case seems to have dropped from the docket.

Matters remained in this condition until February, 1883, when the respondents, through their attorneys, gave notice to J. B. Moore, plaintiffs' attorney in the original case, of a motion to restore the case to the calendar and refer to the master to examine the records and report what amount is due the heirs of the said H. C. Wardlaw, deceased. To this motion no objection was made, except that said heirs be required to give security for costs before proceeding further with the case. Upon hearing this motion, Judge Wallace ordered the case restored to the calendar, and that it be referred to the master to examine the records and report what sum is due to the children of H. C. Wardlaw, deceased, provided that security for the sum of fifty dollars to cover costs be given, on or before the day fixed for the reference. The master, under this order, examined the records in the case and reported the sum due to the children of H. C. Wardlaw. This examination and report was made without notice to plaintiffs' attorney, Mr. Moore.

At the October term of the court this report, by order of Judge Kershaw, was confirmed, with an order that the amount reported as in the hands of the clerk, after paying the costs, be applied to the payment of the interest of J. B. Wardlaw and F. C. Sanders, the two children of H. C. Wardlaw, deceased, and that the bond given by the assignees of the land be turned over to Messrs. Scudday & Simpson for collection, so as to secure the balance that may be due said children. This order was resisted by Moore & Wardlaw on the ground that they had no notice of the time and place of the reference, or of the filing of the report of the referee, and that therefore they had been deprived of all opportunity to *except to said report; and upon these grounds they have appealed, with two other exceptions not necessary to be considered, as they are founded upon facts not appearing in the case, or ruled upon by the Circuit judge.

*361

The sole question in the case is, was it error on the part of the Circuit judge to grant the order appealed from, notwithstanding the fact that plaintiffs' attorneys had not been informed of the time of the reference and were without notice of the filing of the report? Inasmuch as the master has no special court days for the consideration of matters referred to him, of which parties interested may take notice, as a general rule it would seem to be proper and necessary that he should notify said parties of the time and place of the reference which he intends to hold. This is certainly the practice, and it is necessary, otherwise references would be ex parte, and the rights of those interested might be determined without their knowledge. 3 Wait Prac., 284, 294, 295. We do not know that any special harm has been done in this case, but we can see no reason why it should be made an exception from the general rule above referred to.

It is true that no objection was interposed to the reference except that the heirs of H. C. Wardlaw should give security for the costs, but that did not necessarily waive the privilege of being present when the reference was held, or of notice of the report when filed. It is true, too, that the order of reference confined the referee to an examination of the records in the original case, and his duty was somewhat ministerial in its character, but yet it involved the indebtedness of the assignees of the land under the bond which they had given, and they were entitled to be heard as to the amount due thereon. We think the appellants should have had notice of the reference. See the case of Wright v. Herlong, 16 S. C., 620.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case be remanded for such further proceeding as may be necessary.

---

21 S. C. *362

In re CONANT'S CLAIMS.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Counties ⊂=205; Judges ⊂=27.]

On appeal to the Circuit Court from an order by the Board of County Commissioners refusing to audit certain claims presented against the county, an order was passed by the Circuit judge at chambers, and without notice to the board or its attorney, directing the board to audit these claims. Held, that the order of the Circuit judge was invalid, because made out of court and without notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 328–334; Dec. Dig. ⊂=205; Judges, Cent. Dig. § 110; Dec. Dig. ⊂=27.]

[2. Mandamus ⟸101.]

Semble. Mandamus is the proper proceeding to require a Board of County Commissioners to audit claims against the county.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Jennings v. Abbeville County, 24 S. C. 550.

For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 211–216; Dec. Dig. ⟸101.]

[3. Motions ⟸57.]

Even if there had been a written agreement that the matter should be informally presented to the judge for his decision, it would not have been proper for one of the parties to obtain a decision at chambers without notice to the other party and in his absence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Motions, Cent. Dig. §§ 68–71; Dec. Dig. ⟸57.]

Before Pressley, J., Beaufort, March, 1883.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. William Elliott, for appellant.

Mr. W. J. Verdier, contra.

July 3, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This is certainly a novel proceeding. One John Conant being the owner, as alleged, of certain papers called warrants, drawn upon the treasurer of the county of Beaufort, in the year 1876, by L. S. Langley, then the auditor of said county of Beaufort, and alleged to have been given to other parties for services rendered in making the assessment of property for taxation in that year, applied for a writ of mandamus to require the treasurer of said county to pay said warrants, amounting in the aggregate to $995. This court refused the mandamus, on the ground that the claim had not been examined and approved by the county commissioners, as required by section 23 of the act of 1875, 15 Stat., 993. See State ex relatione Conant v. Fuller, 18 S. C., 246.

Thereupon the said Conant, on December 28, 1882, applied to the then board of county commissioners for Beaufort county to *audit said claim; but they declined, on the grounds that the claims had not been presented in the year in which they were given (1876); that they had been previously refused audit by the board, and that, after the lapse of more than six years, they had not now the power or right to audit them as debts of the county, especially after the passage of the act of 1882 (General Statutes, § 623, and note, § 7), which declares "that all claims against a county not presented in the fiscal year in which they were contracted, or the next thereafter, shall be forever barred," &c.

*363

From this refusal of the county commissioners to audit his claims, the said Conant gave them notice of appeal, on March 26, 1883, to "the Circuit Court." It seems that at the time the notice of appeal was accepted, the attorney for the appellant, Conant, considered that there was a verbal understanding that he might present the matter "informally to the judge." At all events, the case was not docketed in the Circuit Court, nor heard during the term; but after the adjournment sine die, the matter was presented to Judge Pressley at chambers, entirely ex parte, in the absence of the attorney for the commissioners, who had no notice whatever of the time or place of hearing. Under these circumstances, Judge Pressley heard the appeal and made the following order: "It is ordered that the judgment of the county commissioners made in above matter on the 28th day of December, 1882, be overruled, and the case remanded to the county commissioners, with instruction to audit the claims of the appellant referred to, if they should be found to be proper claims, and to pay the same, if there be funds in the treasury applicable to the judgment thereof," &c.

From this order the county commissioners appeal to this court upon the following exceptions: "1. Because the notice of appeal from the decision of the county commissioners was not served within the time prescribed by law. 2. Because said appeal from the decision of the county commissioners was not docketed upon the proper calendar of the Court of Common Pleas. 3. Because said appeal was heard and determined by his honor at chambers, and not in court, and the county commissioners had no opportunity of being heard. 4. Because his honor erred in holding that the present board of county commissioners had the power to *audit said claims. 5. Because his honor erred in overruling the refusal of the county commissioners to audit said claims on December 28, 1882, when said county commissioners had previously refused to audit said claims, from which refusal no appeal had been taken."

*364

We cannot consider this as a consent proceeding. The very fact that it is here shows that it is not. The county commissioners have appealed, and the questions made must be decided according to the strict rights of the parties, without regard to any alleged stipulations which were not committed to writing. From the view we take, it will not be necessary to consider any of the grounds of appeal, except the third, which complains that the appeal from the decision of the county commissioners was heard and determined at chambers, and the county commissioners had no opportunity to be heard. This, of course, must be conclusive against the validity of the order below, as no judgment rendered out of court, and in the absence of the party interested, can be valid and binding, unless it be in one of those special cases allowed to be heard at chambers.

If this is to be regarded as a proceeding against the board of county commissioners to make them, according to what is alleged to be their plain duty, enter upon and audit the warrants under the circumstances stated, we are at a loss to perceive how that question can be made, except by regular mandamus. Moses Mand., 104; State, ex rel. Marshall, v. Starling, 13 S. C., 266. If it is to be regarded as really an action by Conant against the county of Beaufort for the recovery at law of a debt, serving the county commissioners only as a means of making the county defendant in the action, then it was certainly necessary that the party most deeply interested should have had notice of the time and place of trial. But, in either case, the first appeal of Conant being to "the Circuit Court," and not to a judge at chambers, there was no authority whatever to hear the case at chambers, and without notice to the attorney representing the county.

Even if the stipulations to the full extent and in the terms claimed had been in writing, and therefore binding, we fail to see that they went so far, in express terms, as to allow one of the parties, without the presence of any one representing the com*missioners or the county, to take the decision of a Circuit judge at chambers. Such a stipulation would not be presumed from what was said, for, as it seems to us, it would not have been in accordance with their duty to the county nor consistent with their own acts in refusing to audit, and in appealing from the order requiring them to do so. See Grierson v. Harmon, and Werts v. Spearman, 16 S. C., 618, where it is ruled that "a judge at chambers can only hear such cases as are provided for by statute, and there is no provision for hearing such a case at chambers. Notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, the parties had a right to have a hearing by the court upon the merits, and such hearing could not be had at chambers—certainly not without the consent of all the parties."

*365

The judgment of this court is that the judgment below be reversed.

---

21 S. C. 365

WITHERS v. JENKINS.

(April Term, 1884.)

[Homestead ⇐2.]

A trustee named in a deed executed in 1867 declined to accept and the land remained in the possession of the grantor, who received the rents and profits from 1868 to 1870, when the property reverted to the grantor; afterwards, judgment was rendered against him for such rents and profits, and against an execution thereon he claimed a homestead exemption. Held, that he received the rents and profits as acting trustee under the deed, and that therefore the obligation arose at the date of the deed, which being prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1868, the claim of homestead could not be allowed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 2; Dec. Dig. ⇐2.]

Before Kershaw, J., Richland, October, 1882.

After stating the facts, which appear in the opinion of this court, the Circuit decree continued as follows:

The homestead act, as it now exists, declares the homestead "exempt to the head of every family residing in this state from attachment, levy, or sale on any mesne or final process issued from any court upon any judgment obtained upon any right of action arising subsequent to the ratification of the constitution of the *state of South Carolina." This is merely an amplification of the language of the constitution as amended in 1880, which declares that "the General Assembly shall enact such laws as will exempt from attachment and sale under any mesne or final process issued from any court to the head of any family residing in this state a homestead," &c. 17 Stat., 320, 513.

*366

Language could not be broader or more comprehensive than this in regard to judgments founded on the class of action specified. If the right of action arose subsequent to the constitution, whatever its nature, it cannot be enforced against the homestead. The question, then, (having regard only to the act,) is narrowed down to this, did the right of action arise subsequent to the ratification of the constitution? It will not be denied that it arose here after the death of Mary Jenkins, the elder, in August, 1868, and consequently subsequent to the ratification of the constitution.

But it is argued that the right of action arose under, and by virtue of, rights conferred by the deed of trust made by Samuel Jenkins in 1867; that that deed was a contract, whose full scope and effect is not to be impeded by the constitution of 1868, or any legislation thereunder, since no state may pass any law which impairs the obligation of a contract. If the action in which this judgment was rendered were founded upon the deed as the cause of action, there is little room to question the soundness of the propositions thus insisted upon. If, for instance, the deed contained covenants of warranty, and an action were brought directly upon the covenant, and a recovery had, the right of homestead could not, probably, be claimed against the judgment, though the breach, and therefore "the right of action," arose after the ratification of the constitution. This would be for the reason that the ground for the action would be the contract made before the constitution, whose obligation was sought to be enforced. The right to demand the performance of the covenants would have been vested by the contract, and could not be impaired by subsequent legislation.

The action in which the judgment here was rendered was originally brought by the plaintiff and his wife, setting forth the deed and demanding protection and enforcement of her rights in the land therein conveyed, which was then as now, in possession of *the defendant, who was receiving the rents and profits thereof. Jenkins denied the execution of the deed, and contested all the rights claimed thereunder. Plaintiff's wife died, and a supplemental complaint was served by leave of court on the part of the plaintiff, still insisting upon the deed and the supposed rights of the plaintiff thereunder, and upon the death of his child another supplemental complaint was served, wherein plaintiff still insisted upon the deed, and claimed his rights under it.

*367

The issues of fact presented and decided were: (1) Was the deed duly executed and delivered by the defendant? (2) Was the marriage of plaintiff and his wife lawfully contracted, so that he had become entitled, in respect of her property, as her husband? The questions of law were: (1) What estate did Mary Withers take in the property under the deed? (2) What estate did her husband take after the death of his wife and child? In other words, what were the obligations of the defendant to the plaintiff under the deed? It will be seen, therefore, that this was an action upon the deed to set it up, and to have the court construe it, and to enforce the obligation thereof against the defendant. Under this action the court construed the deed, and rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for rents and profits due him under the contract or deed thus construed.

The obligation of a contract consists in "the powers and efficacy of the law which applies to and enforces performance of the contract or the payment of an equivalent for non-performance." (Per Trimble, J. [Ogden v. Saunders], 12 Wheat., 318 [6 L. Ed. 606].) The court decreed the payment of an equivalent for the non-performance of his contract by defendant, and he cannot set up a right of exemption created by legislation subsequent to the contract to defeat the obligation of it, here sought to be enforced.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the rule be made absolute, and that the said sheriff, Samuel W. Rowan, proceed to enforce the execution aforesaid against the property of the defendant, according to its exigency, without regard to the claim of homestead therein, until the said property be exhausted, or satisfaction of plaintiff's judgment be made, and that he return said execution within thirty days from notice of this order, and failing *to do so, that he be attached as for a contempt for not obeying the order and process of the court.

*368

From this decree defendant appealed, raising the question considered by this court.

Mr. Preston L. Melton, for appellant.

Messrs. J. D. Pope and F. W. Fickling, contra.

July 7, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. On November 6, 1867, the defendant, appellant, executed a trust deed, by which he conveyed to one Francis Lopez, in trust, the tract of land levied on in this case by the sheriff of Richland county, and in reference to which the question of homestead raised in the appeal arises. This deed conveyed the property in trust for the use of Mary Jenkins, the wife of the appellant for life, and at her death for the sole and separate use of Mary Jenkins, his daughter, and the lawful heirs of her body. Francis Lopez, the trustee named in the deed, declined the trust, and the property remained in the possession of the appellant.

In August, 1868, Mary Jenkins, the wife, died, leaving Mary Jenkins, the daughter, residing with her father, the appellant. In January, 1869, Mary Jenkins, the daughter, intermarried with Withers, the respondent. In April, 1869, Withers and Mary, his wife, filed a bill against Lopez, the trustee, and the defendant, Samuel Jenkins, the latter of whom was in possession, claiming that Mary, upon the death of her mother, became entitled to the use and benefit of the land. Before this cause came to a hearing Mary died, in November, 1869, leaving an infant son surviving her, who became entitled to the estate per formam doni, as the heir of the body of Mary. This son died in March, 1870, leaving his father surviving. The original bill was then revived by Withers, by supplemental complaint against the appellant, in which Withers claimed to be tenant by the curtesy. It was adjudged by this court on appeal that he was not entitled to the curtesy. 14 S. C., 598. The Circuit Court, however, *had allowed him rents and profits which had accrued during the life of his wife and son. It was also determined that the real estate had reverted to the appellant, Jenkins, the fee conditional estate having terminated by the death of his grandson.

*369

Subsequently, the amount of the rents and profits were ascertained by report of a referee, and leave was granted Withers to enter up judgment and issue execution thereon with costs. Under this execution, the land was levied upon, when the defendant claimed the homestead; whereupon the sheriff declined to sell, and the proceeding below was a rule against the sheriff to show cause why he had not sold. The Circuit judge held that the cause of action upon which the judgment had been rendered arose upon the trust deed of Jenkins, which was executed before the adoption of the constitution in 1868, and therefore that Jenkins could not claim the benefit of the homestead provisions found in the constitution of 1868, or of the homestead acts subsequently passed. Was this error? is the question in the case.

It appears that at the time of the reference, when the amount of the rents and profits were ascertained, and also when the judgment thereon was entered, Jenkins was unmarried, having neither wife nor child, nor was he the head of a family. He has subsequently, however, and before the attempted enforcement of the execution herein, intermarried with his present wife, and now interposes his claim for the homestead.

The first point to be considered is, whether the judgment in question was based upon an obligation assumed by the appellant before the adoption of the constitution of 1868? If it was, of course there is an end of the case, under Gunn v. Barry, 15 Wall., 610 [21 L. Ed. 212], and the decisions of our own state, as no homestead can be claimed upon a liability contracted previous to the creation of the homestead exemption provided for in the constitution of 1868. It has been urged very earnestly by appellant's counsel that defendant's liability did not arise under the trust deed, which it is admitted was executed previous to 1868, but that it arose out of a trespass in appellant by refusing to yield possession of the land, which trespass occurred in August, 1868, when his wife died, and continued to March, 1870, when the infant of his daughter died, and which, being after the adoption of the *constitution of 1868, his right of homestead attached as against this liability.

*370

On the other hand, it is urged that Lopez, the trustee named in the trust deed, having declined the trust, and the appellant having continued to hold the property conveyed by him in the deed, held it as trustee, under the principle that a trust will not be allowed to fail for the want of a trustee, the party in possession with knowledge of the trust being regarded and held in equity as trustee de facto. This principle is a well-established principle in the administration of equity, and we can see no reason why it should not apply to the facts of this case. There is no doubt as to the facts: that the appellant did execute the trust deed; that Lopez was named therein as the trustee; that he declined to accept, and that the appellant being in possession, remained in possession, with full knowledge that Lopez had thus declined. He remained in possession during the life of his wife, during the life of his daughter, and her son, and still continues in possession, now holding it as his own by reversion.

During the time of this holding he was no trespasser, but he was rightfully in possession, and in law was holding for the benefit of the cestui que trust. He possibly might have abandoned the property without incurring any liability thereby, but this he did not do, and not having done so, he cannot evade the responsibility of his situation. True, he denied the validity of his deed, but that question has been adjudicated against him, and it reacts to the beginning of his possession. Suppose that Lopez had accepted the trust, and had taken possession in 1867 under the deed, could he have shielded his property by claim of homestead against a liability arising upon failure to account for the rents and profits received by him as such trustee since 1868?

The case of De La Howe v. Harper, 5 S. C., 472, is conclusive of this question, we think. In that case it was held "that the homestead exemption under the constitution of 1868 cannot be allowed against a judgment for a devastavit committed by the defendant as administrator where the administration bond was given before the constitution was adopted; and it makes no difference that the devastavit, as well as the judgment, was after its adoption." The only difference between that case and this, *had Lopez accepted the trust, would be the fact that in De La Howe v. Harper the trustee had given bond for the faithful discharge of his trust, whereas in this the liability existed without bond. This fact, however, can make no difference as to the principle which should govern this liability. The principle is the same in each case. The relation of the parties, that of trustee and cestui que trust, is the basis of the liability in each case, and that begins at the time this relation is established.

*371

Now, in our opinion, Jenkins, upon the refusal of Lopez to accept the trust, having continued to hold the property with a knowledge of all the facts, became in reality the trustee, standing in the shoes of Lopez, and subject to just such responsibility as he would have been subject to had he accepted. With these views, we see no error in the decree of the Circuit judge.

The other questions raised in the argument of the respondent are not involved in the case. No ruling was made upon them below, and inasmuch as the decree of the Circuit judge can be sustained upon the ground upon which he based it, these additional questions are not properly before us. They have not therefore been considered.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

21 S. C. 371

McSWEEN v. McCOWN.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Equity ⟸399.]

The right given to parties by section 2210 of the general statutes to examine witnesses before the clerk of court does not limit the power of the Circuit judge to order a reference to take testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 864; Dec. Dig. ⟸399.]

[2. Reference ⟸16.]

A reference to take testimony which is to be reported to the court is not a reference for trial, and therefore is not governed by section 293 of the code.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ferguson v. Harrison, 34 S. C. 174, 13 S. E. 332.

For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. § 31; Dec. Dig. ⟸16.]

[3. Reference ⟸26.]

In equity causes it is within the judge's discretion to require the testimony to be taken by a referee and reported to the court.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Farmers' Mutual Ins. Ass'n v. Berry, 53 S. C. 131, 31 S. E. 53; Williams v. Newton, 84 S. C. 102, 65 S. E. 959.

For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. § 43; Dec. Dig. ⟸26.]

[4. Equity ⟸336.]

It may be better in some cases to have the testimony given orally before the judge, but the mode of taking evidence in equity causes is a matter to be determined by the presiding judge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 674–678; Dec. Dig. ⟸336.]

Before Pressley, J., Darlington, October, 1883.

*372

*This was an action by John McSween, as survivor of Keith & McSween, against Samuel O. McCown, Carrie B. McCown, and her children, and was commenced April 27, 1882. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Dargan & Dargan, for appellants.

Messrs. Boyd & Nettles and E. K. Dargan, contra.

July 7, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This action was brought to vacate and set aside a deed for alleged fraud in its intent and purpose. The case was called for trial at the October term of the court for Darlington in 1882. A continuance was moved by the defendants, which was granted by consent. At the October term, 1883, the case was again called for trial. The defence again asked a continuance; counsel for the plaintiff did not press for trial, but moved a reference to take testimony, on the ground that the witnesses were old and feeble and that delay in hearing the case might be prolonged. This motion was earnestly resisted by the defendants. The presiding judge, however, overruled defendants' objection and ordered the reference, saying, "that after a cause had been so long on the docket he had a right to refer it to a referee." The defendants declining to name a referee, on motion of plaintiff's counsel, the judge passed the following order: "Ordered, that it be referred to G. W. Brown, Esq., as referee, to take and report the testimony in the cause." From this order the defendant, Carrie B. McCown, in her own behalf, and as guardian ad litem for the infant defendants, has appealed, in which the legal right of the Circuit judge to pass the above order is questioned and denied. This, in fact, is the only question in the case.

The appellant contends that under section 2210 of the general statutes, plaintiff, by application to the clerk of the court, could have accomplished their purpose in securing the testimony and preparing for the trial as easily and as certainly as by the reference; in fact, that this was the only legal mode of effecting such a result, as it was prescribed by statute, and no doubt intended to meet just *such cases. It is true that this section does provide a mode to the end suggested, but this is a privilege allowed to parties, and in no way restricts or affects the powers of the presiding judge in such matters. It is a mode prescribed by which parties on their own motion, and independent of any action of the court, may have their witnesses examined in advance and preparatory to the final hearing, but it does not limit the power of the judge in the exercise of his discretion as to the conduct of the cause before him.

*373

The appellant further contends that the power of the judge as to references is found in section 293 of the code, which does not confer the power exercised here. The section referred to is found in the chapter of the code entitled, "trial by referee," and it specifies the conditions under which the court may order a trial by referees (chap. 5). These conditions are, where the case involves the examination of a long account, or the taking of an account is necessary for the information of the court, or where some question of fact, other than such as arises upon the face of the pleadings, becomes important. It may be admitted that neither of these conditions is present here, and if the court below in the absence of all of these conditions had ordered the case to a referee for trial, there would be much force in appellant's position.

It will be observed, however, that Judge Pressley has not ordered a trial by Mr. Brown, the referee. He has simply ordered that the testimony be taken and reported. The referee under this order is not authorized to report inferences or conclusions drawn from the facts, or the facts themselves; he is simply authorized to report the evidence itself. He is not empowered to exercise any of the functions of a trial judge, as to weighing and sifting the testimony, but is merely to hear the evidence and report it to the court as given before him. When thus understood, it will be seen that the order was not in violation of the section referred to.

As this power exercised by the Circuit judge is not found in the provisions of the code, the next inquiry is, does it exist, and if so, from whence is it derived? While the rules of evidence have generally been the same in equity as at law, yet the manner of taking it has always been different. The object of the law is to enable the jury to find their verdict, and for this purpose it is *essential that the evidence as a general rule in jury trials should be taken viva voce and before the jury, so that conflicting testimony may be weighed and sifted. But this was not deemed essential in equity causes tried by the judge, and the practice prevailed in England in equity causes of having the testimony taken in writing, before an officer of the court, or some one charged with that duty. See Gres. Eq. Evid., 379, et seq.

*374

This practice, descending from the English courts, prevailed in this state before the abolition of our old Court of Equity, and the consolidation of the two jurisdictions into the Court of Common Pleas, and it was ordinary practice exercised without question by the chancellors of this state when the equity courts existed to have the testimony taken at their discretion by the commissioner. We do not see that the fact that the two jurisdictions have been combined and vested in one court, should require any alteration in the mode of the examination of witnesses as to the rights of parties claiming under the one or the other, and we know of no rule of law, statute or otherwise, which demands a change in this respect, or which negatives the right of a presiding judge in an equity cause at his discretion to have the testimony taken and reported to him by a referee.

No doubt it would be better in most cases that the witnesses should be before the judge, especially where the individual credibility of the witnesses becomes important. In such cases the oral examination and cross examination of the witnesses in the presence of the judge might lead to a different conclusion than the mere hearing of written testimony taken out of court. But whether the one mode or the other should be adopted in a special case, seems to be a matter for the presiding judge. This has been the practice in this state too long to be disturbed now.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

21 S. C. *375

*NORTON v. BRADHAM.

Ex parte STONE & CO.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Constitutional Law ⇐23; Homestead ⇐7.]
Where the debt was contracted prior to the constitutional amendment of 1880, the question of homestead must be determined by the provisions of the constitution as originally adopted.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Carolina Nat. Bank v. Senn, 25 S. C. 580; Trimmier v. Winsmith, 41 S. C. 115, 19 S. E. 283; Ex parte Goldsmith, 68 S. C. 537, 47 S. E. 984.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 20, 499; Dec. Dig. ⇐23; Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. ⇐7.]

[2. Homestead ⇐3.]
Section 20 of article I. of the constitution, directing a homestead exemption, is the mere general declaration of a right, which is subsequently defined and limited in section 32 of article II.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ex parte Goldsmith, 68 S. C. 536, 47 S. E. 984.

For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. §§ 4, 5; Dec. Dig. ⇐3.]

[3. Homestead ⇐3.]
The legislature cannot change the character, amount, or beneficiaries of the exemptions provided for in section 32 of article II., the matter of exemptions having been fully occupied by that section.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Parler, 52 S. C. 218, 29 S. E. 651.

For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. §§ 4, 5; Dec. Dig. ⇐3.]

[4. Homestead ⇐3.]
A constitutional provision or statute exempting a homestead from levy and sale is not in derogation of common law, but is remedial in character, and should be so construed as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy. A dictum in Garaty v. Du Bose, 5 S. C., 500, disputed.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Rookard v. Atlanta & C. A. L. R. Co., 89 S. C. 376, 71 S. E. 992.

For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. §§ 4, 5; Dec. Dig. ⇐3.]

[5. Homestead ⇐58.]
The object of the constitution was to secure a homestead to the family; the right of homestead was not limited to property owned by the head of the family, nor secured only against his debts.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in McClenaghan v. McEachers, 47 S. C. 449, 25 S. E. 296.

For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 86; Dec. Dig. ⇐58.]

[6. Constitutional Law ⇐15.]
Besides, in using the words "to secure the full enjoyment of said homestead to the person entitled thereto, or to the head of any family," the constitution shows that this exemption was for the benefit of some persons other than the heads of families. In a written constitution, force and effect must be given, if possible, to every clause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. ⇐15.]

[7. Homestead ⇐3.]
Therefore, the legislature had full power to enact the act of 1874 (15 Stat., 589), which extends to a wife, living with her husband who owns no property, the protection of a homestead exemption as against her own debts.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Carolina Nat. Bank v. Senn, 25 S. C. 581; Harrell v. Kea, 37 S. C. 377, 16 S. E. 42.

For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. ⇐3.]

[8. Constitutional Law ⇐12.]
The terms of a constitutional amendment cannot control this court in giving construction to the provisions of the constitution as they originally stood.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. ⇐12.]

[9. Homestead ⇐185.]
Where land was sold under partition proceedings, and a judgment creditor of one of the parties sought to enforce his lien against his debtor's share of the proceeds, it was an application to secure payment of the debt by the use of final process, and as against such process a debtor, in proper cases, is entitled to a homestead exemption.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 354; Dec. Dig. ⟸185.]

[10. Homestead ⟸76.]
The proceeds of the sale for partition should be regarded as land, and as such the subject of a homestead exemption.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Major v. Hunt, 64 S. C. 101, 41 S. E. 816.

For other cases, see Homestead, Dec. Dig. ⟸76.]

[11. Homestead ⟸191.]
The debtor was not prevented from the assertion of her claim of homestead against the judgment by failing to claim it in the partition proceedings. Ex parte Strobel, 2 S. C., 309, recognized and followed.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ex parte Carraway, 28 S. C. 256, 5 S. E. 597; McMaster v. Arthur, 33 S. C. 515, 12 S. E. 308.

For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 362; Dec. Dig. ⟸191.]

[This case is also cited in McClenaghan v. McEachern, 56 S. C. 350, 354, 34 S. E. 627, and distinguished as to facts.]

*376

*Before Pressley, J., Orangeburg, October, 1882.

The opinion states the facts of the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

Mary D. Norton had an interest in some land sold by proceedings in partition in this court, which ordered her share to be paid to her. O. M. Stone & Co. have a judgment against her on a debt older than the constitutional amendment of 1880, which allowed homestead to a married woman out of her separate estate. She is a married woman, but claims homestead on the ground that her husband has no land in which he can claim homestead. They resided on the land, the proceeds of which are now in court, until it was sold for partition.

She is entitled to homestead out of said proceeds, if the act of 1874 on that subject be constitutional. On that point I consider myself bound by the decision of the Appeal Court, which settles that the homestead exemption, before the late amendment of the constitution, could not be extended to personal property, other than was provided for in the constitution of 1868. It follows that it could not be extended to persons, not within the terms of said constitution, and a married woman, while her husband is living, is not the head of a family. She, therefore, cannot claim homestead against any debt contracted by her before the constitutional amendment of 1880.

It is ordered and adjudged, that the rule in this case be made absolute, and that the master of the court, out of the share of Mary D. Norton in said proceeds, do pay to O. M. Stone & Co., or their attorney, the amount of their judgment entered on November 11, 1882, with interest and costs, and the costs of the proceedings herein.

To this decree appellants excepted, and gave notice of appeal to the Supreme Court upon the following grounds:

1. Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that because the Supreme Court of this state has decided that the homestead exemption, before the late amendment to the constitution, could not be extended to other personal property than that named in article II., section 32, of the constitution of 1868, that, therefore, *such exemption could not be extended to a married woman whilst her husband is living, she having a separate real estate, and her husband having no real property in which the family homestead could be claimed.

*377

2. Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that a married woman, who has a separate real estate, her husband having no real estate, cannot claim homestead against any debt contracted by her before the constitutional amendment of 1880.

3. Because the Circuit judge erred in not holding that appellant is entitled to her homestead exemption, under the act of 1874 on this subject, the debt of respondents being subsequent to said act, the same not being in violation of any of the provisions of the constitution of 1868.

4. Because the Circuit judge erred in not allowing the claim of homestead set up by appellant.

Mr. James F. Izlar, for appellant.

Mr. Mortimer Glover, contra.

July 22, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The appellant being entitled to an undivided moiety of a certain tract of land in Orangeburg county, instituted proceedings against A. H. Bradham and others for partition of the same. It appearing from the return of the commissioners in partition, as well as from evidence taken by the master, that the land could not be divided without manifest injury to the rights of the parties, a sale was ordered, at which the sum of six hundred and thirty dollars was realized, and the object of this proceeding was to subject the portion of that sum to which Mrs. Norton is entitled to the payment of a certain judgment obtained against her by the respondents for the sum of $240.29, besides costs, on November 11, 1881, upon a debt contracted August 20, 1879. The appellant resisted this application, upon the ground that her half of the proceeds of the sale of said land was exempt under the homestead laws.

It appeared in evidence that Mrs. Norton was a married woman, living with her husband on said tract of land up to the time *of the sale, and that he had no real estate in which a homestead exemption could be claimed. The Circuit judge held that she was not entitled to the exemption, inasmuch as she was not the head of a family, and the constitution secures the exemption only to the head of a family; that the act of 1874 (15 Stat., 589) by which the legislature undertook to extend such exemption to a woman having a separate estate "married to the head of a family who has not of his own sufficient property to constitute a homestead," was without constitutional authority, and therefore null and void; and accordingly he ordered that the judgment of respondents be paid out of the proceeds of the sale to which Mrs. Norton was entitled. From this judgment Mrs. Norton appeals on the several grounds set out in the record, which need not be repeated here.

*378

The debt upon which the judgment in favor of respondents was recovered, having been contracted prior to the constitutional amendment of 1880, it is quite clear that the question made by this appeal must be determined by the law as it stood previous to the adoption of that amendment. Gunn v. Barry, 15 Wall. 610 [21 L. Ed. 212]; Cochran v. Darcy, 5 S. C., 125. Indeed, this proposition does not seem to be contested by the counsel for appellant. The fundamental inquiry, therefore, in the case is, whether the act of 1874, cited above, is in violation of the provisions of the constitution as they stood prior to 1880.

There are two provisions in the constitution in reference to the homestead exemption, article I., § 20, which declares that "a reasonable amount of property, as a homestead, shall be exempted from seizure or sale for the payment of any debts or liabilities, except for the payment of such obligations as are provided for in this constitution;" and article II., § 32, which declares that, "the family homestead of the head of each family, residing in this state, such homestead consisting of dwelling house, out-buildings, and lands appurtenant, not to exceed the value of one thousand dollars, and yearly product thereof, shall be exempt from attachment, levy, or sale on any mesne or final process issued from any court. To secure the full enjoyment of said homestead exemption to the person entitled thereto, or to the head of any family, the personal property of such person, of the following character

*379

(*) * * * not to exceed in value in the aggregate the sum of five hundred dollars, shall be subject to like exemption as said homestead, and there shall be exempt, in addition thereto, all necessary wearing apparel." Then follows the provision as to the character of debts, as to which such exemptions cannot be claimed, and the section concludes in these words: "It shall be the duty of the general assembly, at their first session, to enforce the provisions of this section by suitable legislation."

It will be observed that these two provisions are placed in different articles, one in the article designated "declaration of rights," while the other is in the article designated "legislative department." As might have been expected, therefore, the former is confined to a simple declaration of the general right of exemption, and its concluding words manifestly point to some other provision of the constitution where the general right thus declared is to be specifically defined and qualified. The latter, however, is specific in its terms, and declares to the law-making power what shall be the specific character and qualifications of the right which had been previously declared in general terms. We think, therefore, that in considering the question of the limits of legislative power upon this subject, it would be erroneous to confine our attention to the provisions of article I., § 20, but, on the contrary, that section should be regarded as a mere general declaration of a right which is subsequently defined and limited by the provisions of article II., § 32.

If the framers of the constitution had contented themselves simply with the insertion of section 20 of article I., then, clearly, the legislature would have had the power to enact any law upon the subject, not inconsistent with the general right thus guaranteed. They could have fixed the amount and character of property to be exempted and designated the persons entitled to claim such exemption, as well as the mode of proceeding by which such claim should be asserted. But when the people in their sovereign capacity, acting through a convention, went on and by section 32 of article II., prescribed what should be the nature and character of the homestead and personal property exempted, describing what it should be, the particular kind of property, its amount and value, and to whose benefit it should enure, all these matters were *placed beyond the domain of legislative power and nothing was left for the general assembly to do, except what was prescribed in the last clause of the section—pass the laws necessary and suitable "to enforce the provisions of this section." Hence, whenever the legislature undertakes to interpolate other provisions than those prescribed in that section, instead of simply confining themselves, as directed by the organic law, to the enactment of laws suitable for carrying into effect the provisions there prescribed, they are invading a province already fully occupied by the constitution, and transcending the limitation placed upon their powers by that instrument.

*380

Accordingly, as was held in Duncan v. Barnett, 11 S. C., 333 [32 Am. Rep. 476] the legislature had no power to add to the list of articles mentioned in the constitution as exempt from levy and sale, because the supreme law of the land having already specifically designated the articles that should be so exempt, it was beyond the competency of the legislature to disturb or change the provisions which the people in their sovereign capacity had seen fit to make upon this subject. Hence, if a proper construction of the provisions of section 32 of article II., of the constitution, leads to the conclusion that the exemption thereby secured was intended only for the benefit of the head of the family, then the analogy, relied upon by the Circuit judge, between this case and Duncan v. Barnett, supra, would be complete. For if the constitution designates the person to whose benefit the exemption shall enure, then the legislature would have no more power to extend such exemption to a person other than the one so designated, than to extend the exemption so as to cover other property than that specifically designated in the constitution.

The inquiry then is, whether the constitutional provision confines the exemption provided for to the head of the family. Notwithstanding the remarks made by Moses, C. J., in Garaty v. Du Bose, 5 S. C., at page 500, that "statutes exempting property from liability to debts are in derogation of the common law, and not entitled to such a liberal construction as would extend them to those who are not in the spirit or letter of the policy of their enactment," we are not prepared to assent to the doctrine that a statute or constitutional provision exempting the homestead from levy and *sale under execution, is in derogation of the common law; for that remark was a mere obiter dictum, and not necessary to any point decided in the case. Lands were not liable at common law to levy and sale for debt, and have only been made so by statute. We are, therefore, rather inclined to regard such legislation as remedial in its character, and to be construed according to the rules applicable in the construction of that class of legislation. One of these rules is, that such legislation must be so construed as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy.

*381

Now the manifest object of the homestead law is to prevent the mischief which would ensue from having a family "sold out of house and home," and the remedy provided is to exempt the family homestead from liability to sale for debt. The object was to secure to the family, an institution which lies at the very foundation of a state, a shelter—a home. Accordingly, we find that it has been held in several cases in this state that the object of the protection afforded by the homestead clause of the constitution was the family, the head of the family standing as its representative. In re Kennedy, 2 S. C., 227; Bradley v. Rodelsperger, 3 S. C., 227; Moore v. Parker, 13 S. C., 490. Looking at the constitutional provision now under consideration in this light, it would seem to be a matter of small importance whether the head of the family or any other member of the family was the legal owner of the family homestead. That is the thing exempted, and if the sale of it would deprive the family of its home, the mischief which it was designed to prevent would ensue, whether it was sold for the debt of the head of the family or for the debt of some other member of the family to whom such family homestead legally belonged.

Now let us examine the language of the section and see whether it is capable of the construction which we have indicated. The language is—not that the family homestead belonging to the head of each family shall be exempt—but the language is, "the family homestead of the head of each family." Does the word "of" necessarily imply ownership in the head of the family, or may not the language used in the constitution be properly employed to designate a homestead, which though actually owned by the wife, is yet "the family homestead of the head of the family," the hus*band, in the sense that it is the place of his residence, of his home, and that of his family? We think it may, and that it should be so construed in order to carry into full effect the manifest object of the provision of the constitution. Again, it will be observed that the language is—not that the homestead shall be exempt from levy and sale for the debts of the head of the family—but it is, simply, that it "shall be exempt from attachment, levy, or sale on any mesne or final process issued from any court."

*382

Still further, it will be noticed that the section proceeds in the following language: "To secure the full enjoyment of said homestead exemption to the person entitled thereto, or to the head of any family, the personal property of such person," of a specified character shall be likewise exempt. Now, the words italicized by us in the language of the section just quoted, seem to us, necessarily, to imply that the exemption provided for is not to the head of the family only, otherwise the words, "to the person entitled thereto or to the head of any family," would be rendered nugatory. This would be in violation of the rule laid down in Cooley on Cons. Lim., at page 58, "that effect is to be given, if possible, to the whole instrument, and to every section and clause. If different portions seem to conflict, the courts must harmonize them, if practicable, and lean in favor of a construction which will render every word operative, rather than one which may make some idle and nugatory." In the next paragraph this eminent author proceeds to say: "This rule is especially applicable to written constitutions, in which the people will be presumed to have expressed themselves in careful and measured terms, corresponding with the immense importance of the powers delegated, leaving as little as possible to implication. It is scarcely conceivable that a case can arise where a court would be justifiable in declaring any portion of a written constitution nugatory because of ambiguity. One part may qualify another so as to restrict its operation, or apply it otherwise than the natural construction would require if it stood by itself; but one part is not to be allowed to defeat another, if by any reasonable construction the two can be made to stand together."

Under this rule we are bound to give such a construction to this constitutional provision as will give some force and effect to *the words, "to secure the full enjoyment of said homestead exemption to the person entitled thereto, or to the head of any family," which cannot be done by supposing that the object was to confer this benefit upon the head of the family only, but which may be done by supposing that the object was to confer this benefit not only upon the head of the family, but also upon some person other than the head of the family. We think, therefore, that the section of the constitution under consideration may well be construed so as to extend the exemption therein provided to a wife living with a husband who owns no property out of which a homestead could be claimed, upon the family homestead owned by her, which may well be designated as the family homestead of the head of the family, the husband, in the sense that it is his place of residence and that of the family of which he is the head—that it is the home of himself and family. We are of opinion, therefore, that the legislature, so far from transcending its powers in enacting the statute of 1874, above cited, was simply carrying out the mandate of the constitution which required the enactment of suitable legislation to enforce the provisions of section 32 of article II., of the constitution.

*383

The argument that the subsequent adoption of the constitutional amendment of 1880, embodying similar provisions to those contained in the act of 1874, is an indication that without such amendment the act would be unauthorized, does not address itself to our minds with much force. As a matter of fact, it is well known to those acquainted with the history of that amendment, that the prime object of it was to extend the articles of personal property to be exempted, so as to embrace every species of that class of property, instead of being confined to the articles specifically designated in section 32 of article II., of the constitution, as well as to remove any doubts that may have been entertained as to whether a person who did not own any real estate—any homestead proper—could claim an exemption of personal property. It is not difficult to conceive of reasons for incorporating these provisions in the constitutional amendment, other than the one suggested; but even if that reason be the true one, it would not be controlling upon this court when called upon to construe the provisions of the constitution as they originally stood.

*384

*Holding, as we do, that the act of 1874 was not in conflict with any constitutional provision, the question argued by appellant's counsel, as to whether a married woman living with her husband may not be considered as the head of the family, under the circumstances presented by this case, in the sense of these terms as used in the constitution, does not arise, and need not, therefore, be considered.

The other objections urged by respondents' counsel in his argument, to the allowance of the exemption claimed by the appellant, cannot be maintained. It is true that the land was sold, not under execution, but under proceedings for partition, but the judgment creditor is manifestly seeking to subject this property to the payment of his debt by the use of the final process of the court, and this is what the constitution designed to prohibit.

It is also true that the property which the appellant is claiming to have exempted is now in the form of money, and that personal property of that class was not exempt under the provisions of section 32 of article II., of the constitution, as was held in Duncan v. Barnett, supra, and Union Bank v. Northrop, 19 S. C., 473; but it seems to us that it would be a perversion of the spirit and object of the homestead law to apply the doctrine of those decisions to this case. The property was land, and it was converted into money, not for the purpose of changing its character, but solely for the purpose of effecting a division, and the law will, in this case, as it does in many other cases, regard the property, when so converted, still as land.

The objection based upon the ground that appellant made no claim of homestead in the proceedings for partition, is disposed of by the case of Ex parte Strobel, 2 S. C., 309.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

---

21 S. C. *385

*PREGNALL & BROTHER v. MILLER & KELLY.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Fraudulent Conveyances ⇐139.]

Where a vendor retains possession of personal property sold to the vendee upon the consideration of a pre-existing debt, in a contest between vendee and a subsequent purchaser the character of such possession is a question of fact which should be submitted to the jury with the burden on vendee of proving good faith, and therefore the Circuit judge erred in charging the jury that a retention of possession in such case was per se fraudulent, as a general rule, and that the only exception was where possession is retained under a contract of hiring.—Cases reviewed.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in McPherson v. McPherson, 21 S. C. 272; Werts v. Spearman, 22 S. C. 218, 219; Trustees v. Bryson, 34 S. C. 416, 13 S. E. 619.

For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 441; Dec. Dig. ⟸139.]

[2. Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸139.]

Title to personal property changes when it is sold on a credit with possession given, or when sold for cash and left with vendor for vendee's convenience and under his control; therefore it was error to charge that payment of purchase money and delivery of property were both necessary to a change of title.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Harris v. McCaslan, 31 S. C. 426, 10 S. E. 104; State v. Small, 82 S. C. 95, 63 S. E. 4.

For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 439–442; Dec. Dig. ⟸139.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Charleston, November, 1883.

This was an action by Samuel J. Pregnall & Brother against Miller & Kelly. The opinion states the case. The exceptions were as follows:

1. His honor erred in charging that "that there must be a delivery of the article in order to complete the sale; there must be a payment on the one side and a delivery on the other. You will determine whether there was a delivery or not."

2. His honor being requested by appellants to charge that "if the evidence satisfies the jury that the company had already sold the engine to plaintiffs and nothing further remained for the company to do at the time of the alleged sale to defendants, then the property in the engine had already vested in plaintiffs at the time of such alleged sale to defendants, although the engine had not been removed," erred in not charging as requested, and in qualifying the charge by saying: "I so charge you if the sale to plaintiffs was complete prior to the sale to the other parties."

3. His honor erred in charging, in this case, without explanation or qualification, that "where a party sells a piece of property and remains in possession of it, the law presumes that the sale was fraudulent. That is a presmption of law. If he leaves *the property in the visible possession of the vendor, the law presumes that it is left there under some secret understanding between the seller and the buyer. That is the presumption of law."

*386

4. His honor erred in charging that "if the jury find from the evidence that Pregnall & Brother agreed to buy, and did buy, this engine from the Marine and River Phosphate Company, the consideration being a preëxisting debt, and the engine was thereafter left in the possession of the Marine and River Phosphate Company, the jury are instructed that such sale to plaintiffs is null and void, and fraudulent in law, against creditors and purchasers from the company, and the plaintiffs cannot recover."

5. His honor erred in charging that "if the jury find from the evidence that Pregnall & Brother agreed to buy, or did buy, this engine from the Marine and River Phosphate Company, the consideration being a preëxisting debt due Pregnall & Brother, and the engine was thereafter left in the possession of the Marine and River Phosphate Company, from whom thereafter Miller & Kelly bought such engine and took possession thereof without notice of plaintiffs' claim, then the jury are instructed that such prior sale to plaintiffs is null and void, and the latter sale to Miller & Kelly is good and valid, and plaintiffs cannot recover."

6. His honor erred in not submitting it as a question of fact to the jury, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the sale to Pregnall & Brother was "null and void and fraudulent," and in "instructing" the jury that the "plaintiffs cannot recover," if they find from the evidence that the consideration of the sale to plaintiffs was a preëxisting debt, and the engine was thereafter left in the possession of the Marine and River Phosphate Company, and defendants afterwards bought without notice of the prior sale to plaintiffs—"that in such case such prior sale to plaintiffs was null and void and fraudulent, and the latter sale to Miller & Kelly was good and valid, and plaintiffs cannot recover."

7. His honor erred in holding the rule of law in this state to be: "That where the two concurrent precedent facts exist, to wit, the sale to pay a preëxisting debt, and the debtor thereafter remaining in possession, the law presumes a corrupt agreement *between the parties, not to be rebutted by evidence, and holds the transaction fraudulent per se."

*387

8. His honor erred in holding that "the only exception" to what he holds, as above stated, to be the rule of law in this state, is "where there is a bona fide contract for hire between vendor and vendee;" and that it is "only evidenec of hiring that is to be weighed by the jury upon the question of fraudulent sale between debtor and creditor."

9. His honor erred in holding that under the authorities in this state, the Circuit judge was not at liberty to disturb the verdict of the jury, and order a new trial, inasmuch as "there was no evidence as to a contract of hiring in the present case."

Messrs. Hayne & Ficken, for appellants.

The sale to Pregnall & Brother was complete, and title to the engine passed to them from the company prior to the alleged sale to Miller & Kelly. 1 Benj. Sales, §§ 315, 318, 319; 2 Hill Ch., 632. The company did not have such possession as authorized the legal presumption of a corrupt agreement, and attached to the transaction a character and penalty of fraud. The question should have been submitted to the jury. 1 Hill, 16; 1 Bail., 568; 9 Rich., 407; 10 Rich. Eq., 253; 19 S. C., 478; 2 Hill Ch., 636. In this case the proof showed that the possession after sale was not for the company's benefit. Rice Ch., 300; McMull. Eq., 32; 10 Rich., 72. The result of above decisions is, that the legal conclusion of fraud applies only where the property remains in the possession of the debtor for his own use, profit, or pecuniary advantage. See, too, 2 T. R., 587; 1 Benj. Sales, § 736; 20 How., 460; 2 Strob. Eq., 120. The defendants were not purchasers for valuable consideration, an antecedent indebtedness being the consideration of the purchase. 6 S. C., 159; 10 Paige, 180; 20 Johns., 637; 83 Pa. St., 372; 5 S. C., 90. The judge having erred as to the evidence he was at liberty to consider, his refusal of a new trial was error of law. 14 S. C., 432; 19 Ill., 580.

Messrs. Bryan & Bryan, contra.

The judge correctly charged that in this case a sale is not com*plete without delivery when it is for a preëxisting debt and the vendor remained in possession. 2 Mill Con. R., 126; 4 McCord, 306; 1 Hill, 24; 2 Hill Ch., 637; Rice Ch., 300; McMull. Eq., 30; 2 Rich. Eq., 96; 10 Rich., 73. In the case of a subsequent hiring, the vendor does not retain possession as vendor, but under the contract of hiring. 2 Kent., 520, 522; 1 Cranch, 309; 16 Am. Dec., 687. Defendants are not only creditors, but also bona fide purchasers for value. Benj. Sales, 785; 9 Am. Dec., 119; 17 Mass., 110; 7 Am. Dec., 34; 1 DeSaus., 144; 3 Strob. Eq., 134; 13 Rich. Eq., 248; 10 Rich., 332. Any other rule than that charged by the Circuit judge would be a premium upon fraud, and a fraud which would be incapable of proof.

*388

July 26, 1884. The opinion of the Court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. On August 11, 1883, the appellants purchased from the Marine and River Phosphate Company a steam engine, with about 9,627 pounds of iron, then on a certain dredge boat lying in Ashley River, at the wharf of the said company, the consideration of the purchase being a preëxisting debt upon which the said purchase was credited. The appellants at once removed the iron from the dredge boat, but left the engine thereon, for their convenience and at their risk. After this, i. e., about August 27, the respondents, claiming to have purchased the plant of this Marine and River Phosphate Company, located at their works, and including the said engine, took possession of the same. This purchase was made after August 11, the time of appellants' purchase, and was also made in payment of a pre-existing debt due by said company to respondents. Under these circumstances the action below was brought by appellants against respondents for the recovery of the engine, the sole issue in the case being ownership.

The Circuit judge laid down the following legal propositions, in substance, for the government of the jury. That to complete a sale of personal property, there must be a payment of the purchase money on the one side, and a delivery of the article on the other. That in such sale where the vendor continues in possession after the sale as visible owner, the sale is to be considered fraudu*lent and void against creditors. That in such sale, where the consideration is a preexistent debt, and property is left in the possession of the vendor, the sale is null and void; and in this case if they find that the appellants agreed to buy, and did buy the engine, leaving it in the possession of the company, from whom thereafter the respondents bought, taking possession without notice of plaintiffs' claim, then the jury are instructed that such prior sale to appellants is null and void, and the latter sale to respondents is good and valid, and the plaintiffs cannot recover.

*389

Under this charge the jury found for the defendants. A new trial was moved, but was refused, the Circuit judge holding that a sale of personal property in payment of a preexisting debt, the vendor retaining possession required the application of fraud as a legal conclusion, and therefore the verdict, being in accordance with the law, could not be disturbed; and further, as there was but one exception to this rule, to wit, where the vendor remained in possession under a contract of hiring (Pringle v. Rhame, 10 Rich., 75 [67 Am. Dec. 569]), of which there being no evidence in this case, the verdict was not obnoxious to the objection that it should have been left to the jury as a matter of fact to determine the character of the possession, and especially whether any benefit or advantage accrued to the debtor, as the price of the preference given to the creditor.

The appeal involves the correctness of these different rulings and holdings. The main questions to be considered are, 1st. Whether, as held by the Circuit judge, the retention of possession by a vendor of personal property after a sale on consideration of a pre-existing debt is per se fraudulent as a general rule? 2. If so, whether the only exception thereto is, where the possession is retained upon a new contract of hiring as in Pringle v. Rhame?

The leading English cases upon this subject are Twyne's Case, 3 Co., 80, and the case of Edwards v. Harben, 2 T. R., 587. These cases seemed to favor the principle that the mere fact of the vendor retaining possession after sale will of itself, in every such case, render such sale invalid. But this doctrine to its full extent has never been followed in all of the American courts. In Massachusetts it is held that such retention is only prima facie *evidence of fraud, and may be explained by testimony; in other words, that the character of such possession is a question of fact. So in New Hampshire, Connecticut, New York, North Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Texas, Wisconsin, Arkansas, Ohio, and Tennessee. See 1 Chit. Cont. (11th edit.), 571, 572, note, and cases there cited. In some of the other states a contrary doctrine is held. In our state, previous to Smith v. Henry, 1 Hill, 16, the cases seemed to hold that retention of possession was a badge of fraud, not conclusive, but prima facie; but if the testimony proved that the sale was founded upon a valuable consideration, the sale could not be impeached except by positive fraud, want of bona fides. Terry v. Belcher, 1 Bail., 568; Garrett v. Rhame, 9 Rich., 407 [67 Am. Dec. 557]; Guignard v. Aldrich, 10 Rich. Eq., 253.

*390

In Smith v. Henry, however, a distinction was drawn between a sale where a present consideration was advanced, and a sale upon a pre-existing debt; the former being left under the principle suggested above, and the latter held fraudulent as a conclusive presumption of law, the retention of possession being regarded in law as the inducement to the sale, and the cause of the preference given to the particular creditor. In this case Chancellor Harper attempted to reconcile the conflict which seemed to exist in the previous cases, by a close examination of the principle upon which it had been held in some of them, and especially the English cases, supra, that retention of possession after sale was per se fraudulent. He said that this was not, as some seemed to suppose, because the debtor being left in possession, he thereby obtained a credit upon the faith of property which he was not entitled to, misleading subsequent creditors. Nor was it because his antecedent creditors were lulled into a false security. But it was because the debtor had obtained some benefit to himself as the price of the preference given, evidenced by his retaining possession, and using it as his own. Such being the principle of these decisions, it was urged that it did not apply necessarily to a sale where the consideration was valuable, and paid down at the time, because there could be no necessary inference in such case that the sale was for the benefit of the debtor, although he retained possession thereafter. Where, however, the sale was in consideration of a pre-existing debt ex*tinguished thereby, and yet the debtor retained possession, the inference that the debtor had stipulated for some benefit or advantage to himself was so irresistible, that in such cases such possession was held per se evidence of fraud. Hence the distinction which he drew in that case, between sales upon a present consideration advanced at the time, and sales in payment of a pre-existing debt, holding the latter invalid upon the mere fact of retention of possession by the debtor, and the former open to explanation.

*391

Thus stood the law in this state until Jones & Briggs v. Blake and wife, 2 Hill Ch., 636, followed by Pringle v. Rhame, 10 Rich., 74 [67 Am. Dec. 569] in which the court modified the stringent rule laid down in Smith v. Henry, as to a sale upon a pre-existing debt, with possession retained under a contract of hire. Upon examination of this case, however, it will be seen that this modification was not based simply on the ground that possession was retained by virtue of a contract of hiring, but because the fact of hiring showed that such retention was not the price of a preference which the vendee had obtained over other creditors, but was a bona fide possession obtained by the debtor, independent of the sale, and having no necessary connection therewith. Such being the fact, in applying Jones & Briggs v. Blake and wife, and Pringle v. Rhame, we must not confine ourselves to their facts, but we must look to the principle upon which they were decided. Guided by this principle, we cannot say that the only exception to Smith v. Henry is a case of hiring; on the contrary, in every case where possession is retained, if it is not retained as a benefit to the debtor, but under an independent and subsequent bona fide contract, it is open to explanation.

This seems to be the law of this state, and now since Jones & Briggs v. Blake and wife, and Pringle v. Rhame, whether the consideration be the payment of a pre-existing debt or a present consideration, the cases stand on the same platform, i. e., the character of the possession becomes a question of fact and must be submitted to the jury, with the onus upon the vendee. Such being our conclusion as to the principle applicable to the question involved here, we think the Circuit judge was in error in holding that retention of possession after sale upon a pre-existing debt *was conclusive per se of fraud, as a general rule, there being but one exception, i. e., where the possession is founded upon a contract of hiring. We think the character of the possession in this case should have been submitted to the jury in accordance with the views herein above, the invalidity of the sale being dependent upon the fact whether the retention of possession of the vendor was for his benefit or the price of a preference given to the vendee.

*392

We think, too, that that portion of the charge of the judge in which he held that to complete a sale, both payment of purchase money and delivery of property were necessary, was erroneous. Change of title takes place when the bargain is struck, and may pass before payment and before actual delivery; where property is sold on a credit with possession given, or where it is sold for cash and yet left with the vendor for vendee's convenience, and subject to his control, title changes and the sale is complete.

It is not necessary to consider the other questions discussed by the counsel.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case be remanded.

---

21 S. C. 392

BROWNLEE v. MARTIN.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Mortgages ⇐37.]

The rule that a parol agreement is merged in a subsequent written agreement on the same subject, and that the terms of such agreement cannot, in the absence of fraud, mistake, or ambiguity, be varied or contradicted by parol testimony of a previous understanding, does not apply where a deed absolute on its face was executed merely as a security for a debt, and such a deed cannot be converted into an absolute conveyance by any subsequent written agreement, unless such agreement was based upon a sufficient consideration and is shown by the mortgagee to have been fairly made, without undue influence on his part.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Tant v. Guess, 37 S. C. 498, 16 S. E. 472; Hall v. Hall, 41 S. C. 167, 19 S. E. 305, 44 Am. St. Rep. 696; Welborn v. Dixon, 70 S. C. 114, 49 S. E. 232; Surasky v. Weintraub, 90 S. C. 532, 534, 73 S. E. 1029; Leland v. Morrison, 92 S. C. 511, 512, 75 S. E. 889, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 349; Bryan v. Boyd, 100 S. C. 401, 84 S. E. 993.

For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 98; Dec. Dig. ⇐37.]

[2. Evidence ⇐441.]

But where there are no allegations in the pleadings of an agreement different from that which was executed in writing, the Circuit judge correctly ruled that the written paper must be considered as containing all the terms of the agreement between the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1719, 1723–1763, 1765–1845, 2030–2047; Dec. Dig. ⇐441.]

*393

[3. Appeal and Error ⇐837.]

*The correctness of a charge will be considered with reference to the case made, and not as an abstract proposition.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Wallace v. Columbia & C. R. Co., 37 S. C. 343, 16 S. E. 35.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3262–3272, 3274–3277, 3289; Dec. Dig. ⇐837.]

[4. Appeal and Error ⇐232.]

Where an agreement in terms declared that "this paper is not a mortgage, but a contract for a conditional sale," and the defendant in her answer designated it as "a contract for a conditional sale," her exception to the charge of the judge, that "the paper was a conditional sale," cannot be sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1351, 1368, 1426, 1430, 1431; Dec. Dig. ⇐232.]

[5. Equity ⇐378, 381; Jury ⇐13.]

In action for the recovery of real property, the defendant set up as a defence that plaintiff had agreed to convey to her this land, and also another tract, upon payment of a stated amount, and had subsequently taken such other tract in full payment of the amount so stipulated. Held, that this defence raised an equitable issue which should have been decided by the judge himself; and this issue having been left to the jury, and judgment having been entered upon their verdict, the judgment was reversed and a new trial ordered.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Mitchell v. Hamilton, 98 S. C. 293, 82 S. E. 427.

For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 795, 813; Dec. Dig. ⇐378, 381; Jury, Cent. Dig. § 59; Dec. Dig. ⇐13.]

Mr. Justice McGowan concurred in the result.

Before Kershaw, J., Abbeville, October, 1883.

This action was commenced January 6, 1882. The opinion fully states the case.

[For subsequent opinion, see 28 S. C. 364, 6 S. E. 148.]

Messrs. Perrin & Cothran and E. B. Gary, for appellants.

The general denial of the answer put in issue every fact which went to make up the title claimed by plaintiff. 17 S. C., 287; 11 Id., 521; 12 How., 147; 11 Rich. Eq., 582. This issue being made, the court was bound to admit parol testimony as to the truth of the allegation. The original deed is shown to have been a mortgage, and therefore it must always remain such. McMull. Eq., 1. It may be shown by parol to have been intended as a mortgage, and its character as such cannot be changed, except by sale of the equity of redemption bona fide and for valuable consideration. The subsequent agreement for a conditional sale is therefore void. 3 Rich. Eq., 153; 11 Rich. Eq., 582; 12 How., 147; 3 J. J. Marsh., 355; 2 Cow., 324; 7 Johns. Ch., 40.

Mr. W. H. Parker, contra.

The contract between the parties here was not a mortgage, but a conditional sale. Jones Mort., §§ 258, 261–263, 272; Herm. Mort., § 155; 18 Cal., 118; 80 Ill., 190; 9

*394

Ga., 151; 45 Id., *628; 5 Mylne & C., 304; 2 Edw. Ch., 144. The essentials of a mortgage are wanting. There was no loan. Jones Mort., §§ 264–269, 275, 325; 19 Wend., 520; Herm. Mort., 143, 150, 155, 169. Here, there was neither right to foreclose, nor right to redeem. Herm. Mort., § 149; 7 Cr., 218; Jones Mort., § 259. No personal obligation by Mrs. Martin to repay the money. Hill Real Prop., 555; Jones Mort., 331, 332; 19 S. C., 126. Mrs. Martin was not the grantor. In a mortgage, the defeasance must be in favor of the grantor. Jones Mort., §§ 241, 268; 14 Pick., 479; Herm. Mort., § 158; 2 Edw. Ch., 138. But if the deed was a mortgage, its character has been changed by the subsequent agreement under seal. Jones Mort., § 340.

Parol evidence cannot be received to vary, contradict, or modify a written instrument. 1 Greenl. Evid., § 248; 1 DeSaus, 340; 1 McCord Ch., 505; 1 Rich. Eq., 91; 3 Id., 153; 6 S. C., 353; 18 Id., 289; 19 Id., 121; Ibid, 607; 3 Metc., 548. Besides, the evidence offered does not support any of the allegations of the answer. Code, § 171. An equitable defence cannot be made under a general denial. 4 S. C., 49; Jones Mort., § 277. But the instrument was properly construed by the court, and not referred to the jury. 3 S. C., 251; 19 Id., 124. This was an action at law, and its character could not be changed by defendants' equitable defence if pleaded. 18 S. C., 232. The judge passed upon all the facts which would raise an equitable defence.

September 9, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. This is an action to recover the possession of a certain tract of land in Abbeville county, known as the "River Place." The complaint simply alleges, in general terms, that the plaintiff has title, without setting out the sources of his title.

The answer sets up three defences. 1. A general denial of plaintiff's title. 2. That at a sale of the real estate of one Cunningham, deceased, made by his executor, under an order of the court, on December 3, 1877, the defendant, Josephine, bid off the "Home place" and the "River place" (the latter being the tract in controversy) at the sum of $1,609.75; that the said Josephine "was the principal devisee of the said J. J. Cunningham, and *thereby purchased the property at a much less sum than the plaintiff, or any one else, could have done; and that knowing this fact, and seeing that the said Josephine A. Martin could not comply with her bid, the plaintiff proposed to the said defendant to have her bid transferred to him upon certain conditions which were agreed upon, and the bid was so transferred, as by reference to the said agreement or contract for conditional sale, a copy of which is hereto appended and made a part of this answer, will more fully appear." That "by the terms of the said contract for conditional sale, plaintiff agreed to make good and sufficient title to the said premises unto the said J. A. Martin, if she, her heirs, &c., paid the plaintiff on or before December 3, 1879, the amount of the said bid, with interest. The plaintiff in the mean time received titles from the executor upon defendant Josephine A. Martin's bid. That in pursuance of said agreement in 1878 the said defendant, J. A. Martin, paid the interest on one-half of the said bid, to wit, $56, and also $15, the costs of the papers, title, deed, &c., from the executor to the plaintiff."

*395

The third defence is stated in the answer as follows: "That on December 1, 1879, before the payment of the said amount was due, the plaintiff having found a purchaser for the Home place, upon which the defendants were then living, came to the defendant, J. A. Martin, and proposed to her that if she and her husband would move from the Home place to the River place, that he, the plaintiff, would take the Home place for the debt and give them good and sufficient title to the River place, which they did. That the plaintiff then sold the Home place for $2,000, an advance of $400 on what the bid was for both places. That the said defendant then had an opportunity of borrowing the money and paying off the whole amount, but plaintiff said to take the River place and be sure of a home, and so defendant and her husband, relying on plaintiff's agreement, moved to the River place on January 6 following, and have been there ever since. That the said defendant, J. A. Martin, has made valuable improvements on the place and cultivated and used the same as if her own property. That the said plaintiff has promised repeatedly to give the defendant, J. A. Martin, title to the said place, but has never done so."

*396

*The written agreement above referred to bears date January 28, 1878, and after reciting the fact that the two tracts of land above mentioned had been bid off at the sale by the defendant, Josephine, at the sum above mentioned, and that "the said Josephine Martin not being at the time ready to comply with the terms of the sale of the said land, transferred and assigned her bid or purchase to John E. Brownlee, of said state and county, to whom the said James S. Cothran (who was the executor of Cunningham) has made a conveyance of the same, dated the third day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven," contains the following covenants: "That if the said Josephine Martin, her heirs, executors, or administrators, shall well and truly pay to the said John E. Brownlee, his executors or administrators, the said sum of sixteen hundred and nine dollars and seventy-five cents, with lawful interest from the date of the deed aforesaid, on or before the third day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine (A. D. 1879) in full, then, and in such case, the said John E. Brownlee covenants to and with the said Josephine Martin, that he or his heirs at law or devisees, will convey the land aforesaid in fee simple, and according to the same title and interest as he has received from James S. Cothran, to the said Josephine Martin, her heirs and assigns forever." Then follows a covenant on the part of Josephine Martin, that she and her husband will not commit waste upon the said land, after which is a covenant in the following language: "It is further distinctly understood, and this is the agreement, that this paper is not a mortgage, but a contract for a conditional sale, and that if the said Josephine Martin shall not pay the sum of money aforesaid, according to the agreement aforesaid, the said John E. Brownlee, his heirs and assigns, shall have and take possession of the tracts of land aforesaid on the day or thereafter on default of payment shall be made, as aforesaid, as his own absolute property in fee simple forever, under the deed made to him by James S. Cothran aforesaid."

The cause came on to be heard before Judge Kershaw and a jury, when the deed from Cothran, as executor, to the plaintiff was offered in evidence, as well as the contract above set forth. *No other testimony offered at the trial is set out in the "Case," but the judge's charge to the jury, which seems to be set out in full, contains a statement of the testimony adduced at the trial. From this statement it appears that the deed from Cothran to plaintiff, though dated December 3, 1877, was not actually executed until the 24th day of that month; that Mrs. Martin, who was residing at the Home place when the written contract above referred to was executed, continued in possession of both of the tracts of land until early in January, 1880, when she removed to the River place, and that when she moved out one Holland, to whom the plaintiff had sold the Home place for $2,000 between December 3 and the time when Mrs. Martin moved out, took possession.

*397

The judge states that the plaintiff offered testimony tending to show that he took the bid of Mrs. Martin off her hands at her request, and without any condition or qualification whatever; that the subsequent written agreement of January 28, 1878, was made at the request of the defendant, and as a favor to her; that after the expiration of the time limited by the agreement for the payment of the money, she gave up the purchase, and that he, from kindness merely, allowed her to remove to the River place, consenting that she should remain there two years free of rent; and he instructed the jury that if they believe this testimony their verdict should be for the plaintiff.

The defendant, on the other hand, offered parol testimony tending to show that the agreement between her and the plaintiff was that he was to advance the money to pay for the land and take the title as security for such advance, and that he was to reconvey to her, upon payment of the purchase money, the written agreement above referred to being executed merely for the purpose of securing to her the right to a reconveyance when the purchase money was refunded to him, and giving to her two years within which to make such payment. This testimony was received subject to objection, and the judge ruled that it was incompetent because it tended to change the character of the written agreement, in which there was no ambiguity and nothing which seemed to require explanation; saying to the jury that, "whatever may have been the terms of the negotiations which preceded *this instrument, the parties thereto being competent to contract, not deceived by any fraudulent artifice or concealment, nor misled by any mistake, have themselves put in writing, under seal, with great solemnity, what they understood the contract to be. That instrument must be considered as containing the whole contract, and cannot be varied or contradicted by any verbal agreement upon the same subject which preceded it."

*398

He therefore instructed the jury that the written agreement, taken in connection with the previous conveyance to the plaintiff, makes out an absolute title in the plaintiff, duly qualified by the terms of that paper; that such agreement was not a mortgage, but a conditional sale; that time was of the essence of the contract, and if Mrs. Martin failed to pay or tender the money at the day appointed, December 3, 1879, the title to the land became absolutely vested in the plaintiff, without qualification, unless before that time some new relations were established between the parties by a valid contract. The judge then brought to the attention of the jury the fact that the defendant claimed that there was such an additional contract, alleged by the defendant in her answer, stated above as the third defence, and he instructed the jury that if such allegations were established, and such additional contract was made before December 3, 1879, then the plaintiff could not recover; but if no such additional contract was made, or if made after December 3, 1879, when the defendant had no rights under the contract for a conditional sale, which could form the basis of a valid verbal agreement, then the verdict must be for the plaintiff.

The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, and judgment being entered upon the verdict, the defendants appeal upon the following grounds: "1. Because, it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in charging the jury that the agreement, executed January 28, 1878, taken in connection with the previous conveyance, must be considered as containing the whole contract, and cannot be varied or contradicted by any verbal agreement, upon the same subject, which preceded it. 2. Because, it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in refusing to hold that it was competent to show that the deed of December 3, 1877, executed on 24th, absolute on its face, was in fact a security for a loan, *and thence a mortgage, and if so shown, that no subsequent agreement, verbal or written, not supported by valuable consideration, is competent to even change its character. 3. That his honor erred in holding that the agreement of January 28, 1878, was a conditional sale. 4. Because the defence set up in the answer of defendant was equitable in its nature, and the judgment cannot be entered upon the verdict of the jury."

*399

We do not think that the Circuit judge charged exactly what is imputed to him in the first ground of appeal. He did not charge that the written agreement of January 28, 1878, taken in connection with the previous conveyance, constituted the whole contract between the parties, but his charge was that the written agreement constituted the whole contract between the parties, and that such agreement, taken in connection with the previous conveyance, "makes out an absolute title in the plaintiff to the land in dispute at the date of the agreement, duly qualified by the terms of that paper." So that, strictly speaking, the point raised by this ground of appeal is not properly before us. But waiving this, we will consider whether there was any error in the charge, as we understand it, in connection with the second ground of appeal.

It is true, as contended for by the respondent, that it does not appear that there was any request by appellant to charge the proposition of law as contended for by appellant in the second ground of appeal, but this ground may well be regarded as really an exception to the ruling of the Circuit judge as to the competency of the parol testimony adduced by the appellant for the purpose of showing the understanding between the parties at the time the bid was transferred to plaintiff and the title made to him. The judge held such parol testimony incompetent, because the parties having subsequently entered into a written agreement upon the same subject, all their previous negotiations and understandings must be regarded as merged in such written agreement, and that, in the absence of fraud or mistake, or ambiguity in the terms of such written agreement, it must be regarded as containing the whole contract between the parties, and that its terms cannot be varied or contradicted by any parol testimony as to *any understanding between the parties which preceded the execution of such agreement.

*400

While this is, no doubt, true as a general proposition, and well sustained by the authorities cited in respondent's argument, yet we do not think it true in a case like the one under consideration. The law looks with jealousy and suspicion upon all dealings between the mortgagee and the mortgagor, from the supposed influence which the former has over the latter. If therefore a deed, absolute on its face, is shown (as it may be shown by parol evidence) to have been executed merely as a security for a debt, and not intended as an absolute transfer of title, the terms of such agreement or understanding entered into at the time of the execution of the deed are not merged in any subsequent written agreement entered into by the parties. If it is once shown that the deed, though absolute on its face, was, at the time it was executed, only intended as a security for a debt, it will operate only as a mortgage, and it cannot be converted by any subsequent written agreement into an absolute conveyance, unless such subsequent agreement is based upon a sufficient consideration, and is shown to have been fairly made, without undue influence by the creditor; and the burden of showing this is upon the mortgagee. In other words, it must amount to a sale of the equity of redemption, fairly made, upon sufficient consideration. These views are fully supported by authority. Russell v. Southard, 12 How., 139 [13 L. Ed. 927], recognized in Lee v. Lee, 11 Rich. Eq., 582, and followed by Babcock v. Wyman, 19 How., 289 [15 L. Ed. 644]; Villa v. Rodriguez, 12 Wall., 323 [20 L. Ed. 406]; Morgan v. Shinn, 15 Wall., 105 [21 L. Ed. 87]; Peugh v. Davis, 96 U. S., 332 [24 L. Ed. 775]; Brick v. Brick, 98 U. S., 514 [25 L. Ed. 256].

But in considering the correctness of a ruling or charge of the Circuit judge, we must look at it, not as an abstract proposition, but with reference to the case as made by the pleadings and evidence. In this case the defendant, by her answer, did not set up any agreement or understanding entered into between herself and the plaintiff, at the time her bid was transferred to him, different from that contained in the written agreement of January 28, 1878, but, on the contrary, she expressly refers to and relies upon such agreement as containing the terms and conditions upon which her bid was transferred, and to that, therefore, she must *be confined. There was no room for parol evidence of any other agreement, for none such was set up in defendant's answer, but, on the contrary, her second defence is based solely upon the written agreement of January 28, 1878. While, therefore, we do not agree with the Circuit judge in the reason given by him for ruling the parol testimony as to a previous understanding between the plaintiff and the defendant incompetent, we think his ruling was correct, for the reason which we have indicated. It follows necessarily from this that there was no error in the charge that the written agreement of January 28, 1878, must be considered as containing all the terms of the agreement between the parties.

*401

The next inquiry is that raised by the third ground of appeal, to wit: whether there was any error in charging the jury that the agreement of January 28, 1878, was a conditional sale. We do not see how there can be any question upon this point. The parties have expressly said in the agreement itself: "this paper is not a mortgage but a contract for a conditional sale," and the defendant herself in her answer has twice designated the paper as a contract for a conditional sale, and this ought to be conclusive.

The questions whether there was any error in that part of the charge where the jury were instructed "that time was of the essence of that contract, and if defendant, Mrs. Martin, failed to pay the price stipulated, or at least to tender the same, on or before the day fixed for the payment (December 3, 1879), the land became vested in plaintiff absolutely, without qualification, unless before that time some new relations between the parties were established in relation to the land by a valid contract;" and whether there was not a practical and substantial compliance with the terms of the contract, by the sale of the Home place to Holland, and the consequent arrangement for defendant to remove from that place to the River place, have not been raised by any exception, and are not before us for consideration. We are not, therefore, to be regarded as intimating any opinion, either one way or the other, as to these points.

The only remaining question is that presented by the fourth ground of appeal. We think that it has been settled by a series of decisions in this state, that while a judge may submit issues of *fact arising in a case in chancery to the jury, yet this is only for the purpose of enlightening the conscience of the judge, and the verdict of the jury in such a case is not final or controlling, and does not warrant the entry of judgment thereon. The parties are entitled to the opinion of the court itself, both upon the issues of fact and law, and the judgment to be rendered in such a case must be the result of the conclusions of the judge as well on the facts as on the law. It is error, therefore, to enter judgment upon the verdict. Flinn v. Brown, 6 S. C., 209; Gadsden v. Whaley, 9 Id., 147; Sloan v. Westfield, 11 Id., 445; C. C. & A. R. R. Co. v. Earle, 12 Id., 53. The same rule applies even when the action is commenced for the enforcement of a mere legal right, but in which defences are interposed raising equitable issues, so far as the trial and determination of such issues are concerned. Adickes v. Lowry, 12 S. C., 97.

*402

The case now under consideration belongs to the latter class. Like Adickes v. Lowry, it was an action to recover possession of real estate, in which the plaintiff sought to enforce a mere legal right; but the defences interposed were both legal and equitable in their character. The first defence presented merely legal issues and was therefore properly triable by a jury. But the other two defences were plainly equitable in their character. So far as the second defence was concerned, the Circuit judge practically determined that by his instructions to the jury; but the third defence seems to have been left wholly to the jury, and their verdict was accepted as final and conclusive, for it does not appear that the judge ever passed upon the question of fact raised by this defence, or rendered any judgment or opinion of his own thereon, but, on the contrary, simply left it to the jury, and the judgment was entered upon their verdict. Upon this ground, therefore, the case must go back.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I concur in the result. The jury found every issue of fact for the plaintiff. But as the defence *involved in the alleged verbal agreement when Mrs. Martin removed to the River place, was equitable in its nature, it seems that, according to the case of Adickes v. Lowry, the Circuit judge, in the exercise of his chancery powers, should have himself determined it, and not submitted it to the jury. The record discloses no objection at the trial to that issue going to the jury along with the other questions of fact; but possibly the judge, even against the consent of the parties, should have decided it himself, and not having done so, the case must go back upon that point alone.

*403

Judgment reversed.

---

21 S. C. 403

HUGUENIN v. COURTENAY.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐1010.]

A finding of fact by the Circuit judge in an action for specific performance sustained, such finding not being shown to have been without evidence to support it, or manifestly against the weight of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Good v. Jarrard, 93 S. C. 245, 76 S. E. 698, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 383.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3979–3982, 4024; Dec. Dig. ⇐1010.]

[2. Specific Performance ⇐26.]

After contract for the sale of a leasehold interest in land to commence in futuro, but before the purchaser had right of entry, or was entitled to the possession and use of the property, a considerable part of the land was washed away by an ocean storm. Held, that the loss must fall on the vendor, who was still the owner, and that he was not entitled to a specific performance of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Good v. Jarrard, 93 S. C. 240, 76 S. E. 698, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 383.

For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 59; Dec. Dig. ⇐26.]

[3. Specific Performance ⇐59.]

Where one agreed in July to sell his leasehold interest in land at a stated price in cash "possession to be given November 1, provided I can obtain the consent of the present lessee," the agreement was not an absolute contract of sale, but an executory agreement to be completed on November 1.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 181; Dec. Dig. ⇐59.]

Before Wallace, J., Charleston, July, 1883.

This was an action by Cornelius J. Huguenin against Wm. A. Courtenay, commenced in 1882.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

This action was brought to compel the specific performance of the following contract: "I hereby agree to sell you lot on front beach of Sullivan's Island, known as Lot No. 16, on a rough *plat of Moultrieville, for the consideration of $300, cash; possession to be given November 1, 1881; provided I can obtain the consent of the present lessee." This contract was made between the parties to this action in July, 1881. The defendant, the purchaser, refuses to perform because, as he alleges, he desired to build a dwelling-house on the lot, and that its suitability for this purpose was destroyed by the destruction of a large proportion of the lot by the great storm of August, 1881.

*404

The controversy between the parties involves, first, a question of fact: to what, if any, extent had the premises been injured by the storm? It will be observed that the terms of the contract refer to "a rough plat of Moultrieville" for the description and location of lot No. 16. There was no direct proof of the dimensions of lot 16 as laid down on this plat. The statute (Gen. Stat., p. 30, § 71) provides that the lots on Sullivan's Island shall be of the dimensions of one-half acre. It may be, therefore, safe to infer that this lot was laid down according to the statutory provision, and was a half acre lot—that is, a lot of that size above high water mark. For it is impossible to conceive that in providing that the lots on Sullivan's Island shall consist of half an acre, the legislature contemplated that those lots on the front beach should include as part of their dimensions land covered twice daily with the waters of the sea.

The contract then relates to a lot of the dimensions of half an acre. There can be no doubt from the testimony that on the 1st of November, 1881—the time when, according to the contract, the delivery was to be made—lot No. 16 was of much smaller dimensions than that. Nor is there any doubt that this reduction in size had been effected by the washing away of sand and the consequent lowering of the level of the surface and the covering of the lot by the waters of the sea. And that all this was the result mainly of the action of the winds and waves during the great storm of August of that year.

As to the extent of the reduction, there is some conflict in the testimony, but I think it may be fairly gathered from a comparison of the statements of the witnesses that half, or nearly half, of the lot was under the sea. While the part of the lot remaining above high water would probably furnish space enough upon *which a dwelling-house and out-buildings might be built, yet the weight of the testimony is to the effect that, by its reduction in size, the value of the lot as a building site has been materially impaired, and rendered unsuitable for the purposes of the defendant. It has been made impossible for him to conform to the requirements of the statute as to the size of lots upon which dwelling-houses may be erected. Gen. Stat. supra. It must be borne in mind that that part of the lot which is covered by the sea is, for that reason, regarded by the law as destroyed as property. "The sea makes all that it covers common," hence in this case there is an actual destruction, not physical—for the land remains under the sea—but "legal and beneficial." Rol. Abr., 236; Coogan v. Parker, 2 S. C., 268 [16 Am. Rep. 659].

*405

Notwithstanding the substantial impairment of the value and fitness of the lot, to the extent above described, as a building site, is the defendant still bound to perform his contract? The answer to this question depends upon the nature of the plaintiff's tenure at the time of the sale. If at that time the plaintiff had held a freehold estate in the land, the contract would have operated to transfer to the defendant an equitable title to the fee. In the case of Landrum v. Hatcher, 11 Rich. 54 [70 Am. Dec. 237] it was held that land bid off at sheriff's sale, after the purchaser had made his will, goes not to the devisee or legatee, but to the heir at law, to whom the sheriff's deed should be made. The decision is rested on the ground on which Lord Eldon rested his decision in Paine v. Meller, 6 Ves., 349, to wit: "That when a contract is made for the sale of land, the vendor is in equity immediately deemed a trustee for the vendee of the real estate, and the vendee is deemed the trustee for the vendor of the purchase money. Under such circumstances, the vendee is treated as the owner of the land, and it is devisable and descendible as his real estate."

The reason, probably, for the rule is, that when a contract for the sale of land is made, the transfer of a fee is contemplated by the parties. By such a contract in writing an equity in the fee can be, and is, actually transferred at the time to the vendee. The fee and the use being divisible, the fee may immediately pass, while the use, by stipulation, may remain in the vendor, or in his lessee. The land, to all intents and purposes, has become *by the sale the property of the vendee, notwithstanding the use may be temporarily the right of another.

*406

In this case the plaintiff did not have a freehold in the lot of land which was the subject of the contract. The statute enacts: "The present owners of lots on Sullivan's Island, wherever dwelling-houses have been erected, or such citizens of the state as may hereafter build dwelling-houses upon the said island under the license granted by the preceding section, shall be taken and deemed to have, and shall enjoy, the same rights, titles, and interests as tenants from year to year in and to the lots now owned by them respectively, upon condition, nevertheless, that they shall deliver up the same when demanded by the governor of this state for the time being. * * * And the titles thereto shall be assignable, transferable, transmissible, and distributable as estates for years," &c. Gen. Stat., supra.

This statute allows no greater than a leasehold estate in Sullivan's Island lots. Such an estate consists in the use and possession of the land. 4 Kent, 85. It is personalty going to the administrator and not to the heir. No estate before entry or term commences. 1 Wash. Real Prop. (4th ed.), 439, 440, 442, 604. So at the time of the contract between the parties to this action no fee passed to the vendee, for that was in the state. No equity was acquired by the purchaser that made the land actually his. The leasehold estate, which was all that the plaintiff could have in the lot, could not at the time of the contract pass to defendant. For such an estate consists in the use and possession, and that, by the terms of the contract, was to remain in lessee of plaintiff at least until November following. At the time of the contract, the defendant acquired an equity to compel the plaintiff to deliver all he bought at a future day. Before that day the storm destroyed lot No. 16, as represented on the plat referred to in the contract, and it was no longer possible for plaintiff to deliver possession of the lot as bought and sold. The storm having put it out of the power of plaintiff to perform, the equity of defendant ended, for a Court of Equity will not undertake to compel the performance of an impossibility. 3 Mees. & W., 78.

In that case plaintiff was lawfully in possession of a residue *of a term for six years of and in a certain dwelling-house and premises, &c., and of certain furniture, &c., on the same. The plaintiff agreed to sell and the defendant to buy the lease, &c., and it was agreed that defendant should have possession on or before the 1st of January afterwards, on payment of price, &c. On the evening of the day of agreement the principal dwelling-house, &c., was destroyed by fire. Plaintiff sued for price. The defendant pleaded non-fulfilment of agreement and breach of covenant for possession. The court gave judgment for the defendant. Lord Abinger, C. B., said: "I think upon the form of the pleadings the plaintiff was certainly bound really to complete the contract, and that in the very terms stipulated for. Whereas what had taken place, the goods in a great measure being destroyed by fire, put it out of her power to do so, and I think, therefore, that the contract could not afterwards be binding on these parties." The other judges concurred, upon the ground that it was impossible for the plaintiff to complete the contract by reason of the destruction of the property, and the contract was therefore rescinded.

*407

In this state, even after a leasehold estate commences, and the tenant is in possession, a destruction of the subject-matter of the lease by act of God or public enemy, rescinds the contract, and the parties are no longer bound. Bayly v. Lawrence, 1 Bay, 499; Ripley v. Wightman, 4 McC., 448; Coogan v. Parker, 2 S. C., 259 [16 Am. Rep. 659]. In the case of Ripley v. Wightman, supra, the following language from 6 Bacon, page 50, is cited as ground for the decision: "It seems to be extremely reasonable that if the use of a thing be entirely lost or taken away from the tenant, the rent ought to be abated or apportioned; because the title to the rent is founded on the presumption that the tenant enjoys the thing during the contract; and, therefore, if part of the land be surrounded or covered by the sea, this being the act of God, the tenant shall not suffer by it; because the tenant, without default, wants the enjoyment of part of the thing which was the consideration of his paying the rent."

It is not necessary to point out the distinction between the sale of a leasehold estate and the sale of specific personal chattels, as to the time and conditions of the transfer of the property.

*408

*It is ordered and adjudged that the complaint in this action be dismissed.

The plaintiff appealed to this court upon the following exceptions: 1. Because his honor erred in holding that the building of a house upon a Sullivan's Island lot of less than a half acre, would not be in conformity to the provisions of the statute regulating the tenure of such lots. 2. Because his honor erred in not holding, from the evidence, that there was sufficient of said lot left, in November, 1881, upon which the plaintiff could have erected a house such as is usually built upon Sullivan's Island lots, and which would have conformed to the said statutes in such case made and provided. 3. Because his honor erred in not holding that the plaintiff could have substantially performed his agreement to deliver the lot at the time mentioned in the contract, and that the defendant should have accepted the said lot. 4. Because his honor erred in holding that the title to the said lot did not pass to the defendant at the time the contract between the plaintiff and defendant was made, to wit, July 25, 1881.

Mr. S. Lord, jr., for appellant.

[Omitting the argument on the facts.] This was an absolute, unconditional contract of sale to be carried into execution immediately, for a price to be paid in cash, the vendor retaining possession until November.

The tenure of these lots are prescribed by statute. Gen. Stat., § 71; 7 Rich. Eq., 344. The Circuit judge was certainly wrong in resting his decree upon the ground that the law required half acre lots for buildings. Since the act of 1857 these lot owners are tenants from year to year, but with leases renewable at pleasure. Their interest is practically a fee. This leasehold estate was sold by plaintiff to defendant; it was a contract of sale, not of leasing; and the question here is one of sale, and not between landlord and tenant, as it would be if the state were suing for her annual rent of one penny. Therefore the authorities cited in the Circuit decree do not apply here. Had it been a freehold, the loss would have fallen on defendant. Sugd. Vend., Ch. V., § 2; 6 Ves., 349; 2 Hill Ch., 421; 11 Rich., 54. The same rule applies in the sale of chat*tels. Blackb. Sales, 147–149; Benj. Sales, §§ 311–314. The Circuit judge erred in holding that a leasehold estate could not pass at the date of the contract, because that such an estate consists in use and possession, and they were to remain in plaintiff's lessee until November. For a term of years may be created to take effect at a future day, the interest of lessee being meantime an interesse termini. 1 Wash. Real Prop., 293, 295, 296; Tayl. Land & Ten., § 15; 18 Penn. St., 60. But whatever plaintiff's interest, it was assignable, and the title to that interest passed to defendant at the date of the contract. From that time it was at his risk. Bacon v. Sampson, 3 Mees. & W., 78, is not authority on the point for which invoked. In that case title remained in the plaintiff, and no excuse was pleaded. In Massachusetts property remains in the seller after the bargain for sale, but South Carolina, following the English rule, holds that it is in the buyer.

*409

Messrs. Bryan & Bryan, contra, cited the authorities in the Circuit decree, and also Pow. Cont., 147; 2 Bay, 276; Gen. Stat., §§ 71, 72; 5 Barb., 601; 113 Eng. C. L., 824; 107 Mass., 514; 70 Me., 288.

September 9, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiff seeks, by this action, to enforce the specific performance of a contract for the sale of a house and lot on Sullivan's Island, the terms of which are to be found in the correspondence which passed between the parties. The plaintiff, by letter dated July 25, 1881, addressed to defendant's agent, says: "I hereby agree to sell you lot on front beach, Sullivan's Island, belonging to me, and known as No. 16 in a rough plat of Moultrieville, and purchased by me from E. M. Jervey March 21, 1880, for the consideration of $300 cash; possession to be given November 1, 1881, provided I can obtain the consent of the present lessee." To this letter the defendant replied by letter of same date, confirming the negotiation made by his agent, and adding these words: "I had hoped to have got immediate possession, intending to use the small building for *my bathing this season; but as I will not build before November, I will arrange otherwise."

*410

The defendant in his answer admits the making of the contract as above stated, but denies the allegation of the plaintiff, that he "has always been, and still is, ready and willing to perform the agreement on his part, and, on being paid the purchase money, to convey the said lot of land to the defendant, and to let the defendant into possession thereof from the time in the agreement specified." And he also denies the further allegation, "that on or about the first day of November the plaintiff duly offered to make title to the said land to the defendant pursuant to the agreement; but the defendant then, and ever since, has refused to accept the same and to pay the purchase money." On the contrary, the defendant avers that the plaintiff "was then, has been ever since, and is now unable to make title and convey the said lot of land to the defendant pursuant to said agreement," by reason of the fact that after the making of said agreement, and before the said first day of November, the premises in question were in part destroyed by a storm in August, 1881, and so large a part of said lot covered by the sea as to render it wholly unfit for the purposes for which defendant proposed to purchase.

On the trial below two questions were raised, one of fact and the other of law. 1. Whether the lot was injured to such an extent by the storm of August, 1881, as to render it unfit for the purposes for which the defendant proposed to purchase. 2. If so, does this relieve the defendant from the liability to perform the contract? The Circuit judge answered both of these questions in the affirmative, and accordingly rendered judgment dismissing the complaint. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals upon the several grounds set out in the record, which, however, substantially raise only the two questions above stated.

The first being a question of fact, we are bound, under the well settled rule, to accept the conclusion reached by the Circuit judge, unless it is shown to be without any evidence to support it, or manifestly against the weight of the evidence. The testimony as to the extent of the injury done to the premises by the storm was certainly conflicting, and it is quite clear that we cannot say that the conclusion reached by the Circuit judge is with*out any evidence to support it. Nor can we say that his conclusion was manifestly against the weight of the evidence. There was conflict in the testimony and it was for the Circuit judge to weigh it, and if the conclusion which he has reached can be supported by the testimony, we will not interfere, even though there may be other testimony in the case pointing to a different conclusion. We are not to substitute our judgment for that of the Circuit judge as to the comparative weight of the testimony, but we are simply to inquire whether manifest error has been shown. This, we think, has not been done, but, on the contrary, a review of all the testimony satisfies us that the conclusion reached by the Circuit judge may well be supported. Gary v. Burnett, 16 S. C., 632.

*411

This brings us to the question of law involved in the case, and the answer to that depends upon the inquiry, who was the owner of the property in question at the time the destruction or injury took place; for it is quite clear that whoever was the owner at the time must bear the loss. To solve this inquiry it is necessary for us to consider the nature of the property in question. It is conceded to be a mere leasehold estate, and not an estate of freehold. Hence the practical inquiry in this case is, whether the ownership of the property in question was transferred from the plaintiff to the defendant at the date of the contract above set forth, to wit, July 25, 1881. According to the authorities, the title or estate in property of the character of that now under consideration does not pass until the leaseholder's term commences and he has taken, or is entitled to take, possession. The very nature of such an estate consists in use and possession. 4 Kent Com., 85; 1 Washb. Real Prop., Bk. 1, Ch. 10, § 1.

Now as title or estate constitutes what we understand by the term ownership, it would seem to follow that, as no title or estate passed out of the plaintiff and into the defendant at the date of the contract, inasmuch as by its terms the defendant then had no right of entry and no possession or use of the property, the ownership remained in the plaintiff, and if so, the loss must fall upon him. It is true that an estate for years may be created to commence in futuro, and that in such a case the lessee acquires what is called an interesse termini, but the title or estate, that is, the *ownership, must remain in the lessor, and until the title or estate of the lessee commences, the property is at the risk of the lessor, because until that time he is the owner.

*412

In this state the doctrine has been established, that "where there is a substantial destruction of the subject-matter, out of which rent is reserved in a lease for years, by an act of God, or of public enemies, the tenant may elect to rescind, and on surrendering all benefit thereunder shall be discharged from the payment of rent." Coogan v. Parker, 2 S. C. 259 [16 Am. Rep. 659] and the cases there cited. Now if this is the rule to be applied for the relief of one whose term or estate has actually commenced, there would seem to be much stronger reason for applying the same rule for the relief of one whose term or estate has never commenced. The fact that one is a tenant and the other a purchaser can make no difference in the principle. In fact, a tenant is a purchaser of the use and possession of the demised premises for the term of his lease.

But in addition to this, we think that under a proper construction of the terms of the contract in this case it amounted to nothing more than an executory agreement for the sale of a leasehold estate, the term of which was to commence, and possession to be given, at a future day. The very fact that it contained a condition—"provided I can obtain the consent of the present lessee"—shows conclusively that neither of the parties could have regarded the contract as an absolute sale at the time. It is clear from the defendant's letter accepting the proposition to sell, that he expected and desired to obtain possession at least as early as the first of November, 1881, and if he could not do so, he would not be bound, and whether he could do so depended upon the consent of a third party, the then "present lessee" of the plaintiff; and it is, therefore, impossible to suppose that either party supposed that they were then making an absolute contract of sale. When the lease of the then lessee of the plaintiff would expire, and whether his consent had been obtained before or after the partial destruction of the premises by the storm in August, or whether such consent ever was obtained, does not appear; and certainly until such consent was obtained, it could not be said that there was any binding contract between the parties.

*413

*The fact that the consideration was to be paid in cash cannot affect the question, for certainly it cannot for a moment be supposed that the parties intended by the word "cash" that the consideration should be paid at the date of the contract, for at that time the condition upon which it depended had not been performed, as the consent of the "present lessee" had not then been obtained. The true construction is, that the cash was to be paid when the term commenced and when possession was to be delivered. And this is the construction placed upon it by the plaintiff himself, for in his letter to the defendant and in his complaint he only demands interest from the first of November, 1881, whereas, if the cash was to be paid at the date of the contract, he would have been entitled to interest from that time. It is true that the plaintiff in his complaint alleges that he always had been and still is ready to perform the agreement on his part, and this might be regarded as necessarily implying that he had obtained the consent of his then lessee; but this allegation is distinctly denied in the answer, and we find no testimony to sustain such allegation.

As to the first ground of appeal, which alleges error on the part of the Circuit judge in holding that the reduction of the size of the lot below one-half of an acre rendered it impossible for the defendant to conform to the requirements of the statute in that respect, we do not deem it necessary to say anything. For, even conceding that there was error in this respect, that was only one of the reasons assigned for the judgment below, and as such judgment, as we have seen, may be supported upon other grounds, such error, if it be one, becomes immaterial. We are satisfied that the plaintiff is seeking to enforce the specific performance of a contract when he himself is unable to perform his part of the agreement, and that there was, therefore, no error in the judgment dismissing the complaint.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

21 S. C. *414

*DUKE v. COUNTY OF WILLIAMSBURG.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Counties ⇐213.]

Quere: What is the proper remedy of a creditor of a county?

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Jennings v. Abbeville County, 24 S. C. 545.

For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 342, 343; Dec. Dig. ⇐213.]

[2. Counties ⇐47.]

County commissioners have no powers, except such as are conferred by the constitution, or by some statute in accordance therewith.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. ⇐47.]

[3. Counties ⇐173.]

A county of this state had no power in 1870 under the constitution and laws then of force, to execute bonds, without express authority of the legislature, for the purchase money of land bought for a poor farm; and bonds so executed were not valid obligations of the county.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 261; Dec. Dig. ⇐173.]

[4. Constitutional Law ⇐193; Municipal Corporations ⇐935.]

But such bonds having been subsequently recognized by a joint resolution of the legislature as a part of the past indebtedness of the county which issued them, they thereupon became valid obligations of the county.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State ex rel. C., C. & C. R. Co. v. Whitesides, 30 S. C. 586, 9 S. E. 661, 3 L. R. A. 777.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 540; Dec. Dig. ⇐193; Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1951; Dec. Dig. ⇐935.]

[5. Counties ⇐183.]

And a repeal of this joint resolution could not take away from the obligee his right to enforce the contract so recognized and made valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 284; Dec. Dig. ⇐183.]

[This case is also cited in Jennings v. Abbeville County, 24 S. C. 545, without specific application.]

Before Fraser, J., Williamsburg, March, 1880.

This was an action by R. E. Duke as administrator of David M. Duke, deceased, against the county of Williamsburg, commenced in February, 1879. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Barron & Haynsworth, for appellant.

Mr. John A. Kelley, contra.

September 9, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. From the allegations of the complaint, which are not denied in the answer, it appears that on or about August 22, 1870, the county commissioners of Williamsburg bought from the plaintiff's intestate a tract of land for the purpose of establishing thereon a "poor farm" for said county at and for the sum of $1,614.60; that they paid a part of the purchase money in warrants on the county treasurer, which were subsequently paid by that officer, and for the balance executed the two bonds which constitute the cause of action in this case, which were made payable on the 1st day of January, 1871, with interest from date at the rate of seven per centum per annum, but *if not paid at that date, then the interest was to be at the rate of ten per centum per annum; that on June 7, 1877, a payment was made on the said bonds out of the proceeds of taxes collected the year preceding to pay the past indebtedness of the county, but that the balance due on said bonds remains due and unpaid, and that the county commissioners in office at the time this action was commenced refuse to make any payment on said bonds or to recognize them as constituting a part of the past indebtedness of the county. Thereupon the plaintiff demanded judgment against the county (1) for the balance due upon said bonds; (2) for an order requiring the county commissioners to recognize the amount due upon said bonds as a part of the legal bona fide indebtedness of the county, and that the same be admitted to a participation in the distribution of the taxes collected to pay such past indebtedness.

*415

The defendant, by its answer, set up two defences. 1. That of res adjudicata, based upon some proceedings in mandamus; but as this defence does not seem to have been considered or passed upon in the Circuit Court, and the "Case," as prepared for argument here, contains no facts upon which it could be based, no further notice need be taken of it. 2. That the bonds in question were issued without any legal authority, and therefore constituted no legal evidence of any indebtedness of the county. In the court below it seems to have been contended that even if the bonds were originally issued without authority, yet they had been subsequently ratified and confirmed by subsequent legislation, which will hereinafter be more particularly noticed. The Circuit judge held that the bonds were originally issued without authority, and that the subsequent legislation relied upon did not have the effect of making them valid obligations of the county. He, therefore, rendered judgment dismissing the complaint.

From this judgment the plaintiff appeals, substantially, upon two grounds: 1. That there was error in holding that the bonds were originally issued without authority; 2. In holding that the subsequent legislation relied upon did not ratify and confirm the action of the county commissioners in issuing the bonds.

No question has been raised as to the form of proceeding in this case, and we shall not volunteer to do so. Whether a person *claiming to be the creditor of a county can bring his action in the usual form for the recovery of his alleged debt, except in such cases as the right of action is given by statute, or whether he should not submit his claim for audit to the county commissioners, from whose judgment, if unfavorable to him, he may appeal; and after he has thus established his claim, whether his remedy is not by mandamus to compel the county commissioners to levy a tax to pay the same, is a question upon which we prefer to reserve our judgment. See Wheeler v. County of Newberry, 18 S. C., 135.

*416

We will, therefore, upon this occasion, confine our attention to the two questions raised by the appeal. First. Did the county commissioners have any authority to issue the bonds in question? It is quite clear that the county commissioners have no powers except such as are conferred by the constitution, or by some act of the legislature passed in accordance with the provisions of that instrument. The law which was of force at the date of these bonds, and by which, therefore, the question of their validity is to be determined, is to be found in Constitution, art. IV., sec. 19, and the act of 1868, 14 Stat., 128. The language of the section of the constitution referred to is as follows: "The qualified electors of each county shall elect three persons, for the term of two years, who shall constitute a board of county commissioners, which shall have jurisdiction over roads, highways, ferries, bridges, and in all matters relating to taxes, disbursements of money for county purposes, and in every other case that may be necessary to the internal improvement and local concerns of the respective counties: Provided, That in all cases there shall be the right of appeal to the state courts."

The powers thus conferred are broad and extensive, but they are not unlimited. They do not embrace the power to levy taxes, except as such power is delegated by some act of the legislature. For by section 4 of article IX of the constitution, it is declared that "no tax shall be levied, except in pursuance of a law, which shall distinctly state the object of the same, to which object such tax shall be applied;" and by section 8 of the same article it is specially provided that "the corporate authorities of counties, townships, school districts, cities, towns and *villages may be vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes." Accordingly we find that it has been the uniform practice ever since the adoption of the constitution for the legislature to make special provision each year authorizing the county commissioners to levy the taxes necessary for county purposes.

*417

Nor are the provisions of section 19, above quoted, sufficiently extensive to confer upon the county commissioners unlimited power in providing for the support of the poor, for by section 5 of article XI. the constitution provides that "the respective counties of this state shall make such provision as may be determined by law for all those inhabitants who, by reason of age and infirmities or misfortunes, may have a claim upon the sympathy and aid of society" (the italics being ours). Accordingly, at the first session of the general assembly after the adoption of the constitution, in the act of 1868 above cited, authority was given to the county commissioners to purchase land and erect buildings for the poor, and very soon thereafter, to wit: on February 28, 1870 (14 Stat., 369), another act was passed authorizing the county commissioners, in pursuance of the authority conferred by the said act of 1868, to provide with said buildings "sufficient tillable land to give employment to such persons, able to work, as may come upon the county for support; and said buildings and land shall be known as the Poor House and Farm of said county."

It having been thus "determined by law" the provision which the county commissioners should be authorized to make for the support of the poor, it is only necessary for us to inquire what was the extent of the authority thus conferred upon the county commissioners. For this purpose, we must look to the first, second, and third subdivisions of section 14 of the act of 1868, above cited, together with the proviso at the end of the section. The language is as follows: "The boards of county commissioners shall have power, and they are hereby authorized: 1. At any meeting thereof lawfully assembled to purchase, for the use of their respective counties, any real estate necessary for the erection of buildings and for the support of the poor of such county. 2. To fix upon and determine the site of any such buildings, and cause to be erected necessary buildings for Poor House, and pre*scribe the manner of erecting the same. 3. To borrow money for the use of such county, to be expended for the purchase of any real estate, or for the erection of any such buildings, and to provide for the payment thereof, with interest, by tax upon such county, within ten years from the date of such loan, in yearly instalments or otherwise: * * * Provided, that no such loan shall be created by the county commissioners until they notify the general assembly of the necessity thereof, and authority be granted by them to create said loan."

*418

These being the terms in which the authority was vested in the county commissioners to purchase the property necessary for the establishment of a "Poor House and Farm," the practical inquiry in this case is, whether the county commissioners of Williamsburg county, in purchasing land for a Poor Farm from the plaintiff's intestate, and giving the bonds in question, complied with the terms thus prescribed; for unless they did, their action was without any legal authority, and the bonds do not constitute legal obligations of the county. It will be observed that the terms prescribed contemplate but two modes by which such a purchase could be made: first by cash and second by borrowing the money necessary to pay the price agreed upon; and a purchase on a credit in the usual form does not seem to have been contemplated or provided for. It is quite certain that they did not adopt the first mode contemplated (buying for cash), and if the mode which they did adopt can be construed as practically the second, and that they borrowed the money from their vendor with which to pay the price agreed upon, and that the bonds in question were given to secure the payment of the money so borrowed, then it is equally certain that they have failed to comply with one of the terms upon which the authority to purchase was conferred, and that, too, one of the most important, inasmuch as it is conceded that no notification of the necessity for such loan had been made to the general assembly, and no authority for the creation of such loan granted.

It is obvious that the purpose of this restriction upon the powers of the county commissioners was to prevent them from fixing upon the county a debt for the purpose indicated, unlimited in amount, until the necessity for the same had been made *to appear to the legislature, and their authority for creating such debt had been obtained. The wisdom of such a purpose is apparent, especially when the means of paying such debt—by taxation—was entirely under the control of the legislature. We agree, therefore, with the Circuit judge that the bonds in question were originally issued without legal authority, and hence did not then constitute valid obligations of the county.

*419

The only remaining inquiry is, whether, by any subsequent legislation, these bonds have been rendered valid. The legislation relied upon for this purpose is the act of March 3, 1874 (15 Stat., 580), authorizing and directing the county commissioners of Williamsburg to levy and collect a special tax, from year to year, until a certain specified sum was collected, to be applied exclusively to the payment of the past indebtedness of said county; and a joint resolution, approved March 2, 1876 (16 Stat., 210), by which the bonds sued on in this case were in express terms recognized, and the county treasurer directed to register them, and that the same be paid, as a part of the past indebtedness of the county, as provided for by the act of 1874, above cited. Inasmuch as the only vice in the original issue of these bonds was the want of legislative sanction for such issue, it would seem to follow necessarily that this express recognition of them operated as a confirmation, and healed any infirmity there might have been in their original issue, and that they are, therefore, now valid obligations of the county, unless there is some other objection to their payment not disclosed in the present proceedings.

The respondent, however, contends that the only effect of this legislation was to entitle these bonds to their pro rata share of the fund raised by the act of 1874; and that this they have already received. We do not so regard it. The validity of these bonds depends upon the question whether they were issued by proper authority, and although such authority was wanting at the time of their issue, the subsequent recognition of them by the legislature must necessarily be regarded as a confirmation of the previously unauthorized act of the county commissioners in issuing them.

Again, the respondent contends that the joint resolution of 1876 was impliedly repealed, though he cites no act upon which *he relies as having such effect. We presume he alludes to the act of March 18, 1878 (16 Stat., 494), entitled "An act to adjust the past indebtedness of Williamsburg county," which makes provision other than that furnished by the act of 1874 for the payment of the past indebtedness of the county, and which, in its last section, repeals all acts and parts of acts conflicting with it. This, it is contended, necessarily repealed the act of 1874, and that the joint resolution of 1876 fell with it. Even granting this to be so, we do not see how it could affect the question under consideration. The repeal of the act of 1874 might very well take away the means provided for paying the past indebtedness of the county and substitute therefor the means provided by the act of 1878, but it certainly could not have the effect of annulling any of such past indebtedness. So that even if the legislature had undertaken, in express terms, to repeal the joint resolution of 1876, it could have no effect in annulling any debt created or recognized by it, as such repeal would be clearly in violation of the provisions of the constitution both of this state and the United States, forbidding the passage of any law impairing the obligation of contracts. We think, therefore, that the Circuit judge erred in holding that the subsequent legislation referred to did not have the effect of making the bonds in question valid obligations of the county.

*420

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN concurred generally, but Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON only in the result.

---

21 S. C. 420

TOMPKINS v. AUGUSTA & KNOXVILLE R. R. CO.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Estoppel ⟸3.]

In action by the heirs at law of a testator against a railroad company to enjoin the construction of its road across the lands of testator, devised to his widow, but claimed by plaintiffs as residuary devisees, the complaint alleged that the widow, now deceased, intestate, had renounced her devise and claimed dower *421 in all of her hus*band's lands. Held, in subsequent action between the same parties, that they could not now deny this allegation and claim as heirs at law of their mother.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. ⟸3.]

[2. Evidence ⟸474½.]

After evidence offered of facts and circumstances to show that a railroad company had entered by permission the lands of plaintiff, it was competent for defendant to ask its witness whether there "was any act of the owner indicating a dissent."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2228; Dec. Dig. ⟸474½.]

[3. Evidence ⟸185.]

Plaintiff could not testify as to the contents of letters written by him to the president of the defendant company, no notice having been given to defendant to produce the letters themselves. Nor did such testimony, objected to by defendant, become competent upon defendant's testifying, without objection, to such contents.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 642–660; Dec. Dig. ⟸185.]

[4. Eminent Domain ⟸268.]

Where a railroad company constructs its road-bed over lands of another by permission of the "owner," it is not a trespasser, and the holders of the legal title to such land cannot maintain an action for the recovery of the strip of land so occupied by the railroad company and for damages therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 697, 736–740, 742; Dec. Dig. ⟸268.]

[5. Eminent Domain ⟸303.]

Where a railroad company made entry upon land and constructed its road-bed thereon by permission of the "owner" (which permission may be inferred from the facts and circumstances), such entry is not unlawful, and the railroad company is only liable thereafter for the value of the land so occupied and for any special damage caused by such occupation. Gen. Stat. of 1872, ch. lxiii, § 83.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Leitzsey v. Columbia Water Power Co., 47 S. C. 484, 25 S. E. 744, 24 L. R. A. 215; Cureton v. South Bound R. Co., 59 S. C. 377, 378, 37 S. E. 914.

For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 815–817; Dec. Dig. ⟸303.]

[6. Eminent Domain ⟸271.]

The word "owner," as used in this section of the act, means the person who has control of the land; therefore, permission given by executors, who had, under their will, a power of sale for purposes of division or of paying debts, were the owners within the meaning of this section.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Tutt v. Port Royal & A. Ry. Co., 28 S. C. 399, 5 S. E. 831; Northwestern R. Co. v. Colclough, 89 S. C. 558, 72 S. E. 494; Colclough v. Briggs, 99 S. C. 181, 83 S. E. 36.

For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 734; Dec. Dig. ⟸271.]

[7. Appeal and Error ⟸170.]

Where the constitutionality of a statute was not questioned in the Circuit Court, nor by any exception, but is raised for the first time in the arguments here submitted, it is not properly before this Court for consideration.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Frazee v. Beattie, 26 S. C. 351, 2 S. E. 125; Bomar v. Railroad Co., 30 S. C. 455, 9 S. E. 512; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. South Bound R. Co., 57 S. C. 322, 35 S. E. 553; Porter v. Charleston & S. R. Co., 63 S. C. 177, 41 S. E. 108, 90 Am. St. Rep. 670.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1037; Dec. Dig. ⟸170.]

[This case is also cited in Ex parte Bacot, 36 S. C. 131, 15 S. E. 204, 16 L. R. A. 586, without specific application.]

Before Hudson, J., Edgefield, March, 1883.

This was an action by Stephen S. Tompkins and others, who were the residuary devisees under the will of James Tompkins, their father, and were also heirs at law of their intestate mother, Huldah Tompkins, against the Augusta & Knoxville Railroad Company, commenced December 9, 1882. The case is thus reported by the Circuit judge:

In the answer to the complaint the railroad company rests its claim to the right of *422 way over the land in question upon the *acquiescence, consent, and permission of the plaintiffs, not denying that the fee in the land is vested in them. At the trial the testimony was directed mainly to this leading issue. The plaintiffs had not granted the right of way, nor had the railroad company had the same condemned under the provisions of the act of the legislature in such case made and provided, nor had any steps been taken by the plaintiffs to recover compensation for the right of way, which the company alleges it is ready, and has always been ready, to make. The chief issue of fact, therefore, submitted to the jury was, whether the defendant company has acquired a right of way over the land of the plaintiffs by their acquiescence, consent, and permission.

The manner of acquiring rights of way is prescribed in Revised Statutes (old edition), pages 352–356, sections 75 to 86 inclusive. Under section 83 of this act the defendant has acquired its right of way, if at all. Therefore in opening my charge to the jury I proceeded to read and expound this statute in its various provisions, and especially the said last named section, and instructed the jury that if the railroad company has acquired a right of way over the lands of the plaintiffs, it is under the provisions contained in section 83 of said act, and not otherwise, as there is no evidence of a grant nor of a condemnation; nor of use and enjoyment of the road-bed a sufficient length of time to raise the presumption of a grant under the common law rule. The company rests its claim, and under the evidence in this case can rest its claim, alone upon the said act of the legislature, and the evidence in the case to bring the alleged acquired right of way within its terms.

I then turned to the case of Verdier v. Railroad Company, 15 S. C., 477 to 484, as the case containing the authoritative interpretation and most lucid exposition of the sections of said act, and especially of section 83. I told the jury that I preferred to adopt the language of that case in expounding to them the law of the case under consideration, as it was directly applicable and binding; and I proceeded to read in full the words of Justice McGowan on pages 482 and 483, wherein he explains and interprets the language and meaning of section 83. I then made the application to the present case, leaving it entirely to the jury to *say whether the evidence in this case satisfied them, from its preponderance, that the plaintiffs had permitted the defendant corporation "to enter upon the construction of their highway without previous compensation," &c. If the jury should so conclude, I proceeded, in the language of that case, to explain to them how the plaintiffs were estopped from afterwards denying the right of way to the defendant, and how they would be entitled alone to compensation, and the mode and manner in which they would, under the act, have to secure such compensation.

*423

I instructed them that the permission of the executors of the will of James Tompkins, deceased, under whom the plaintiffs claim, would be sufficient, and would be binding upon all the plaintiffs, carefully leaving to the jury to find whether or not that permission had been given. I further explained to them that permission might be given expressly by word of mouth, or might be implied from acts, conduct, silence, and acquiescence, reading again the language of Justice McGowan, and the authorities cited by him in support of this proposition. It appeared in evidence that the road was not constructed in its entire course through this plantation on the exact line of the original or Ashmore survey, but that in a part of its course or line of construction it deviated somewhat from the said survey, and ran in rear of, instead of in front of, the residence, and near the family burial ground. The general direction of the line, however, was that of the Ashmore survey, and, in part, the two lines were the same.

I charged the jury that, if the permission to enter and construct was given, and the entry was made and the construction begun in consequence of this permission, the deviation on a part of the line such as was proved in this case, would not work a forfeiture of the permission, nor would it authorize the executors to revoke the general permission, in consequence of which the money, labor, and time of the company had been expended and bestowed in the construction of the road. A general grant of the right of way, or a general permission to enter and construct, when accepted and acted upon in whole or in part, cannot afterwards be, by the owner of the land, construed into a grant or a permission to locate and construct only on a certain mathematical line.

My charge in this respect is misapprehend-

*424

ed by the plaintiffs' *counsel, and incorrectly set out in the case. It is also misapprehension and error in the plaintiffs' counsel to represent me as saying to the jury: "It is for you to say whether from all the circumstances the company believed that there was permission. If so, then that ends the case," &c., &c. The belief of the company could have no weight in enabling the jury to infer permission, unless it was created by the acts, declarations, or conduct of the plaintiffs, the executors. From these and these only could the jury infer permission and find it as a fact, and so I instructed them.

The first three exceptions relate to questions of evidence. The question set forth in the first exception was allowed to be asked. Upon the second and third, I have to remark that Mr. S. S. Tompkins was allowed to say that he sent the letters spoken of in these exceptions, but was not allowed to state the contents of the letters, because no notice had been given defendant to produce said letters, and because it may readily be perceived that the exact language and full purport and meaning of a letter written upon such a subject is of the utmost importance. The witness might honestly think he had said one thing, whilst the letter, if produced, would amount to something quite different. Hence I hold that the letter is the best evidence of its contents, and parol evidence thereof could not be admitted, since no notice to defendant had been given to produce these letters.

As to the fourth and fifth exceptions, it is enough to say that what I did say in regard to the act of 1868, and the case of Verdier v. Railroad Company, I have already explained.

Exception 6. I charged that the executors had power to give permission, but did not say that they "spoke the voice of the whole family."

Exception 7. Correctly put.

* * * * * *

Exception 15. I refused the proposition contained in this request because, as I told the jury, the question was not one of deceit, misrepresentation, and fraud, but one of permission.

Exception 16. I refused this request, because, as I have said, the executors, who were in charge of the land and in full control thereof under the will, had power to give permission such as would bind the devisees under the will.

*425

*Exception 17. I refused this request as not applicable to the case because the executors could bind the heirs by their consent.

It should appear in the case that I did charge the 3d and 4th requests of the plaintiffs, which are as follows: "3d. That in order for the jury to conclude that the plaintiffs are estopped, they must find from the evidence that the defendants were induced to locate and construct their railroad by the conduct of the plaintiffs; and that the defendants would not have located and constructed their railroad over the land of the plaintiffs as they did, if it had not have been for the conduct of the plaintiffs. 4th. That the burden of proving such conduct is upon the defendant." These two requests of the plaintiffs I regarded as very pertinent, and involving the very essence of the real issue, and I charged the jury, therefore, as requested.

The following are plaintiffs' exceptions, omitting those which the Circuit judge reported to be incorrect statements of his charge:

1. Because his honor erred in ruling that the defendants could ask the witness, Buckhalter, "Was there, or not, any act of S. S. Tompkins indicating a dissent?"

2. Because his honor erred in ruling out the testimony of S. S. Tompkins that he notified A. M. Aiken, one of the officers of the company, by letter that the company should not go through the land without condemning it according to law.

3. Because his honor erred in ruling out the testimony of S. S. Tompkins that he notified Eugene Verdery, the president of the company, by letter, that the company should not go through the land without condemning it according to law.

4. Because his honor erred in charging the jury that the act of 1868 was alone to be their guide, and that the act gives the landowners a remedy in every case, and that the plaintiffs had their remedy under such act.

5. Because he instructed the jury, after reading to them the case of Verdier v. R. R. Co., that the law in that case was applicable to this, whereas the plaintiffs claim that it has no application to the facts, as shown by the testimony.

6. Because he instructed the jury that the executors had suf*ficient power to give consent to the defendants to enter for purposes of construction, and that they spoke the voice of the whole family.

*426

7. Because he charged the jury the following: "The question then is, Did the executors, or either of them, give consent to enter?"

15. Because he refused to charge the jury as requested by plaintiffs, as follows: "That before they can find a verdict for the defendants, they must find in the evidence adduced: 1. That the plaintiffs have made false representations or concealed material facts from the defendants in regard to the right of way over their land; 2. That these representations were made with knowledge of the facts; 3. That defendants were ignorant of the truth; 4. That the plaintiffs made them with intention that the defendants should act upon them; 5. That the defendants were induced to act upon the false representations;" but after reading the requested instructions, which had been argued by plaintiffs' counsel as propositions of law bearing directly upon the case, he charged the jury that these propositions were not applicable to the case.

16. Because he refused to charge the jury as requested by plaintiffs, as follows: "That if the jury find from the evidence that plaintiffs were tenants in common, and that one or more of the plaintiffs did acts or made declarations or admissions which amount in law to permission to the railroad company to enter upon the land in dispute and construct their road upon it, or to acquiescence in the occupation by the company of the land in dispute, such acts, declarations, or admissions can bind only the parties who made them; and if no such acts, declarations, or admissions were made by other plaintiffs, such plaintiffs not making them are entitled to recover." But, on the contrary, the presiding judge did charge the jury that permission of the executors is sufficient to bind all.

17. Because he refused to charge the jury as requested by plaintiffs, as follows: "That no acts, declarations, or admissions made by one tenant in common can bind his co-tenant, and that this rule applies with particular force in the case of infants." The presiding judge assigned as reason for refusal of this *request, that it "involved a question as to power of executors to bind and the court holds that their permission is enough, if established."

*427

[For subsequent opinion, see 30 S. C. 479, 9 S. E. 521.]

Messrs. Abney & Abney and Earnest Gary, for appellants.

Mr. J. Ganahl, contra.

September 9, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This action was brought by the plaintiffs to recover possession of two strips of land in the possession of the defendant, constituting a part of its road-bed, as well as damages for withholding the same. It seems that neither the defendant, nor the company whose rights it had acquired by legislation and arrangement, had ever taken the steps prescribed by statute for the purpose of acquiring the right of way over the tract of land conceded to be the property of the plaintiffs, but that it, as well as the company with which it had been consolidated, had taken possession and constructed its railroad under an alleged consent of the owners, still, however, acknowledging its liability to pay the value of the land actually taken, as well as any special damages occasioned thereby. The jury found a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiffs appeal on the ground of error on the part of the Circuit judge in his rulings as to the admissibility of certain testimony, and in his charge to the jury. The exceptions are very numerous, but as many of them were taken under a misapprehension of the judge's charge, as appears by his report settling the case for appeal, it will not be necessary to set out the exceptions in detail.

As we understand the case, two general questions arise out of this appeal: First, whether the Circuit judge erred in his rulings as to the admissibility of evidence. Second, whether he erred in instructing the jury that the permission or consent of the executors of James Tompkins, or either of them, was sufficient to warrant the defendant in going upon the land of the plaintiffs and constructing its railroad over said land, without first pursuing the mode prescribed by statute for having said land condemned.

While reference must be had to the record

*428

(which is too volu*minous to warrant us in undertaking to make even an abstract of it) for the origin and history of this case, a brief statement of such facts as may be necessary to a proper understanding of the questions raised will, perhaps, be desirable. It is conceded that James Tompkins died seized and possessed of the tract of land over which the railroad of the defendant has been constructed, and that the plaintiffs are his heirs at law; that by his will he devised the said tract of land to his widow, Huldah Tompkins, who died intestate in 1868, leaving as her heirs at law the plaintiffs in this case, together with her grandson who died in 1872, whose interest the plaintiffs have acquired; and that the plaintiffs, S. S. Tompkins and J. W. Tompkins, are the duly qualified executors of said will.

By the first clause of his will the testator directed that his debts and funeral expenses "be paid out of the debts due me or moneys on hand at my death, and if insufficient, then that my executors, hereinafter named, sell enough of my estate, not herein specially disposed of, either publicly or privately, and upon such terms as they may elect, to pay and satisfy all just claims against me." By the residuary clause of the will all the rest and residue of the estate is devised and bequeathed to certain persons therein named, and for the purpose of effecting division amongst the devisees and legatees so named, the executors are authorized "to sell and convey any part or all of my estate, either privately or at public or private auction, that is at auction at which only the beneficiaries under this clause are permitted to buy."

The plaintiffs contend that the land in question having been specifically devised to the widow, the same descended to them as her heirs at law upon her death in 1868, and that, therefore, the executors of James Tompkins had nothing whatever to do with the land, and had no control over it. It appears, however, from the record of a former suit between these same parties, introduced in evidence in this case, that these plaintiffs there distinctly alleged that the widow "declined to take under the said will, but claimed dower in all of the real estate of the testator." This being so (and the fact that it is so cannot now be denied by the plaintiffs), the devise to the widow never took effect, and the land fell into *the residuum of the testator's estate, and the plaintiffs can only claim it under the residuary clause of the will.

*429

The question as to the competency of certain evidence resolves itself into two branches. After testimony had been adduced for the purpose of showing that the defendant company had entered upon the land in question by the permission or acquiescence of the executors, the following question was propounded to one of the witnesses: "Was there or not any act of S. S. Tompkins indicating a dissent?" which, upon objection, was ruled competent. We do not see any error in such ruling. The point of inquiry was whether the company had entered by permission of the executors, which permission may, as we shall presently see, be inferred from facts and circumstances; and after evidence had been offered of such facts and circumstances, we not only see no error in the form in which the question was put, but it would seem to be the most natural termination of the inquiry.

The next inquiry is as to the correctness of the ruling by which the witness, S. S. Tompkins, was prevented from testifying as to the contents of certain letters alleged to have been written by the witness to Aiken and Verdery, two of the officers of the company. Nothing would seem to be clearer than that the letters themselves furnished the best evidence of their contents; and until the proper foundation was laid, it was clearly incompetent to introduce secondary evidence. If, as it seems to be contended, the plaintiffs were satisfied that the letters were in court, in the possession of the defendant or its officers, notice to produce them might have been given, even at the trial (Reynolds v. Quattlebum, 2 Rich., 140); and if the plaintiffs failed to do so, they have no just cause of complaint that the secondary evidence offered by them was rejected. Nor does the fact that Verdery subsequently testified as to these letters, alter the case. His testimony was given without objection, and the fact that one party has allowed the other to adduce incompetent testimony without objection, will not authorize him in turn to introduce other incompetent testimony when it is objected to.

The next question is as to the power of the executors, or either of them, to give the company permission to enter upon the land and construct its railroad; for the fact that such permission was *given must be regarded as settled by the verdict of the jury. This question has been argued by the appellants as if the defendant's position was that such permission operated as a transfer of the right of way; but we do not so understand the position of the defendant. On the contrary, by its pleadings in this case, as well as in the former suit between these same parties, the defendant expressly concedes its liability to pay for the right of way, and avers its willingness to do so, whenever the value of the land which it has taken, as well as the special damages, if any, shall be ascertained. The defendant only contends that the permission of the executors operated to relieve them from the charge of trespassing, in entering upon the land and constructing their railroad; and that, as the plaintiffs in this case, in order to enable them to recover, must not only establish their title to the land in question, but must go further and show that the person whom they are seeking to oust is wrongfully in possession, they cannot recover if it appears that such person is rightfully in possession.

*430

Under the construction given to section 83 of chapter LXIII., of the General Statutes of 1872 (which is the law applicable in this case), by the case of Verdier v. Port Royal Railroad Company, 15 S. C., 476, where the landowner has permitted a railroad company to enter upon his land and construct its road, he cannot maintain an action to dispossess said company, even though the steps prescribed by the statute for the purpose of condemning so much of said land as may be necessary for the purposes of the company have not been taken. The statute, in compliance with the constitutional provision declaring that private property shall not be taken for the use of a corporation without the consent of the owner, or a just compensation being made therefor, provides that a corporation shall, before entering upon any land for the purpose of constructing its road, give notice to the owner, so that if he objects to such entry, the corporation shall first pursue the course prescribed by the statute to have a condemnation of the land; but if the owner does not object, but on the contrary, permits the company to enter, which permission, as is held by the case above cited, may be inferred from all the facts and circumstances, then such entry does not become unlawful, though it leaves the company still liable to pay for the value *of the land taken, together with any special damage that the landowner may sustain by reason of such taking. The only effect of such permission to enter is not to confer any right of way, but simply to relieve the company so entering from the character of a trespasser.

*431

The practical inquiry, therefore, in this case is, whether the defendant had such permission to enter upon the land of the plaintiffs and proceed in the construction of its road; for if it did, then the entry was lawful and the company was rightfully in possession, and this action cannot be maintained. Inasmuch as the verdict of the jury establishes the fact that the company did have the permission of the executors of James Tompkins, or one of them, to enter upon the land for the purpose of constructing its railroad, the inquiry is narrowed down to the question whether the executors, or either of them, had the power to grant such permission. The statute, in dealing with this subject, uses the term "owner" of the land, and it is earnestly contended that the executors were not the owners of the land in question; but that, at most, they simply had a power to sell, for certain purposes, while the legal title remained in the plaintiffs, who were and still are the owners of the land.

It is quite obvious that the statute does not use the term "owner" in the sense of the holder of the legal title, but rather in the sense of one who has the control of the land. If a minor, or other person under disability, holds the legal title, the statute prescribes that the notices and other papers necessary in the proceedings for the condemnation of the land, shall be served, not upon such minor or other person under disability, but upon his guardian, trustee, or committee—that is, upon the person who exercises control over the land, even though he does not hold the legal title, and is not, in the strict sense of the term, the owner of the land. In this case the executors must necessarily have had the control of this land, for they were not only authorized to sell it for division, but, after it had fallen into the residuum, by the widow's renouncing her rights under the will and electing to claim dower in the whole of the real estate, they had also the power to sell the whole or any part of it for the purpose of paying the debts of the testator. To exercise these powers, the exe*cutors must, of necessity, have retained the control of the land, and having such control, we see no reason why they, or either of them, could not grant permission to the defendant company to enter upon the land for the purpose of constructing its railroad, without in any manner interfering with the right of such of the devisees as become entitled, on the division of the land appropriated by the company, to claim compensation therefor.

*432

In the argument here, the constitutionality of the act providing the mode of obtaining compensation for lands appropriated by a corporation, has been assailed. But inasmuch as no such question was raised in the Circuit Court, or by any of the exceptions, it is not properly before us for consideration. We may say, however, that even if it should be assumed that the act was unconstitutional (though upon that point we express no opinion), we do not see how it could help the case of the appellants. For without this act, if the company has entered upon the land by proper authority, then it is rightfully in possession and this action cannot be maintained, but the plaintiffs would be remitted to their claim for damages merely.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

21 S. C. 432

FLENNIKEN v. BUCHANAN.

(April Term, 1884.)

[Pleading ⇐8.]

A complaint alleged that G. was lawfully seized and possessed of a tract of land which she rented to K. for one bale of cotton, and that the interests and claims of G. and K. in the cotton made upon said land had been assigned to plaintiff for valuable consideration; that the sheriff had seized such cotton under warrant issued by the clerk of court at the instance of B., to enforce an alleged lien; that the defendants, the sheriff and B., unjustly detain said cotton, after demand made therefor by plaintiff; and judgment was asked for the cotton so seized, or for sixty dollars, its value, and for ten dollars damages. Held, that the complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 23; Dec. Dig. ⇐8.]

Before Aldrich, J., Fairfield, February, 1884.

*433

*The opinion states the case.

Mr. J. E. McDonald, for appellant.

Mr. Edgar C. Haynsworth, contra.

September 20, 1884. The opinion of the Court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. The Circuit judge in this case sustained a demurrer upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and rendered judgment dismissing the complaint. The only question raised by the appeal, therefore, is, whether the complaint does state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

For the determination of this question we are bound to assume the truth of all the material allegations of the complaint. These allegations, in substance, are as follows: That on January 1, 1883, Mrs. Anna S. Gradick rented to one Tobias Kennedy a tract of land, of which she was lawfully seized and possessed, Kennedy agreeing to pay her as rent, on November 1, 1883, one bale of cotton, weighing four hundred and eighty pounds; that on September 29, 1883, "six hundred pounds of lint cotton, made and cultivated upon the premises leased by the said Tobias Kennedy from the said Anna S. Gradick," were seized and taken into his possession by the defendant, McCarley, as sheriff, by virtue of a warrant issued by the clerk of the court "under an alleged statutory lien for rent," issued at the instance of the other defendant, Buchanan; "that the respective interests and claims of the above named Tobias Kennedy and Anna S. Gradick in and upon the cotton and produce so seized have been duly assigned, for valuable consideration, to D. R. Flenniken, the plaintiff in this action;" and that the defendants, after demand therefor, still unjustly detain the said cotton, the value of which is sixty dollars, to the damage of the plaintiff ten dollars.

The legal effect of these allegations are, first, that Mrs. Gradick was the legal owner, and entitled to the possession of the land in January, 1883, for that is the plain meaning of the terms "lawfully seized and possessed"; second, that as such owner she *leased the premises to Kennedy, who thereby became entitled to the produce made on the place—the legal owner of it—(in the absence of any showing to the contrary, and there is no such showing here) subject to the lien of Mrs. Gradick for rent; third, that defendants, under some "alleged" statutory lien for rent

*434

(by whom given does not appear), seized six hundred pounds of the cotton made on the said premises, and upon demand "unjustly" refuse to deliver it up to the plaintiff, who had bought the "interests and claims" of both Kennedy and Mrs. Gradick.

It is difficult for us to understand why these allegations are not a sufficient statement of a cause of action. It is true that there is no allegation, in so many words, that the plaintiff is the owner of the cotton, but that is necessarily implied from the allegations which are made. Kennedy having leased the premises from the legal owner, was unquestionably entitled, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, to the produce grown thereon; and when he sold his interest to the plaintiff, his right to the cotton in question passed to the plaintiff, who would have held the same subject to the lien of Mrs. Gradick; but as she too assigned her claim to the plaintiff, he thereby became the absolute owner of the cotton, until some one else is shown to have a superior title, or some lien which would justify its seizure; and this does not appear in the complaint. All that there appears is that the cotton was seized under an alleged statutory lien for rent, but by or to whom is not stated, though the inference would probably be that it was claimed to be due to the defendant, Buchanan. But whether there was in fact any such lien as alleged, and whether it covered the cotton in question, does not appear in the complaint; and if so, these facts must be made to appear by way of defence.

But without discussing the question further, we think the case of Childers v. Verner & Stribling, 12 S. C., 1, is conclusive. Indeed, this case is much stronger in favor of the plaintiff than that. In that case there was not only no distinct allegation of ownership in the plaintiff, but the allegation that she had rented the premises upon which the crop in question was grown could only be inferred by a somewhat strained construction of one of the paragraphs of the complaint; and this, too, notwithstanding *the fact that in preceding paragraphs it was distinctly alleged that the premises had been rented to one McFall, who had employed the plaintiff to work the crop. Yet the court held that, though the complaint was defective in its mode of statement, it was in substance sufficient; and that the defect in the manner of stating the facts constituting the cause of action should have been corrected by motion to make the allegations more distinct, and that the demurrer was improperly sustained by the Circuit Court.

*435

The rule was there laid down, in the language of Pomeroy, as follows: "The true doctrine to be gathered from all the cases is, that if the substantial facts which constitute a cause of action are stated in a complaint or petition, or can be inferred by reasonable intendment from the matters which are set forth, although the allegations of these facts are imperfect, incomplete, and defective, such insufficiency pertaining, however, to the form rather than to the substance, the proper mode of correction is, not by demurrer, nor by excluding evidence at the trial, but by a motion before the trial to make the averments more definite and certain by amendment." Applying this rule to the case now under consideration, we think the Circuit judge erred in sustaining the demurrer.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

---

21 S. C. 435

In re MALONE'S ESTATE. In the Matter of Notification by BRYAN, Escheator. Ex parte BUIST, Administrator. Ex parte MALONE. Ex parte BUIST, Administrator, et al.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Descent and Distribution ⇐75.]

Upon the death of a person intestate, title to his real estate instantly vests in his heirs, or, leaving none, in the state, although it may not be known until after judicial inquiry where the title has vested.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. §§ 243–251, 260–262; Dec. Dig. ⇐75.]

*436

[2. Escheat ⇐8.]

*Where title to real estate vests in the state, the state will not dispose of the property until the escheat has been ascertained in the mode prescribed by law; but the state may, before office found, grant to individuals or corporations her right to property already escheated, and even to such as may hereafter escheat, in which case the right, when legally established, has relation back to the death of the intestate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Escheat, Cent. Dig. § 20; Dec. Dig. ⇐8.]

[3. Municipal Corporations ⇐64.]

The state retains absolute control over charters granted to municipal corporations, but not over the property of such corporations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 156, 157; Dec. Dig. ⇐64.]

[4. Constitutional Law ⇐127.]

In 1799 the state granted to the City Council of Charleston for the benefit of its Orphan House, all escheated property, within certain limits, to the amount of $50,000; and in 1868 the constitution directed the proceeds of all escheated property to be preserved as a "State School Fund" for the use of "free public schools." In 1864 a person died intestate, leaving lands within said limits, which was claimed to be escheated property. Held, that the right so granted by the act of 1799 could not be divested by the constitution of 1868, and that the said city council were entitled to so much of this property (if escheated) as would, with its previous receipts from like sources, make up the amount of $50,000.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 332; Dec. Dig. ⇐127.]

[5. Escheat ⇐8.]

The right of the city to such balance is not affected by its failure to claim previously escheated property of greater value within those limits, which had been granted by the state to other parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Escheat, Cent. Dig. §§ 20, 22; Dec. Dig. ⇐8.]

[6. Escheat ⇐8.]

But an act of the legislature, passed in 1878, extending the limit of its former grant of $50,000 to $100,000, was in conflict with the constitution of 1868 (art. X., § 11), and therefore null and void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Escheat, Cent. Dig. §§ 20, 22; Dec. Dig. ⇐8.]

[7. Schools and School Districts ⇐19.]

An Orphan House under the control of the city of Charleston, open only to "poor orphan children, or the children of poor, distressed, or disabled parents," is not a "free public school" of the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 37; Dec. Dig. ⇐19.]

[8. Escheat ⇐6.]

Notification of escheat was properly served under section 2300 of the general statutes, but the subsequent proceedings thereunder were not conducted in compliance with the law. Some parties came in and filed their traverse. Held, that the proceeding could not affect parties not appearing, but having been properly commenced, it should not be dismissed, and the parties who did appear were entitled to have a trial of their traverse.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Escheat, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. ⇐6.]

[9. Escheat ⇐6.]

Each separate traverse under a notification of escheat is a separate case, and should be separately tried.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Escheat, Cent. Cent. Dig. §§ 7–17, 24; Dec. Dig. ⇐6.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Charleston, November, 1883.

These appeals were brought to this Court under the titles of: "In the matter of notification by George D. Bryan, Esq., deputy escheator for the City Council of Charleston; ex parte G. L. *Buist, administrator, v. G. D. Bryan, deputy escheator, et al.; ex parte Lemuel Malone, et al., v. G. D. Bryan, deputy escheator, et al.; ex parte G. L. Buist, administrator, et al., v. G. D. Bryan, deputy escheator." The opinion fully states the cases.

*437

Upon the motion of Buist, administrator, to set aside all of the proceedings as "unconstitutional, null, and void," the Circuit judge, after making a statement of the facts, and citing and quoting Const., Art. X., § 11; act of 1799, § 15, 5 Stat., 366; Gen. Stat., § 2318, continued his decree as follows:

It appears from the year book for 1881, issued by the city of Charleston, introduced on argument, without objection, that the full amount of the $50,000 limited by the grant under act of 1799, has never been realized from escheated property by the City Council of Charleston for the benefit of the Orphan House. It will be observed that under the act of 1799 the grant is made not to the City Council of Charleston for governmental purposes, but to said City Council for the express benefit of the Orphan House of Charleston, a charitable institution. In Cooley's Const. Lim., 339, it is stated: "If a grant is made to a municipal corporation charged with a trust in favor of an individual private corporation or charity, the interest which the cestui que trust has under the grant may sustain it against legislative revocation." It will not be denied that the Orphan House, under the act of 1799, under grant from the state, was entitled to any interest or title of the state acquired at the death of Thomas W. Malone, in 1864, by escheat.

It is equally clear that if any right vested in the City Council for the Orphan House upon the death of Thomas W. Malone in 1864, such right could not be divested by any subsequent provision of the constitution of 1868. In Harlock v. Jackson, 1 Tr. Con. R., 135, it was held: "In cases of escheats for want of heirs the freehold is vested in the state from the time of the death." In this case the land had been granted to one Allison, who died without heirs. The court says: "It seems clear that the land in question is to be regarded as an escheat from the time of Allison's death. * * * In order to authorize the use of it to public purposes or the disposal of it by public au*thority, there must be an office found, that is to say, there must be proceedings to establish the escheat pursuant to act of assembly."

*438

Under this authority it seems that the title cannot remain in abeyance, but instantaneously vests in the public upon death without any one who can lawfully claim by descent or purchase. I must conclude and hold that upon the death of Thomas W. Malone, the City Council of Charleston acquired, under the act of 1799, vested rights for the benefit of the Orphan House, that could not be annulled or repealed by the constitution of 1868.

Do the provisions of section 11 of article X. of the constitution of 1868 conflict with the provisions of the act of 1799? Whenever an act of the legislature can be construed and applied as to avoid conflict with the constitution, it should be done. The act of 1799 vests property now escheated, or which shall hereafter be escheated. Section 11 of article X. of the constitution directs the proceeds of estates of deceased persons who have died without leaving a will or heir, to be invested as a school fund. In this section of the constitution we find the limitation, "not otherwise appropriated by this state or the United States."

By reference to legislative acts, it appears to have been the policy of the legislature prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1868 to grant escheated property to a certain amount in value to trustees of schools and charitable associations in certain localities. It was decided in Nettles v. Cummings, 9 Rich. Eq., 440, that the legislature had the right to grant future escheats, and conferring power to hold and possess escheated property to a certain amount was not void for uncertainty. It occurs to me that the expression, "not otherwise appropriated by the state or the United States," in section 11 of article X. of the constitution, was intended as a recognition of the validity of former grants by the state of escheated property, and was only intended to apply the proceeds of escheated property in excess of the limits of such grants. Section 2,318 of the general statutes seems to me to sustain this view.

In this view, I do not think the constitution of 1868 conflicts with the act of 1799, but even if it did, it could not repeal said act, if, as I conclude, rights vested under said act at the death of *Thomas W. Malone in 1864. The act of December 23, 1878, must be held to be in conflict with article X., § 11, of the constitution of 1868, but this does not affect the conclusions reached already that this motion cannot be granted.

*439

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the motion of George Lamb Buist, administrator of Thomas W. Malone, be refused.

The Circuit decree on the motion to dismiss the proceedings as "unauthorized under the laws of the state in such cases made and provided," (omitting its statement of facts), was as follows:

It was conceded in argument that George D. Bryan, deputy escheator, had not procured the inquest and verdict of a jury with the certificate thereof by a judge, as provided in section 2301 of the general statutes. At this stage of the proceedings to escheat the lands of Thomas W. Malone, this motion is made. The authority for the institution of this proceeding by George D. Bryan is not questioned. The motion only seeks to set aside all of the proceedings subsequent to the notifications of escheat as null and void, under the law regulating the escheat of property.

Chapter XCII. of the general statutes is substantially the same as the act of 1787 (5 Stat., 47), entitled "an act to appoint escheators and to regulate escheats." In McCaw v. Galbraith, 7 Rich., 86, the court, referring to the act of 1787, say: "This act and the amendments of it contain the only provision which we have of machinery for executing such law concerning escheats and forfeitures as now prevails in this State. * * * In providing in reference to such cases for inquest of office, public notice, order of sale, if there should be no claimant, traverse by a claimant and trial * * *."

In Harlock v. Jackson, 1 Tr. Con. R., 142, it is held that in order to authorize the use of property to public purposes or the disposal of it by the public authority there must be an office found, that is, proceedings to establish the escheat, pursuant to act of assembly. I therefore conclude and hold that a compliance with the provisions of section 2301 of the general statutes is necessary in proceedings for escheat of land.

Does the omission to comply with the provisions of the said *section render all of the proceedings had in this cause null and void? What proceedings have been had in this cause? The deputy escheator (whose authority to institute this proceeding is not questioned) is before the court with notice that certain lands have escheated. Upon the deputy escheator's notice, but before inquest of office, a claimant is permitted by the court upon petition in this proceeding to traverse the escheat and take testimony to be used at the trial of the cause. The court has therefore undertaken to determine the issue between the escheator and traverser. Pending this issue, other claimants, who have not as yet traversed the escheat, upon petition and notice move the court to set aside proceedings already had as null and void, because such proceedings have not been according to law.

*440

If there had been a final determination between the escheator and traverser in this proceeding, as already indicated, I would hold that the escheat could not be established without the inquest and verdict of a jury under section 2301, as well as a compliance with the other provisions of law. In this proceeding the initiatory notice of escheat to the judge has been given as provided in section 2300 of the general statutes. There has been no inquest of office or public notice to claimants as required by sections 2301 and 2302. Whilst the law may contemplate the inquest of office and notice to claimants as therein provided at an earlier stage of the proceedings, for the escheat of Malone's lands, yet I can discover nothing in the law to prevent these steps still being taken.

I conclude and hold, that it would be competent for the court in which an issue is pending between an escheator and a traverser to allow any defect in the proceedings for escheat to be remedied at any time before a final determination of the issue. As the traverser is in no default, he should not be subjected to the delay or prejudiced in what might result from the granting of the motion at the instance of parties who have not as yet traversed the escheat.

Even if it were not competent for the court yet to allow the deputy escheator to proceed under his notice, I hold it would not be competent for this court to reverse and set aside orders passed in a cause before the court.

*441

The effect of the orders in *the cause as well as all other matters involving the regularity of the proceeding will be determined by the court upon the trial upon its merits of the issue between the escheator and the traverser.

It is ordered and adjudged that the motion of Samuel Malone, Henry Malone, Bates Malone, and others, upon petition filed to set aside the proceedings in the above entitled cause, be refused. It is further ordered, that George D. Bryan, deputy escheator, do serve a copy of the notice of escheat of the lands of Thomas W. Malone upon Samuel Malone, Bates Malone, and others, named in the petition accompanying the notice of the motion herein refused, and that each of said parties have leave to traverse said escheat.

The exceptions to these decrees, taken by the several appellants, raise the points stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry Buist, for Buist, administrator.

Messrs. J. D. Kennedy and T. H. Clarke, for G. W. Malone et al.

Mr. James Simons, for Lemuel Malone et al.

Mr. W. M. Thomas, for Henry Malone et al.

Mr. Robert Chisolm, for J. G. Fawkner et al.

Mr. G. D. Bryan, for the deputy escheator.

September 20, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. These three appeals, under the titles above stated, all grow out of proceedings instituted by Geo. D. Bryan, as deputy escheator for the City Council of Charleston, for the purpose of having certain real estate of the late Thomas W. Malone declared to be escheated and vested in said City Council for the benefit of the Orphan House of Charleston, upon the ground that he died leaving no person who can lawfully claim the same either by purchase or descent.

The facts out of which the questions to be determined arise are *substantially as follows: sometime in 1864 the said Thomas W. Malone departed this life, in the city of Charleston, intestate, leaving sundry lots in the said city, described in the notification of escheat, as well as some personal property. Soon after his death, George Lamb Buist, Esq., was duly appointed administrator of his personal estate, and he has been, and still is, in the receipt of the rents and profits of said real estate. On December 18, 1882, George D. Bryan, as deputy escheator for the City Council of Charleston, served a notification of escheat upon Judge Pressley, the judge of the 1st Circuit, which embraced the city of Charleston. After this notification, the respondent, John G. Fawkner, presented his petition, denying that the said Thomas W. Malone died leaving no heirs capable of inheriting his estate, and on the contrary averring that he and others therein named are the heirs at law and distributees of said estate. On February 3, 1883, Judge Pressley granted an order directing the deputy escheator to serve a copy of the notice of escheat upon the attorney of said Fawkner, with leave to him to traverse the escheat, which traverse was filed on February 10, 1883.

*442

In the meantime, to wit, on February 7, 1883, George Lamb Buist, as administrator of Thomas W. Malone, upon whom a copy of the notice of escheat had been served, filed his petition denying that Thomas W. Malone had died without leaving any person capable of inheriting his estate; stating that he had been informed that the intestate left a sister, who formerly resided in one of the southwestern states, and that he had other connections in the state of Alabama; that he had been served with a notice by the attorney of said Fawkner, claiming that he and others named in the petition of said Fawkner were entitled as next of kin and heirs at law to the estate of the intestate; that an action had been commenced on January 13, 1883, by the said Fawkner against him as administrator and the said Bryan as deputy escheator, to recover the personal estate and to be let into possession of the real estate of said Thomas W. Malone, and for an account of the personalty and the rents and profits of the realty; submitting that no order can properly be made in the premises until notice has been published according to law, calling in all persons claiming to be heirs and distributees of said *Thomas W. Malone, and praying that his rights and interests may be protected in any order that may be made in the premises.

*443

Subsequently to the filing of the petition and traverse of Fawkner, as above stated, but at what date does not appear, Geo. D. Bryan, as deputy escheator, filed his reply, controverting the allegations of Fawkner's petition, and praying that such further proceedings may be had as will give an opportunity to bring in all those who claim to be next of kin of said Thomas W. Malone, so that the rights of all parties may be finally adjudicated. On April 5, 1883, Henry Malone filed his petition and claimed to be an heir at law of said Thomas W. Malone, and on the same day an order was granted requiring the deputy escheator to serve the notice of escheat upon the attorney of said Henry Malone, with leave to traverse the escheat, but it does not appear that any traverse was filed by him.

On April 7, 1883, Judge Cothran, while holding the courts of the first Circuit, granted an order for the clerk to advertise, in accordance with the provisions of section 2302 of the general statutes, calling upon all persons claiming to be entitled to the estate of said Thomas W. Malone to come in and make good their claims. In pursuance of this order, the clerk did publish an advertisement, without date, calling upon the heirs of said Thomas W. Malone "to appear and make claim to his estate before the expiration of six months from the date hereof." Mark Malone and others having presented their petition claiming to be next of kin of said intestate, the court granted an order on June 30, 1883, requiring the deputy escheator to serve a copy of the notice of escheat upon the attorney of the petitioners, with leave to them to traverse the escheat, but it does not appear that any traverse was ever filed by them.

On October 3, 1883, a claim was filed by Charles Malone and others, but no action seems to have been taken thereon. On October 4, 1883, a traverse was filed by Geo. L. Hill, one of the claimants named in the petition of John G. Fawkner, above mentioned. On October 5, 1883, a claim was filed by Geo. W. Malone and others, and no action taken thereon. On October 6, 1883, a petition was filed by Lemuel Malone and others, claiming that they and others, some of whom are infants, whose names are *unknown to the petitioners, are heirs at law and next of kin of the intestate, and as such entitled to his estate, both real and personal; that the mode prescribed by law by which lands are to be declared escheated has not been pursued in the proceedings herein; that the advertisement by the clerk, under the order of April 7, 1883, was not in accordance with the law; and praying that all the proceedings subsequent to the notification of escheat be set aside as null and void; and failing in this, that they may be served with a copy of the notification of escheat, with leave to traverse the same. On October 9, 1883, a traverse was filed by Margaretta Taylor and others, some of the parties named in the above mentioned petition of John C. Fawkner as heirs at law of the said Thomas W. Malone.

*444

On the same day of the filing of the petition of Lemuel Malone and others, as above stated, these petitioners, by their counsel, gave notice to the clerk of the court, and to Mr. Bryan, the deputy escheator, that they would move the court at its next session "to set aside all the proceedings in the matter of the proceedings for the escheat of the lands of the said Thomas W. Malone subsequent to the notification of escheat therein, on the ground that the same are null and void, and unauthorized under the laws of the state in such cases made and provided."

On October 23, 1883, Geo. Lamb Buist, as administrator as aforesaid, gave notice to the attorneys representing the various parties of a motion to set aside all the proceedings upon the ground that under section 11 of article X. of the constitution of this state the proceeds "of all estates of deceased persons who have died without leaving a will or heir" are appropriated to the establishment and maintenance of "free public schools, and for no other purposes or uses whatever," and that, therefore, Geo. D. Bryan, as deputy escheator for the City Council of Charleston, has no authority to institute any proceedings for the escheat of lands in the city of Charleston, either for the benefit of the Orphan House of Charleston, or for any other purpose.

These motions were heard at November term, 1883, by Judge Witherspoon. At the hearing, it was contended by the administrator, Mr. Buist, and by those uniting with him in this appeal, that although the 15th section of the act of 1799 (5 Stat., 366), *vesting in the City Council of Charleston for the benefit of the Orphan House of Charleston all escheated property in the parishes of St. Philip and St. Michael, which embrace the city of Charleston, to an amount not exceeding the sum of fifty thousand dollars, had never been in express terms repealed, yet that it was abrogated by the provisions of section 11 of article X. of the constitution of 1868; but that if this position could not be maintained, then the City Council, having, as it was conceded, already received the proceeds of escheated property to the amount of $48,648.19, it can only claim the balance of the sum limited in the act of 1799 to $50,000, to wit, the sum of $1,351.81, and that for this purpose they should be required to confine their proceedings to only so much of the property as would yield that balance, notwithstanding the fact that the legislature, by the act of 1878 (16 Stat., 731), had amended the 15th section of the act of 1799, above cited, by increasing the sum therein mentioned from fifty to one hundred thousand dollars, because the act of 1878 was in conflict with the provisions of the constitution above cited.

*445

On January 23, 1884, Judge Witherspoon filed his judgment holding that the provisions of the 15th section of the act of 1799 were not abrogated by the provisions of the constitution of 1868, but that the act of 1878 was in conflict with said constitution, and dismissing the motion of the administrator. From this judgment the administrator appeals, and all the parties claiming to be heirs at law of Thomas W. Malone, except John G. Fawkner and those mentioned in his petition, unite with the administrator in his appeal. Mr. Bryan, the deputy escheator also appeals upon the ground that the Circuit judge erred in holding the act of 1878 unconstitutional.

At the same term, the motion submitted on behalf of Lemuel Malone and others was heard, when it was contended by the moving parties that, inasmuch as the mode of proceeding prescribed originally by the act of 1787, 5 Stat., 46 (the provisions of which are substantially re-enacted in sections 2300– 2315 of the General Statutes of 1882), had not been strictly pursued after the notification of escheat had been served upon the judge of the 1st Circuit, all the proceedings subsequent to such notifica*tion were nullities and should be so declared. On January 22, 1884, Judge Witherspoon filed his judgment, holding that, while there were defects in the proceedings, they were not such as rendered the proceedings void, but that they might be supplied, and refused the motion. He also ordered the deputy escheator to serve a copy of the notice of escheat on the petitioners with leave to traverse the same. From this judgment, Lemuel Malone and the others named in the petition appeal, and all the other parties claiming to be heirs of Thomas W. Malone (except John G. Fawkner and those named in his petition), as well as Mr. Buist, the administrator, join in this appeal.

*446

These appeals raise the following questions: 1st. Whether the provisions of the 15th section of the act of 1799 have been repealed or abrogated by the 11th section of article X. of the constitution of 1868. 2d. Whether the act of 1878, increasing the grant of escheated lands to the City Council of Charleston for the benefit of the Orphan House from fifty to one hundred thousand dollars, is in conflict with said constitutional provision. 3d. Whether the defects in the proceedings instituted by Mr. Bryan, as deputy escheator, are such as to render all of such proceedings, since the notification of escheat, null and void, or whether such defects may not yet be supplied.

I. Title to real estate cannot remain in abeyance; it must be vested in some one. When, therefore, a person seized of real estate dies intestate, the title to such estate vests at once in his heirs, if he leaves any, but if there is no person who can establish that relation, then the title must necessarily at once vest in the State as escheated property. The fact that it may be uncertain or unknown where the title does vest, until after a judicial determination of the question in whom the title is vested, does not prevent the immediate vesting of the title in the person really entitled; for the law will regard the title as vested in such person immediately upon the death of the intestate, although it may not then, or for some time afterwards, be known where the title has vested. This doctrine is fully supported by authority. Harlock v. Jackson, 1 Tr. Con. R., 135, reported also in 3 Brev., 254; City Council of Charleston v. Lange, 1 Mill Con. R., 454.

*447

*Although the title is thus vested in the state immediately upon the death of the intestate leaving no heirs, yet the state will not undertake to dispose of the property until after it has been ascertained in the mode prescribed by law, that the property has in fact escheated, and then only in the mode provided for by the escheat law—by sale—and will not re-grant the land as vacant land. Bodden v. Speigner, 2 Brev., 321. As is said by Cheves, J., in City Council v. Lange, supra, "the state forbears to exercise the right which the common law casts upon it, until that right is ascertained."

But while the state thus forbears to exercise the right of disposing of the property until the escheat has been ascertained, or, as it is usually expressed, until office found, it has always exercised the right of granting its rights in escheated property to corporations as well as private individuals, whether such property has been already declared escheated or not; and our court has distinctly held, in the case of Nettles v. Cummings, 9 Rich. Eq., 440, that the legislature may grant future escheats; that is, an act conferring upon the Sumterville Academical Society property theretofore or thereafter escheated, to the amount limited in the act, was a valid grant of property which escheated after the passage of the act as well as before, up to the amount so limited.

It is true that these legislative grantees of escheated property, like the state, cannot make escheated property available, except in the mode prescribed by the escheat law, either through the action of the state escheator or their own escheators, when, as in this case, they are authorized to appoint one. Still, like the state, they are invested with the right from the time of the death of the intestate, though they may not be able to enforce such right, so as to reap its fruits until the mode of proceeding prescribed by the escheat law has been pursued. But when that has been done, then their rights have relation back to the time of the death of the intestate. Thus in the case of the City Council of Charleston v. Lange, supra, in which the plaintiff was doubtless claiming under this same act of 1799, it was held that the City Council was entitled to recover from the administrator, not only the rents and profits of the real estate received by the *administrator which accrued after, but also those which accrued before office found.

*448

This, it seems to us, shows conclusively that where escheated property, or that which may thereafter escheat, has been by legislative grant conferred upon a corporation or individual, such grantee becomes invested with all the rights of the state immediately upon the death of an intestate leaving no heirs, although the enforcement and enjoyment of the fruits of such rights are postponed until the property has been declared escheated in the manner prescribed by law. The practical inquiry, therefore, in this case is, whether the right vested in the City Council of Charleston for the benefit of the Orphan House to all the escheated property in the parishes of St. Philip and St. Michael to an amount not exceeding fifty thousand dollars, by the 15th section of the act of 1799, could be taken away by the provisions of section 11 of article X. of the constitution of 1868.

While it is true that the state retains absolute control over charters which it may grant to municipal corporations, and may, at any time alter or modify or even repeal them altogether, yet it by no means follows that it retains the same control over all the property of such a corporation. The rule upon this subject, as stated by that eminent author, Mr. Justice Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, p. 237, of the 2d edition, is as follows: "When corporate powers are conferred, there is an implied compact between the state and the corporations that the property which they are given the capacity to acquire for corporate purposes, under their charter, shall not be taken from them and appropriated to other uses. If the state grants property to the corporation, the grant is an executed contract which cannot be revoked. The rights acquired, either by such grants or by any other legitimate mode in which such a corporation can acquire property, are vested rights, and cannot be taken away. Nevertheless, if the corporate powers should be repealed, the corporate ownership would necessarily cease, and even when not repealed, a modification of those powers, or a change in corporate bounds, might seriously affect, if not altogether divest, the rights of individual corporators, so far as they can be said to have any rights in public property. And in other ways incidentally, as *well as by direct intervention, the state may exercise authority and control over the disposition and use of corporate property, according to the legislative view of what is proper for the public interest, and just to the corporator, subject only, we think, to this restriction, that the purpose for which the property was originally acquired should be kept in view, so far as the circumstances will admit, in any appropriation that may be made of it."

*449

In the celebrated Dartmouth College Case, 4 Wheat., 518 [4 L. Ed. 629] where the whole subject of the control of corporations by the government was most ably and elaborately discussed, the court declared that while the charter of a municipal corporation was not like the charter of a private corporation, a contract, yet that municipal corporations could not be deprived of their vested rights of property. As Story, J., at page 694–5, says: "It may also be admitted that corporations for mere public government, such as towns, cities, and counties, may, in many respects, be subject to legislative control. But it will hardly be contended that, even in respect to such corporations, the legislative power is so transcended that it may, at its will, take away the private property of the corporation or change the uses of its private funds acquired under the public faith. Can the legislature confiscate to its own use private funds which a municipal corporation holds under its charter, without default or consent of the corporators? * * * From the very nature of our government the public faith is pledged the other way, and that pledge constitutes a valid compact, and that compact is subject only to judicial inquiry, construction, and abrogation." Again, at page 698, he says: "The truth is that the government has no power to revoke a grant, even of its own funds, when given to a private person, or a corporation, for special uses. It cannot recall its own endowments granted to any hospital, or college, or city or town, for the use of such corporations." See also Terrett v. Taylor, 9 Cranch, 43 [3 L. Ed. 650] and Town of Pawlet v. Clark, 9 Cranch, 292 [3 L. Ed. 735].

In Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87 [3 L. Ed. 162] it was settled that a legislative grant of property was an executed contract and within the protection of that clause of the constitution of the United States which forbids a state from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts. Judge Cooley, in commenting on this case *and showing that every grant to a municipal corporation does not constitute a contract, says, at page 277 of his work on Constitutional Limitations, 2d edition: "If, however, a grant is made to a municipal corporation charged with a trust in favor of an individual, private corporation, or charity, the interest which the cestui que trust has under the grant may sustain it against legislative revocation; a vested equitable interest being property in the same sense and entitled to the same protection as a legal."

*450

In view of these principles, thus authoritatively settled, we think it clear that the provisions of section 11, article X., of the constitution cannot have the effect of annulling or repealing the legislative grant of all escheated property in the parishes of St. Philip and St. Michael, to the extent of fifty thousand dollars, to the City Council of Charleston for the benefit of the Orphan House of that city.

In the argument here it was contended that, inasmuch as the legislature had, in numerous instances since the passage of the act of 1799, made special grants of escheated property in the city of Charleston to private individuals, the City Council, by neglecting to assert its rights to such property, had forfeited its rights under the act of 1799 to the extent of the value of the escheated property so lost to it, and that by taking into account the value of the property so lost by its neglect, the City Council should be regarded as having already received the full amount secured to it by the act of 1799. No such question seems to have been raised or considered in the Circuit Court, and therefore it is not properly before us. But even if it were, the remarks of the court, through Johnston, Ch., in the case of Nettles v. Cummings, in response to a similar position taken in that case would seem to be conclusive. He says: "As to the objection that the society by neglecting to enforce its rights in former cases of escheated property has forfeited its rights to the extent of the property thus lost—is there anything in the statutes compelling it to take its remedy out of the first property which presents itself? Is not the authority plainly conferred to take the remedy out of whatever escheated property it might select, provided it should not raise more than the amount limited in the acts?"

II. As to the constitutionality of the act of 1878. It is quite *clear, upon the principles hereinbefore announced, that this act is unconstitutional. The proceeds of all escheated property in the state having been appropriated by the constitution of 1868 (art. X., § 11), "as a state school fund," the legislature certainly had no power, ten years after such appropriation, to divert any portion of the proceeds of such property to any other purpose. The act of 1878 was an attempt by the legislature to make a new and additional grant of escheated property in the city of Charleston, to the amount of fifty thousand dollars, to the City Council of Charleston, for the benefit of the Orphan House, but as all of such property had already been devoted by the supreme law of the land to another purpose, such attempt must necessarily fail, as beyond the competency of the legislature.

*451

It is argued, however, that the Orphan House of Charleston is a free public school, "combining with it the feature of support for poor orphan children," and, as such, that it falls within the constitutional provision in regard to the proceeds of escheated property. As we understand it, however, the Orphan House is not a state but a city institution. It is not under the control of the state, but of the city authorities or commissioners appointed by them. The school attached to it is not under the control of the superintendent of education, or of the school commissioners. Its doors are not open to all, but only to "all poor orphan children, and children of poor, distressed, or disabled parents, as shall be deemed proper objects of admission by the commissioners;" and while it is undoubtedly a noble charity, and a great credit to the city in which it has been established, it cannot, in any proper sense of the terms, be regarded as a "free public school," and as such, entitled to participate in the "state school fund." Hence, after the proceeds of all escheated property have been devoted by the constitution to the "state school fund," which "shall be faithfully appropriated for the purpose of establishing and maintaining free public schools, and for no other purposes or uses whatever," the legislature has no power to divert any portion of such proceeds to the support of the Orphan House.

III. The only remaining inquiry is, whether the defects in the proceedings instituted by Mr. Bryan, as deputy escheator, to have the real estate of the late Thos. W. Malone, in the city of *Charleston, escheated, are such as to render all of such proceedings subsequent to the notification of escheat (to which no objection seems to be raised) null and void.

*452

Section 2300, of the general statutes of 1882, requires that a notification of escheat shall be served on the judge of the Circuit within which the supposed escheated lands lie, and this requirement seems to have been properly complied with. Section 2301 requires the judge presiding at the court next ensuing after the service of the notification, to cause the jury to make a true inquest of such supposed escheated lands, and certify their verdict to the escheator, who is required to record the same in a book to be kept for the purpose, and return the original within two months to the office of the clerk of the court, to be there filed and kept as a record. None of these various requirements were complied with.

Section 2302 requires the clerk, upon the return of the inquest, to cause to be advertised in a newspaper the first week in every month for six months, a notice containing certain specified particulars, calling upon all persons claiming under the person last seized of the supposed escheated lands to appear and make claim; and section 2303 provides that if no person shall appear and make claim within twelve months after the expiration of the time prescribed for advertising, the clerk shall issue process signed by the judge to the escheator, pronouncing the said lands escheated and vested according to law, and directing him forthwith to sell the same upon the usual notice. The provisions of these two last mentioned sections were not complied with, but under an order of the judge, the clerk did advertise for claimants (his advertisement being without date) for six months, requiring them to come in and file their claims, not, however, within twelve months after the expiration of the time prescribed for advertising, as required by the statute, but within six months from the date of his advertisement.

Section 2304 prescribes the manner in which the escheator shall advertise the sale and the terms thereof. Section 2305 provides for the division of the land, if it exceeds six hundred acres, into smaller parcels. Section 2306 provides that, "if any person shall appear, within five years, and make good title to *such lands in the Court of Common Pleas, on an issue tried, he shall forthwith receive adequate compensation." Section 2307 reads as follows: "Any person without delay, shall be heard on a traverse, in the Court of Common Pleas, on a petition setting forth his right, and the said lands shall be committed to him, if he shall show good evidence of his title to hold until the right shall be found and discussed for the state and the claimant; such claimant finding sufficient security to prosecute his suit with effect, and without delay, and to render to the state the yearly value of such lands, if the right be found for the state." The provisions of the remaining sections of the chapter contain nothing material to the present inquiry.

*453

From this brief summary it is quite manifest that no valid sale of the lands alleged to be escheated can be made until the requirements of the statute, which have been omitted, are complied with, but it does not by any means follow that these omissions will invalidate the traverse already filed by some of the claimants who are in no default whatever. The object, clearly, of the requirements which have been omitted, especially that in reference to the advertisement, is solely to give full and ample notice to all persons who may have any claim to the supposed escheated lands to come in and make good their claim before they are disposed of by sale. Hence, if any person chooses to come in without the publication of the notice as required by statute, he will be bound by all subsequent proceedings, just as an absent defendant would be who chooses to come in without due publication of notice to absent defendants; but those who do not come in will not be bound until after all the requirements of the statute are complied with, and therefore the court would not be justified in ordering a sale until such requirements had been complied with, because until then it could not be known that all persons who might have a claim had been offered and had neglected the opportunity to come in and assert their claims. But how the omission of any one of those requirements can affect a traverse of one who chooses to come in before all the formalities are complied with, we are at a loss to conceive.

Each traverse is a separate case. Such was the practice adopted in McCaw v. Galbraith, 7 Rich., 74, and such must *necessarily be the practice from the very nature of the proceeding. The fact that one traverse may fail in the issue which he has tendered, has no effect whatever upon a traverse that may be filed by another. Indeed, the requirements of the statute, which appellants claim were omitted in these proceedings, are not conditions precedent to the filing or trial of a traverse, but only to the order of sale. There is no reason why a traverse should not be filed and tried before the expiration of the time prescribed for the notice to all claimants to come in and make good their claims. Certainly the law does not contemplate that a claimant shall not file his traverse and have it tried until after the expiration of eighteen months from the date of the first publication of the notice. On the contrary, the statute expressly provides that, "any person without delay shall be heard on a traverse in the Court of Common Pleas, on a petition setting forth his right." Not a word is in the statute even implying that a person who wishes to traverse must wait until after all the steps necessary to a sale have been taken before filing his traverse and having it heard; but on the other hand the statute expressly declares that his traverse shall be heard, without delay, on a petition setting forth his right.

*454

Now if a claimant may file his traverse and have it tried before the expiration of the time within which any person who may have a claim is allowed to come in and make good his claim, that is within twelve months after the expiration of the time (six months) prescribed for advertising, making in all eighteen months, we see no reason why a person, if he chooses so to do, may not file his traverse and have it tried before the notice has been published at all in accordance with the requirements of the statute, the only effect of such trial being to determine the issue between himself and the escheator, without prejudicing, in any manner, the rights of any other traverse. We see no error, therefore, on the part of the Circuit judge in refusing the motion submitted by Lemuel Malone and others to set aside all the proceedings subsequent to the notification of escheat.

The judgment of this court is that both of the judgments of the Circuit Court, which have been appealed from, be affirmed.

---

21 S. C. *455

ROBERTS v. SMITH.

SMITH v. BOYLE.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Vendor and Purchaser ⟸191.]

One who purchases land, goes into possession with the consent of the vendor, and pays the purchase money, but receives no deed of conveyance, is entitled to specific performance, and for all practical purposes is the owner of the land. And it does not alter the case if part of the purchase money was paid after the death of the purchaser.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Sweatman v. Edmunds, 28 S. C. 62, 5 S. E. 165; Buchanan v. Buchanan, 38 S. C. 415, 17 S. E. 218; Watts v. Witt, 39 S. C. 368, 17 S. E. 822; Rapley v. Klugh, 40 S. C. 144, 18 S. E. 680; Peay v. Seigler, 48 S. C. 514, 26 S. E. 885, 59 Am. St. Rep. 731.

For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 395; Dec. Dig. ⟸191.]

[2. Wills ⟸8.]

After-acquired land did not pass under the will of a testator who died before 1858.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 12, 13; Dec. Dig. ⟸8.]

[3. Trusts ⟸69.]

An assignment to the widow of such purchaser of the title deed to the property held by the vendor, which assignment was made without consideration and executed without witnesses, conveyed no title; but if regular, the widow would have held as trustee for the heirs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Dec. Dig. ⟸69.]

[4. Adverse Possession ⟸10.]

Quere. Can the creditor of one deceased urge a plea of adverse possession in behalf of the debtor's estate, no such claim being asserted by the heirs or administrator of the deceased?

[Ed Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 58–64; Dec. Dig. ⟸10.]

[5. Adverse Possession ⟸62.]

A devisee who is also executrix, does not hold the subject of the devise by adverse possession against the creditors of the testator, until his debts are all paid.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Brock v. Kirkpatrick, 69 S. C. 237, 48 S. E. 72.

For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 325; Dec. Dig. ⟸62.]

[6. Adverse Possession ⟸62.]

When a widow, who is also executrix, claims by devise what is afterwards discovered to be intestate property, such discovery cannot have relation back, so as to change the character of her possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 325; Dec. Dig. ⟸62.]

[7. Tenancy in Common ⟸15.]

One co-tenant cannot claim land by adverse possession against her co-tenants living with her, there having been no ouster, and two of them being minors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. §§ 42–52; Dec. Dig. ⟸15.]

[8. Judgment ⟸686.]

Judgment was recovered against B in 1849, renewed against his administrator in 1869, and incidentally affirmed in 1870 in an action to which all the heirs at law of B were parties. Held, in action brought in 1882, that this judgment was an outstanding debt of B's estate.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Leitner v. Metz, 32 S. C. 387, 10 S. E. 1082.

For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1209; Dec. Dig. ⟸686.]

[9. Executors and Administrators ⟸202.]

B gave his bond in 1850, secured by mortgage, and judgment upon this bond was obtained against B's administrator in 1871, B's heirs at law not being parties. Whether this judgment was a lien upon the lands of B depended upon the character of his heirs' possession, but the bond and mortgage are valid claims against B's estate (which is the land mortgaged), his heirs, parties to this action, raising no objection to their payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 730, 738–745, 748, 754, 763; Dec. Dig. ⟸202.]

[10. Payment ⟸66.]

Where a debtor acknowledged her bond as a subsisting obligation within thirteen years after its maturity, the currency of a presumption of payment dates only from such acknowledgment. Distinction drawn between the force of admissions made on a debt not yet *presumed to be paid, and on one where the presumption of payment is complete. This case thus distinguished from McQueen v. Fletcher, 4 Rich. Eq., 161.

*456

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Dickson v. Gourdin, 26 S. C. 398, 2 S. E. 303.

For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. § 186; Dec. Dig. ⟸66.]

[11. Payment ⟸66.]

After judgment obtained on a bond, the debtor, by letter to her creditor, acknowledged her indebtedness on the "bond" held by the creditor. There being no other indebtedness by her to this creditor, held, that it was an acknowledgment of the judgment debt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 176–188; Dec. Dig. ⟸66.]

Before Wallace, J., Charleston, June, 1883.

These were two actions heard together: 1. Action by Susan V. Roberts against T. H. Smith, administrator of M. E. J. Boyle, Susan Smith, Sarah C. Miles, and L. C. Boyle, commenced April 4, 1882, to foreclose a mortgage given by M. E. J. Boyle. 2. Action by Susan Smith against L. C. Boyle, Sarah C. Miles, T. H. Smith, Susan V. Roberts, A. C. Schaffer, as administrator L. C. Boyle, the elder, and against the heirs of Josiah I. Perry, deceased, commenced May 11, 1882, for partition of the estate of L. C. Boyle, deceased. The opinion fully states the cases.

Mr. W. M. Thomas, for appellant.

Messrs. Lord & Inglesby and Jennings W. Perry, contra.

September 22, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. These cases were filed in Colleton county, were removed to Charleston by order of court, and, involving substantially the same issues, were by consent heard together. An order of reference was made, requiring the master, G. H. Sass, Esq., to take the testimony and report upon "all the issues of law and fact," whose report discloses substantially the following facts:

Lionel Chalmers Boyle purchased the plantation known in the proceedings as the "Singleton tract," the subject of the suits, from Josiah Isaac Perry in the year 1850. He paid cash, $400, of the purchase money, but this amount he borrowed from the said Perry, as executor of Susan M. Perry, and to secure the bond given for the same, executed to the said Perry as executor as aforesaid, a mortgage of the land so purchased, but this mort*gage was not recorded until February 5, 1868. It seems that no formal conveyance was executed to Boyle, but he was let into the possession and occupied it until December 21, 1850, when he died, leaving a will bearing date August 13, 1849, by which he bequeathed and devised in terms the whole of his property, real and personal, to his wife, Mary E. J. Boyle. The dates show, however, that he purchased the Singleton land after he had executed his will, and therefore being after-acquired property, it did not pass under his will according to the law then in force, but was intestate property.

*457

It is manifest, however, that the parties thought the land well devised to the widow. The remainder of the purchase money was paid after the death of L. C. Boyle, through O'Hear, Roper & Stoney, who had been the factors of Boyle in his life-time, and continued to be the factors of the estate after his death. After the balance of the purchase money was paid in this way, Josiah I. Perry still did not make title direct, but endorsed on the deed of the land made to him by his vendor, the executor of Singleton, an assignment in the following words: "The State of South Carolina, Colleton county. I do hereby transfer and assign the within named plantation to Mrs. M. E. J. Boyle, her heirs and assigns forever, for and in consideration of full value received. In witness whereof I have hereto set my hand and seal, this first day of March, 1851. (Signed) Josiah I. Perry. [L. S.]" As appears, this assignment was under seal, but it was not witnessed or recorded, and there was no proof that it had ever been delivered.

The following claims were set up against the proceeds of the land:

1. The widow, M. E. J. Boyle, and her children, continued in possession of the land after the death of L. C. Boyle, and on March 22, 1853, she executed her bond to Jacob A. Lockwood, trustee, for $1,350, and to secure it, executed to him, as such trustee, a mortgage of the said plantation, of even date, which was recorded April 14, 1853. This mortgage did not include all of the Singleton land, but only two parts of it—one of 700, and another of 500 acres; two other tracts—the "Pine Barren tract," consisting of 200 acres, and another, called "Cattles," containing 405 acres, included in the Singleton land, were omitted in the *mortgage to Lockwood, trustee. The land and mortgage were assigned by Lockwood, trustee, to Susan V. Richards (now Roberts), the cestui que trust, and are now sought to be foreclosed on the land, in the case first stated in the title. There remains due upon this debt of M. E. J. Boyle the sum of $500, with interest from August 1, 1864.

*458

2. On March 17, 1853, Jacob A. Lockwood, as guardian, recovered judgment against Mary E. J. Boyle for $3,135. This judgment is still unsatisfied, but it is claimed that it must be presumed paid by lapse of time. To rebut this presumption, Mrs. Roberts relies on the following letter of Mrs. Boyle, viz.: "Mr. Richards—Sir: I received a short time since a letter from you relative to amount of balance due on bond to Mr. Lockwood, as guardian. I regret very much it is not in my power at present to settle same, but assure you I shall endeavor to do so as soon as possible. Must beg your further indulgence. February 9, 1866. Yours, very respectfully, (signed) M. E. J. Boyle." Mrs. Boyle died intestate on December 10, 1867, and T. Henry Smith administered upon her estate.

3. As before stated, L. C. Boyle had in his life-time given a bond to Perry, as executor, for $400, which was secured by a mortgage of the Singleton land, not recorded until 1868. Upon this bond Perry, after the death of Boyle, sued A. C. Schaffer, his administrator, without making the heirs parties, and recovered judgment against the administrator in December, 1871. This judgment is still unsatisfied, and is claimed to be due by the estate of L. C. Boyle.

4. In February, 1849, before the death of L. C. Boyle, "The Bank of the State" recovered judgment against him for $3,000, which was revived by proceedings against Schaffer, administrator, on November 10, 1869. In December, 1869, Josiah I. Perry, as assignee, brought suit against T. Henry Smith and wife, and others, heirs at law of L. C. Boyle, to foreclose a mortgage on an Edisto plantation belonging to the estate of L. C. Boyle. The date of the mortgage was junior to that of the judgment of the bank, and the complaint charged that the judgment must be considered as paid by presumption from lapse of time, or if not, that the bank should be required to revive the same and to pro*ceed by execution to exhaust all the other property of L. C. Boyle before resorting to the premises mortgaged. The answer of T. H. Smith and wife, Susan, a daughter of L. C. Boyle, set up the same defence to the judgment. The bank answered, declaring their willingness to levy on other property of the estate, if any of such property could be pointed out; but that not being done, the court, in 1870, made a decree sustaining the validity of the judgment, which was satisfied in part out of the proceeds of sale of the mortgaged Edisto premises. The remainder of the judgment was afterwards assigned to Thomas Henry Smith April 21, 1876, and is now claimed by him as a valid and subsisting lien against the estate of L. C. Boyle.

*459

As the claims one and two are against the estate of M. E. J. Boyle, the wife, and three and four are against that of L. C. Boyle, the husband, it was necessary in the first place to determine to which of the estates the Singleton tract of land properly belonged. Upon the facts stated the master held, as matter of law, that L. C. Boyle was the owner of the Singleton plantation and had a good title thereto in his life-time; that Mrs. Boyle took no title under the assignment, nor did she take any title under the will, her only title in the property being her distributive share, viz., one-third thereof after the debts of her husband were paid, and to that amount only could her mortgage lien attach.

As to the Roberts mortgage, executed by Mrs. Boyle, he held that it is a lien on her distributive share after the payment of L. C. Boyle's debts, &c. As to the judgment of Lockwood, guardian, against Mrs. Boyle, he held that the presumption of payment by lapse of time had not been rebutted. As to the judgment recovered by Perry, trustee, against the administrator of L. C. Boyle, he held that it is a valid and subsisting lien, according to its rank against the estate of L. C. Boyle. As to the judgment of the Bank of the State, assigned to T. Henry Smith, he held that its validity was established in the case of Perry, Assignee, v. T. H. Smith and Wife, et al., in which the heirs of L. C. Boyle were parties, and that the balance still due is a valid lien upon the estate of L. C. Boyle.

Upon exceptions and argument in the Circuit Court, Judge Wallace affirmed the report in every particular, and from that *decree Mrs. Susan V. Roberts appealed to this court upon the following exceptions:

*460

I. Mrs. Roberts objects: 1. Because there was no legal testimony of any sale by J. I. Perry to L. C. Boyle, and the master erred in not stating his rulings on the proposed testimony of the sale. 2. Because the presumption is, that the assignment of Perry to Mrs. Boyle was recorded on the second record in 1868, and that it was delivered, and there is no evidence to the contrary. 3. There is no proof of any judgment of Perry against Schaffer, administrator of Mr. Boyle, and the presumption of time, and from the assignment of the land by the mortgagee, Perry, to Mrs. Boyle, for a valuable consideration, is that the mortgage debt was paid by her.

II. Mrs. Roberts denies: 1. That L. C. Boyle in his life-time ever had a good title to the land. 2. That the taking of a mortgage by Perry from Mr. Boyle was an estoppel in the sense of a presentation of his making title to Mrs. Boyle, especially where it is in evidence introduced by the family, that he, Perry, said he had made no title to Mr. Boyle. 3. That the possession of Mrs. Boyle was not adverse under her title from Perry to the other heirs and creditors of Mr. Boyle; and she alleges that the report of the master in this behalf is inconsistent in itself in holding (1) that Mrs. Boyle and the whole family "regarded her as the owner," working it, mortgaging it, and holding it for twenty-two years, ten years at least after the majority of the youngest child; and (2) that this possession was not adverse. 4. That the assignment of Perry to Mrs. Boyle was a nullity, the facts and presumption showing that she paid for it, besides the "good consideration" mentioned in the assignment to her by Perry. 5. That the Roberts mortgage was a lien only on one-third of the land, and not on all. 6. That the promise to pay Lockwood, guardian, within twenty years did not rebut the presumption of payment of her judgment to him. 7. That the judgments of the bank and of Perry (if proved) against Schaffer, administrator of Mr. Boyle, is binding on the heirs of Mr. Boyle, and especially on Mrs. Boyle's interest, covered as it was by a mortgage long before recorded.

III. Mrs. Roberts alleges: 1. That the master ought to have *reported the land as belonging to Mrs. Boyle. 2. That if it was a family mistake, and the land did belong to Mr. Boyle, the family should not now be allowed to take advantage of that mistake to the worry and injury of this mortgagee, who was at that time a minor. 3. That a mistake taken advantage of in that way would be a fraud, which would call for the strongest intervention of the courts. 4. That it was neither a mistake nor fraud, but a good title, which the mother of this family mortgaged to Mrs. Roberts, &c.

*461

The leading question in the case is as to the ownership of the Singleton tract of land, for on that must depend the proper application of the proceeds of sale. The pleadings are not in the Brief, but the master found, and the Circuit judge concurred, that L. C. Boyle, in his life-time, purchased the Singleton plantation from Josiah Isaac Perry, paid part of the purchase money, and was let into possession; that he executed a mortgage to the vendor to secure the part of the purchase money paid, and that the remainder of the purchase money was paid soon after his death from the products of his estate, through his factors. And under this state of facts, it was held as matter of law "that L. C. Boyle was the owner of the Singleton plantation and had a good title thereto in his life-time."

In this conclusion we concur. It is true there was no proof of a formal deed from the vendor to the vendee while he lived. But one who purchases land, goes into possession with the consent of the vendor, and pays the purchase money, is entitled to have specific performance, and for all practical purposes must be regarded as the owner. It does not alter the case if a part of the purchase money is paid after the death of the purchaser. Spears v. Oakes, 4 Rich., 347; Watson v. Child, 9 Rich. Eq., 129. In the case of Oakes it was held that, in the absence of proof, title in the vendee is the legal implication of the vendor's accepting from him a mortgage of the premises; and as to the time of the payment of the purchase money, Judge O'Neall said: "So, too, of the payment to the South Carolina Society by Mr. Dart—that was in his duty as administrator, and rather strengthened than weakened the presumption of the plaintiff's title," &c. The case of Watson v. Child was, in several re*spects, very much like this. In that case there was no deed to the purchaser in his life-time, only an agreement to purchase and a payment of a part of the purchase money. After the death of the purchaser, McLennon, his executors paid a balance due out of the personalty, and took title in their names; held, that as the land was purchased after the will was executed, "they were trustees for the heirs, and not for the legatees and devisees."

*462

It is clear that Mrs. Boyle never had title as original purchaser, for the land was bought by her husband in his life-time, who paid part of the purchase money, the remainder being paid after his death from the proceeds of his farm. It is also clear that Mrs. Boyle had no title as devisee under her husband's will, for the land was purchased after the execution of the will, and he died before 1858. See 12 Stat., 700; Watson v. Child, supra; and Bell v. Towell, 18 S. C., 94. It is quite as clear that the endorsement of Perry on the deed to him from the executor of Singleton conveyed no title to Mrs. Boyle, for it was without witnesses or consideration, and was not shown to have been delivered. Besides, if the deed had been in all respects regular and delivered, she would have been held to be a trustee for the heirs under the authority of the case of Watson v. Child, supra.

But assuming that Mrs. Boyle only inherited one-third of the land, subject to the payment of her husband's debts, it is insisted that her possession of the land from 1850, when her husband died, until 1867, when she died, gave her title to the whole of it by adverse possession against her husband's heirs and creditors. Neither her administrator nor heirs make such defence, but the effort is made by Mrs. Roberts, one of her creditors, to set up the bar of the statute for Mrs. Boyle, so as to enlarge the property liable for her debt. The administrator of the debtor is the proper person to plead the statute of limitations. Bolt v. Dawkins, 16 S. C., 198.

But passing that, we fail to see that Mrs. Boyle's possession was adverse either to her husband's heirs or creditors. Her possession was on the assumption that the land was well devised to her by the will; but in that view the devise was subject to the payment of her husband's debts. As executrix and devisee, she was charged with certain duties as to those debts, from which the *mere possession of the land could not absolve her. As was said in the case of Simons v. Bryce, 10 S. C., 368: "The widow, being both executrix and devisee, she cannot, in the latter capacity, claim any rights inconsistent with her duty in the former. Her first duty as executrix was to pay the debts of her testator so far as his property would extend, and until she had performed that duty, it is difficult to understand how she could acquire any adverse rights to such property, which was in her hands primarily for the purpose of paying such debts. She must be regarded, therefore, as in possession as executrix until the debts are paid; and the lands devised to her must, while in her hands, remain liable for the payment of the debts due by the testator in preference to any debts due by her in her individual capacity," &c.

*463

It is urged, however, that Mrs. Boyle was not devisee and in possession as such; that she was mistaken and all the other parties were also mistaken as to her rights in the land. This may be so, but we do not see how the subsequent discovery of the truth can have relation back, so as to change the whole character of her possession. No intentional fraud was practised upon Mrs. Roberts. She, or those who acted for her, simply had the misfortune to give credit to one who seemed to own property which she did not. Although the land turned out to be intestate property of L. C. Boyle, it was not, on that account, any the less liable for his debts. The possession of Mrs. Boyle was certainly not adverse to the rights of her children, who were her co-tenants and living with her. There is no pretence of ouster of any of the tenants. Harvin v. Hodge, Dudley, 23. At least two of the children, L. C. Boyle and Sarah C. Miles, were minors down to the death of Mrs. Boyle in 1867. Thomson v. Gaillard, 3 Rich., 422 [45 Am. Dec. 778]. The Singleton plantation must be regarded the property of L. C. Boyle, sr., at the time of his death, and, not passing under his will, was intestate, and after the payment of his debts, was subject to distribution among his heirs under the statute—one-third to his widow, Mrs. M. E. J. Boyle, and the remaining two-thirds among his children.

This brings us to the inquiry as to what claims are established against the estate of L. C. Boyle and his widow, M. E. J. Boyle, *respectively, and first as to those against L. C. Boyle, which must be paid before distribution. No. 3, the judgment of the Bank of the State, was recovered against L. C. Boyle in his life-time (1849). It was renewed against his administrator, Schaffer, in 1869, and in 1870 was incidentally affirmed by the court in the case of Perry, assignee, v. T. Henry Smith and wife et al., in which the heirs of L. C. Boyle were parties. We see no reason to doubt that the balance due on this judgment is a valid debt of the estate of L. C. Boyle.

*464

No. 4, the bond debt of Perry, trustee, for the $400 borrowed by L. C. Boyle for payment on the purchase money of the land, and which was secured by a mortgage of the premises in 1850, was sued to judgment against Schaffer, as administrator, in 1871. In this action the heirs of L. C. Boyle were not made parties, and on that account Mrs. Roberts objects, that the judgment is not a lien upon the land. The master and Circuit judge held it to be a lien, on the general ground that "a judgment against an administrator binds the lands of the intestate, even if the heirs are not made parties, and are in possession." Whether this ruling was correct depends entirely upon the character of the possession of the heirs. See the late case of Huggins v. Oliver, ante 147. But we do not regard the point as necessarily involved in this case. There was certainly a bond debt secured by a mortgage of these very premises. All the heirs of L. C. Boyle are before the court in this proceeding, and they make no such question. The amount still due on this judgment is a valid lien, according to its rank, against the estate of L. C. Boyle.

After the aforesaid debts are paid out of the proceeds of the land, one-third of the remaining proceeds are applicable to the debts of Mrs. Boyle, and the remaining two-thirds are distributable among the children of L. C. Boyle. No. 1, the mortgage given by Mrs. Boyle to Jacob A. Lockwood, as trustee, March 22, 1853, assigned to Mrs. Susan V. Roberts, and sought to be foreclosed in the case first stated. This claim is not contested, and the remainder due, as found by the master, is payable out of Mrs. Boyle's distributive share as above stated.

No. 2, the judgment originally for $3,135, obtained against Mrs. Boyle by Jacob A. Lockwood, as guardian, March 22, 1853.

*465

*The master and the Circuit judge held that, as this judgment was obtained more than twenty years before these proceedings were instituted, it must be considered as presumed paid, notwithstanding the note upon the subject written by Mrs. Boyle on February 9, 1866, upon the ground that the said note contained no such "distinct admission of a subsisting legal obligation unaccompanied by any conduct or expression indicative of unwillingness to pay," as was required in the case of McQueen v. Fletcher, 4 Rich. Eq., 161. In this conclusion we do not concur. The doctrine as taken from McQueen v. Fletcher is correct as applied to a debt already barred by the lapse of full twenty years, but has no application to admissions made before the presumption is complete.

In that case it was held that in considering admissions relied on to rebut the presumption of payment, the same principles were applicable, which apply when admissions are relied on to take a case out of the statute of limitations. "So long as the lapse of time is less than twenty years, any admissions which oppugn the inference of payment drawn from it, go to the jury along with it, and all are considered together according to their natural force; but when full twenty years have expired, an admission that the payment has not in fact been made cannot of itself destroy the effect of the presumption." As to acknowledgments to take a case out of the statute of limitations, the distinction is familiar between a debt barred and one not barred. In the latter case a mere acknowledgment that the debt had not been paid and is still due, will be sufficient. "When an acknowledgment is made in writing by the debtor, charging him in direct terms, or if there be made a part payment or part satisfaction of interest then due, the action must be brought in twenty years next after the time of such acknowledgment, part payment, or part satisfaction." Boyce v. Lake, 17 S. C., 488 [43 Am. Rep. 618]; Best Pres., § 188.

Now apply these principles to this case. The judgment was recovered in 1853, and on February 9, 1866, less than thirteen years thereafter, Mrs. Boyle, the debtor, wrote to Mr. Richards, the then husband of Mrs. Roberts, "I received a short time since a letter from you relative to amount of balance due on bond to Mr. Lockwood, as guardian.

*466

I regret very much it is not in my *power at present to settle same, but assure you I shall endeavor to do so as soon as possible. Must beg your further indulgence," &c. This was before the lapse of full twenty years, and we think was an acknowledgment of the debt quite sufficient to give a new starting point to the running of the twenty years, which have not yet expired. It is true, Mrs. Boyle did not refer to a judgment, but we hear of no other debt of hers "to Mr. Lockwood as guardian," and we have no doubt the reference was made to this same debt which was in judgment, and which is a subsisting debt against her estate.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified as herein stated as to the Lockwood judgment against Mrs. Boyle, and that in all other respects it be affirmed.

21 S. C. 466

GLENN v. COLUMBIA AND GREENVILLE R. R. COMPANY.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Master and Servant ⟸139.]

A train hand, sent back at night to signal an approaching train, saw it coming, although it had no head-light, but upon its emerging from a curve in a cut, he discovered that the engine was very close upon him, and in getting off the track upon which he was still standing, his foot was caught by the rail, and in extricating his foot his hand was caught by the train and crushed. From the railroad cut to where this train hand stood, the distance was too short for the train to stop. In action against the railroad company for damages, the Circuit judge granted a non-suit. Held, that in this there was no error, the absence of a head-light in this case not having contributed to the injury received by this train hand.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ruff v. Columbia & G. R. Co., 42 S. C. 121, 20 S. E. 27; Wragge v. South Carolina & G. R. Co., 47 S. C. 112, 25 S. E. 76, 33 L. R. A. 191, 58 Am. St. Rep. 870; Brown v. Spartanburg, U. & C. R. Co., 57 S. C. 435, 35 S. E. 731; Land v. Southern

Ry., 67 S. C. 294, 45 S. E. 203; Lyon v. Charleston & W. C. Ry., 77 S. C. 343, 58 S. E. 12.

For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 275; Dec. Dig. ⟸139.]

[2. Railroads ⟸389.]

To recover damages for injury done to a party by a railroad company, the plaintiff must not only show negligence by the company, but also that the injury complained of was the result of such negligence.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Wallingford & Russell v. Columbia & G. R. Co., 26 S. C. 269, 2 S. E. 19; Adkins v. Atlanta & C. Airline R. Co., 27 S. C. 76, 2 S. E. 849; Petrie v. Columbia & G. R. R. Co., 29 S. C. 318, 7 S. E. 515; Barber v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 34 S. C. 450, 13 S. E. 630; Ruff v. Columbia & G. R. Co., 42 S. C. 120, 20 S. E. 27; Smith v. Gilreath, 69 S. C. 359, 48 S. E. 262.

For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1319–1323; Dec. Dig. ⟸389.]

[This case is also cited in Agnew v. Adams, 24 S. C. 89, without specific application.]

Before Fraser, J., Richland, July, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. John Bauskett, for appellant.

Mr. J. C. Haskell, contra.

*467

*September 24, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiff brings this action to recover damages for certain injuries sustained by his son, Manus Glenn, a minor, occasioned by the alleged negligence of the defendant. On the night of February 19, 1881, Manus Glenn, who was in the employment of the defendant company as a train hand and brakeman on a freight train on its way to Columbia, was sent down the track by the conductor, when his train stopped at Saluda Old Town to take on wood, to signal an approaching up train from Columbia.

In his testimony, Manus Glenn gives the following account of the manner in which the accident occurred: "I took the red lantern and went down the track nine telegraph poles, according to instructions from the conductor, when I heard the train approaching and saw a light from the cab of the engine. There was a curve in the track about a hundred yards from me, and the train was a good ways on the other side of this curve when I first heard it coming and saw the light from the cab. There was no headlight on the engine. It was in the middle of the night, about 12 o'clock. The night was dark and drizzling rain. When the train entered the curve I could not see it. I signalled the train, when I first heard and saw it, with the red light, which is a signal of danger, and the engineers must stop when they see it. I then started to meet this train to get on it and ride back to the train to which I belonged. When I had gone about twenty steps, I saw by the light of the fire-box under the engine that it was close on me. I attempted to get off the track, when my shoe caught in a piece of the iron rail, a sharp splinter of it, and I had to use my hand to get my foot loose. In jerking it loose, which I did with my hand, my hand was caught by the iron splinter running through it, and before I could get it loose the engine was on me and crushed my arm. It was broken and crushed so badly it had to be cut off. I was brought to Columbia. Dr. Green cut the arm off. I was laid up in the house for about two months. I saw a light from this engine that run over me three times—once from the cab when I first signalled it with the red light before it entered the curve, and again saw the light *from the cab as it turned out of the curve, and afterwards the light from the fire-box from the engine when I was trying to get my foot loose from the splinter of the rail. I was hired by the company at seventy-five cents per day. My father, Britton Glenn, received and collected my wages. I had the red lantern on my arm when I was struck. I carried it back to the train. I was not instructed to stand on the side of the track in flagging trains down. I stood on the track and flagged the lantern across the track. I could have seen the engine better had there been a head-light on the locomotive; I could have seen the reflection of the light on the trees and woods when the engine was in the curve."

*468

The plaintiff also testified that the night was dark and rainy; that there was no head-light on the engine; that he hired his son to the company and collected his wages; that the length of the up train was about sixteen cars; that the track was tolerably level, a little down grade going towards Greenville; that the train was running at the rate of about ten miles an hour, and that "with fifteen cars, can take up its own length, about five hundred feet, if every brakeman is to his place."

James Nelson, another witness for plaintiff, testified that he was a train hand and brakeman on the train which ran over Manus Glenn; dark and rainy night; no headlight on the engine; had been taken off that day as they went down and left at the shops at Helena for repairs; was to get it as they went up; were behind time, and shops were closed when they reached Helena, therefore did not get head-light; witness was on top of the train and never did see Manus's red light; took up about the length of train after striking Manus; about fifteen cars in the train and three brakemen; don't think the train could have been stopped in less than three hundred yards; before they struck Manus, the engineer blew for brakes about one-quarter of a mile from Saluda Old Town. When they first blew brakes, it would have taken one-quarter of a mile to take up train—two hundred yards past the point where Manus was struck. There was a curve in the track, and if the head-light had been burning, he (Manus) would not have seen it till it rounded the curve. Engineer might have seen Manus Glenn one hundred yards. At *that time he could not have stopped train under two hundred yards.

*469

This, with the testimony of Dr. Green as to the extent of the injury and the necessity for amputating the arm, was substantially all the evidence adduced by the plaintiff. At the close of the plaintiff's testimony a motion for non-suit was made and granted, and plaintiff appeals upon the following grounds: 1. "Because his honor erred in granting the non-suit in this that there was evidence of gross negligence on the part of the company in not providing a head-light to the locomotive, which was running in the night time, and thereby caused the accident. 2. Because his honor held that no negligence was proved against the defendant, and that the negligence was all on the part of the plaintiff. 3. Because his honor held that running a locomotive and train of cars in the night time without a head-light, and the locomotive running over a man, was no negligence on the part of the railroad company. 4. Because his honor erred in not allowing the case to go to the jury, when it is respectfully submitted that there was sufficient evidence of negligence for the jury to pass upon."

The "Case," as prepared for argument here, does not contain the slightest evidence that the Circuit judge made any such rulings as are imputed to him in the second and third grounds of appeal, and it is not admitted by the counsel for respondent that any such rulings were made. There is nothing, therefore, upon which these grounds rest, and they cannot be considered by us.

The only question left for us to determine is whether there was an entire lack of testimony to sustain all or any one of the points necessary to be established in order to enable the plaintiff to maintain his action. As is said by Simpson, C. J., in Carrier & Harris v. Dorrance, 19 S. C., 32: "It is well settled that a non-suit is proper only where there is a total failure of testimony by the plaintiff either as to his whole case or to some material and essential part thereof." Was there such a failure in this case?

To determine this question, it will be necessary to consider, first, what were the points material and essential to the plaintiff's case. To enable the plaintiff to maintain this action, he must *not only show negligence on the part of the defendant, but he must go further and show that the injury complained of was the result of such negligence. Mere proof of negligence on the part of the defendant gives the plaintiff no cause of action, because there is no wrong done to him until it is shown that he has been a sufferer by reason of such negligence. It may, and doubtless would, be considered gross negligence for a railroad company to allow a train of cars, with some of the wheels cracked, to be run over a road where there were defective rails or cross-ties, or over a decaying trestle or bridge; but if a third person should be injured by such a train, not by reason of its running off the track, but by a collision with another train, or with some vehicle crossing the track, such negligence could not constitute any foundation for a cause of action in favor of the person injured, because it could not in any way be regarded as causing the injury complained of. In such a case, the negligence of the company, though highly reprehensible, would constitute no wrong to the person injured, and would, therefore, furnish no ground for an action on his behalf.

*470

Applying these principles to the case under consideration, in which the negligence imputed to the defendant was in failing to furnish a head-light for the engine, we find that the testimony as to such negligence was quite sufficient, as to that point, to send the case to the jury; but we look in vain for any evidence whatever tending to establish the equally material and necessary point that the injury complained of was in any way the result of such negligence. On the contrary, the testimony of the party injured demonstrates the fact that the absence of the head-light had nothing to do with causing the injury. The object of the head-light, as we suppose, is to enable the engineer to see objects ahead of him on the track, and perhaps to enable persons to see an approaching train at a sufficient distance to avoid collision with it.

Now, according to the uncontradicted testimony adduced for the plaintiff, the accident occurred at a point near a curve which rendered it impossible for the engineer to see far enough ahead even with the very best head-light, to enable him to take up his train before it reached the point where Manus Glenn was struck, *and he himself says that he not only heard, but saw, at least three times, the approaching train before it came within one hundred yards of the point where he was struck. So that it is perfectly manifest that the absence of the head-light in no way contributed towards causing the injury complained of. There being no testimony tending to establish this material and necessary point in the plaintiff's case, there was nothing to leave to the jury, and there was, therefore, no error in granting the non-suit.

*471

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

21 S. C. 471

LUMB v. PINCKNEY.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Ejectment ⟸146; Improvements ⟸4.]

Where a complaint under the betterment act (Gen. Stat. §§ 1835–1839) alleged a former recovery by defendant against plaintiffs of the land described, the possession by plaintiffs under title which they supposed had conveyed a fee, and the value of improvements erected on this land by plaintiffs, and contained a prayer for a recovery of the value of such improvements, the complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. § 516; Dec. Dig. ⟸146; Improvements, Cent. Dig. § 24; Dec. Dig. ⟸4.]

[2. Constitutional Law ⟸87, 160, 278; Eminent Domain ⟸2; Improvements ⟸2.]

The betterment law of this state (Gen. Stat. §§ 1835–1839) is not in conflict with sections 1, 14, 21, or 23 of article I. of the constitution of this state, but is a valid and binding enactment of the legislature.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 156, 446, 917; Dec. Dig. ⟸87, 160, 278; Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. ⟸2; Improvements, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. ⟸2.]

Before Cothran, J., Hampton, September, 1883.

This was an action by James M. Lumb and others against Adele R. Pinckney and others, commenced in February, 1883. The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Mr. John S. Reynolds, for appellants.

The rule of the civil law touching betterments has never been recognized in this state. 4 DeSaus., 465; Chev. Eq., 213. The complaint discloses no facts that give a cause of action. Pom. Rem., § 519; 18 S. C., 530; 10 Id., 451; 31 Vt., 306. This law gives a right of action against one charged with no wrong, and makes the lien of the trespasser sufficient to divest *the true owner's title; and the judgment for the improvements carries costs. The betterment act of this state is taken from the Vermont statute, but in Vermont there is an elective feature, which may preserve to the owner his property; and upon this ground the statute has been sustained. 4 Vt., 37. In most of the states this elective feature exists. 12 Mass., 314; 14 Ill., 174; 50 Me., 322; 18 Blatch., 202; 18 Iowa, 267; 3 Ohio St., 467; and so in other states. Cool. Con. Lim., 386, 389. See, too, this elective feature in other parts of our statute law. Gen. Stat., §§ 1840, 2289, and the homestead laws; 19 S. C., 243. This law violates Const., art. I., § 1; 7 Cal., 6; 11 S. C., 315; 8 Wheat., 17, 24, 101; 18 Tex., 546. It also violates art. I., § 14. Cool. Cons. Lim., 353, 357; 18 Iowa, 268; 24 Minn., 372; also, art. I., § 21; 1 Yerg., 384; Cooke, 293. And it also violates section 23 of the same article. 14 S. C., 423. This statute is not a mere regulation of the remedy. Cool. Con. Lim., 289, 362; 35 N. Y., 302; 13 Rich., 498.

*472

Mr. C. J. C. Hutson, contra.

The complaint states a cause of action. Code, § 163; 28 Barb., 231; 8 S. C., 104; 12 Id., 1; 16 Id., 392. Compensation for improvements is founded in equity. Black, Tax Titles, 17; 3 Kent, 334; 2 Id., 336; 5 Rep., 30; 4 T. R., 168; 1 Story, 38; 2 Id., 605; Code Civ. of France, art. 552–3; Bell Com., § 538; Chev. Eq., 231; 2 McCord Ch., 455; 4 Rich. Eq., 476. Our betterment act is a copy of the Vermont statute, which was sustained in 31 Vt., 300. Like statutes in other states have been sustained. 12 Mass., 314; 18 Blatchf., 202; 10 Yerg., 477; 13 Ala., 31; 4 Kans., 358; 18 Iowa, 261; 5 Ohio, 133; 13 Id., 74, 308; 2 Peters, 492; 8 Wheat., 1; 1 Black., 374; 14 Ill., 171; 19 Wis., 235. See, too, 12 S. C., 488; 15 Id., 368; 17 Id., 594. This act violates none of the sections of the constitution referred to by appellants. 4 Wheat., 122; 12 Id., 213; 14 Rich., 135; Cool. Con. Lim., 348, 437, 439; 6 Cranch., 87; Bald., 74.

September 24, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by below was an action *under the act, known as the "betterment act," to recover the value of certain improvements erected upon the lands recovered by the defendants from the plaintiffs in a former action brought for that purpose. To this action for betterments, a demurrer was interposed, on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This demurrer was overruled, and the defendants have appealed. The appeal presents two questions. 1. Whether the facts stated in the complaint are sufficient to bring the case within the provisions of the betterment act; and, 2. If so, whether the betterment act is constitutional. The appeal rests on the negative of both of these questions. Can these denials be sustained?

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The action

*473

I. There are several sections of the betterment act. Gen. Stat., §§ 1835, 1836, 1837, 1838, 1839. The most important of these sections, in fact the only one necessary to be considered here, is section 1835, because in that section are found the conditions upon which the right to betterments is founded, and the recovery thereof is allowed and authorized. That section provides: "That after final judgment in an action to recover lands and tenements in favor of the plaintiff, if the defendant has purchased the lands so recovered, &c., supposing at the time of such purchase, &c., that his title was good in fee, such defendant shall be entitled to recover of the plaintiff in such action the full value of all improvements made upon such lands by such defendant, or those under whom he claims, in the manner hereinafter provided for."

Now, all that is necessary to be stated in a complaint under the reformed procedure, so as to escape a demurrer like that interposed here, are the facts which have given rise to the right of action, as contradistinguished from legal conclusions. A simple narrative of the facts upon which the right of action is based is not only good pleading, but the best. From such a narrative the court deduces the legal conclusions, and determines whether any primary right of the plaintiff has been invaded by the defendant, and consequently whether a cause of action exists. Suber v. Chandler, 18 S. C., 530; Hogg v Pinckney, 16 Id., 392.

The facts specified in section 1835, supra, which, when existing, entitle a party to the action therein provided, and which *must be stated in the complaint as a cause of action under the act, are: 1. A final judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action to recover lands and tenements; and, 2. That the defendant, in such action, and those under whom he claims being in possession under the supposition that he was seized in fee, had erected improvements of value upon the land. Upon these facts the act in terms entitles such defendant to recover of the plaintiff "the full value of all said improvements—the said value to be measured by the sum which such land shall be found at the time of the rendition of such judgment to be worth more in consequence of the improvements than it would have been without them." § 1836.

*474

Does the complaint state the facts thus required by the act and upon which a right of recovery attaches? In the first paragraph the former action for the recovery of the land by the defendant against the plaintiff, and the verdict in favor of defendants are stated; in the second and third the possession of plaintiffs under titles which they supposed conveyed to them the land in fee is set out in detail; and in the fourth the value of the improvements erected by the plaintiff and those under whom they claimed is presented, with a prayer for judgment for said value to be recovered in accordance with the statute in such case made and provided. We do not see how the complaint could have followed the act more closely.

II. Is the betterment act unconstitutional? This is the real question in the case, and it deserves full consideration.

It is true that according to the severe and rigid principles of the English common law, founded and established in feudal times and in support of feudal interests and doctrines, title to lands carried with it the land and every thing affixed and attached thereto. The owner of the fee was regarded as the owner of all structures and improvements found upon the premises; so that he who erected such improvements, erected them at his peril. This doctrine, though firmly established in the common law, and though a logical result from the settled principles applicable to real estate and the ownership thereof in England; yet is obviously a harsh and inequitable doctrine when adhered to as a universal and inflexible rule, and it is nowhere found as a ruling princi*ple, except where the English common law prevails in all of its original severity. It has no place in the laws of France, Spain, or Scotland; in fact, is repudiated wherever the equitable principles of the civil law have found a foothold in the administration of justice.

*475

In this country, even before the legislatures of the different states intervened by special acts on the subject, the courts of equity, influenced by what Judge Story styled a "persuasive equity" to the contrary, struggled against it, and contended for the higher doctrine, that he who bona fide takes possession of land under a prima facie legal title, and makes valuable improvements, which must pass with the freehold to the party asserting his paramount right, is deemed by the established rule in chancery entitled to compensation. Bright v. Boyd, 2 Story, 607; Lowndes v. Chisolm, 2 McCord Eq., 455 [16 Am. Rep. 667]; Williman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq., 476; followed by Annely v. DeSaussure, 17 S. C., 389; Scaife v. Thomson, 15 Id., 366; and Jacobs v. Bush, 17 Id., 594. No fair mind can hesitate to acknowledge the justice of this principle; and still further, that services of a lasting and permanent character rendered by one to another, demand compensation whether such services were procured originally by request or not, and a perfect system of jurisprudence would require the application of this principle in all cases where parties stood in this relation to each other. It is admitted, however, that neither the common law nor the equity courts have gone to this extent as yet. Nor can they, not being invested with legislative power.

In most of the American states the equity of this principle as to improvements bona fide erected on lands supposed to be owned in fee, but afterwards recovered by paramount title, has however, been recognised, as appears in the numerous betterment acts which have been passed. Among these the betterment act of our state is found. No doubt these acts in their details are more or less imperfect, and in their application are not only surrounded with difficulties, but frequently work injustice. Yet as to the end intended to be accomplished, but few can fail to approve. The question, however, before us is not as to the wisdom of the act nor its efficiency, nor whether it is suitable to the end *designed, nor yet whether it might be improved by the incorporation of other features. The act is upon the statute books, and we must take it as we find it, and if valid must enforce it.

*476

Is the act constitutional? Mr. Justice McIver, in the case of State v. Gaillard, 11 S. C., 309, laid down a clear and concise rule by which to test the legislative power of the general assembly of the state, and the constitutionality of any special act. He said: "There is no doubt but that under article II., section 1, of the constitution, the legislative power of the state is vested in the general assembly, but there is as little doubt that this is not a grant of complete and absolute legislative power, but only such as is not forbidden by the terms of the constitution of the United States or of this state, either in express words or by necessary implication. Hence, when the inquiry arises, whether a particular act of the general assembly is within the scope of the powers granted to that body, the only question necessary to be considered is whether such act is forbidden, either in express terms or by necessary implication by any provision of the constitution of the United States or this state: for if it is not so forbidden, then such act has the full force and effect of law; but if it is so forbidden, then it has no such force and effect, and must be declared to be unconstitutional, and therefore void."

This is the test we must apply to the question here. It is not claimed that any provision of the constitution of the United States is involved. The question, therefore, is, does the constitution of the state forbid it either in express words, or by necessary implication? It has not been contended that any express inhibition can be found in that instrument, nor is there ground for such position. Is there any for an inhibition by necessary implication? Without attemping here to define the conditions of a necessary implication applicable to every case where the question arises, it is sufficient for our present purpose to say that the constitution guarantees in several of its sections, certain rights to the citizen, and inasmuch as the constitution is the supreme law of the land, it by necessary implication forbids the general assembly from passing any law in conflict with these guarantees. The general assembly has no power to repeal a section of the constitution, not that it is expressly prohibited from such act, but *because the constitution is the organic law, ordained and enacted by the people themselves, the source of all governmental power, and therefore beyond the reach of all subordinate authorities.

*477

The principal sections containing these guarantees are sections 1, 14, 21, and 23, of article I. The appellants contend that the act violates all of these sections. In section 1 the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, is declared to be one of the inalienable rights of the citizen. In section 14 it is declared that no one shall be deprived of his estate, but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land. Section 21 forbids the enactment of any law impairing the obligation of contracts. And section 23 provides that private property shall not be taken, or applied for public use, or for the use of corporations, or for private use, without the consent of the owner or a just compensation being made therefor: Provided, That laws may be made securing to persons or corporations the right of way over the lands of other persons or corporations, &c.

Does this act infringe upon the inalienable right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property guaranteed in section 1? We think not. On the contrary, the purpose of the act being to protect the right of the improving claimant to the property which he has placed upon the premises in dispute, under the bona fide belief that the premises were his, it is, in our opinion, in full harmony with that section, and so far as the improving claimant is concerned, carries out its intent and object. There are equitable as well as legal primary rights in reference to the acquisition of property, and the protection of the constitution may be invoked by either, as the one or the other may happen to be the superior. Now while, as we have said, it is a principle of the common law, that the legal title of real estate, as a general rule, carries with it not only the land, but also all structures or improvements thereon, yet the equity doctrine in cases where valuable improvements have been made under the bona fide supposition that the land belonged in fee to the party erecting them, is that said improvements belong to said party, and this being a paramount right, it is entitled to the shield of the section referred to in preference to the legal title growing out of the mere ownership of the land. In this view the betterment act, being intended *as a means of securing to the improving claimant his recognized equitable rights over an inferior legal claim, is therefore not only not in violation of section 1, article I., but, on the contrary, is in accordance therewith.

*478

Section 14 declares "that no one shall be deprived of his estate except by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land." This is an important and fundamental guarantee, one which lies at the foundation of all progress and improvement, and, within the limits intended by the framers of the constitution, it should be most sacredly guarded. But to construe it as intending to fix unalterably all laws of force at the adoption of the constitution, and as an inhibition against the passage of any new laws giving new rights and remedies as advancing civilizaton may demand, would be changing it from a shield of protection into an instrument of intolerable oppression. Such a construction would negative and destroy the grant of legislative power to the general assembly, and render that department of the government a useless appendage to our governmental system. This was not intended, nor can this section be so interpreted by any legitimate rule of construction. It simply means what it says, to wit: "That no one shall be deprived of his estate except by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land." Under it, the citizen, before surrendering his estate, has the right to demand a judgment of his peers requiring him to do so, or the existence of some law which when enforced demands it, and to that extent it is a limitation upon the power of the general assembly forbidding the enactment of any law which can deprive one of his estate by any other means. Thus understood, we do not see that the betterment act in any way conflicts with this section. The act has no application, except as the law of the land, nor can it be enforced, except through the verdict of the jury.

Section 21 provides, "that no law shall be passed impairing the obligation of contracts," and it is said that a grant from the state is a contract between the state and the grantee, and therefore any legislative act that impairs the obligation of the grant is unconstitutional. This, no doubt, is true, but we fail to see its application here. As well might it be said that the laws allowing the enforcement of contracts, or the collection of debts by the *sale of real estate, through judgments and executions, impaired the obligation of the original grant from the state, and were therefore void. The betterment act, formulating an underlying principle of equity, creates a legal obligation in the nature of a debt against the owner of the land, which, if he fails to meet, the land itself is made liable to be reached by ordinary process as in other cases of debt, and is as free from the objection raised as any of the modes provided for the enforcement of claims by the sale of lands granted by the state. The remedies in the two classes are the same in principle, and must stand or fall together.

*479

Section 23. It appears to us that the respondent has the best right to invoke this section. It declares that private property shall not be taken for public or private use, without the consent of the owner, or a just compensation being made therefor. A party has erected valuable and permanent improvements upon a city lot, of which he is a bona fide purchaser, under a title apparently perfect and complete, enhancing ten times its original value. The true owner of the lot, either from inexcusable laches, or from some other cause, delays the assertion of his rights until these improvements have been completed. He then institutes action, recovers the lot, takes possession with the improvements, and refuses compensation. Should he be allowed to shield himself under this or any other of the sections of the constitution referred to? On the other hand, could not the improving claimant, with infinite more justice, claim their protection?

The claim of the land owner stands upon a mere legal technicality. He has titles to the land, it is true, which, at common law, carries with it every thing attached thereto. But the claim of the improving claimant stands upon substantial equity, based upon his labor and industry, and while he has no right to the land, it would be a blot upon any system of jurisprudence to make him forfeit the improvements, and that for the benefit of one who has expended neither labor nor money in their erection. The true idea is, that both parties should be protected according to their respective rights and interests. This the betterment act attempts by giving the improving claimant, not the costs of the improvements, but such an amount only as they may, in the judgment of the peers of both parties, increase the value of the *premises. This certainly is the equity of the case, and we do not find that the constitution, in any of its sections, forbids its application and enforcement.

*480

The appellants' counsel has referred us to several cases from some of the western states, in which acts similar in their purpose to ours have been held unconstitutional. But these decisions, upon examination, have been found to be based upon special matter peculiar to the acts under discussion there, and therefore not in point, even if they could be relied on as authorities, which they could not be, except so far as they are sustained by established general principles. Besides the weight of the decisions in the different states where betterment acts have been enacted, is in favor of their constitutionality. See Cooley Const. Lim., title "betterment laws," the cases there cited, and Blackwell Tax Titles, 681.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

21 S. C. 480

MIMS v. CHANDLER.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Trusts ⇦79.]

Where M. furnished a part of the money to purchase a tract of land and C. the balance, C. taking titles in his own name to secure the amount so advanced by him, which was to be repaid by M., it would seem that there was a resulting trust in favor of M., certainly to the extent of the money paid by him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 111, 112; Dec. Dig. ⇦79.]

[2. Frauds, Statute of ⇦106.]

A receipt in writing for $285, "to be placed on land papers," is not a sufficiently definite memorandum to take a parol agreement for the purchase of land out of the statute of frauds.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Peay v. Seigler, 48 S. C. 496, 26 S. E. 885, 59 Am. St. Rep. 731.

For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 211; Dec. Dig. ⇦106.]

[3. Frauds, Statute of ⟸129.]

Payment of the purchase money is not such part performance as to be sufficient of itself to take a case out of the statute of frauds, but part payment by the purchaser, with possession delivered by the vendor by virtue of the agreement, and improvements made by the purchaser, are sufficient; and a contract for the purchase of land may, under these circumstances, be established by parol proof.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Humbert v. Brisbane, 25 S. C. 510; Kennemore v. Kennemore, 26 S. C. 255, 1 S. E. 881; Boozer v. Teague, 27 S. C. 363, 3 S. E. 551; Hunter v. Mills, 29 S. C. 79, 6 S. E. 907; Tant v. Guess, 37 S. C. 496, 16 S. E. 472; Peay v. Seigler, 48 S. C. 512, 26 S. E. 885, 59 Am. St. Rep. 731.

For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 311; Dec. Dig. ⟸129.]

[4. Specific Performance ⟸46.]

M., a tenant of 212 acres of land, agreed to purchase from his landlord 65 acres of this tract, and paid part of the purchase money, C. paying the balance and taking the title to himself as security for the repayment by M. of such balance. Held, that M.'s subsequent posses*sion of the 65 acres was not under his former tenancy, but should be referred to a new possession under his agreement to purchase.

*481

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 128; Dec. Dig. ⟸46.]

[5. Specific Performance ⟸131.]

Upon M.'s payment in full of this balance due to C., the title to these 65 acres should, under the agreement, be made to M., and the Circuit decree erred in permitting the master to make title to M.'s wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 426–435; Dec. Dig. ⟸131.]

[6. Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸163.]

One having full knowledge of the contract between C. and M., purchased this land from C. in consideration of a past due debt owing to him by C. Held, that this deed must be set aside as fraudulent and void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 510, 517; Dec. Dig. ⟸163.]

[This case is also cited in Brown v. Cave, 23 S. C. 256, as to facts, and in Rapley v. Klugh, 40 S. C. 134, 18 S. E. 680, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Aldrich, J., Sumter, March, 1883.

This was an action by Timothy Mims against Daniel Wesley Chandler and T. Duncan Chandler. The case is fully stated in the Circuit decree, which was as follows:

This is an action for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. Although much time was consumed in the development and argument of the case, the facts are in a narrow compass. Mr. Frierson was the owner of a tract of land containing 212 acres, more or less. The plaintiff Mims was his tenant at a rent of five bales of cotton a year. Frierson says: "I first bargained to sell the land to Mims for $1,500 on a credit of three years, or five bales a year rent. I afterwards agreed to sell him the land for $1,200 cash, and to let the rent of five bales of cotton, which Mims owed me, go in as part payment. Mims paid me $285 and Chandler $15. In thirty days after, Chandler paid me the balance, $900, and received titles for the land."

It appears that when Mims had made his agreement with Frierson, Goodman entered into an agreement to buy the land remaining, after Mims had cut off 65 acres, the tract on which he lived with his wife and children. When the purchase came to be completed, the defendant, D. W. Chandler, paid the purchase money and took the title in his name. Goodman says: "I went in with Mims and thought Frierson was to make the title, but Chandler said he would take the title in his own name, because he knew Mims could not meet the payments next year, and he could indulge him." Mims had married Chandler's aunt.

When the land was bought from Frierson, Mims says Chandler told him to raise $300, or as near that amount as he could, and that he would give one and two years to pay the balance, $400; *that he sold five bales of cotton for $260, took $25 out of his pocket, and Chandler advanced the other $15, which he charged in his books to Mims's account; that on December 21, 1880, he and Goodman went to Chandler to get their titles; that he made the title to Goodman and took his mortgage; he then said to Mims, "I can't draw your papers, it is late now; but I will have them fixed up by Dr. Mayes, and send them to you. Go home, go to work, and make yourself easy;" he gave the following receipt: "$285. Mayesville, S. C., Dec. 21, 1880. Received of Timothy Mims two hundred and eighty-five dollars, to be placed on land papers. (Signed) D. W. Chandler."

*482

He further says he bought the land for a home, because his wife's relations lived in the neighborhood; that he went to work with his son, cleared, ditched, and drained about ten acres, made it good planting land and improved the health of the place; that in September, 1881, he told Chandler he had picked out three bales of cotton, who replied, "If you will gin it out and bring it to me, I will make your title, take your mortgage, and wait on you until next fall for the balance;" that he delivered him the three bales in payment for the land, sent him two bales, and a few days after carried him the third. "When I asked him for the title, he said, 'My business is such I can't fix them up today, but will send or bring them to you in a few days.' He gave me the two following receipts: '$98.28. Received. Mayesville, September 15, 1881, of Timothy Mims, $98.28, to be placed on account (Signed) Daniel Chandler.' '$50. Received. Mayesville, S. C., of Tim. Mims, ($50) fifty dollars on account. September 15, 1881. (Signed) D. W. Chandler.'"

Mims said he was always ready to carry out his part of the contract, but soon after he had made the last payments he received a letter from Chandler, ordering him off the place. He then "went to see him, when Chandler said, 'I understand you are going to offer the balance of the money due on the land. I will not take it, nor will I make you a title.' A day or two after I commenced this suit. D. W. Chandler sold this land to his brother Duncan. When Duncan bought, he knew all about the transaction, for a month before I commenced this suit Duncan came to my gate and I said to him, 'Wes.

*483

has not fixed up my *papers yet. I have got some more cotton which I expect to let him have when I get my papers,' and showed him my receipts. He said, 'You have no idea Wes. will cheat you? he has been sick and not able to attend to business.' I replied, 'No; but I want the matter fixed up.' That was at least a month before the suit was commenced, and he said nothing about buying the land."

Goodman corroborates Mims as to making the title when the $285 was paid. "Chandler told me in the fall of 1881, if Mims would pay him three bales of cotton, he would make him the title and take a mortgage for the balance. After Mims delivered him the cotton, he said he saw no chance for him to pay, and he would not make the title. He did say something about making title to his aunt if he could get his money. That is the first time I heard about his aunt, a year after the sale to Mims. Chandler told me of the bargain with Mims before the $285 was paid."

J. A. Lemon testifies: "Chandler told me, 'I can do nothing with uncle Tim.' He said, 'Go and tell him if he will bring me three bales of cotton, I will make him the title.' I did tell him, Mims did bring the cotton and Chandler said he could not make the title then, but would get Dr. Mayes to draw it and would send it. He gave him a receipt. Chandler said he believed he would make the title to one of the boys. That was the first time I heard about making to any one else."

E. C. Mims testified: "Was at Chandler's just before Christmas, 1880, when bargain was made. Frierson made the title to Chandler. When Chandler made title to Goodman, father paid him $285, and Chandler gave a receipt, saying he had not time to make title then, but he would make them out and father could come and get them."

This was the plaintiff's case. When he closed, Mr. Earle moved to dismiss the complaint. I suggested to Mr. Earle to reserve the question and to go into his defence. He insisted on his motion and it was refused. The defendants then went into their defence, and proved by C. J. Wilson that he was present in November, 1881, when Mims told Chandler he could not pay for the land, that he had tried to borrow the money, and that Chandler would have to take it back. It was the year of the drought. *He asked Chandler if he would rent? Chandler said he would see him. In November, 1881, Lemon says Mims told Chandler he could not meet payments on land—was humming and hawing about renting. Nothing said about Mims's wife.

*484

T. D. Chandler produced a title from his brother, dated December 13, 1881, to the land in question, for $500. Mims told my brother he could not make payments, and spoke about renting. He says he does not know what land is worth—at least $500. He bought it for $500, paid no money, that he had money in his brother's hands, which he had lent him from time to time; that his brother offered to take $500 for the land—what he owed him. He said Mims did show him the receipts at the gate, and he did tell him his brother would not cheat him—not to be uneasy. He said he heard nothing about going to law. His deed is dated December 13, 1881, recorded January 21, 1882; the complaint is dated December 14, 1881. The conversation at the time Mims showed him his receipts at his gate was before that about not making payments.

D. W. Chandler then testified that on December 21, 1880, he bought the land from Frierson for $900, provided Mims paid his rent to date. "The deed was for $1,200, which I paid, except $285, which Mims paid on his rent to me, and I receipted for. One hundred acres was sold to Goodman for $500. Mims was in possession as a tenant of Frierson, and had five bales of cotton destrained for rent. I paid Frierson thirty days after. Mims has not paid me a dollar. All of his payments have been made on account of his advances. I did promise to settle the land on my aunt and her children when she paid me $400. Had no conversation with her—the agreement was with Mims. The $285 receipt was the money he paid for Frierson's rent, the balance in full. The other receipts were on his accounts. I had no connection with the Frierson agreement. Am willing to convey land to my aunt and her children when I am paid $400 at 12 per centum interest. Not a dollar has been paid on it. Mims said he was satisfied, and agreed to pay three bales of cotton. I owed my brother $585, and was to pay 12 per centum interest. Had no idea of this suit. I may have had the conversations referred to, but they were on the agreement to make titles to

*485

*Mims's wife. I did tell Goodman about September 10 to tell Mims if he would pay three bales on his account, I would take a mortgage on the land and wait a year, if I could possibly arrange my business; if not, I would notify him. Sent for Mims in November, told him I must have the $400 for the land. Went into a settlement—he expressed himself satisfied, and asked for an extension of credit. Told him I was compelled to have money. He said, 'I will give it up,' and asked if he could rent. Replied, 'I do not know; think I will be forced to sell.' He agreed to it. Sent for him in December, told him I would rent for three bales. He expressed thanks."

On the cross-examination, this witness read from a paper which he said he had made night before the last, "Frierson came with Mims when land was sold. Mims sold the cotton and brought the money to the store. Goodman is mistaken when he says I promised to make title to Mims. I did not send the message about three bales to be credited on the land. You (Mr. Lee) told me about this suit last November; I asked you to wait, as I thought I would settle with Mims. Supposed I had, and was surprised I was sued."

The plaintiff Mims was then recalled, who said, "Not a word was said about my wife on the day of the agreement to the last payment, and when I offered to pay the balance which he refused, Chandler said, 'If you do not pay me all the accounts you owe me, you shall not have the land.' I did say, 'I do not see how I can raise all the money.' I never offered to rent, but said, 'I can't tell you now, and want to see my attorney.'"

This, in substance, is the whole case. I do not think I have omitted a material fact or statement. After seeing and hearing the witnesses, a careful review of the testimony, and full consideration of the earnest and able arguments submitted on both sides, I do not think there can be the slightest doubt in any candid mind that Mims, Goodman, and Frierson have given the exact truth in relation to this transaction. Whether Chandler had a sinister purpose in assisting his uncle, Mims, to make the purchase from Frierson, I am not certain, but am inclined to think not. That he knew all the particulars of the bargain and sale, I feel assured. He was prosperous then, as shown by his *ability to raise the $900 to complete the cash payment; hence, he promptly gave his receipt for $285, "to be placed on land papers." What can he mean by that? Can there be any other solution than that the agreement as stated by Mims was the real transaction, and the payment in part performance? This view is strengthened by the fact, about which there can be no doubt, that at the very time of receiving the money and giving the receipt, he promised to have the papers prepared and sent to Mims. Chandler himself supports this view when he says this rent was to be a part of the purchase money.

*486

To my view, after the payment of the $285 of the purchase money, the reception of the receipt for land papers, and remaining in possession, that Mims was Frierson's tenant is extravagant. How could he be? Frierson had conveyed the land to Chandler, who had paid $285 of Mims's money as part of the purchase money, made title to Goodman, given his receipt to Mims on land papers, and promised to execute and send the title in a few days. To hold now that he was Frierson's tenant, and not in under a contract of sale, is such a tax on credulity, that I cannot entertain it for a moment.

But, independently of this, if Chandler did not regard his uncle, Mims, as the purchaser of that 65 acres, why did he permit him to improve it? He knew he was a poor man, that he was anxious to secure a home for his family, and yet he never uttered a word of warning, to say, your labor may be in vain! It is true, to cut down, ditch, and drain ten acres is no great undertaking for a landed proprietor of means, but when a poor man, who cannot afford to buy more than 65 acres, goes on that small tract, thinking he has bought his home, and with his boy, a mere youth, with their own hands cut down timber, dig ditches, drain wet places, and bring it into cultivation, improving the healthfulness of the residence, it is a big job, although there be but ten acres redeemed. Chandler saw his uncle and cousin doing this work. Can there be a plausible reason for permitting them to waste their labor, if he claimed the land?

That there was an agreement to purchase by Mims, at the date of the purchase, is beyond doubt according to Chandler's own statement. He does not deny the conversations referred to as to *the title, but says there was an agreement to make title to Mims's wife and children. Now, if this be so, when was the agreement made? It must have been at the time of the purchase, and the $300 must have been a part of the purchase money, which was paid by Mims, for Chandler says, "I did promise to settle land on my aunt and her children when she paid me $400, at 12 per cent. per annum interest." What does that mean? The contract price was $700, Mims paid $300, balance $400. This confirms the whole transaction, as related by Mims and the other witnesses for the plaintiff. It is clear, however, to my mind, this settlement on his aunt is an afterthought. Chandler himself says, "She was not present: I had no conversation with her;" and all the witnesses swear that nothing was said about his aunt until a year or more after the contract to purchase.

*487

I do not hesitate in my conclusions that there was part payment, possession under the purchase, a promise to make title, and that this is an effort to apply payments on the land to an antecedent debt against the express instruction of the debtor.

I am not so certain but that Chandler may be regarded in the light of a trustee. He had nothing to do with the contract to purchase from Frierson, in its inception. That was entirely between Mims and Frierson, for Goodman says, "I bought from Mims; went in with Mims, and thought Frierson was to make the title." After the contract to purchase for $1,200 had been completed between Frierson and Mims, Chandler came in and agreed with Mims, if he would raise $300, or as near that amount as he could, he would raise the other $900, take the title in his own name, make title to Mims and Goodman, and give them time to pay, the debt being secured by bond and mortgage of the land each was to get. In pursuance of this agreement, he did make title to Goodman and took his bond and mortgage, gave a memorandum in writing to Mims for his cash payment, $285, and promised to prepare the papers another day, it then being too late.

Is that not only a compliance with the statute of frauds, writing and part payment, but does it not place Chandler in the position of a trustee, holding for the benefit of Mims, when he paid the balance of the purchase money? Can one *occupying such a relation to an innocent purchaser invoke the protection of the statute? Will he be permitted to practise such a fraud upon the trusting relative, whose money he has used, and who has diligently complied with every part of his engagement? I think not.

*488

This whole transaction has, to my mind, very much the appearance of a contrivance on the part of Chandler, finding that he was embarrassed, and that the purchase of the land was a good speculation, to turn the advantage to his own account; or, as if he had intended from the first to entrap Mims into the payment of the $300, and collect, under the pretence of procuring for his wife and children, his preëxisting accounts for advances for which he had no security, and against the express instructions of his uncle how to apply the payments. The equity side of this court cannot lend its aid to such a contrivance. Daniel Wesley Chandler must perform his contract, and make title to his uncle, Timothy Mims.

Very little need be said as to the conveyance from Daniel W. Chandler. A more transparent fraud I have never seen. Inadequate price; no money paid; title made the day before the date of the complaint; knowledge of the suit; inspection of Mims's receipt; indignant exclamation to Mims, "Do you think my brother would cheat you?" The whole thing is too thin to waste time and words. The deed must be set aside as fraudulent and void.

1. It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that Daniel W. Chandler do perform his contract. 2. That the master do make title to Timothy Mims of the land described in the complaint on receiving from him the sum of $296.76, with interest from February 16, 1883. That the costs be paid out of the money paid by Mims, and the balance to T. Duncan Chandler.

As D. W. Chandler says the land was purchased for the benefit of his aunt, Mrs. Mims, and her children, and that his brother is now ready to carry out that arrangement, it is finally ordered that the master may make title to Mrs. Mims, on such terms and conditions as may be agreeable to her husband, Timothy Mims, the plaintiff in this action.

*489

*The testimony of the plaintiff and of each of his witnesses concerning the agreement for the sale of land was objected to by the defendants upon the ground that such an agreement could not be proved by parol. These objections were overruled, and the defendants excepted. At the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony, the defendants moved that the complaint be dismissed, upon the ground that the alleged agreement was within the statute of frauds. This motion was refused, and defendants excepted. The exceptions to the decree appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Earle & Beard, for appellants.

Messrs. Moises & Lee, contra.

October 6, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action, in the nature of a bill in equity, to set aside the conveyance of a certain tract of land, alleged to be fraudulent, and to enforce a parol agreement as to the same. The defence denied the existence of the alleged parol agreement, and interposed the statute of frauds to exclude all evidence of such agreement. The case came on to be heard by Judge Aldrich, who admitted the testimony, the substance of which is fully stated in the decree of the judge, with an abstract of the testimony of the different witnesses. It will therefore be unnecessary to restate the testimony, or to do more than give such a general outline of it as to show its character and make the points intelligible. [Here follows a statement of the testimony of Mims and Goodman as given in the Circuit decree.] There was other testimony, but none, as we think, very materially changing the substance of this statement.

The Circuit judge decreed that the conveyance of the land from D. W. Chandler to his brother, Duncan, should be set aside as fraudulent; that D. W. Chandler should execute the trust assumed by him to convey the land to Mims, and that the master should make title to the said Mims, on his paying the balance of the purchase money, viz., $296.76, with interest thereon from February 16, 1883, the costs to be paid out of the money thus to be paid; and the following was added: "As D. W. Chandler *says the land was purchased for the benefit of his aunt, Mrs. Mims, and her children, and that his brother is now ready to carry out that arrangement, it is finally ordered that the master may make title to Mrs. Mims on such terms and conditions as may be agreeable to her husband, Timothy Mims, the plaintiff in this action."

*490

The defendants appeal to this court upon the following grounds:

1. "Because the agreement alleged in this case could not be proved by parol.

2. "Because his honor erred in holding that the alleged agreement was not within the statute of frauds.

3. "Because the receipt for '$285 to be placed on land papers' is not such a memorandum as the statute requires.

4. "Because Mims had been in possession under Chandler's grantor, and the retention by him of a pre-existing possession does not take the case out of the statute.

5. "Because the payment of a part, or even the whole, of the purchase money is not sufficient to take the case out of the statute.

6. "Because the circumstances as proved do not satisfy the statute.

7. "Because his honor erred in holding that the payments made by Mims should be credited upon the alleged account for the purchase of the land and not upon his account for merchandise sold to him by Chandler.

8. "Because if an agreement for the sale of the land ever existed between the parties, Mims released all his rights thereunder before the conveyance of said land to T. Duncan Chandler was executed.

9. "Because his honor erred in holding that the plaintiff was not estopped from setting up the alleged agreement against T. Duncan Chandler.

10. "Because, under the circumstances as proved, T. Duncan Chandler has at least the right to be reimbursed the amount paid by him for the land.

11. "Because his honor erred in his conclusions of fact and of law."

We incline to think that the second view of the Circuit judge was the correct one; that the facts made out a case of trust *resulting to Mims, which was susceptible of proof by parol. Billings v. Clinton, 6 S. C., 102. Mims made the contract of purchase from Frierson, not from Chandler—who did not appear in the business at all until the purchase money was to be paid. It is true that he then delivered the money to Frierson,—not as a purchaser for himself, but for Mims, who furnished $285 of the money so paid. This payment, through Chandler, raised a resulting trust in favor of Mims, certainly to the extent of the payment, if it did not give color and character to the whole transaction. It was clearly proved that actual payment of a definite proportion of the purchase money was made by Mims, the cestui que trust, at the time of the purchase. Ex parte Trenholm, 19 S. C., 127.

*491

But as Mims did not pay in cash the remainder of the purchase money ($415), which was advanced for him by Chandler when he took the title, we will assume that Chandler really occupied the relation of vendor to Mims, and we think that, even upon that assumption, the result must be the same. The statute of frauds, embodied in section 2019 of the general statutes, does provide "that no action shall be brought upon any contract or sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any right in or concerning them * * * unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing, signed by the parties to be charged therewith," &c. The agreement sought to be enforced by the plaintiff—that Chandler held the legal title of the land only as a security for the purchase money advanced by him—was not in writing. At the time Chandler took the title, he gave to Mims a receipt in writing for $285, "to be placed on land papers," and we have no doubt that receipt had reference to the land in question, and was an acknowledgment of part payment of the purchase money. We do not, however, think that the receipt expressed the agreement alleged to exist, or was such "a memorandum thereof" as the statute requires. It did not contain the particulars of the agreement in such definite and unambiguous terms, as has been held to be necessary under the statute. Church of Advent v. Farrow, 7 Rich. Eq., 378.

But while the receipt was not such a memorandum of the *agreement as to take it out of the statute, it is well settled that "the Court of Equity will enforce specific performance of a contract within the statute when the parol agreement has been partly carried into execution. The distinct ground upon which Courts of Equity interpose in cases of this sort is that otherwise one party would be enabled to practice a fraud upon the other." 2 Story Eq., § 759; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur., 423. Was there such part performance in this case as to take it out of the statute? We think there was. The Circuit judge found that the payment by Mims of the $285 at the time the arrangement was made, for which a receipt was given, stating that it was "to be placed on land papers," was in part payment of the purchase money, and in this finding we concur. That payment could not (as claimed by Chandler) have been a payment for the rent due Frierson, for the price of the land ($1,200) had absorbed and extinguished the rent to Frierson as such. Nor could it have been for rent due to Chandler himself, for there is not an intimation in the case that at that time Mims owed Chandler any rent.

*492

This and the other payments to Chandler, indicated by the receipts "on account," were payments on the land purchase as directed by Mims; but, according to the authorities, these payments on the purchase were not alone sufficient to take the case out of the statute. It seems that the payment of the whole purchase money would not of itself suffice for that purpose, but it is a circumstance which, in connection with others, may be considered. Smith v. Smith, 1 Rich. Eq., 130. According to the authorities, it seems that putting the purchaser into possession is to be considered as stronger evidence of part performance than mere payment of the purchase money, for the reason that such act would be a fraud upon the purchaser unless the agreement should be fully performed. "Especially will it be held to do so when the party let into the possession has expended money in building, or repairs, or other improvements; for under such circumstances, if the parol contract were to be deemed a nullity, he would be liable to be treated as a trespasser; and the expenditure would not only operate to his prejudice, but be the direct result of a fraud practised upon him." 2 Story Eq., § 763.

To have such effect, of course the possession must not be ob*tained wrongfully or independent of the agreement, but by virtue of it and held under it. In this case it was contended that the possession of Mims, being obtained originally as the tenant of Frierson, and Mims never having gone out as tenant and reëntered as purchaser, must still be considered as possession under Frierson; that his possession from December, 1880, when the purchase was made, until December, 1881, when the action was brought, continued to be his old possession of tenant, and not a new possession as purchaser. We cannot adopt this view, which is contradicted by every fact in the case, as well as by the declarations of Chandler himself. "If the possession may be referred to an independent title, e. g., where it is held under a pre-existing tenancy, the same principle does not apply, unless the parties so conduct themselves as to show that they are acting under the contract," &c. Adams Eq., 212.

*493

The Circuit judge found as matter of fact, and we concur with him, that on December 21, 1880, Mims ceased to be the tenant of Frierson, and was let into a new possession as purchaser. Up to that time, as tenant of Frierson, he was in possession of the whole land; afterwards he was only in possession of the parcel (sixty-five acres) purchased by him. On the day indicated, Frierson conveyed all his interest in the land, and of course Mims's tenancy to him then ceased, and there is no evidence that on that occasion, or any other, he took a new lease from Chandler or any one else. On the contrary, he then commenced a new possession of the parcel purchased by him, in accordance with the direction of Chandler himself, who said, "I can't draw your papers, it is late now, but I will have them fixed up by Dr. Mayes and send them to you. Go home, go to work, and make yourself easy."

He was in this possession as purchaser for a year at least, and during that time made improvements on the land without dissent or warning. It is true the improvements were not extensive. It may be considered a small matter to clear, drain, and ditch ten acres of land, but it is not probable that as mere tenant he would have done so much, and the improvements do not seem to be out of proportion to the means of the parties. This possession by the direction of Chandler, with the improvements made, consid*ered in connection with the other circumstances, and particularly the payments on the purchase money, were sufficient to take the case out of the statute, and the parol proof established the contract alleged by the plaintiff. We agree with the Circuit judge that the plaintiff is entitled to have the land conveyed to him upon the payment of the balance due on the advances made by Chandler with interest.

*494

But we do not concur in so much of the decree as authorized the master to make the title to Mrs. Mims. At the time of the agreement nothing was said about conveying the land to Mrs. Mims. What was afterwards said by Chandler was ex parte and without consideration. Timothy Mims made the contract, also the payments in part, and he will be required to pay the balance due. The title should be made to Timothy Mims himself.

In reference to the deed of the land from D. W. Chandler to his brother, Duncan, the latter testified that "he does not know what the land is worth; at least $500;' he bought it for that price; paid no money; had money in his brother's hands, which he had lent him from time to time; that his brother agreed to take $500 for the land, what he owed him." He said Mims did have the receipts at the gate, and he did tell him his brother would not cheat him, &c. The deed bore date December 13, 1881, one day before the action was brought. At that time, T. Duncan Chandler knew all the facts as to the manner in which his brother held title to the land. He paid nothing for it, and we agree with the Circuit Judge that the deed should be set aside as fraudulent and void.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified so that the title to the land described shall be made to Timothy Mims, and in all other respects affirmed.

21 S. C. *495

*CROUCH v. CHARLESTON & SAVANNAH RAILWAY COMPANY.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Navigable Waters ⟸20; Negligence ⟸113.]

Contributory negligence is a matter of defence, and the burden of proving it is on defendant. It is not necessary, therefore, that the plaintiff should allege in his complaint that he exercised due care.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Joyner v. South Carolina Ry. Co., 26 S. C. 58, 1 S. E. 52; Donahue v. Railroad Co., 32 S. C. 302, 303, 11 S. E. 95, 17 Am. St. Rep. 854; Whaley v. Bartlett, 42 S. C. 473, 20 S. E. 745.

For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. § 96; Dec. Dig. ⟸20; Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 186; Dec. Dig. ⟸113.]

[2. Navigable Waters ⟸20.]

Knowledge that there are defects in a draw to a bridge does not relieve the owners of the bridge from all responsibility. And so, where a steamer had several times passed through such a draw without injury, but on one occasion was injured while passing through with proper care, in action for damages for such injury, the judge properly refused a non-suit.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Agnew v. Adams, 24 S. C. 89; Kaminitsky v. Northeastern R. Co., 25 S. C. 59; Quinn v. South Carolina Ry. Co., 29 S. C. 385, 7 S. E. 614, 1 L. R. A. 682.

For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. § 96; Dec. Dig. ⟸20.]

[3. Navigable Waters ⟸20.]

The failure of the steamer to "drop anchor and drag through," as is required of boats, &c., passing under a bridge (Gen. Stat., § 1115) does not affect this case.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Laney v. Chesterfield County, 29 S. C. 146, 7 S. E. 56; South Carolina Steamboat Co. v. Wilmington, C. & A. R. Co., 46 S. C. 334, 24 S. E. 337, 33 L. R. A. 541, 57 Am. St. Rep. 688.

For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. § 96; Dec. Dig. ⟸20.]

[This case is also cited in Elliott v. Pollitzer, 24 S. C. 85, without specific application, and in Steamboat Co. v. Railroad Co., 30 S. C. 547, 9 S. E. 650, 4 L. R. A. 209, 14 Am. St. Rep. 923, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Charleston, November, 1883.

Action by H. W. Crouch and others against the Charleston and Savannah Railway Company. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Brawley & Barnwell, for appellants, cited 11 East, 60; 88 Mass., 39; 1 Abb. Forms, 444, 446; Wood Nuis., § 703; Ang. Water Cour., § 567; 2 Bland, 2; 2 Cart., 586; 66 Mass., 488; 36 Vt., 580; Thomp. Neg., 1203–7; 119 Mass., 564; Wood Nuis., §§ 73, 846, 864; 71 N. C., 311; 9 N. Y., 456; Gen. Stat., § 1115.

Messrs. Lord & Inglesby, contra.

October 6, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The plaintiffs are the owners of the steamer "Silver Star." The defendant is a chartered corporation, with the power to conduct their railroad across any river, creek, waters, or water courses that may be in their route from Charleston to Savannah, provided that the navigation of the stream be not obstructed thereby. Under the charter a bridge was constructed across the Ashley River, a navigable stream.

The complaint alleged that the defendant, since June 7, 1880, has unlawfully kept and continued the said bridge across the Ashley, with an improperly constructed draw therein, and has *thereby obstructed and continued to obstruct the navigation of said river. That on September 27, 1882, while the steamer of the plaintiffs was proceeding upon the said river, she struck upon and against the said bridge, and thereby received injury to the amount of two thousand dollars. The answer of defendant denied each and every allegation of the complaint not specifically admitted, but admitted it to be true that on the day named, September 27, 1882, the plaintiffs' steamer, known as the "Silver Star," did receive certain injuries in passing the said bridge, but insisted that the same was caused by the negligence and want of care of the persons in charge of the steamer, in not taking the proper precaution while passing the bridge.

*496

At the trial the defendant corporation demurred orally that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, which demurrer was overruled and the trial proceeded with. The testimony submitted by the plaintiffs tended to show, that the draw was not properly constructed, or of sufficient width to enable vessels to pass through in safety; that the injury occurred in the afternoon of a fair day, and that, in attempting to make the passage, every possible precaution was taken by the officers of the boat to avoid accident. There was no testimony offered to rebut this proof, but the defendant seemed to rely upon the general proposition that the improper construction of the draw was apparent, and being known to the officers of the boat, the effort to pass through should not have been made, and to do so amounted to want of proper care or negligence upon their part. It appears that the steamer "Silver Star" had, in pursuing her business, frequently passed through this draw-bridge without injury, and that complaints had been made to the defendant of the improper construction and narrowness of the draw.

The defendant moved for a non-suit which was refused, and the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs for $1,158.

The defendant appeals to this court, I. From the ruling of the judge, in refusing to sustain the demurrer and dismiss the complaint, upon the grounds, 1. "Because the complaint does not state that the plaintiffs were in the exercise of ordinary care in passing defendant's bridge. 2. Because it does not state facts, from which it might be inferred that the plaintiffs were in the ex*ercise of ordinary care in so passing the bridge." II. The defendant also appeals from the order of the judge refusing a motion for nonsuit on these grounds, 1. "That plaintiffs' testimony shewed that in passing said bridge they were doing what prudent men would not attempt under similar circumstances, and were therefore not in the exercise of ordinary care. 2. Because plaintiffs' testimony showed that they did not drop anchor and drag through defendant's bridge as required by law," &c.

*497

First, as to the demurrer. It is true that in actions like this for damages on account of alleged negligence, great consideration is given to the question of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. In a majority of the cases probably, the conduct of the plaintiff is interposed in answer to the charge of negligence on the part of the defendant; but the better view seems to be, that the conduct of the plaintiff is not a necessary element in his cause of action and to be alleged by him; but a defence to be alleged and proved by the defendant. In pleadings under the code, great clearness and simplicity are required, surplusage being regarded as a vice. The complaint must only state "the facts which are the occasion for the primary right and duty to arise, and those which form the breach of such right and duty, to the entire exclusion of the other elements that enter into the cause of action, the legal rules, and the legal rights of the parties," &c. Pom. Rem., § 524.

This court has held in the recent case of Carter v. C. & G. R. R. Company, 19 S. C., 28 [45 Am. Rep. 754], that contributory negligence is a matter of defence and the burden of proving it is with the defendant. We think it follows from the onus of proof being on the defendant, that it is not necessary for the plaintiff to make the allegation of due care in his complaint, and thus anticipate the defence. "Where contributory negligence is mere matter of defence, a complaint or declaration will not be held bad solely because it omits an allegation that the plaintiff or person injured was without fault. * * * It is not necessary for the plaintiff to aver due care on his part, in order to introduce proof of it." 2 Thomp. Neg., 1178, in the notes. We think there was no error on the part of the Circuit judge in refusing to sustain the demurrer.

Second, as to the non-suit. Assuming that it was incumbent *upon the defendant to make out a case of want of proper care on the part of the plaintiffs, we think that the testimony on the subject tended to show that all possible care was taken in passing the draw; at least that it was quite sufficient to require the judge to submit the question to the jury. Indeed, proper care of the officers in passing the draw does not seem to have been questioned, but the general ground was taken that the defects of the bridge were so obvious, and so well known to the officers of the steamer, that the effort, under the circumstances, to pass at all, was itself clear proof of want of proper care upon their part—so clear that the judge upon that ground should have ordered a nonsuit. We cannot accept the view that the knowledge of the defects on the part of the officers, should relieve the defendant from all responsibility. Such knowledge was entitled to proper consideration, but to make it conclusive against the injured party, would be to give primary importance to a secondary consideration, and to absolve the wrong-doer for the very reason that his wrong was so great and apparent that it was known by all. The greater the obstruction, the more certain immunity from its consequences! that is to say, to give the obstructor advantage of his own wrong.
*498

It is true that no one is justified in wantonly throwing himself against an obvious and impassable obstruction, and such conduct clearly proved would prevent a recovery for an injury thereby produced; but we do not see that such failure could cure the original wrong of the obstructor. Besides, in this case, experience had shown that it was possible to pass through the defective draw without injury, as the "Silver Star" had done many times before. The plaintiffs were engaged in business, which made it necessary to navigate the Ashley River. They had a right to do so unobstructed, and the defendant corporation had no right to place such obstructions across the river as required them, for fear of injuries, to give up the navigation and their business. The doctrine contended for would certainly put the navigation of the river at the mercy of the defendant corporation.

We think the proper doctrine on the subject was announced in a late Maryland case, County Commissioners of Prince George v. Burgess (Md.) 17 Reporter, 245, February.
*499
1884, in which *Judge Irving, in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "It is well settled in this state that the burden of showing contributory negligence on the part of a plaintiff, is on the defendant. Bacon's Case, 58 Md., 484. This rule has been laid down in suits against railroads for injuries occasioned by them; and we see no reason for establishing a different rule as applied to accidents occasioned by defective county roads and bridges. The presumption that a man will act prudently and with care for his own safety, and will not recklessly rush into destruction, must exist as well in one case as in the other. In this case it is argued that because the evidence showed that the plaintiff knew of the condition of the bridge, therefore the burden shifted, and it was incumbent on him to show affirmatively that he used due care and prudence in driving. It is wise for a plaintiff shown to know of a defect, to prove that he drove with caution (that was shown in this case); but we cannot accede to the view that the onus of showing want of care rests any where but on the defendant. If the bridge was wholly impassable and the plaintiff knew it, his knowledge would be conclusive, and the case might have been taken from the jury. In this case it does not appear from the proof that the bridge was wholly impassable. It was unsafe and had a hole in it, into which appellant's horse fell and was injured. The simple fact of its existence, with the knowledge of the plaintiff, was not sufficient to bar recovery. The hole might possibly have been avoided with ordinary care in driving, and the knowledge of its existence, ought to have prevented carelessness on the part of the plaintiff, and naturally would have induced care on his part; but the onus of showing that such care and prudence were not exercised still rested on the defendants. The case of Reed v. Northfield, 13 Pick., 94, is very similar to this case. There was a dangerous hole by the side and edge of the bridge, of which the plaintiff had knowledge. He crossed the bridge and in doing so his horse got into the hole and was seriously injured. The jury was instructed that the knowledge of the hole being there was not conclusive evidence of negligence. On appeal Chief Justice Shaw, pronouncing the decision of the court, said that the ruling was perfectly correct. See Horton v. Ipswich, 12 Cush., 492,

*500

&c. The doctrine to be *extracted from all these cases is, that if the defect in a road or bridge be such as to make the same practically impassable, a person takes all the hazard who, with such knowledge, attempts to pass over the road or bridge, and will not be redressed if he is injured. But if the defect be one which does not render the road wholly unfit for use, or bridge substantially impassable, and is only a defect which might result injuriously if not shunned, in such case it cannot be that a citizen with business must remain at home and may not make any attempt to use the road or bridge as his necessity requires," &c.

Section 1115 of the General Statutes, under the head of "Bridges," provides that "All vessels, boats, and rafts passing under any bridge shall, before they come to the same, drop anchor and drag through under the same; and if any vessel, boat, or raft shall pass, or attempt to pass, under any bridge without dragging as aforesaid, every such vessel, boat, or raft shall forfeit the sum of fifty dollars, to be recovered by immediate seizure and detention of the said vessel, boat, or raft, until the payment of the said sum, by information being given of the same to the Circuit Court in the county where the offence was committed; the money, when so recovered, to be applied for rebuilding or keeping in repair such bridge," &c. This is not a proceeding to recover the penalty imposed by this section, which we do not think has any application to the case. This is a private bridge with a draw to it defectively constructed. The difficulty was not in getting under the bridge, but through it. There was no evidence that in passing the draw, it was customary, or would have been attended with less danger to the vessel, to "drop anchor and drag through."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

21 S. C. *501

*FROST v. FROST.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Wills ⇐561.]

A testator devised to "my two children, U. and S., the tract of land whereon I now live. I give S. 140 acres to be laid off at the upper end of the tract. I give my daughter H. 130 acres on Bee Tree Branch. I give to my son U. all my other lands." Held, that S. took the 140 acres in severalty, and that U. and S. took between them the residue of the home tract, and that the "other lands" devised to U. meant lands not specifically mentioned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1221–1224; Dec. Dig. ⇐561.]

[2. Evidence ⇐372.]

A deed more than thirty years old was properly admitted in evidence, its genuineness having been established by the corroborative facts that it was found in the grantee's possession, and had endorsed upon it a certificate of registration in the proper office (the records of which office had since been destroyed by fire), and that the grantee had been in the occupancy of the land for over fifty years.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1616; Dec. Dig. ⇐372.]

[3. Tenancy in Common ⇐35.]

A deed by two tenants in common of a specified number of acres construed to convey their interest in a larger tract of land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. § 27; Dec. Dig. ⇐35.]

[4. Evidence ⇐186.]

A case, as reported in "McCord's Reports," was properly admitted in evidence to prove the judgment of the court, the records of both Circuit and Appeal Courts being proved to have been destroyed by fire in 1865. The case thus reported was not only the next best evidence, but was specially made evidence by the act of 1865 (13 Stat., 354).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 671; Dec. Dig. ⇐186.]

[5. Judgment ⇐665.]

A decision of the court of last resort is binding upon the parties to that suit, although afterwards, in another cause, a different principle is declared.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Jones v. Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co., 65 S. C. 418, 43 S. E. 884.

For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1178; Dec. Dig. ⟸665.]

[6. Curtesy ⟸8.]

In this state a husband has no estate by curtesy in lands of his deceased wife held by her in fee simple.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Curtesy, Cent. Dig. § 18; Dec. Dig. ⟸8.]

[7. Tenancy in Common ⟸15.]

In 1826, a husband purchased an interest in lands, and thereby became a tenant in common with his wife, who died in 1839, leaving him and their children surviving; and by the death of two of his children he subsequently acquired an interest in their shares. He never claimed to hold the lands adversely to his children, but asserted that it belonged to the estate of his wife. Held, that he had committed no ouster, and that to action brought in 1882, by some of the surviving children against a purchaser at sheriff's sale of their father's interest in this land in 1877, the statute of limitations could not be successfully pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Odom v. Weathersbee, 26 S. C. 248, 1 S. E. 890.

For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. §§ 42–52; Dec. Dig. ⟸15.]

[8. Execution ⟸260.]

The purchaser at the sheriff's sale gave public notice that the land did not belong to this father, but to his children. Held, that while the sale stood unimpeached, such purchaser was entitled to all the interest that the father had in such land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 743–746; Dec. Dig. ⟸260.]

Before Hudson, J., Richland, April, 1883.

*502

*The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs, Abney & Abney and J. P. Thomas, Jr., for plaintiffs.

Mr. F. W. McMaster, contra.

October 6, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. About the beginning of the century, one Burrill Faust lived on a plantation near the bridge over Crane Creek on the Monticello road, in Richland county. In 1815 he died, leaving surviving him his wife, Christina, and her two unmarried children, Uriah and Sallie. He had been twice married and by his first wife he had two children, Elizabeth and Mary, but they had both married and settled off; Elizabeth had married James Boatwright, and Mary had married John Glover. Burrill Faust left a will by which he devised as follows: "I give my two children, Uriah and Sallie, the tract of land whereon I now live. I give Sallie one hundred and forty acres, to be laid off at the upper end of the tract adjoining Jasper Faust's lands, by a straight line from the river. I give to my daughter Harriet, a tract of land, containing one hundred and thirty acres, situate in the state and district above mentioned, on Bee Tree Branch, the waters of Crane Creek, bounded, &c. I give to my son Uriah all my other lands," &c. No account can be found of a settlement of the estate or division of the lands, but after the death of the testator, his widow, Christina, and her two children, Sallie and Uriah, continued to live together on the homestead. In or about 1820, Sallie married John D. Frost, sr., who was the owner of large landed estates in the neighborhood; but upon his marriage, he went to live with his wife's family, and engaged in the cultivation of that place in common with his own.

In 1825, Uriah Faust died intestate, never having been married. There was no administration upon his estate, and no proceeding was had to divide or partition the lands between his heirs and his sister Sallie, except what may be regarded as proved by the following facts: In the fourth volume of McCord's Reports, page 439, there is a case reported styled James Boatwright and *others v. Christina Faust and others, which, after citing the clause of Burrill Faust's will making provision for Uriah, states that "James Boatwright and Elizabeth, his wife, and John Glover and Mary, his wife, who are both daughters of Burrill Faust, sued for partition of the lands devised to Uriah Faust, between and among the heirs of Burrill Faust, claiming that a life estate was only devised to Uriah Faust. The defendants demurred, and the demurrer was sustained by Mr. Justice Waities," &c. Upon this statement, the demurrer was overruled by the Appeal Court, which held that "there are no words in this will from which an intention to give a fee can be inferred. By the act of 1824 it is declared that every gift of land by devise shall be considered a gift in fee simple. But that act cannot affect the will now in question, as it was passed since the execution of the will, and even since the death of testator;" and thereupon reversed the judgment below, thereby in effect declaring that, Uriah being dead, the lands given to him became the intestate property of the estate of his father, Burrill Faust, and were distributable among his heirs, viz., Christina, the widow, one-third, and Elizabeth Boatwright, Mary Glover, and Sallie Frost, each, a third of the remaining two-thirds.

*503

The records of both the Circuit and Appeal Courts in Columbia were destroyed when the city was burned in the late war, and one of the questions in the case is whether the book of reports (4 McCord) was admissible as evidence of the facts therein stated. In this connection, it appeared that there was an instrument of writing, purporting to be a deed from James Boatwright and wife and John Glover and wife to John D. Frost, sr. bearing date June 21, 1826, conveying to him, for the consideration of $4,240, their shares (stated as 420 acres) of the lands which had been devised for life to Uriah Faust. This paper was found after the death of John D. Frost, sr., in an old trunk which had belonged to him. The execution of the paper was not proved, but it was offered in evidence as "an ancient document." It had upon it evidence that Elizabeth Boatwright and Mary Glover respectively relinquished their inheritance, and that it had been regularly recorded in 1826. Whether this paper was properly admitted in evidence is another question in the case.

*504

*John D. Frost, sr., and his family continued to live with the widow, Christina, at the old homestead, until she died. The precise time is not stated. She died intestate, and there was no administration upon her estate or division of her interest in the lands, as her daughter, Sallie Frost, was her sole heir at law. After the death of Christina, John D. Frost and family remained on the home place for some years, but finally moved off to the "Flat House," or Boatwright place, where Sallie Frost died in 1839 intestate, leaving as her heirs at law her husband, John D. Frost, sr., and seven children, viz., Uriah C. Frost, Mary F. Maxcy, Agnes W. Walker, John D. Frost, jr., Sarah A. Guignard, Campbell Frost, and Cassius Frost. There was no administration upon her estate or division of her lands. Campbell and Cassius both died intestate after their mother, unmarried and without children; and no division of their estates was ever made. The children still lived with their father in possession of the old homestead until they respectively married and settled off. The youngest child was born about 1837 or 1838, and was not of full age until about the beginning of the war in 1860. Uriah C. Frost was never married, and Mrs. Maxcy was not married until 1874.

The war came on, and by its results John D. Frost, sr., lost some two hundred slaves and was made insolvent. Judgments were obtained against him, and, after homestead was laid off to him, the sheriff of Richland county, on February 5, 1877, offered for sale, under executions against him, "all that tract of land, five miles from Columbia, on the Monticello and Broad River roads, &c., containing six thousand and five hundred acres," &c. The tract of land thus described consisted of lands which undoubtedly belonged in his own right to the defendant, but also embraced the lands now in question. At the sale, John D. Frost, jr., one of the sons of the defendant in execution, announced publicly that the lands about to be sold as the property of his father, John D. Frost, sr., did not belong to him, but to his children. The sheriff, however, proceeded with the sale, and the lands were knocked down to the said John D. Frost, jr., at the price of $12,350, who, on February 7, 1877, received sheriff's title for the same. John D. Frost, jr., had *always lived upon the land, and he continued to do so until April, 1881, when his father, John D. Frost, sr., died intestate.

*505

On June 2, 1882, the plaintiffs, three of the children of Sallie Frost, instituted these proceedings, alleging that all the said Faust tract of land belonged to the estate of Mrs. Sallie Frost, the last survivor of the Faust children, and praying that it might be partitioned among her surviving heirs, viz., Uriah C. Frost, Mary F. Maxcy, Agnes M. Walker, Sarah A. Guignard, and John D. Frost, jr. To this the said John D. Frost, jr., being in possession, objected, and claimed that the whole of the land belonged to him in severalty; that his father, John D. Frost, sr., in his life-time, acquired title to the whole of it, part by the purchase from Mrs. Boatwright and Mrs. Glover, part by inheritance from his deceased wife, Sallie, and sons, Cassius and Campbell, and the remainder by lapse of time and the statute of limitations; and that being in his father, the title to the whole passed to him as purchaser at the sheriff's sale aforesaid. It was referred by consent to the master to take the testimony, which is printed in the brief. The case came on to be heard by Judge Hudson, who decreed that the land belongs to the plaintiffs and defendants in certain proportions, and ordered partition of the same among the parties according to their respective rights so ascertained. From this decree, both parties appeal upon the following grounds:

Exceptions of the Plaintiffs.

I. Because his honor admitted in evidence the paper purporting to be a deed from Boatwright and Glover and their wives to John D. Frost, sr., holding that it was over thirty years old, and was found in possession of the grantee, when there was no proof of its age outside of the dates on the paper, no proof that the paper had ever been in the possession of the grantee, or that he had ever held under it. II. Because his honor admitted in evidence the 4th volume of McCord's Reports to prove the facts that there was a case between Boatwright and others and matters involved in the case, holding that the loss of records in the court below and the Appeal Court was proved, when the existence of such records never appeared.

*506

III. Because his honor held that John *D. Frost, sr, became entitled under said deed to two-thirds of two-thirds of Uriah's half of the home tract of land. IV. Because his honor admitted in evidence any portion of the testimony reported by the master in his September report (March 31, 1883), his honor holding that the self-serving declarations of J. D. Frost, sr., were not admissible in evidence, but so much of the testimony in this report as was competent, was admissible. V. Because his honor held that the act of 1791 abolished tenancy by the curtesy in fee simple estates in South Carolina, and that the plaintiffs and defendants, as heirs at law of their mother, were not entitled to all the lands mentioned in the complaint. VI. Because his honor held that the deed from the sheriff to John D. Frost, jr., was proved, without the introduction of the advertisement in a newspaper. VII. Because his honor did not hold that John D. Frost, jr., was estopped from denying the title of the children of his mother in and to all of these lands by his conduct at the sale, when he notified the public of their title, &c.

Exceptions of John D. Frost, Jr.

I. Because his honor having admitted as an ancient deed the deed of Boatwright and Glover and their wives, should have held that John D. Frost, sr., was entitled to the full amount of 420 acres conveyed in said deed. II. That his honor erred in decreeing that John D. Frost, sr., was entitled to two-thirds of two-thirds of Uriah's half of the land, instead of holding that J. D. Frost was entitled to two-thirds of two-thirds of the balance of the land. III. That his honor erred in construing the following words of the will of Burrill Faust, "I give my two children, Uriah and Sallie, the tract of land whereon I now live. I give Sallie one hundred and forty acres, to be laid off at the upper end of the tract adjoining Jasper Faust's land by a straight line from the river. * * * I give my son Uriah all my other lands." His honor's construction was that he gave Sallie 140 acres, and one-half of the other land, whereas the construction should have been, that Sallie received as her share the 140 acres, the upper portion of the tract, and the "other lands" should have been construed the balance of the tract, this balance being 955 acres, according to the DeBruhl survey, and 985 acres according *to the Miller survey. IV. That his honor erred in holding that the plaintiffs are entitled to rent for the years 1881 and 1882, the plaintiffs having waived all claim to rent prior to the death of John D. Frost, sr., which occurred April 4, 1881; whereas defendant maintains, if any rent should be allowed, it should be computed from the time of bringing this action. V. Because his honor failed to sustain the defendant's plea of the statute of limitations, notwithstanding the proof that John D. Frost, sr., had purchased nearly two-thirds of the land fifty-seven years ago, and had exercised absolute control over the whole of the said tract for about fifty years, and had granted the right of way through the land to the Greenville and Columbia railroad company thirty-five years ago, and for twenty-five years after the youngest child came of age, held the land adverse to plaintiffs. VI. Because the wealth of John D. Frost, sr., his acts of ownership over the land, his advances to his children during a period of over twenty years are such evidences of ouster against the plaintiffs as co-tenants, that his honor should have held that the plaintiffs were estopped from bringing any action. VII. Because his honor erred in not holding that the deed from Mrs. Boatwright and her husband and Mrs. Glover and her husband, and the entering of John D. Frost thereunder and his continued possession thereof, would create a color of title and make in John D. Frost, sr., an adverse possession as to 420 acres of said tract in dispute, &c.

*507

The first question in order is that as to the construction of Burrill Faust's will. As Mr. Preston is reported to have said in the argument of the case in McCord, "the will is obviously the production of a very ignorant man." In disposing of his lands he used no paragraphs, but the devises follow each other with no other separation than a dash. There is a separate provision for Harriet (his illegitimate daughter), between that for his two children, Uriah and Sallie, and the phrase lower down, "I give to my son Uriah all my other lands." We do not think that this subsequent provision for Uriah was intended to have reference back to the home place, which had already been given to "Uriah and Sallie," but was to be rather in the nature of a residuary clause, covering and disposing of other lands which might not have been specifically given by the will.

*508

Uriah and Sallie *were both unmarried and living with their mother in the homestead, which was on the tract, but outside of the parcel given to Sallie, and the father probably intended to give both of them an interest in the home place, subject to the gift of 140 acres to Sallie in severalty, "to be laid off at the upper end of the tract adjoining Jasper Faust's lands," &c.

As to the admission in evidence of the Boatwright and Glover deed, the rule as to "ancient deeds" is laid down by Mr. Greenleaf in the following terms: "To the rule requiring the production of the witnesses there are some exceptions, and the first is when the instrument is thirty years old, in which case it is said to prove itself, the subscribing witness being presumed to be dead, and other proof being presumed to be beyond the reach of the party. But such documents must be free from just grounds of suspicion, and must come from the proper custody, or have been acted upon so as to afford some corroborative proof of their genuineness." 1 Green. Evid., §§ 570, 144, and note 1.

If the paper is thirty years old, that alone will be sufficient, provided its genuineness is beyond all doubt. Usually certain other facts are required to be shown, as that it came from the proper custody, or has been accompanied by possession, &c., but proof of these facts are required simply in corroboration; that is, that some evidence shall be offered auxiliary to the apparent antiquity of the instrument, to raise a sufficient presumption in its favor. As soon as its genuineness is satisfactorily established by any circumstances, the deed is admitted. "Any incontestable fact going to show that a deed was in existence more than thirty years before it is offered in evidence, will authorize its introduction as an ancient muniment of right. Possession is that which seems to be most generally resorted to for this purpose, because it is the most usual mode of asserting a right under legal title. This, however, is not indispensably necessary. [Duncan v. Beard] 2 Nott & McCord, 404." Swygart v. Taylor, 1 Rich., 54; Edmondston v. Hughes, Cheves, 81; Thompson v. Brannon, 14 S. C., 550, and authorities.

In this case the deed was found after the death of the grantee, John D. Frost, sr., in an old trunk which had belonged to him. It had probably been in his custody for over fifty years, accompanied *by possession of the premises referred to. It bore date in 1826, and had the marks of having been recorded at the time. Upon this proof of its genuineness, the Circuit judge admitted it in evidence, and we cannot say that he committed error therein.

*509

But in so ruling we do not think that the deed conveyed to John D. Frost, sr., any particular parcel of land containing 420 acres. We hear nothing of an actual partition, which most probably was never made, as Mrs. Sallie Frost and Mrs. Christina, the widow, were the only other persons then thought to have an interest, and they were in possession along with John D. Frost, sr., who simply purchased the interest of Boatwright and wife and Glover and wife. If the parties acted under a mistaken view as to the extent of their shares, that could not enable them to convey larger interests than they possessed. The shares of the vendors together amounted to two-thirds of two-thirds of Uriah's half of the homestead (outside of the 140 acres of Sallie), which the deed conveyed, and no more.

This deed is in accord with a decision of the highest state court of that day, in the case of James Boatwright and others v. Christina Faust and others, found in 4 McCord, 439, which held that Burrill Faust's will gave Uriah only a life estate in these lands, which, after his death, were distributable among the heirs of the said Burrill, as his intestate property. The original record of that case was not in evidence, but its loss was satisfactorily accounted for by the burning of Columbia during the late war, and the case, as printed in a volume of the reports purporting to be published by "D. J. McCord, state reporter," was the next best evidence upon the subject. 1 Green., § 84, and note; Cook v. Wood, 1 McCord, 139. Besides, we do not see why the volume of reports was not admissible under the first section of the act of 1865, "To provide a mode by which to perpetuate testimony in relation to records destroyed or lost during the late war," which, among other things, declared that as secondary evidence, "statements in the record of any suit in any of the courts, produced from the proper place of custody, or in the printed volumes of state reports published by the authority of the general assembly, shall be admissible for the consideration of the court or jury, having jurisdiction of the issues of fact," &c. 13

*510

*Stat., 345. We are judicially satisfied that there was such a case as reported, and that the judgment was as therein stated.

It is true that judgment gave a different interpretation to the act of 1824 as to the necessity for words of perpetuity in a devise of real estate from that which was soon after (1828) established in the case of Hall and others v. Goodwyn and others, reported in the same volume (4 McCord, 442), which declared that the act of 1824 was a declaratory law and retrospective in its operation. Although the doctrine held in Boatwright v. Faust was not afterwards approved and followed, yet the case itself, so far as we are informed, was never overruled, and therefore was binding upon the parties to that suit, and as to them must be regarded as a matter adjudged.

John D. Frost, jr., claiming to be the owner of his father's interest in these lands under the sheriff's deed of 1877, insisted that at that time his father, John D. Frost, had acquired title to the whole of it, part by the purchase from Boatwright and Glover, part by inheritance from his deceased wife and children, Campbell and Cassius, and the remainder by adverse possession, lapse of time, and the statute of limitations. To this, it was replied by the other children that as to his wife's lands he was only in possession as husband during her life, and after her death he held it during his own life as tenant by the curtesy, and that the interest of the heirs did not vest in possession until his death in 1881, and of course there could be no adverse possession until that time.

This court has lately held that in this state the husband has no estate by the cur-tesy in lands of his deceased wife held in fee simple.[1] But we agree with the Circuit judge that nothing was added to the interest of John D. Frost, sr., by operation of the statute of limitations. He had no interest, except as husband, until he purchased the shares of Boatwright and Glover, and thus became tenant in common with his wife, Sallie, in regard to the interest of Uriah under the interpretation of the law then adopted. At the death of Christina he acquired no additional interest, as his wife, Sallie, was the sole heir of her mother. He continued to be tenant in common with his wife until she died in 1837. After her *death and that of his children, Campbell and Cassius, he had an increase of his interest as heir, but he was still tenant in common with his children who lived with him. It is familiar law that a tenant in common holds possession for his co-tenants as well as for himself, and cannot plead the statute of limitations unless there has been an ouster and adverse possession. Villard v. Robert, 1 Strob. Eq., 393; Allen v. Hall, 1 McCord, 131. Ouster was not shown by the testimony, and it is not to be assumed that John D. Frost ousted any of his children from the little pittance of an estate inherited from their mother. On the contrary, as was natural, they lived with him, and his possession was their possession. He always denied that he held adversely to his children, and refused to allow any part of this land to be included in his homestead, saying "it belonged to the estate of his wife." We concur with the Circuit judge that there was no ouster, and that John D. Frost, sr., acquired no rights as against his children by the statute of limitations.

*511

In behalf of the other children, it is urged that John D. Frost, jr., is not entitled, as purchaser at the sheriff's sale, to the whole interest of his father, John D. Frost, sr.; that he is estopped from so claiming for the reason that at the sale he gave public notice that the lands did not belong to his father, but to his children. That announcement probably had the effect of chilling the biddings and of enabling him to purchase the lands for less than their true value, and that should certainly induce him to do no less than exact and scrupulous justice to his brothers and sisters, who were in no way benefited by that advantageous purchase. But while that sale stands unimpeached, we are constrained to hold that all the legal title which at that time had vested in John D. Frost, sr., passed by the deed of the sheriff to John D. Frost, jr. We concur with the Circuit judge that as to the shares of the other children he should account for rents and profits at least from January 1, 1881.

[1] Gaffney v. Peeler, ante 56.—REPORTER.

*512

*Shares of the Different Parties.

First. Mrs. Sallie Frost (her share in severalty),	140	acres.
Her $\frac{1}{2}$ of homestead proper, $985\frac{1}{5}$ acres,	$492\frac{3}{5}$	"
Her mother's $\frac{1}{3}$ of $\frac{1}{2}$ of $985\frac{1}{2}$ (Sallie sole heir),	$164\frac{1}{3}$	"
Her interest as heir in Uriah's part, $\frac{1}{3}$ of $\frac{2}{3}$ of $\frac{1}{2}$ of $985\frac{1}{5}$,	$109\frac{7}{15}$	"
Sallie's share distributable at her death,	$906\frac{4}{15}$	"
$\frac{1}{3}$ to husband, John D. Frost, sr.,	$302\frac{4}{45}$	"
For her children,	$604\frac{8}{45}$	"
Seven children (share of each),	$86\frac{98}{315}$	"
Upon the death of Campbell and Cassius, their shares,	$21\frac{814}{15}$
Were divisible among brothers and sisters and father (6), Share of father and each living child, $21\frac{814}{21}$—	$28\frac{98}{315}$	"
Share of each living child,	$115\frac{23}{225}$	"
Second. 1. John D. Frost, sr., purchase from B. & G. $\frac{2}{3}$ of $\frac{2}{3}$ of $\frac{1}{2}$ of $985\frac{1}{5}$,	$218\frac{14}{15}$	"
2. Share of his wife's estate,	$302\frac{4}{45}$	"
3. Share of estate C., &c.,	$28\frac{14}{21}$	"
Passed to John D. Frost, jr., under sheriff's deed,	$549\frac{31}{45}$	"
Added his own proper share,	$115\frac{23}{225}$	"
Whole share of John D. Frost, jr.,	$664\frac{178}{225}$	"

Chargeable with rents and profits, &c.

Share of Uriah C. Frost,	$115\frac{23}{225}$	acres.
Share of Mary F. Maxey,	$115\frac{23}{225}$	"
Share of Agnes M. Walker,	$115\frac{23}{225}$	"
Share of Sarah A. Guignard,	$115\frac{23}{225}$	"

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, and all the appeals dismissed.

21 S. C. *513

*BOYKIN v. BOYKIN.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Wills ⇨630.]

The words of a will were: "I direct that all the rest of my real estate shall be kept undivided until the death of my wife, to be worked by the slaves of my estate and those which I shall in this bequeath to my wife, under the control and management of my executors; and from and immediately after her death I devise the said real estate to my sons, equally to be divided among them, share and share alike, to them and their heirs forever. And should any of my sons die before the time herein appointed for the division of my real estate and should leave issue living at that time, then I direct that such issue shall take among them, share and share alike, the same portion of real estate to which their parent would have been entitled if he had survived my said wife, to them and their heirs forever. And if any of my sons shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years before the death of my said wife, I direct that such son or sons shall be permitted to cultivate, each for himself, such a part of real estate as shall be allotted for that purpose by my wife and executors until the final division, when he or they shall receive his or their own share." Held, that the devise created vested interests in the sons living at the death of testator, and only the division and possession were postponed to the death of the widow; therefore the interest of two sons who died intestate and without issue after testator, but before the widow, vested in their mother and other heirs at law.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Dickson v. Dickson, 23 S. C. 224; Tindal v. Neal, 59 S. C. 11, 36 S. E. 1004; Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co. v. Reynolds, 69 S. C. 503, 48 S. E. 476; Hays v. Western Union Tel. Co., 70 S. C. 40, 48 S. E. 608, 67 L. R. A. 481, 106 Am. St. Rep. 731; Brantley v. Bittle, 72 S. C. 184, 51 S. E. 561; Walker v. Alverson, 87 S. C. 55, 63, 68 S. E. 966, 969, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 115; West v. Smith, 89 S. C. 544, 72 S. E. 395.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1477; Dec. Dig. ⟸630.]

[2. Wills ⟸623.]

Held, further, that in the case of the death of such sons without issue no cross-remainders were provided for, nor was it necessary that the court should imply them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1445; Dec. Dig. ⟸623.]

[3. Wills ⟸728.]

The will also bequeathed certain slaves to the widow and directed that "they may be worked on my general estate under the control of my executors, who shall, as long as she lives, pay to her annually out of the proceeds of my general estate the sum of $600 in full compensation for the use, labor, and profits annually of said slaves." Held, that this provision for the widow ended with the emancipation of the slaves.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1776; Dec. Dig. ⟸728.]

[4. Wills ⟸730.]

The executors were authorized and directed to keep the widow supplied as long as she lived with suitable carriage and a pair of carriage horses, to be purchased at the expense of the estate whenever the executors "may deem it necessary." And they were also required to pay out of the undivided estate for all repairs and renewals of furniture for the dwelling house of testator (which was given to the widow for life) whenever directed by the executors, to be continued during the widow's lifetime. All the provisions of the will for the widow were in lieu of dower. After testator's death, *and after the war, the widow found a change of residence necessary, and exchanged, with her surviving son, the testator's homestead for a house in town. Held, that the widow was entitled to the carriage and horses, and to have the furniture in her town house repaired.

*514

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1787; Dec. Dig. ⟸730.]

[5. Wills ⟸755.]

There was a legacy to the widow of "$2,000 in six per cent. stocks of the State of South Carolina." The testator owned some stocks of this state at his death. Held, that the legacy was demonstrative and not specific, and that the widow was entitled to demand the same, with interest at six per cent. (which is the rate of interest on such securities).

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Chapman v. City Council of Charleston, 30 S. C. 560, 9 S. E. 591, 3 L. R. A. 311; Rogers v. Rogers, 67 S. C. 172, 45 S. E. 176, 100 Am. St. Rep. 721.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1948; Dec. Dig. ⟸755.]

[6. Wills ⟸719.]

The delay of the widow in asserting her claims, her acquiescence in the payment of other legacies, and her knowledge of the sale of testator's state stocks, did not estop her under the circumstances of this case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1722–1725; Dec. Dig. ⟸719.]

[7. Wills ⟸765.]

The several provisions in favor of the widow being in lieu of dower, will not abate for the payment of debts, but they are not a charge upon the lands devised; and the use of the state stocks by the executors to pay to her daughters their legacies which were charged upon such lands, does not entitle her to be subrogated to their rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1979; Dec. Dig. ⟸765.]

[This case is also cited in Kennedy v. Boykin, 35 S. C. 81, 14 S. E. 809, 28 Am. St. Rep. 838, as to facts.]

Before Hudson, J., Kershaw, February, 1883.

This was an action by Sallie W. Boykin against Thomas L. Boykin, as executor of the will of Burwell Boykin, deceased, and against all the devisees and legatees under said will, and against certain creditors of the said Thomas L. Boykin. The opinion states the case.

The Circuit decree, omitting its statement, was as follows:

I will here observe that there has been no accounting taken of the actings and doings of the executor, T. L. Boykin, so that we are not informed of the condition of the estate in his hands, except that it is stated in argument of counsel that he is totally insolvent; and we may presume that whatever of the personal estate was not destroyed by the results of the war, and has not been paid to legatees, is not available. But that is yet to be judicially ascertained upon an accounting.

All litigants have expressed a desire to obtain a construction of the will, and an adjudication of the main legal questions preparatory to an accounting and settlement. This we think proper, and to this duty we will at once address ourselves, and *in doing so will take the sections of the will in dispute in their regular order.

*515

The first and second clauses of the will present no question difficult of interpretation, as the language is plain and unambiguous in regard to the rights and privileges of the wife and daughters of the testator. It is in evidence that the two hundred acres of land were marked off and admeasured, and that the widow and daughters continued to dwell in the family homestead, being provided for by the executor as the will directs, though not fully, and the repairs and renewals were not well kept up. So matters continued without any effort on their part by legal steps to enforce a better performance of duty on the part of the executor until a few years ago, when the widow sold to Thomas L. Boykin her life estate in the premises, in exchange for an estate in fee in a residence in Kirkwood, in the suburbs of Camden.

We do not think that under the circumstances, after so long a delay, she is entitled to have an estimate made of the arrearages of the annual cost of what should have been expended by the executor in keeping up the establishment on the plantation, and now recover that as a gross sum from the executor; but we do think that she has a right to demand of him a suitable carriage and pair of horses, and a proper repairing and renewal of her present household furniture. Of course, the altered condition of things, and the present age and circumstances of his mother, should be taken into consideration in deciding upon a proper outlay in this respect at this juncture. The estate has been greatly reduced by the casualties of war. Perhaps the executor has been also guilty of devastavit, but how far is yet to be determined, and much depends upon the evidence on this point. We cannot prejudge him.

Nor do we experience much difficulty and hesitation in construing the third clause of the will, and feel free to say that each of the three sons surviving the testator took under that clause a fee in the one-third of the body of land devised. The testator directs this fee to go absolutely to the issue of such of the sons as should die before the mother, leaving issue surviving, but does not provide how the share of a son should go in the event he should die before the mother and leave no issue to take. *It is argued that his purpose and intention were that in such event the son's share should vest in the surviving sons, and that Eugene and John having successively died unmarried, and without issue, by right of survivorship Thomas L. Boykin has become vested with the entire devise. If such had been the testator's intention, it would have been very easy for him to have so declared. In this clause cross-remainders are not created by express words, nor are they raised by necessary implication. I have carefully examined the authorities relied upon in support of this doctrine of cross-remainders, but in my judgment they do not sustain the construction contended for by the creditors of T. L. Boykin. I hold that as Eugene and John died leaving no issue to take, their respective shares in fee vested in those who filled the description of their heirs at law at the dates of their deaths respectively. But, of course, the period of partition and enjoyment in severalty remains as the testator has fixed it, to wit, the death of the widow. Until then the land is to be kept together for the use of the estate, as prescribed by the will. In refutation of the cross-remainder theory, see Smither v. Willcox, 9 Ves., 233, referred to in 2 Jarm. Wills, 493, and note.

*516

We agree entirely with the master in his construction of section fourth of the will. The six hundred dollars to be paid annually to the widow was the testator's estimate of the compensation which should be paid her for the annual labor and services of her eight negro slaves on the plantation, which was to be worked for the benefit of the estate. The widow having accepted the slaves, as well as her entire legacy, in lieu of dower, and the slaves having been emancipated, this source of income was dried up. The corpus and income became a loss to her.

The legacy of $2,000 in state stocks I do not regard as specific, but merely pecuniary and general. The remarks of the learned author of William on Executors, Vol. 2, *pages 999 and 1000, are in accord with Jarman on Wills, and are adopted by Redfield, and sufficiently support me in holding that this legacy is not specific, and must therefore be paid, but I think with only six per cent. interest from July 27, 1862. But how it is to be paid is a question made interesting by the earnestness and zeal displayed in the argument of counsel. Clearly, the executor is *responsible under the testimony as it comes to me, although, as I have before remarked, the extent of his devastavit has not been fully enquired into. He has assented to the legacy, has paid less favored legacies, and has disposed of the rents, issues, and profits of the land, and, to some extent, the land itself. He does not interpose the plea of the statute of limitations, nor could he do so whilst he maintains to this legatee the relation of trustee.

*517

The provision for the widow stands upon high grounds—higher in law and in equity than that of ordinary legatees, mere volunteers. She is a purchaser, or rather the testator became, by her acceptance of his offers, a purchaser of her interest in his real estate, and she a vendor for valuable consideration. So highly is her legacy esteemed, that in case of a deficiency of assets personal, her claim does not ratably abate with other legacies, but must be paid, even if thereby the legacies of the children should be defeated in whole or in part. 2 Wms. Ex'rs, *1169, 1170; 1 Roper Leg., *432. Such a claim of a widow is so greatly favored, that before she will be driven to her election she will be allowed time in which to be fully informed of the real condition of the estate, so as to enable her knowingly and understandingly to make her choice. Should she elect hastily and unadvisedly, she will be allowed to recall her imprudent election. Here, however, she has elected, and too long a time has elapsed to think of asking to recall, nor does she do so. She sues now to recover the provision made for her in lieu of dower, declaring very truthfully and properly that she has made her election.

Her counsel insists, however, that her legacy is not only favored in law, and preferred to one that is a mere bounty, but that it is a charge upon the specific devises of land—not that the testator has so declared it to be, but that the law so declares it. In this they err. The law does not only not so declare, but the very nature of the acceptance of such a legacy implies a renunciation of all interest in the land, saving what may be expressly, or by necessary implication, contained in the legacy itself, as where it is made a charge on land, or payable out of the usufruct, &c. There is nothing of the kind in the legacies given to this widow, except the current expenses of the household, repairs, and renewals of furniture, &c., whilst the *wife and daughters live in the family residence, and even those outlays are to be supplied from the proceeds and income of the general estate, and not from the sale of any part of the land.

*518

In the absence of any specific directions to that effect in this will, these legacies to the wife in lieu of dower are not charges on the land specifically devised. Therefore, should there be a deficiency of personal assets, so that there must be a marshalling of assets as between legatees, we know no rule of law nor of equity that will enable the widow to subject the land specially devised to the payment of her claim. 3 Jarm. Wills, 530, 531; 3 Red. Wills, 369, citing Forrester v. Lord Leigh, Amb., 171; Scott v. Scott, Amb., 383; Herne v. Meyrick, 1 P. Wms., 201; Clifton v. Burt, Ibid, 678. As, however, all the debts have been paid, and all other legatees settled with, and as the landed estate is still undivided, and required to be kept together and managed for the use of the family until her death, and since hers is a favored legacy, every advantage and preference must be granted her henceforth in getting what justly belongs to her.

It is, however, contended, that as the state stock was taken by the executor to satisfy in part the legacies to the girls given in the 9th clause of the will, which legacies are made a charge on the land, the widow now has the right to be subrogated to their rights in the premises, and thus to resort to the land for payment. But only one thousand dollars of the state stocks was so applied (the balance being paid in other funds and stocks), and this was done many, many years ago, and with her full knowledge and consent. And we do not perceive how, at this late day, having so long acquiesced in this act of the executor, she has any equity, by subrogation or otherwise, to demand payment of her legacy out of a specific devise. She has a preferred claim upon all the personal assets in the hands of the executor, and these, perhaps, will consist of the rents and profits of the undivided realty. If from this source she cannot be paid, she is entitled to a personal judgment against the executor, which, however, as a lien upon his individual property, including his devise in fee, will take rank only from its date, and must be junior to subsisting outstanding liens, such as mortgages and judgments.

Now, it appears that Thomas L. Boykin

*519

has undertaken to *mortgage portions of his land, by metes and bounds, and to convey by deed other parts; and that under decrees of foreclosure and sale, still other parts have gone into the hands of purchasers. Clearly, he had no right to do more than mortgage or sell his undivided interest in fee in this land. In so far as any of these purchasers or lien creditors may have such a deed or mortgage, to wit, of the right, title, and interest of T. L. Boykin, he or she will have a lien superior to a personal judgment recovered by the plaintiff against the executor in this action; but, otherwise, it may turn out that her judgment will take priority. Much depends upon the nature of these liens and purchases, and the outcome of the partition which may be made after the death of the plaintiff. Until that time the possession of each and every of these purchasers must be at the will of the tenants in common, or rather the devisees of the land and their heirs, among whom T. L. Boykin is only one of a goodly number. These remarks do not apply to the 200 acres bought of his mother. That is his absolute property, with contingent limitations.

The compromise agreement spoken of by the referee I have never seen, but learn that it is signed only by the counsel for the parties, whilst I believe there are minors in interest. I do not deem it necessary to go further in this decree than to adjudicate the widow's rights and to interpret the will, and the parties and these purchasers may hereafter adjust their claims according to their desire and agreement, whatever that may be. I can only say that none of them have, against the consent of the devisees, a right to the possession of any of the land until after the death of the plaintiff, and not then, even, unless it be that they have purchased the interest of T. L. Boykin, and can stand in his stead in the partition.

As the insolvency of T. L. Boykin is conceded, and as the rents and profits are likely to constitute the only fund out of which the plaintiff can realize anything, which rents and profits have been for a short time collected and disbursed by the master of this court, who is dead, a receiver must be appointed to take charge of the estate with all convenient speed.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed: First. That the sons, as devisees under the third clause of the will of Bur*well Boykin, deceased, took each for himself a vested interest in fee, transmissible to the issue of such as should predecease their mother leaving issue surviving, and to the heirs at law of such as predeceased their mother, leaving no issue surviving, but that the period of partition and enjoyment in severalty of all shares is postponed to the death of the plaintiff.

*520

Second. That the plaintiff do recover of the said executor the sum of $2,000 with interest thereon at six per centum per annum from July 27, 1862, with leave to issue execution thereon against said executor, to be levied de bonis testatoris, if any there be unadministered in his hands, and if not, then de bonis propriis, but not to be levied of any of the real estate devised under the said third clause of said will.

Third. That the plaintiff do likewise recover of said executor a sufficient sum of money to buy for her and daughters a carriage and horses, and to repair and renew the furniture in her present dwelling, with leave to issue execution to enforce payment upon the same terms as that above provided. And in order to ascertain said sum, it is hereby referred to the clerk of this court as special master to take testimony and report a suitable sum of money for these purposes, the master being disqualified.

Fourth. Leave is hereby given to any of the parties to this action to apply at the foot of this decree for the appointment of a receiver, with information as to the amount of the bond necessary to be given, and to the said special master it is referred to ascertain and report a suitable person to act as receiver of the said rents and profits and estate generally, and the proper amount of said bond.

Fifth. That the said rents, issues, and profits be applied to the payment of the amounts decreed herein to the plaintiff, in preference to any other claim, and to the costs of this action, in case the said executor be not able to pay the same, which he is hereby directed to do.

Sixth. That the parties interested have likewise leave to apply at the foot of this decree for further orders touching the lands in possession of those who hold under pretended titles from Thomas L. Boykin.

*521

*Seventh. That it be referred to the said special master to audit and report upon the accounts of the said Thomas L. Boykin, as executor as aforesaid, with leave to report upon any special matter in regard thereto, as well as in regard to any other matters arising under the pleadings in this action, and not herein finally and fully adjudicated.

From this decree the several parties appealed upon the grounds stated in the opinion of this court.

Mr. W. H. Lyles, for plaintiff.

Messrs. W. Z. Leitner, Buist & Buist, and De Saussure & Son, for creditors.

October 10, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Burwell Boykin, late of Kershaw county departed this life in 1861, seized and possessed of a handsome estate, consisting, among other things, of nearly 5,000 acres of valuable land in one body on the east side of Wateree River. He left surviving him a widow, Sallie W., and seven children, Eugene, John, Thomas L., Mary L., now the wife of Everard B. Cureton, Harriet A. Boykin, Sallie W., now the wife of T. H. Clarke, and Flora Boykin, for whom he made liberal provision by will. He gave to each of his sons, except Thomas L., $200, and to each of his daughters $4,000, the latter to be raised out of any money due him, and belonging to his estate, not disposed of by the will, and in case there should not be a sufficiency for the purpose mentioned, then the same to be considered as a charge upon the lands. He then provided as follows:

"Section 1. I desire that my wife and children may dwell together in my dwelling house, where I now reside. * * *

"Sec. 2. To my wife, Sallie W. Boykin, for and during the period of her natural life, and no longer, and subject to the first section of this will, I devise the dwelling house where I now reside, and all the out-buildings attached thereto, together with all and singular the household and kitchen furniture, of every description, belonging to the premises, and also 200 acres of the tract of land whereon said dwelling house and out-buildings are *situated, to be admeasured, and the buildings thereon defined by my executors, to be hereinafter named. * * * And I hereby empower and authorize my said wife to divide the said furniture, by will or otherwise, among my children in any manner she pleases; but should she fail or refuse to do this, at her death I direct my executors to take and hold the same for distribution under the residuary clause of this will. And I hereby charge the expenses of all needful repairs of said dwelling house and out-buildings and repairs and renewals of furniture for the same upon my undivided estate, as it may be from time to time, when such repairs and renewals shall be directed by my executors, to be continued during the life of my said wife, but no longer.

*522

"Sec. 3. I direct that all the rest of my real estate shall be kept undivided until the death of my said wife, to be worked by the slaves of my estate and those which I shall in this bequeath to my wife, under the control and management of my executors; and from and immediately after her death I devise the said real estate in this section referred to, to my sons, equally to be divided among them, share and share alike, to them and their heirs forever. If, however, I shall in the mean time by deed convey any portion of the said real estate to any of my sons, then the part so conveyed shall be taken and held by him as his portion of real estate to which he would otherwise have become entitled under the provisions of this section of my will. And should any of my sons die before the time herein appointed for the division of my real estate, and should leave issue living at that time, then I direct that such issue shall take among them, share and share alike, the same portion of real estate to which their parent would have been entitled if he had survived my said wife, to them and their heirs forever. And if any of my sons shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years before the death of my said wife, I direct that such son or sons shall be permitted to cultivate, each for himself, such a part of real estate as shall be allotted for that purpose by my wife and executors, until the final division, when he or they shall receive his or their own share, &c.

"Sec. 4. To my wife, Sallie W. Boykin, to her and her heirs forever, I give and bequeath the following named slaves, to wit:

*523

*Bremer and Tabby, Hester and Sandy, children of said Tabby, Isaac, Sandy, Peggy, and Bob Lord, with the present and future increase of the females among them, which said slaves may be worked on my general estate under the control of my executors, who shall, as long as she lives, pay to her annually out of the proceeds of my general estate the sum of six hundred dollars, in full compensation for the use, labor, and profits annually of said slaves.

"Sec. 5. To my wife, Sallie W. Boykin, to her and her heirs forever, I give and bequeath two thousand dollars ($2,000) in six per cent. state stocks of the State of South Carolina, and I hereby authorize and direct my executors to keep her supplied as long as she lives with suitable carriage and a pair of horses, to be purchased at the expense of my estate whenever they may deem it necessary, &c.

"Sec. 6. All the rights, privileges, devises, and bequests in this will and testament made and allowed to my said wife, Sallie W. Boykin, are intended, and by her must be taken, only in lieu of her right of dower in each and every portion of my real estate," &c.

The testator nominated his brother, A. H. Boykin, and his sons, Thomas L. Boykin and Burwell Boykin, as executors, but only Thomas L. Boykin qualified. He returned an inventory and appraisement of the estate, which showed that in round numbers, the negro slaves were valued at $60,000, the stock, plantation tools, &c., at $17,000, and the bonds and notes at $28,000. He paid the pecuniary legacies to the daughters as they came of age or married; but to enable him to do so, certain portions of the lands were assigned to the younger daughters, viz., tracts Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, aggregating 544 acres and a fraction, were assigned to Harriet A. Boykin, and tracts Nos. 5, 6, and 7, aggregating 332 acres, were assigned to Flora Boykin, in 1875. And in order to complete the payment of the daughters, also all the six per cent. state stock belonging to the estate, was sold, except the nominal amount of $1,000, which is still in the hands of the executor, but of no value.

The widow, Sallie W., accepted the provisions of the will in lieu of her right of dower in the lands, the 200 acres, including *the family mansion, were run off for her, the slaves bequeathed to her were employed on the undivided lands as directed, and the $600 paid to her annually; but at the end of the war, the slaves were emancipated, and the value of the choses greatly reduced, if not destroyed. The two younger sons, Eugene and John, died intestate and unmarried, and an arrangement was made by which the widow, Sallie W., disposed of her life estate in the 200 acres, and purchased a house and lot in the town of Camden, whither she removed.

*524

It seems that the executor had never paid her the legacy of $2,000 in six per cent. state stocks, and now refusing even to continue the annuity of $600, and proper expenditures for renewal of furniture, carriage and horses, &c., she instituted these proceedings, alleging that all the available assets of the estate had disappeared, and praying that the executor should be required to pay her the $600 annually, the legacy of $2,000 in six per cent. state stocks, and money sufficient to renew her furniture and to purchase a carriage and horses as directed by the will; that the sums so ascertained to be due her should be paid out of the rents and profits of the undivided lands, which were to be kept together during her life, and were specifically charged with keeping up her establishment; and should that not be sufficient for the purpose indicated, then that the same should be adjudged to be a charge upon the said lands.

At this stage of the proceedings, it transpired that there were persons other than the devisees who claimed to have an interest in the lands; that Thomas L. Boykin, the executor, being involved, possibly insolvent, had undertaken to sell certain parcels of the undivided lands, and to mortgage other portions to secure his individual creditors; and thereupon these persons so claiming were made parties defendant, and the following state of facts, given in the most general terms, appeared:

On May 31, 1872, Thomas L. Boykin contracted with Louis D. DeSaussure for agricultural advances, and to secure the same executed a mortgage of a certain tract of land described as containing 893 acres, with metes and bounds, &c. On January 8, 1873, he also contracted with Witte Brothers for advances to the amount of $9,000, and to secure the same executed a mortgage *of 2,000 acres of the estate lands, with metes and bounds, &c. On March 1, 1873, he also executed a mortgage of 500 acres of the said land to secure a debt of $600 due to Charles B. Taylor, assigned to A. H. H. Stuart. On May 16, 1874, he also gave to John A. Armstrong a note for $1,573.54, and to secure it executed a mortgage of "all his undivided interest in the estate of Burwell Boykin, in which his mother, S. W. Boykin, had a life estate," &c. He also gave other conveyances of portions of the lands; but it is unnecessary now to state them in detail, as the Circuit judge did not undertake to adjudge any question in the case except "the widow's rights and to interpret the will."

*525

These creditors and alienees of T. L. Boykin made vigorous opposition to the claims of the widow, the plaintiff. The issues were referred to the master, who took the testimony and made his report. Upon exceptions to this report, the cause came on for a hearing by Judge Hudson, who held that the sons of Burwell Boykin took under the will vested interests in their respective shares of the land; that the widow was not now entitled to the annuity of $600; but that she was entitled to recover the legacy of $2,000 in state stocks, and directing its payment out of the rents and profits, but declining to make it a charge upon the lands. From this judgment all the parties appealed. We think all the grounds taken by the creditors of T. L. Boykin are embodied in the appeal of Louis D. DeSaussure, which are as follows:

"That it was error in the Circuit judge to hold: 1. That the legacy of $2,000 to the plaintiff is not a specific legacy. 2. That the sons of the testator, Burwell Boykin, do not take as a class, but directly. 3. That the lands must be rented out and a receiver appointed to take charge of the rents to meet the support of the plaintiff. 4. That the plaintiff is entitled to a future provision for carriage and horses, repairs of furniture, &c., upon the grounds following:

"First. That the $2,000 of state stocks was a specific legacy, and if a devastavit as to it has been committed, the plaintiff must look to the executor by whom the devastavit was committed, and not to the testator's estate.

"Second. That the third clause of the testator's will, as inter*preted by the whole contents of the will, clearly evinces an intention on the part of the testator to provide for classes; and the third clause indicated his sons as the class to take his lands.

*526

"Third. That the defendant, Thomas L. Boykin, being the survivor of the class designated in the third clause of the will takes all the real estate, and his mortgages or conveyances of such real estate will give priority over any and all claims of the plaintiff upon such real estate for support, according to the terms of the will and circumstances.

"Fourth. That the provision in the second clause of the will in relation to repairs and renewal of furniture was for repairs and renewals as to furniture to be used in the dwelling-house provided for the plaintiff in such clause, and her voluntary relinquishment of such dwelling-house was an abandonment of all claim for 'repairs and renewals of furniture for same.'

"Fifth. That the provision for a carriage and pair of horses for the plaintiff was dependent upon the discretion of the executors 'to be purchased at the expense of my estate whenever they may deem it necessary,' and the sole qualified executor having by his answer stated that such were furnished as long as he thought necessary under the circumstances, such provision, if now deemed necessary to be made, can only be at the expense of the whole estate, and by contribution among all the devisees."

Plaintiff's Exceptions.

1. "Because his honor held that the plaintiff is not entitled to the annuity of $600 bequeathed to her in the fourth clause of the will of Burwell Boykin, deceased.

2. "Because his honor held that plaintiff is entitled to interest only at the rate of six per cent. per annum on the legacy of $2,000 'in six per cent. state stocks' bequeathed to her in the fifth clause of the will.

3. "Because his honor did not hold that all of the legacies given to plaintiff by the will, being given and accepted in lieu and bar of dower, were chargeable by law and the terms of the will upon the real estate devised.

4. "Because his honor did not hold that the defendant, Thomas *L. Boykin, having exhausted the personal estate of his testator in the payment of the legacies to Mary L. Cureton and Sallie W. Clarke, inferior in grade to plaintiff's legacies as to the personalty, but charged upon the land, the plaintiff is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of Mrs. Cureton and Mrs. Clarke, and to have so much of the land devised sold as would be sufficient to satisfy her legacies.

*527

5. "Because his honor did not hold that the plaintiff had a life estate in the whole of the real estate.

6. "Because his honor held that none of the land devised was subject to the payment of these legacies to the plaintiff, when he should have held that at least the interest of Thomas L. Boykin in said lands should be subject to the payment of said legacies, under the fi. fa. authorized against him de bonis propriis.

7. "Because his honor undertakes to decide and determine how the judgment authorized against Thomas L. Boykin for these legacies will rank with respect to prior judgments against him or conveyances and encumbrances made by him without a sufficiency of evidence to show how they stand, and without that question being before him or involved at this juncture of the proceedings."

The action was brought by Sallie W. Boykin, widow of Burwell Boykin, deceased, for the recovery of legacies and to enforce the execution of other provisions of his will in her favor. In the progress of the cause, questions arose between Thomas L. Boykin, the executor, and his creditors. While it was proper to hear these creditors in opposition to the claims of the widow, which touched the property disposed of by the will in which the said Thomas L. had an interest, the Circuit judge did not undertake to adjudicate the rights of the creditors or adjust equities between the defendants; so that there is no question before this court except as to the rights of the widow, and as incidental thereto the construction of the will of Burwell Boykin.

First. As to the devise of the lands in the third clause. The important words are as follows: "I direct that all the rest of my real estate shall be kept undivided until the death of my said wife, to be worked by the slaves of my estate, and those which I shall bequeath in this to my wife, under the control and management of my executors; and from and immediately after her death *I devise the said real estate in this section referred to to my sons equally, to be divided among them share and share alike, to them and their heirs forever." Two of the sons, Eugene and John, died unmarried and without issue during the life of the widow, and the question now is whether they took vested interests in the undivided lands which were transmitted to their respective heirs under the statute of distributions, or passed under the will to Thomas L. Boykin, their only surviving brother. The mother, at whose death the division was directed, is still living, and of course we can only give construction according to the facts as they exist at the present time.

*528

The three sons, Thomas L., Eugene, and John, were in esse at the death of the testator, and there could be no difficulty in the construction of the clause if the lands had been given to the widow expressly for life, and "from and immediately after her death to my sons equally, to be divided," &c. It is admitted that if the terms had created an express life estate in the widow, they would have given a vested remainder in each of the sons to the extent of one undivided third. It is clear, therefore, that the alleged difficulty does not grow out of the words "to my sons equally, to be divided," and that the doctrine as to classes, in so far as it gives the right of survivorship, has no application to the case. Whatever interest was given was in severalty. 2 Jarm. Wills (1st Am. edit.), 162, and note.

It is contended, however, that the lands were not given to the widow or any one else during her life; that there was a chasm between the death of the testator and that of the widow, in which the lands were not given at all, or at least no such particular estate was created, as is necessary to support a vested remainder; that the devise from and after the death of the widow, was an effort to give lands in futuro, which could only take effect as an executory devise; in other words, that the devise was contingent upon the sons surviving the mother, and as a consequence, if the other son, Thomas L. Boykin, also should die before his mother, the whole devise would be defeated. We cannot accept this view, which, as it seems to us, would not only run counter to the manifest intention of the testator to dispose of his whole estate, but would violate the settled rules of construction applicable in such *cases. In the first place, it is not quite clear that the lands were not disposed of during the life of the widow. The will directs that they should "be kept undivided until the death of my wife, to be worked by the slaves of my estate, &c., under the management and control of the executors." This looks very much like a substantial devise to the executors during the life of the widow, for the purpose of carrying out the trusts indicated; but the provision is very peculiar, and we do not think it necessary to rest the judgment of the court on that construction.

*529

We concur with the Circuit judge that the devise created vested interests in the sons living at the death of the testator, and only the division and possession were postponed to the death of Mrs. Boykin. Mr. Jarman says: "The law favors the vesting of estates, the effect of which principle seems to be, that property which is the subject of disposition, will belong to the object of gift immediately on the instrument taking effect, or as soon thereafter as the terms thereof will permit. As therefore a will takes effect at the death of the testator, it follows that any devise or bequest in favor of a person in esse simply (i. e., without any intimation of a desire to suspend or postpone its operation) confers an immediately vested interest. If words of futurity are introduced into the gift, the question arises whether the expressions are inserted for the purpose of protracting the vesting, or point merely to the deferred possession or enjoyment. It may be stated as a general rule that where a testator creates a particular estate and then goes on to dispose of the ulterior interest, expressly in an event which will determine the prior estate, the words descriptive of such event occurring in the latter devise will be construed as referring merely to the period of the determination of the possession or enjoyment under the prior gift, and not as designed to postpone the vesting." 1 Jarm. Wills (1st Am. edit.), 727. Where a testator devises lands to trustees until A shall attain the age of twenty-one years, and if or when he shall attain that age, then to him in fee, this is construed as conferring on A a vested estate in fee simple, subject to the prior chattel interest given to the trustees, and consequently on A's death, under the prescribed age, the property descends to his heirs at law, though it is quite clear that a devise to A if or when *he shall attain the age of twenty-one years, standing isolated and detached from the context, would confer a contingent interest only. Ib., 734.

*530

There are directions in this will, that if any of the sons should come of age before the death of Mrs. Boykin, "such son or sons shall be permitted to cultivate, each for himself, such a part of the lands as shall be allotted for that purpose by my wife and executors until the final division, when he or they shall receive his or their own share." The devise also contains a provision that if any of the sons should die before the time appointed for division, leaving issue, "such issue shall take among them the same portion to which their parent would have been entitled," &c. Now one of the rules of construction adopted in this class of cases is, as it was tersely stated by Chancellor Kent: "A devise to A in fee, if or when he attains the age of twenty-one, becomes a vested remainder, provided the will contains an intermediate disposition of the estate or of the rents and profits during the minority of A, or if it directs the estate to go over in the event of A dying under age" (or before the event fixed for possession). 4 Kent, 205; Cadogan v. Ewart, 7 Adol. & Ell., 636; Rivers v. Fripp, 4 Rich. Eq., 298; Seabrook v. Gregg, 2 S. C., 78; Smither v. Willcox, 9 Ves., 233, 1 Jarm. Wills, *739.

This rule runs through all the cases which were quoted and discussed by Chancellor Dunkin in Rivers v. Fripp, and by Chief Justice Moses in Seabrook v. Gregg, supra, and we conceive it to be unnecessary to do more than quote what Chancellor Dunkin said in Rivers v. Fripp: "Although the reasons of this rule are various and more or less obvious, and, as might be supposed, have been received with more or less favor, the rule itself seems well settled. So from Boraston's case, 3 Rep., 19, down to the very recent case of Williamson v. Berry, 8 How., 495 [12 L. Ed. 1170] words seemingly creative of a future interest, have been frequently construed to refer to the futurity of possession, and not as designed to postpone the vesting of the estate. In Boraston's case there was a term of eight years devised to A and B, and after the said term the land to remain to executors for the performance of his will, till such time as H should accomplish his full age of twenty-*one years, and when the said H should come to his age of twenty-one, then to him and his heirs for ever. It was held by the court that the estate was vested in H; that the adverbs of time, when, &c., did not make anything necessary to precede the vesting of the remainder, but merely expressed the time when it should take effect in possession," &c.

*531

But assuming that the interests were vested, another view is suggested, that, inasmuch as the will shows that the testator intended the lands for his sons as a class, the court can and should declare cross-remainders among them, in order to effectuate that intention. As before stated, the will does provide that if any of the sons should die before their mother, leaving issue, such issue shall then take the share of their parent; but the will does not provide for the case of sons dying before their mother without issue. As that event has occurred, can the court supply the alleged omission, and declare that the testator intended the interest of such deceased child to go to his surviving brothers, to the exclusion of his heirs at law generally? It seems to us that it would be an unauthorized liberty thus to add, from mere conjecture as to the intention of the testator, an important supplement to the provisions of his will. It is true there are such things as cross-remainders by implication, but such implication must be absolutely necessary. We fail to see in this will anything which requires such an implication. In the case of Baldrick & Weston v. White, 2 Bail., 442, cited at the bar, it was held that "where in a devise to two, their several shares are limited over to third persons on the failure of issue of either of them, cross-remainders will not be implied." In the case of Seabrook v. Mikell, Cheves Eq., 80, the words were, "in case my surviving son shall depart this life without issue," &c. The interests of the dead sons having vested, and, in the event which has occurred, not being limited over, must be distributed as other intestate property. See case of Smither v. Willcox, 9 Ves., 234, cited in the Circuit decree.

Second. As to the $600 to be paid annually to the widow, &c. After giving his widow certain slaves by name, the testator directed that "they may be worked on my general estate under the control of my executors, who shall, as long as she lives, pay to her *annually out of the proceeds of my general estate the sum of six hundred dollars, in full compensation for the use, labor, and profits annually of said slaves." We think this provision ended with the emancipation of the slaves. It was expressly stated to be "in compensation for the use, labor, and profits of the slaves," and must be regarded as one of the many losses which resulted from emancipation. But we agree with the Circuit judge that the executor should have the household furniture of the widow repaired and renewed, and provide for her a suitable carriage and pair of horses. Manifestly the object nearest the testator's heart was to make his widow comfortable during her life. She promptly yielded her right of dower in a very large and valuable plantation in consideration of the provisions of the will. She lost by emancipation the $600 provided for her annually as compensation for the hire of her slaves, as well as the slaves themselves. Circumstances so changed that a change of residence became proper, to which it does not appear that the executor or any of the legatees objected. We do not see that the provision was made for the widow on condition that she continued to reside in the old family mansion, or that her change of residence absolved the executor or the estate from the legal as well as high moral obligation of providing for her in her old age as the will directs.

*532

Third. As to the legacy of $2,000 in six per cent. state stocks, &c. It is in the following words: "To my wife, Sallie W. Boykin, to her and her heirs forever, I give and bequeath two thousand dollars ($2,000) in six per cent. stocks of the state of South Carolina." This was not a specific legacy of the stocks in the sense that the legatee was to have the very thing bequeathed, as a horse, or a ring, the destruction of which would simply be the loss of the legatee. What was given? Not stocks, but dollars; not so many particular dollars in a bag and capable of delivery, but dollars generally. One of the earliest and simplest tests of a specific legacy was to inquire whether the legacy would be adeemed if the testator, after the execution of his will, disposed of the thing given. Now, suppose Mr. Boykin, after he made his will, had disposed of all his state stocks, would that have been an ademption of this legacy? We should say not, for the reason that the thing given was not "stocks," but dollars.

*533

*Possibly it might have been an ademption if he had directed the given number of dollars paid in "my stocks now in my possession." But the provision is "in six per cent. state stocks of the state of South Carolina;" that is to say, in any stocks of the proper description, whether then in his possession or to be purchased or acquired in any other way by his executors. It does not even appear in the will that the testator owned such stocks, but if it had, that would have made no difference. "It must be observed that the mere possession of the testator at the date of his will of stocks of equal or of larger amount than the legacy will not make the bequest specific when it is given generally in particular funds without further explanation, for the testator might mean only to direct his executor to purchase with his general estate so much stocks in the fund described, and therefore that clear intention which is required for making a legacy specific does not here exist." 2 Wms. Exrs. (7th edit.), 1252.

The gift was in dollars; not in any particular dollars, earmarked and identified, but such a number of dollars; and that makes this what is called a demonstrative legacy. This kind of legacy, while it is specific in its nature, differs so much in effect from one properly specific that if the fund out of which it is to be repaid is called in or fail, the legatee will not be deprived of his legacy, but be permitted to receive it out of the general assets; yet the legacy is so far specific that it will not be liable to abate with general legacies upon a deficiency of assets. 2 Wms. Exrs., *1043, and notes, quoting the civil law: "If the testator devise ten quarters of corn, coming of the corn which shall grow in such a soil, or two tons of wine of his grapes in such a vineyard, or ten lambs of such a flock, though so much corn or wine or so many lambs do not arise of the things aforesaid, yet the heir or executor is compelled by law to make them good integraliter; because he may seem to have mentioned the soil, the vineyard, and the flocks rather by way of demonstration than by way of condition. Fulbecke's Parallele, p. 37, edition of 1618."

The statute of limitations is not interposed by the executor or legatees. It is, however, insisted that the widow was guilty of laches in demanding her legacy; that she stood by and without objection saw the assets destroyed or paid to her daughters, and *especially that she acquiesced in the delivery of the stocks, intended as alleged for her, to others. It is true she waited long, but it should be kept in mind that the testator died during the war, which soon after ended, reducing greatly the value of choses, and bringing upon the country general confusion and ruin. Besides, as we can well understand, there were other reasons which naturally made the widow hesitate to seek redress in the courts. As to the state stocks, we have just determined that they were not given to her specifically, and of course she had no more right to object to the executor using them than any other choses of the estate. The legacy must therefore be paid; but as in our view it might be discharged by the delivery of "six per cent. state stocks of the state of South Carolina" to the value of two thousand dollars, we concur with the Circuit judge that it should only bear interest at six per cent. per annum.

*534

The legacy being given in lieu and bar of dower is, and should be, much favored in law. It was given for a consideration, and is therefore somewhat in the nature of a debt of the testator, but we agree with the Circuit judge that it was not charged upon the lands. The will certainly does not expressly make it a charge; and we do not think that the widow is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the daughters, whose legacies were charged upon the lands, upon the ground that they were paid in part by the state stocks. That claim can only stand upon the view that "the stocks" were specifically given to her, and their use in paying the legacies of the daughters gives her the right pro tanto to stand in their place and set up in her favor the right of charge given to them. The conclusive answer to this is our ruling that the state stocks were not specifically given to the widow. If the legacy were a debt of the testator pure and simple, and there were not assets to pay it, that of itself would not make it a charge upon any particular part of the estate specifically given to others, but would involve the question of general contribution by all the legatees and devisees. That question was not made in the proceedings, and we will not consider it now. The claim of the widow is so favored that it would not have to abate for the payment of debts of the estate; but it is a very different ques*tion whether the other legatees and devisees shall abate in order to pay her legacy.

*535

The Circuit judge, in order to settle all rights as far as he could, declared in advance upon what property the execution on the judgment herein rendered might or might not be levied. There are many questions in reference to the claims upon these lands yet to be determined, and we think it premature to decide now how, when, or upon what property that execution may be levied. We prefer to reserve our judgment upon that question until the case arises and is regularly argued.

With this slight modification as to the manner of levying the judgment and execution, the judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

21 S. C. 535

WILSON v. KELLY.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Descent and Distribution ⇐102.]

Where slaves were given to children by their father in his life-time, and he died intestate after emancipation, neither the value of such slaves nor their use can be charged as advancements under the statute of this state.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Lanham v. Lanham, 38 S. C. 137, 16 S. E. 609.

For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. § 412; Dec. Dig. ⇐102.]

[2. Descent and Distribution ⇐102.]

If the slaves were lent to the children, or were hired to the husbands of intestate's daughters, the use of the slaves in such cases could not be charged as advancements.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. §§ 411, 412; Dec. Dig. ⇐102.]

3. Hughey v. Eichelberger, 11 S. C., 36, and Ex parte Glenn, 20 Id., 64, affirmed.

Before Hudson, J., Kershaw, February, 1883.

This was an action by Emily C. Wilson against Jane K. Kelly and others, distributees of the estate of Wiley Kelly, deceased, and against the administrator of said estate, for the settlement, partition, and distribution of the estate of said Wiley Kelly, who died in December, 1873. In making settlement and distribution of the personal estate among the distributees, an accounting for advancements became necessary, and in such accounting the question arose whether negro slaves received by *the several children of the intestate, before the war, were to be charged as advancements.

*536

At June term, 1880, Judge Hudson held, under the authority of Hughey v. Eichelberger, that the slaves could not be charged for as advancements, but that the use of such slaves were advancements, and the master was directed to take an account of the value of such use. The master subsequently made a report of the value of such use to the children respectively. The cause came up again before Judge Hudson in February, 1883, on exceptions to the master's report, when his honor overruled the exceptions and confirmed the report.

From this decree some of the defendants appealed upon the ground "that his honor, the Circuit judge, erred in holding as matter of law and fact, that the hire of negroes, as reported by the master herein, should be charged against said defendants as advancements," and the plaintiff also gave notice of appeal from so much of the decretal order of June term, 1880, "as decides or determines that the value of the negro slaves given by Wiley Kelly, the intestate, to his children in his life-time and which were liberated before his death, cannot be charged as an advancement against said children."

Messrs. J. D. Kennedy and W. H. R. Workman, for plaintiff.

Messrs. J. T. Hay and W. D. Trantham, for defendants, appellants.

October 11, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. But two questions are raised by this appeal. 1st. Whether the value of the slaves given by the intestate, Wiley Kelly, who died in 1873, to certain of his children, shall be charged to such children as advancements. 2d. If not, whether the value of the services of such slaves should not be charged as advancements. It is true that some question has been raised as to whether any slaves were in fact given to the daughters of the intestate, the testimony tending to show that the intestate took notes for nominal sums from his sons-in-law for hire, but this seemed to be for the purpose of protecting the *slaves from the marital rights of the husbands, as the slaves all went into the possession of the parties prior to 1868. But for the purposes of this case we shall assume, as we understand the master to have found, that the slaves were really given to the daughters as well as to the sons. For if they were merely hired to the sons-in-law, there can be no question that neither their value, nor the value of their services, could be charged as advancements.

*537

The first question has been decided adversely to the view contended for by the plaintiff by the case of Hughey v. Eichelberger, 11 S. C., 36, which has been recognized and affirmed in the subsequent case of Ex parte Glenn, 20 S. C., 64. This would ordinarily be conclusive of the question, but the counsel, probably not being aware of the subsequent decision in Ex parte Glenn, as it had not been published at the time the argument in this case was heard, contend that what was said in Hughey v. Eichelberger on the question was a mere obiter dictum, and have undertaken to show that such so-called dictum is not well founded, either in reason or authority. In that case there were two reasons given why the slaves could not be regarded as advancements. One was based upon the particular terms of the deed, and the other was that slaves having ceased to be property before the death of the intestate, it was impossible to ascertain their value under the rule established by the statute, as construed by the decisions in this state, and therefore it was impossible to charge them as advancements. We do not see why one of the reasons given should be regarded as obiter dictum any more than the other.

But waiving this, and waiving the further fact that the question has been distinctly decided in the subsequent case of Ex parte Glenn, we will proceed to consider the question. It is quite certain that property which has no value cannot be charged as an advancement, and it is equally certain that, at the death of the intestate in this case, slaves had no value. If, therefore, the rule prescribed by the statute, as construed by the decisions, is that the property claimed to be an advancement must be charged at the value which it bears at the time of the death of the intestate, relation being had to its condition at the time of the gift, and if slaves then had no value, it follows necessarily that there was *nothing to be charged as an advancement. It is contended, however, that such is not the rule, but that at the death of the intestate is the time when the inquiry is to be made as to what was the value of the property when it was given. To use the language of counsel in his argument: "The idea is that at the death is the time when an estimate is to be made of the value of the advances. Not that the value of the advances at the death is what the party receiving them is to be charged for then, but the estimate that shall be made at the death of what that value has been."

*538

This, we think, is in direct conflict with the terms of the statute, and the construction given to it by the decisions. The language of the statute upon this point is: "The value of which portion being estimated at the death of the ancestor, but so as that neither the improvements of the real estate by such child or children, nor the increase of the personal property, shall be taken into the computation." This clearly shows that the intention was to charge the value of the property at the time of the death of the ancestor, discarding any increased value which may have been imparted to it by natural causes or by artificial improvements, and not that the estimate was then to be made of what had been the value; for if such was the intention, then there would have been no necessity for the provisions that the improvements and the natural increase should not be taken into consideration.

But the decisions leave this point in no doubt. In McCaw v. Blewit, 2 McCord Ch., which is conceded to be a leading case on the point, the language of the court, at page 104, is as follows (italics being ours): "That part of the estate which has been given is to be estimated at what it is worth at the death, relation being had to its situation at the time of the gift. Thus a father gives one of his sons a healthy negro boy of twelve years of age, and ten years after the gift the father dies. If this boy be brought into hotchpot, his value will be estimated as that of a boy twelve years old; and whatever such a boy would then bring, the child is to be charged with as an advancement."

In Youngblood v. Norton, 1 Strob. Eq., 122, the language above quoted from McCaw v.

*539

Blewit is quoted with approval, *and it was held that the advancement must be charged at what the property was worth at the time of the death of the intestate, although the father and son had agreed upon a higher valuation at the time the property went into the possession of the son.

The same rule was announced and acted upon in Ison v. Ison, 5 Rich. Eq., 15, the language of the court being: "Certainly, in ascertaining the amount of this advancement, reference should be had to the description of the horse at the time of the gift, and the value of a horse of that description at the death of the intestate." So in Manning v. Manning, 12 Rich. Eq., at page 428, it is said: "The period for fixing the rights of the parties is the death of the decedent. The value of the property to be divided is to be estimated as of that day, and so of the property which had been given off to the children, taking that property in the plight and condition it was when received by the children." The same rule was recognized and acted upon in Rickenbacker v. Zimmerman, 10 S. C., 110 [30 Am. Rep. 37].

So we think it clear, that the position contended for cannot be sustained, but on the contrary, that the well-settled rule is, in ascertaining the amount at which an advancement should be charged, to inquire what is the value of the property at the time of the death of the intestate; what would it then bring, assuming it to be in the condition in which it was at the time of the gift?

Again, it is contended by another of the counsel that although slaves were not property at the time of the death and therefore then had no value, yet as the rule requires that reference should be had to the condition of the property at the time of the gift, and as the slaves, in this case, were then property and had a value, the estimate must be made as if their then condition as property still continued and as if they were still property, having a value. But this is manifestly impossible. Any estimate placed upon what would be their value in 1873, if they had continued to be property, would be purely conjectural, for there would be no standard by which such an estimate could be made. The law deals only with facts susceptible of proof by competent evidence, and courts cannot undertake to apply its principles to purely conjectural cases.

We are not insensible to the fact that these views will, in some *cases, and perhaps in this, lead to injustice, but as has been well said by Lesesne, Ch., in Manning v. Manning, supra: "While it is especially the province of this court to do complete justice, it must not lose sight of settled principles, and cannot obviate or remedy the mischances incident to human affairs." It would not only be dangerous to the best interests of society for courts to depart from or disregard settled principles of law, but they have no authority so to do. Courts administer justice according to law, and not according to what a judge may think is abstract justice in a particular case.

*540

The second question, as to whether the value of the services of the slaves or their hire, should not be charged as advancements, was expressly reserved in the case of Hughey v. Eichelberger, supra, and no opinion upon it was there intimated. We think, both on principle and authority, that this question must be answered in the negative. If the slaves were given to the children, then, of course, they became the property of the children from the time of the gift, and there would be no more propriety in holding them accountable for hire, than there would be in charging them with the hire of any other slaves which had become their property either by purchase or otherwise. After the slaves were given to the children their hire constituted no part of the intestate's estate, but belonged exclusively to the children, and could not, therefore, be considered as advancements. If, on the other hand, the slaves were not given to the children by the intestate, but simply loaned to them for use, then under the authority of the case of Ison v. Ison, 5 Rich. Eq., 15, it is clear that the value of such use cannot be charged as an advancement.

In that case one of the questions was whether certain distributees who had been permitted by the intestate to use and occupy portions of his land, should be charged with the rent as advancements. The court held that they were not so chargeable, saying: "If they owed him for the rent, it was a debt. If he charged nothing for the occupancy (as was the fact), the permission to occupy was a mere accommodation, and no advancement. An advancement always embraces the idea that the parent has parted from his title in the subject advanced. But if the intestate, in this instance, had actually given the land, the statute express*ly exempts the donee from accountability for the rent; much more are the parties exempt where the whole matter was simply permissive, and the object was mere accommodation."

*541

We can see no reason why the principle, thus established as to rent of land, does not apply with equal force to the hire of slaves. If, however, the transaction between the intestate and his sons-in-law, by which he took notes from them for nominal sums, be regarded as a hiring by him to them, then it is quite clear that there would be no ground whatever for charging such hire to the daughters as advancements. It seems to us, therefore, that in no view of the case can the value of the slaves or their hire be charged as advancements.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court, allowing the value of the hire of certain slaves to be charged as advancements to certain of the children of intestate, be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary.

21 S. C. 541

HOOPER v. COLUMBIA AND GREENVILLE R. R. COMPANY.

(April Term, 1884.)

1. The rule laid down in Snow v. Housatonic Railroad Company, 8 Allen, 444, as to the duties of a railroad company towards its employés, approved.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Evans v. Chamberlain, 40 S. C. 107, 18 S. E. 213.]

[2. Master and Servant ⇐113.]

Quere: Where a railroad company requires a brakeman to ride upon the top of its train, and at the same time maintains a bridge with a top too low for such employé to pass through in safety without stooping, is this a danger incident to the employment of a brakeman, and is there a full performance of the duty imposed upon the company in regard to the safety of their employés?

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 225; Dec. Dig. ⇐113.]

[3. Master and Servant ⇐217.]

But an employé may waive the right to exact of his employer such appliances as the law requires, and, as a general rule, the acceptance or retention of service without complaint, after full knowledge of a permanent patent defect amounts to a waiver of such defect.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Adkins v. Atlanta & C. A. R. Co., 27 S. C. 75, 2 S. E. 849; Powers v. Standard Oil Co., 53 S. C. 363, 31 S. E. 276; Mew v. Charleston & S. Ry. Co., 55 S. C. 103, 32 S. E. 828; Youngblood v. South Carolina & G. R. Co., 60 S. C. 18, 38 S. E. 232, 85 Am. St. Rep. 824; Bodie v. Charleston & W. C. R. Co., 61 S. C. 478, 39 S. E. 715; Wood v. Victor Mfg. Co., 66 S. C. 486, 45 S. E. 81; Montgomery v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 73 S. C. 508, 53 S. E. 987; Pinckney v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 92 S. C. 557, 75 S. E. 964.

For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 574–600; Dec. Dig. ⇐217.]

[4. Master and Servant ⇐220.]

Therefore, where a brakeman on top of a train, in full daylight, was struck on the back of the head and killed by the top of a bridge through which he had passed daily for three months, and always stooped to avoid injury, the railroad company are not liable in *damages to his administrator for negligence in permitting this bridge to remain as it was, and in failing to have danger-signal cords; and no special negligence in this case being shown, a nonsuit was properly ordered.

*542

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 633; Dec. Dig. ⇐220.]

5. This case distinguished from Lasure v. Graniteville Manufacturing Company, 18 S. C., 276.

[6. Trial ⇐139.]

The proof by plaintiff not authorizing a reasonable inference of negligence on the part of the railroad company, the non-suit was proper.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Couch v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co., 22 S. C. 563; Kaminitsky v. Northeastern R. Co., 25 S. C. 59; Simms v. South Carolina Ry. Co., 26 S. C. 494, 2 S. E. 486; Madden v. Port Royal, etc., Ry. Co., 35 S. C. 383, 14 S. E. 713, 28 Am. St. Rep. 855; Hicks v. Sumter Cotton Mills, 39 S. C. 43, 17 S. E. 509; Walling v. Congaree Const. Co., 41 S. C. 391, 19 S. E. 723; Madden v. Port Royal & W. C. Ry. Co., 41 S. C. 454, 19 S. E. 951, 20 S. E. 65; Wofford v. Clinton Cotton Mills, 72 S. C. 349, 51 S. E. 918; Lyon v. Charleston & W. C. Ry., 77 S. C. 343, 58 S. E. 12.

For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 332–333, 338–341, 365; Dec. Dig. ⇐139.]

[This case is also cited in Agnew v. Adams, 24 S. C. 89, without specific application, and in Garrick v. Florida Central & Peninsular R. R., 53 S. C. 449, 31 S. E. 334, 69 Am. St. Rep. 874, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Kershaw, J., Oconee, November, 1883.

The opinion gives a full statement of the case.

Messrs. S. P. Dendy and M. F. Ansel, for appellant.

Mr. John C. Haskell, contra.

November 14, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action by J. J. Hooper, as administrator of his son, Nelson T. Hooper, against the Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company for damages, on account of the death of said intestate, while in the service of said company as brakeman, which as alleged was caused by their wrongful act, default, and negligence in keeping up, at Felton's Crossing, on their road, a bridge which was defective in being too low, and by the over-head arches of which he was killed, while in the discharge of his duty. The action was brought by the administrator for the benefit of himself as the father and the other distributees of the intestate, under the act of the legislature on that subject. The defendant corporation answered, admitting the death, but insisting that there was no defect in the bridge at Felton's Crossing; and that if so, such "defects were well known to the said Nelson T. Hooper, both before and up to the time of his death, and that he continued in such service for a number of months before his death for valuable consideration paid by defendants, knowing the said bridge, and if there was any danger attached to the passage of said bridge by the trains of the defendants, the said Nelson *T. Hooper assumed all the risks and perils incident thereto; and these defendants deny that they are responsible for the injuries arising from any defect in said bridge, which was known to said Hooper and unknown to these defendants," &c.

*543

The case came on for trial before Judge Kershaw. It was admitted that plaintiff's intestate was struck by the over-head timbers of the bridge at Felton's Crossing, on the defendants' road, and that the injuries received produced his death. It appeared from the evidence that the intestate, Nelson T. Hooper, was a brakeman on a freight train on the defendants' road, and had been for about three months, which was his first experience on a railroad; that on the morning of November 7, 1881, in a storm of wind and rain, the train, running at maximum speed, passed under the bridge at Felton's Crossing, and soon after the conductor heard that Hooper was hurt, and stopped the train. He was found dead, his face bloody; he lay across the car, and head on arms, feet towards the side of the car on right, face turned towards the front, hands in his overcoat pockets; he was found mid-way of the car, just over the door. There was a considerable cut on the back of the head just at the edge of the hair; it was a considerable gash.

It further appeared that it was the duty of a brakeman to be on the top of the cars. Top-brakes were not used until Colonel Doddamead was superintendent (about 1870 or 1871); before that the brakeman was on the inside of the car. The bridge at Felton's was built originally in 1857, and renewed since the war. The bridge was sixteen feet from top of rail, and the height of a South Carolina railroad car (kind in use that day) is a little over eleven feet—stated by Mr. Magee, who measured one, to be eleven feet and three and one-fourth inches—leaving between the top of the cars and the timbers about four feet and eight and three-fourths inches; "a moderate stoop would pass a man under the bridge, a sitting posture would do so, but one could not stand without being knocked off." At that time there were no danger-cords to give warning of approach to the bridge; a negro man once before had been killed at the same place. He was not a train hand; got on the cars, stood up, and was killed. It also appeared that the intestate was reared in the neighborhood, and *lived with his father, the family furnishing him with clothes; that he was only about a month over twenty-one years of age, and when not engaged on the road worked for his father; that after going on the road, he had not assisted his father much in money matters, but had let him have some. He spent most of his wages for clothing, was an obedient, industrious, sober boy, getting a dollar a day as brakeman.

*544

The company offered no evidence, but upon the close of plaintiff's, moved for a non-suit, which the judge granted, among other things saying: "The evidence for the plaintiff showed this bridge had been in the position it then was for thirty years without any change in point of height or construction from its original place and location. I cannot see under the evidence any proof that defendants have been guilty of negligence in the building of this bridge, or in maintaining it as originally constructed by the builders of the road. On the other hand, the evidence appears to point clearly to the negligence of the deceased as at least contributory, both from his certain knowledge of the bridge from passing beneath it daily, and every time being required, in order to avoid danger, to incline his body, and from the fact that his face, from the location of the injury, was directed to the rear. Upon the familiar principles of law, that one who enters the service of another takes upon himself the ordinary risks incident to the employment, and that one who has contributed to the cause of the danger of which he complains cannot recover against another who also contributed to the same causes, either or both, and I cannot, from the evidence on the part of the plaintiff, avoid the conclusion that the non-suit should be granted. * * * As to the fifth and sixth grounds of the motion for non-suit, they are refused. I am not prepared to be the pioneer in this state in announcing as a principle of law that a parent has no beneficial interest in the life of a child after the majority of such child, or to say that in this particular case there was such a failure of proof of beneficial interest as to take the case for this reason from the jury," &c.

From this order of non-suit, the plaintiff appealed upon the following grounds:

1. "Because where there is any proof to sustain the allegation of the complaint, the question must go to the jury.

*545

*2. "The question of negligence was a mixed question of law and fact, and should have been submitted to the jury.

3. "The question of negligence should have been submitted to the jury, because it was proved that the company had notice, and knew, or ought to have known, that their bridge at Felton's Crossing was too low, and dangerous to its servants and employés.

4. "The proof showing that said bridge was too low, the defendant company was liable for injuries to its employés occasioned by improper and dangerous structures if the employé was in the discharge of his duty.

5. "Under the proof, the defendant company was liable to the administrator, plaintiff, for the death of his intestate.

6. "That his honor erred in holding that the deceased was chargeable with knowledge of the dangerous condition of the bridge, it being in proof that he was young and inexperienced, and had only been in railroad service about three months, and no evidence that he was ever notified of the dangerous condition of the bridge.

7. "The question of contributory negligence, and whether the plaintiff's intestate was chargeable with knowledge of the defect in the bridge, was a question for the jury, and should have been so submitted," &c.

At common law, a right of action for a personal injury dies with the person: actio personalis moritur cum persona. If death is instantaneous with the injury, no right of action accrues which can survive, according to the ancient principle that "in a civil court the death of a human being cannot be complained of as an injury, whether it results from the felonious assault or the carelessness of the party causing it." This was considered a defect in the law, and most of the states of the Union have passed laws upon the subject, more or less similar to the first English precedent, known as Lord Campbell's act. Our law provides as follows:

"Section 2183. Whenever the death of a person shall be caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of another, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and *recover damages in respect thereof, then and in every such case the person or corporation who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as make the killing in law a felony.

*546

"Section 2184. Every such action shall be for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, and children of the person whose death shall have been so caused, and shall be brought by or in the name of the executor or administrator of such person; and in every such action the jury may give such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively, for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought, and the amount so recovered shall be divided among the before-mentioned parties in such shares as they would have been entitled to if the deceased had died intestate and the amount recovered had been personal assets of his or her estate," &c.

The right of the administrator to recover is precisely the same as if Nelson T. Hooper had not been killed outright, but injured, and he were now suing the company for damages. In that view, did the Circuit judge commit error in granting the non-suit? That must depend upon the proper application of the doctrines of negligence, which most of the text writers say is not a fact, but an inference from facts considered in connection with the law. The intestate, Hooper, was in the employment of the company as a brakeman. In such case the rule is that "while it is true, on the one hand, that a workman or servant, on entering into an employment, by implication agrees that he will undertake the ordinary risks incident to the service in which he is engaged, it is also true, on the other hand, that the employer or master impliedly contracts that he * * * will also take due precaution to adopt and use such machinery, apparatus, tools, appliances, and means as are suitable and proper for the prosecution of the business in which his servants are engaged with a reasonable degree of safety to life and security against injury." Snow v. Housatonic R. R. Co., 8 Allen, 444.

Taking this as a proper expression of the rule, we agree with *the Circuit judge that when the road was built, the bridge at Felton's Crossing was a suitable "appliance," in so far as the safety of the employés was concerned, for there was ample room to pass the train in safety, and at that time it was not made the duty of any of the employés to be on the roof outside of the cars; but in 1870 or 1871, after the bridge was built, the company required the brakeman to be on the top, and a height of bridge which was ample before might not be a suitable "appliance" under the new conditions. We are not quite sure that maintaining the bridge at its former height afterwards, making it necessary for the brakeman to bend his body in order to escape injury, every time the train passed under it, was a full performance of the duty imposed upon the company in regard to the safety of their employés, or was one of the ordinary risks of the employment.

*547

But there is another principle which applies here. We think it is settled that an employé may waive the right to exact of his employer such appliances as the law in its strictness might require, and that as a general rule the acceptance of service, or remaining in the service without complaint after full knowledge of a permanent patent defect, amounts to such waiver as to that particular defect. After the change in the position of the brakeman, the bridge remained unchanged for ten years to 1881, when the intestate entered the service of the company as a brakeman, and after full knowledge of the condition of the bridge, continued in that service without complaint for three months before the accident occurred.

The principle is thus stated in Pierce on Railroads at page 379: "A servant who before the injury had knowledge of the defect in the road or machinery, or who having a reasonable opportunity to inform himself, ought to have known such defects, is presumed, by remaining in the company's service, to have assumed the risks of such voluntary exposure of himself, and cannot recover for an injury resulting therefrom; and his knowledge has the same effect whether the company or master was informed or ignorant of such defect. This rule applies with special force, where the defect or danger is obvious to the senses. A servant who knows the defect and peril takes the risk of dangerous imple*ments, * * * or of services of peculiar peril which he undertakes, and dangerous practices in which he participates; or of injuries resulting from the projecting roof of a station-house, or from bridges which are too low to allow him to ride standing upright on the top of the train, and he is ordinarily chargeable, from the fact of his entering the employment with knowledge of the height of such bridge, without notice or warning from the company,"

*548

&c., citing the cases of Owen v. N. Y. Cent. R. R. Co., 1 Lans., 108; Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Stricker, 51 Md., 47; Devitt v. Pacific R. R. Co., 50 Mo., 302; and Pittsburg & C. R. R. Co. v. Sentmeyer, 37 Leg. Int., 194.

This is certainly the general rule, but there are well recognized exceptions, in which such conclusion will not "necessarily follow," as in our own case of Lasure v. Graniteville Manufacturing Company, 18 S. C., 278, which was an action by a laborer in the employment of the defendant company for damages on account of personal injuries received in the fall of an elevated tramway, over which he was rolling cotton from the warehouse to the mill of the defendants. The distinction is thus stated by Mr. Pierce on the page before cited: "The knowledge from which it will be presumed that the servant took the risk must be such as will put him on his guard, and mere knowledge of a defect which does not inform him of the hazard is not conclusive that he assumed the risk or was negligent. The servant has been held not to be affected with such knowledge where he had a right to suppose the defect to be temporary in its character," &c. Snow v. Housatonic R. R. Co., supra. In this case the lowness of the bridge was permanent, patent, and certainly informed the intestate of the hazards incident to it.

Assuming then that the intestate took the risks incident to the condition of the bridge by his entering into the service of the company as a brakeman, and remaining in that service after he had full knowledge upon the subject, was there any proof of particular negligence on the part of the company or its agents at the time of the unfortunate accident, and which caused the same? We do not understand it to be claimed that at the time of the accident there was any such special act of negligence; and in that view there was no evidence to charge the company, whether *there was or was not any want of proper care on the part of the intestate himself. It is true the train was running fast, not, however, at greater speed than the maximum allowed (15 miles an hour) on the T rail. It was running from Belton towards Walhalla, in the face of a northeast storm of wind and rain. The intestate, as brakeman, was on the top of the cars without shelter, where his duty required him to be in foul as in fair weather, and the proof seems to indicate that, exposed as he was, and probably overlooking the fact that they were approaching Felton's Crossing, he put his hands in his overcoat pockets, turned his back to the pelting storm, and was dashed to death by the timbers of the bridge striking him on the back of the neck. However much to be regretted, we do not see, under all the circumstances, that it can be considered as other than a sad accident, the proximate cause of which was the failure of the intestate to observe the bridge, occasioned probably by his position in protecting himself from the storm.

*549

It is, however, strongly pressed upon the court that there were facts involved, and they should have been left to the jury. It is true, as this court has often ruled, that a non-suit for want of evidence should not be granted where there is any evidence to go to the jury, whose exclusive province it is to decide upon the weight of conflicting testimony. But we do not understand that the meaning of this rule is, that every question involving a fact must go to the jury, whether there is or is not proof to support it. If there is no conflicting evidence, and all is on one side, it may be the duty of a judge to direct a non-suit, as it would be a nugatory thing to send such an unsupported case to the jury. Brown v. Frost, 2 Bay, 126 [1 Am. Dec. 633]; Hopkins v. De Graffenreid, Ibid, 441; McCall v. Cohen, 16 S. C., 448 [42 Am. Rep. 641]. A high authority expresses the principle in this form: "The judge has to say whether any facts have been established by evidence, from which negligence may be reasonably inferred: the jurors have to say whether, from these facts, when submitted to them, negligence ought to be inferred. The relevancy of evidence, and whether any exist which tends to prove, or is capable of proving, negligence, is for the court." Pierce, 312.

There were no facts in the case, except as to the height of *the bridge and the absence of danger cords, the employment of the intestate as brakeman on the road, and as to his knowledge of the condition of the bridge. We agree with the Circuit judge, that the proof bearing upon these facts did not, in favor of the intestate, authorize a reasonable inference of negligence on the part of the company. As to the condition of the bridge and the employment of the intestate as brakeman there could be no doubt, and it seems to us, after making all proper allowance on account of his youth and inexperience, there could be as little as to his knowledge of the height of a bridge under which he had passed every day for three months.

*550

This view makes it unnecessary to consider the other question, which was so fully argued at the bar, as to whether, under our statute, a parent can recover damages resulting from the death of a son, who is over the age of twenty-one years, and acting for himself. As that question is not involved in the case, we prefer to reserve our opinion.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

21 S. C. 550

ALTEE v. SOUTH CAROLINA RAILWAY COMPANY.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Master and Servant ⟸272.]

In action by an employé against a railroad company to recover damages for an injury sustained while in its service, the complaint alleged negligence in the employment of plaintiff's co-laborers. Held, that evidence of the quality of such co-laborers was admissible as a link in the chain of evidence, and as such could not be objected to at the time when offered, even though it afterwards appeared that the injury had not resulted from any unfitness on the part of such co-laborers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 933–935; Dec. Dig. ⟸ 272.]

[2. Master and Servant ⟸113.]

Plaintiff having been struck and injured by the roof of a bridge while acting as brakeman on top of defendant's train, brought his action for damages. There being some evidence that he was put in such position by his employer, the railroad company; that the bridge was known to the defendant to be too low to permit a person to stand erect with safety on top of a passing car; and that plaintiff was uninformed and unwarned of this danger, the Circuit judge did not err in refusing to grant a non-suit or to direct a verdict for defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 225; Dec. Dig. ⟸113.]

*551

*3. This case distinguished from Davis v. Railroad Company, ante 93.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Carter v. Oliver Oil Co., 34 S. C. 216, 13 S. E. 419, 27 Am. St. Rep. 815.]

[4. Trial ⟸139.]

A judge may not order a verdict for defendant unless there has been a total failure of proof as to an essential allegation of the complaint, or where the facts proven do not constitute a cause of action. The distinction between directing a verdict and granting a new trial explained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 332, 333, 338–341, 365; Dec. Dig. ⟸ 139.]

[5. Appeal and Error ⟸110.]

There is no appeal from an order refusing a new trial, except where such refusal involves an error of law.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Webber v. Ahrens, 36 S. C. 587, 15 S. E. 732.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 740–748; Dec. Dig. ⟸110.]

[6. Appeal and Error ⟸987.]

[The Supreme Court has no jurisdiction to review errors of fact.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3893; Dec. Dig. ⟸987.]

[This case is also cited in Agnew v. Adams, 24 S. C. 89, without specific application.]

Before Aldrich, J., Richland, November, 1883.

This was an action by Oscar E. Altee against the South Carolina Railway Company, commenced in February, 1883, to recover $25,000 for the loss of an arm and other injuries sustained by him in being knocked from the top of a freight train, in the early morning of November 7, 1882, by the roof of a bridge, through which the train was passing, he being at the time an employé of the company and in his proper position as brakeman. The jury rendered a verdict for plaintiff for $5,000, and judgment was accordingly entered.

The presiding judge, in refusing a motion for new trial, said:

Believing, as I do, that twelve sensible men of business, selected for their integrity, are quite as apt to be right on a question of fact as one judge, I am very loath to assume such a responsibility. It is true, where a verdict is rendered from prejudice or passion, against the evidence, I would not hesitate to grant the motion; yet, if there is evidence to support it, I am very unwilling to set up my individual judgment against the sworn verdict of the twelve men, who know the witnesses and are much better qualified to judge of the credit to be given to each and all than I possibly can be.

It is true, in this case there is but one witness who testifies to the facts connected with the injury for which the plaintiff claims damages—the plaintiff himself. This point was very earnestly and ably urged in the argument, but in the very nature of the case it could not be otherwise; the conductor and the other two brakemen were on the engine. The plaintiff was sent to the top of the train to see that the brakes were off, and to flag down an approaching train to avoid a collision. In the performance of *this duty he was knocked off and received the injuries of which he complains. I see and fully appreciate the argument that the defendant railroad may be put to disadvantages if the story of the injured employé is held to be conclusive against the corporation, yet, if the rule prevailed that the injured employé cannot recover unless his statement is supported by other witnesses, he would be without redress in cases like the present, although the railroad defendant may be guilty of the grossest negligence. It is for this very reason that the verdict of the jury is entitled to the very highest consideration, when it is supported by facts and circumstances. They know the witnesses, who have been examined in their presence, and can much better judge of their credibility and the motives prompting them in making their statements than the presiding judge.

*552

Now, what are the facts here? The covering to the bridge was too low. The defendant railroad knew it, and had known it for sixteen years. They also knew that the law requires them to supply safe appliances for the protection of their employés. They failed to warn the plaintiff of the danger of passing under that bridge standing erect on a freight car, contenting themselves with the position that every employé takes the risk of the employment; and further, that this defect of construction was so patent that every man of common sense and ordinary observation was bound to see and know it; that the plaintiff did know it, and contributed to the injury by his reckless and careless conduct.

The plaintiff says: I did not know it; I was not warned of the danger; I complained of the brakemen who were sent out on the train with me, that they were green hands; the night was dark, and a heavy fog at the river; I was sent up there to put off brakes, and signal the approaching train to avoid a serious collision, and while thus engaged, was knocked off, my right arm torn from my body, my skull fractured, and received other injuries, which greatly endangered my life, and from which I suffered much physical pain and mental anxiety. Now, it is true, this plaintiff was contradicted by two witnesses, who say that he did know of the danger, for on that very night he had warned one of the green hands not to stand erect passing over the bridge. But one of *these witnesses was directly contradicted in a very important statement. The plaintiff was recalled, and swore most emphatically that he never made the statement, for he was ignorant of the danger until he was struck in the head. This is the case as it was given to the jury on a very favorable charge from the court, every one of the defendant's requests to charge was allowed, and the jury was emphatically instructed as follows:

*553

"The question for you is: Did not the plaintiff know of the structure of that bridge from previous experience? Did he warn his co-brakeman at Jamison's that there was danger of being knocked off, standing erect? These are questions for you. Is it incumbent on the defendant railroad to go to the expense of raising all its bridge coverings, so as to enable brakemen to stand erect, when it is known to them by actual experience that they cannot go under without stooping? If this fact was known to the plaintiff, and he had been acting under that knowledge for ten weeks, however you may sympathize with him in his misfortune, you must ask yourselves, did he not contribute to his injury by his own negligence? If you come to that conclusion, your verdict will be for the defendant. Did the plaintiff use ordinary care on that occasion?

"You will consider that this bridge is over the main track; that it is permanent; that it has been there sixteen years, and if any man of ordinary prudence and care could not see and know it is dangerous to stand erect on a freight train passing over it. The bridge having been there so long, and suitable for the traffic of the road, it is not obligatory on the railroad company to pull it down and erect an uncovered bridge. The defendant is not bound to adopt all the modern improvements. Did the plaintiff, then, know of the structure and condition of this bridge when he re-entered the service of the defendant? He had been on the road before: did he have the opportunity to know? If he did know, or had the opportunity to know, the defendant is not liable.

"The case is before you: the plaintiff asks for a verdict for $25,000 on his own statement. The witnesses on the part of the defendant railroad, at Jamison's, swear positively and emphatically that he did know of the danger. It is argued these are interested witnesses, because they are employed by the defendant *railroad. It is for you to balance this interest and say if the plaintiff is not equally interested in maintaining his side of the case."

*554

To grant this motion, I must conclude that this verdict is without evidence, or manifestly against the weight of the evidence. If the evidence of the plaintiff is rejected, it is without evidence. If the testimony of the brakemen is received, it is manifestly against the weight of the evidence. That was the very question submitted to the jury. By their verdict they respond: We believe the plaintiff Altee; we do not believe the witnesses who contradicted him. I will not set up my opinion against theirs; the motion is refused.

Other matters are stated in the opinion. The defendant appealed upon the grounds there stated.

Messrs. W. H. Brawley and John T. Rhett, for appellant.

Messrs. Abney & Abney, contra.

November 14, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The respondent, while in the employment of the South Carolina Railway Company as brakeman, received the injury complained of, and for which the action below was brought. His proper place as brakeman was on top of the cars, and while standing erect on a box car, as it passed over the Congaree bridge on the morning of November 7, 1882, the overhead structure being too low for him thus to stand erect, he was struck by the timbers thereof and severely injured.

At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, a motion was made for non-suit on various grounds, which was refused, and at the close of the testimony on both sides, a motion was made by the defendant, that the court instruct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant on several grounds, which was also refused. The case then went to the jury, under the charge of the judge, the defendant having submitted fourteen requests, all of which were granted, except the latter part of the first. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for $5,000.

The defendant moved for a new trial, which being refused, the defendant has appealed upon the following five exceptions:

*555

"1. *Because the Circuit judge erred in admitting testimony of plaintiff Altee as to the inefficiency of his fellow-brakemen, and as to the train being behind its schedule time. 2. Because the Circuit judge erred in refusing to grant the motion for non-suit on grounds submitted at the trial. 3. Because the Circuit judge erred in refusing to instruct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant on grounds submitted at the trial. 4. Because the Circuit judge erred in refusing to grant a new trial on grounds submitted at trial. 5. Because the Circuit judge, in determining the motion for a new trial, did not exercise his discretion in weighing the testimony as required by law."

The questions of law raised in the appeal are: First, should the testimony of Altee (the plaintiff), referred to, have been excluded? Second, should a non-suit have been granted? Third, should the judge have directed a verdict for the defendant? and Fourth, should a new trial have been ordered?

The complaint alleged negligence to the defendant under two specifications: 1st. For carelessness and negligence in the employment of unfit and incompetent servants to serve as brakemen with the plaintiff, the incompetency and unfitness of said brakemen being known to the defendant, and in consequence of whose unfitness the plaintiff was exposed to more than ordinary risk and danger, from which his injury resulted. 2nd. For negligence in requiring him to discharge a duty on top of the box cars, which had to pass the Congaree bridge, a structure too low for him to stand erect on said cars in safety while passing, a fact which though known to the defendant was yet never communicated to the plaintiff, and of which he was entirely ignorant.

1st. The plaintiff was the first witness examined, and after a few questions propounded he was asked, "What sort of hands were Herron and Kinsman?" To this question the defendant objected, on the ground that any testimony as to the character of the employés of the company, or any other matter, unless it could be shown that their alleged inefficiency, or other matter, was one of the proximate causes of the injury, was incompetent. This objection was overruled, and this is the foundation of the first exception above. It appears to us that this objection was entirely premature, and was properly overruled at the time it was *made. One of the allegations in the complaint involved a charge of negligence in the employment of co-laborers with the plaintiff, and it was certainly pertinent to that issue to prove the "sort" of hands employed. The Circuit judge could not at this early stage of the case anticipate the future testimony, or a failure on the part of the plaintiff to follow up the testimony given, with evidence that these hands through their unfitness had caused the injury. In fact, the objection itself, or rather the ground of the objection, implies that such testimony would be competent in the event that the inefficiency of these servants constituted one of the proximate causes of the injury. It is true that in the progress of the case it was ascertained that this charge of negligence could not be sustained, and the case ultimately turned upon the second specification, as appears from the charge of the judge, the requests made to charge, and the grounds upon which the motion for a new trial was based. But at the time this testimony was introduced, it seems to us that it was pertinent and competent, and therefore there was no error in admitting it.

*556

2nd. As to the non-suit. "A non-suit is proper only where there is a total failure of testimony by the plaintiff as to his whole case, or to some material and essential part thereof." Carrier & Harris v. Dorrance, 19 S. C., 32, and the cases there cited. Now, here the negligence charged to the defendant was the fact that the plaintiff had been placed in a position where he was exposed to a danger of which he knew nothing, and of which he was not informed by the defendant, or furnished with any means or guards to warn him of its presence, although said danger was known to the defendant when the plaintiff was employed and placed in said position. Was there a total failure of testimony as to either of these allegations? We think not. On the contrary, the slightest examination of the evidence as reported will show that there was evidence as to all of them. There was evidence as to the place of the plaintiff as brakeman. There was evidence as to the fact that the Congaree bridge was too low to allow one to stand erect on the top of a car in safety as it passed said bridge. There was evidence as to the fact that the defendant knew the height of the bridge and the danger of plaintiff's position. And there was evidence that plaintiff was uninformed *as to this danger; certainly that the defendant had given him no information on the subject. These were the material allegations in the complaint, and we do not see how the Circuit judge could have granted a non-suit in the face of the testimony without invading the province of the jury as to the facts.

*557

The case before the court is a very different case from Davis v. Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company (ante, page 93), recently heard and decided by this court, in the character of the negligence alleged and of the testimony introduced. There the negligence complained of was a failure on the part of the company to furnish the brakeman with safe lanterns while in the discharge of his duty, and in negligently erecting a tank too close to the track. The plaintiff was non-suited by the Circuit judge because in his opinion the plaintiff failed entirely to introduce any testimony bearing upon the negligence alleged, and this court affirmed the judgment of the Circuit Court. Here, however, the negligence is of a different character. It consisted in exposing the plaintiff to a danger known to the defendant, but unknown to the plaintiff, and without any information or warning to him of the presence of such danger. This was the allegation in the complaint. It was the gist of the action, and the question before the court on the motion for non-suit was, is there any testimony as to these facts? The Circuit judge found that there was; he therefore refused the non-suit, and we think it was properly refused.

3d. Was it error on the part of the Circuit judge to refuse to instruct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant? We do not know any class of cases where a Circuit judge would be warranted in directing a verdict for the defendant, except where there has been a total failure of evidence as to any or all of the essential allegations in the complaint, or where, admitting the facts alleged, yet they do not constitute a cause of action; in other words, in cases where either a nonsuit for total absence of testimony would be proper, or where a demurrer for the want of a cause of action would be sustained. Should a clear case, in either of these categories, by some strange accident or oversight reach the jury, we see no reason why the Circuit judge should not direct a verdict for the defendant as matter of law.

*558

*The case before the court does not fall under either of these classes. It will not do to say that because a Circuit judge under our system is invested with power to grant new trials, that it follows he is also invested with power to direct a verdict in cases where, if the verdict should be in one way, he would feel compelled to grant a new trial. The power to grant a new trial is very different from that of directing a verdict. A verdict concludes the parties as to the facts of the case; whereas a new trial merely places them back as they stood originally, with the right of further investigation and the opportunity of having any errors corrected by a second trial. A verdict settles the facts, and is final; a new trial reopens the issue without prejudice. The first belongs to the jury; the second is under the control of the court.

4th. Was there error in refusing the motion for a new trial? It must be remembered that this court in cases at law has jurisdiction only as to the questions of law involved. It has no jurisdiction as to the facts, and its power on appeal extends in such cases only to the errors of law assigned. So that, in order to sustain an appeal in such cases, some error of law must be presented and shown to have been committed below. What error of law did the presiding judge commit here in refusing the motion for a new trial? Formerly, before the adoption of the constitution of 1868, the power to grant new trials belonged to the Appeal Court; since the adoption of the constitution, however, the Supreme Court organized thereunder has been denied the power of hearing such motions as an original proceeding, but this power has been conferred by act upon the Circuit Courts, to be exercised by such courts "in all cases where there has been a trial by jury, for reasons for which new trials have usually been granted in the courts of the United States." This power has been invoked in the Circuit Courts most usually upon the facts; as, for instance, where the preponderance of the testimony has been the one way or the other, for excessive damages, and the like. In such cases, the judgment of the Circuit Court is final, and it cannot be reviewed here, because no question but one of fact is involved. Brickman v. S. C. Railroad Company, 8 S. C., 173; Steele v. C., C. & A. R. R. Co., 11 Id., 591.

Where the court below, however, declines to exercise this *power, on the ground that it has not been invested with it, his refusal is appealable, and his judgment may be reviewed, because here would be a question of law, to wit, the existence of the power. State v. David, 14 S. C., 428, and Wood v. Atlanta and Charlotte R. R. Co., 19 Id., 582. And also where the jury refuses to take the law from the court and finds a verdict in direct conflict with the charge of the judge as to some legal proposition laid down governing the case; for the same reason as above, a refusal of a new trial in such a case would be subject to review by this court. Dent v. Bryce, 16 S. C., 1. The case before the court does not involve either of these questions.

*559

Nor does it, as far as we can see, present any error of law connected with the refusal of the new trial. The Circuit judge, after rendering an oral decision upon this motion, filed a written opinion therein, giving his reasons fully for the refusal. There being no controversy as to the law of the case as laid down by the judge, and all the requests to charge having been in the main granted, there was nothing left but the facts, and the jury having found these in favor of the plaintiff, the judge did not feel at liberty to arrest the verdict; and involving, as the motion did, questions of fact only, or at least substantially, its refusal is unappealable.

No exception having been taken to the charge of the judge, nor any error assigned because of omission on his part to charge defendant's requests, the case here has been free from those important questions of negligence, contributory or otherwise, usually introduced in such cases. We have, therefore, not found it necessary to discuss such questions. On the contrary, the appeal having been based mainly upon the refusal of the non-suit, the refusal to direct the verdict and to order a new trial, and therefore involving only questions of law governing such motions, we have confined ourselves to the questions thus involved, and finding no legal principles applicable to such motions violated in the judgment below,

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

21 S. C. *560

*WHALEY v. GAILLARD, County Treasurer. DE SAUSSURE v. SAME.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. States ⟸113.]

The legislation of this state in relation to the public debt, beginning with the joint resolution of June 8, 1877, was designed to ascertain judicially, by the rules and principles of law that regulate contracts between individuals, what was the valid debt of the state, and to make ample provision for the punctual payment of interest thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 112; Dec. Dig. ⟸113.]

[2. Constitutional Law ⟸142.]

The state having by statute constituted a special court for the purpose of determining the validity of any of her obligations declared by the bond commission to be invalid, and having permitted herself to be sued therein, and suits having been then brought against the state by certain persons claiming to be her creditors and representing every class of the securities so reported to be invalid, and an adjudication having been made by the Supreme Court of this state, and no writ of error taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, as was authorized by such statute, the state by subsequent legislation provided a mode by which the percentage of invalidity in its outstanding bonds under this decision of the court should be ascertained, and then directed other bonds to be issued by the state treasurer for so much of the outstanding bonds as were found to be valid, and in exchange therefor, and prohibited county treasurers from receiving any coupons in payment of taxes, except those of such new issue of bonds. Held, that this legislation did not impair the obligation of a contract by the state with her bondholders, whereby she had agreed to receive the coupons of her bonds in payment of taxes, but only provided a mode by which it would be definitely and easily ascertained whether a coupon so offered represented any portion of her valid debt, and was therefore receivable in payment of taxes.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in McLure v. Melton, 24 S. C. 567, 58 Am. Rep. 272.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 323; Dec. Dig. ⟸142.]

[3. States ⟸191.]

The state having permitted herself to be sued in a prescribed mode, and having invited all persons asserting certain claims against her to appear and establish them, a person holding such claims but neglecting to appear and litigate them cannot afterwards maintain an action against the state by another proceeding not permitted by the state; nor can he maintain an action against the officers of the state for refusing to do that which the laws of the state forbid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 184; Dec. Dig. ⟸191.]

[4. Taxation ⟸527.]

The act entitled "an act to facilitate the collection of taxes," (16 Stat., 785) was not designed to afford the bondholders a means of reopening the question of what is the valid debt of the state (which has been otherwise finally determined), and does not, therefore, apply to cases where coupons of bonds issued by the state are tendered in payment of taxes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 970–978; Dec. Dig. ⟸527.]

*561

[5. Taxation ⟸527.]

*Besides, such act afforded a remedy only where the treasurer illegally and wrongfully refused to receive payment of taxes in the "funds and moneys" tendered; and refusal by such officer to receive coupons declared by the Supreme Court of this state to be invalid is not an illegal or wrongful refusal. And if such decision of the Supreme Court should now be reversed, such reversal could not make illegal the acts of an officer previously done under a statute of the legislature passed in accordance with the decision of her court of last resort.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 977; Dec. Dig. ⟸527.]

[6. Constitutional Law ⟸49.]

A statute which conflicts with any provision of the constitution is a nullity, although there are other provisions with which it does not conflict. Therefore, where this court decided that the "act to authorize a loan for the relief of the treasury" (14 Stat., 182) did not violate the last two clauses of art. IX., § 7, of the Constitution (Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller General, 4 S. C., 430); and afterwards decided (Bond Debt Cases, 12 S. C., 200) that this act was null and void, because in conflict with two other clauses of this same section of the constitution, bonds issued under this act which were acquired between the filing of these two decisions are affected by the later decision, and are not valid claims against the state.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in City Council of Anderson v. Fowler, 48 S. C. 16, 25 S. E. 900; State v. Tucker, 56 S. C. 523, 35 S. E. 215.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 47; Dec. Dig. ⟸49.]

[7. States ⟸119; Statutes ⟸119.]

This act for the relief of the treasury attempted to create a public debt which was not for the purpose of defraying any "extraordinary expenditures of the state," nor was it authorized "for some single object," nor was such object "distinctly specified therein." The act, therefore, was in conflict with art. IX., § 7, of the constitution, and null and void.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Town Council of Chester, 39 S. C. 317, 17 S. E. 752; McCullough v. Brown, 41 S. C. 243, 19 S. E. 458, 23 L. R. A. 410.

For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 118; Dec. Dig. ⟸119; Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 164–167; Dec. Dig. ⟸119.]

[8. Constitutional Law ⟸70.]

Whether the expenditure to be defrayed is "ordinary" or "extraordinary" is not left exclusively to the determination of the legislature, but will be adjudicated by the courts when the question is raised.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 129–132, 137; Dec. Dig. ⟸70.]

[9. States ⟸119.]

Under an act which authorized the governor to borrow $1,000,000 on coupon bonds of the state, $1,000,000 in bonds were issued, and subsequently there was a second issue of like amount. Held, that the bonds of this second issue were invalid; for the act did not authorize the substitution of new bonds for the debt incurred by the issue of the first bonds, nor did it authorize a new and additional debt to be created by a second or other issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 118; Dec. Dig. ⟸119.]

[10. States ⟸113.]

The consolidation act (15 Stat., 518) was not passed as is required by the Constitution where a public debt is to be created, and, therefore, did not make anything a public debt that was not at that time a valid obligation of the state.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Feldman & Co. v. City Council of Charleston, 23 S. C. 66, 55 Am. Rep. 6.

For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 112; Dec. Dig. ⟸113.]

[11. States ⟸113.]

An act of the Legislature cannot create a public debt of the state unless the constitutional requirements are complied with, notwithstanding the fact that the effect of such act as a whole reduces the volume of the public debt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 112; Dec. Dig. ⟸113.]

[12. States ⟸113.]

The Legislature cannot contract a debt except as authorized by the *Constitution, and the consolidation act not having been so passed as to create a debt, any contract, whether by compromise or otherwise, attempted by that act was without authority and not binding upon the state.

*562

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 112; Dec. Dig. ⟸113.]

[13. States ⟸147.]

This consolidation act was a proposition addressed to bondholders individually, and not to them as a class, nor did it require from any person a surrender of all his bonds in order to be entitled to an exchange of any of them. It cannot, therefore, be called a composition by the state with her creditors. This case distinguished from Lost Bonds Case, 15 S. C., 224.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 156; Dec. Dig. ⟸147.]

14. Bond Debt Cases (9, 11, 21, 29), 12 S. C., 200, affirmed.

[This case is also cited in Robertson v. Tillman, 39 S. C. 304, 305, 17 S. E. 678; Ehrlich v. Jennings, 78 S. C. 277, 58 S. E. 922, 125 Am. St. Rep. 795, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Kershaw, J., Charleston, February, 1883.

These were two actions, under the act of December 24, 1878 (16 Stat., 785), to recover money paid for taxes, one being by B. J. Whaley against P. C. Gaillard, treasurer of Charleston county, and the other by L. D. DeSaussure against the same defendant. They were tried together.

The plaintiffs requested the presiding judge to charge as follows:

1. That the provisions of the act of December 22, 1873, were in the nature of proposals to the creditors of the state, and when the consolidation bonds were issued under said act and taken by the creditors, a contract was consummated between them and the state as fully as if all the provisions of the act had been embodied as express stipulations in the most formal instrument signed by the parties.

2. That the pledge that the coupons of the bonds so issued should be received in payment of all taxes due the state during the year in which they matured, except for the taxes levied for the public schools, formed a part of the contract, and was the security offered to the creditors. That the act of the legislature of South Carolina, entitled "an act to raise supplies and make appropriations for the fiscal year commencing November 1, 1881," in so far as it prohibited the county treasurer from receiving the coupons of the consolidated bonds referred to in the complaint in payment of the taxes levied by said act, is null and void, as repugnant to article I., section 10, of the constitution of the United States.

*563

*3. That the validity of the bonds for the relief of the treasury, issued under the act of 1869, which were surrendered to the state by the Yonkers Savings Bank in May, 1875, must be determined according to the law as it was judicially construed to be in the case of Morton, Bliss & Co. v. The Comptroller General, and were valid obligations of the state. That the decision subsequently made by the Supreme Court of the state in the State Bond Cases cannot receive a retroactive effect without impairing the obligation of contracts long before entered into.

4. That by the act of August 26, 1868, the governor of the state was authorized to borrow on the credit of the state, on coupon bonds, within twelve months from the passage of the act, a sum not exceeding $1,000,000, or as much thereof as he might deem necessary to pay interest on the public debt. That the governor was invested with full discretion, and was clothed with full authority, in determining the necessity for the issue of the bonds, the mode of their issue, and the amount of bonds to be issued in order to raise the sum of money required; and bona fide holders for value of the bonds issued by him, or of the coupons of such bonds, had no means of knowing in what manner the governor exercised this discretion, and they cannot be affected by any abuse of authority by him. That by the recital on the face of the bonds that they were issued under the act approved August 26, 1868, the state, as against a bona fide holder for value, was estopped from disputing the truth of such representation.

5. That the legislature having, with a full knowledge of all the facts connected with the alleged over-issue of the bonds for the payment of interest on the public debt, authorized the funding of the said bonds, has waived said objections and validated the bonds.

6. That the settlements made between the state and the Yonkers Savings Bank of New York, in May, 1875, and between the state and Levy & Borg, on October 13, 1875, were such compromises of doubtful rights as are sufficient foundation for an agreement and consideration for a contract; and the validity of the new bonds issued to the Yonkers Savings Bank and to Levy & Borg rests upon these contracts and compromises, and not upon the validity of the surrendered and cancelled securities.

*564

*7. That the settlement made in May, 1875, between the State of South Carolina and the Yonkers Savings Bank was a unity, and the state cannot set it aside in part while it retains the Land Commission bonds surrendered by the Yonkers Savings Bank at the time said settlement was made, and the same rule applies to the settlement between the state and Levy & Borg, of October, 1875.

These requests were all refused, and the judge then charged the jury as follows:

"Gentlemen of the Jury: Under the present condition of the law affecting this case, as determined by the Supreme Court, and the legislation connected therewith, you are directed, on the pleadings and the evidence submitted, to find a verdict for the defendant."

Verdict for defendant and judgment entered accordingly.

The plaintiffs appealed upon exceptions alleging error in the judge's charge and in his refusal to charge as requested.

Messrs. Lord & Inglesby, Buist & Buist, Simonton & Barker, Simons & Seigling, and T. M. Mordecai, for appellants.

As an appeal lies in these cases to the Supreme Court of the United States, it is important to examine the questions presented in the light of the decisions of that court—12 S. C., 271. The coupons tendered are void under the decision in the Bond Debt Cases, but we ask a reconsideration of that decision. As to the bonds for the relief of the treasury, we contend that the decision in 4 S. C., 430, applied to all bonds of the class there considered; and at the session of the legislature next succeeding, the act was passed under which these consols were issued; the bonds were thus acquired under the law as then declared, and cannot be affected by subsequent statutes or decisions. 12 S. C., 282. The objections now urged are different from those then urged, but were as apparent then as now. 101 U. S., 677. As to the second issue of bonds to pay interest, we submit that the act did not limit the governor to a single issue, but that he had authority to borrow $1,000,000 within twelve months. He had full discretion and authority to determine the necessity, the mode, and *the amount of issue. 12 S. C., 275; 103 U. S., 696. If he has been guilty of irregularity, or even of fraud, the state must be the loser, and not an innocent holder. Dixon County v. Field, 111 U. S., 83. With full knowledge of all the facts, the legislature has waived all objections and validated the bonds by directing them to be funded. 4 S. C., 430. The consolidation act was a compromise and composition made by the state with her creditors. 105 U. S., 278; Story Cont., § 449; Story Eq. Jur., 129–131; 6 Cl. & Fin., 911; 4 Ves., 840; 5 Peters, 99; 4 Metc., 270; 2 Strob. Eq., 258; 15 S. C., 232. The consolidation act did not require a two-thirds vote, to be recorded by yeas and nays, because it did not create a further debt, nor was it for an extraordinary expenditure, nor the appropriation of money needing a new tax levy. It provided for a reduction of the ascertained debt of the state, and for its reduction, liquidation, and redemption. It reduced the public debt by several millions of dollars.

*565

Mr. Clarence A. Seward, same side.

The Attorney General, contra, argued that the decision in the Bond Debt Cases was correct. He further contended that the contract of the state was only to receive coupons of valid consolidation bonds in payment of taxes. There are coupons outstanding of invalid bonds having the similitude of valid bonds. Whether valid or invalid, the county treasurer cannot determine, and therefore he is required to receive coupons of the recognized valid or brown bonds. The state can protect herself, by reasonable requirements, from receiving invalid coupons; and she does not thereby impair the obligation of her contract. These requirements constitute a part of the remedy provided by the state, and the only limitation upon the state is that there must be an adequate and efficacious remedy. The remedy provided is analogous to that given by the act of 1877 (16 Stat., 302), approved in 101 U. S., 437. See too 107 U. S., 769. In those cases, the proceedings to determine the validity of the bills or coupons tendered were to be taken after tender, while here they are to be taken before tender; but the principle is the same.

*566

The validity *of the seventh section of act of 1882 must be determined by the law as declared when these coupons were tendered. Under the act to facilitate the collection of taxes, only such amount can be recovered as was wrongfully and illegally collected. The county treasurer is bound to obey the law as declared by the courts; the law forbade him to receive these coupons. 107 U. S., 712. The plaintiffs here have another and full remedy—they can demand brown consols from the state treasurer in exchange for their green bonds; and if that officer refuses, they can apply for a writ of mandamus, and thus have the question of their validity determined. 107 U. S., 781.

Mr. L. F. Youmans, same side.

November 14, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. These two cases, involving as they do similar general principles, were heard and will be considered together. The plaintiffs tendered to the county treasurer in payment of their taxes certain coupons of bonds, alleged to have been issued under the provisions of an act entitled "an act to reduce the volume of the public debt and provide for the payment of the same," approved December 22, 1873 (15 Stat., 518), which were refused by him upon the ground that said coupons had been adjudged by the decision of this court, in the Bond Debt Cases (12 S. C., 200), not to be valid obligations of the state, and their receipt in payment of taxes had been forbidden by law. Thereupon these actions were instituted to recover the amounts mentioned in said coupons, the plaintiffs claiming a right so to do, under the provisions of an act entitled "an act to facilitate the collection of taxes," approved December 24, 1878 (16 Stat., 785), and incorporated in the general statutes of 1882, as sections 268, 269, and 270, the avowed object being to obtain from this court a reconsideration of its former decision in the Bond Debt Cases, supra, with the view of carrying the question involved to the Supreme Court of the United States; but whether this object can be attained by these proceedings will be hereinafter considered.

*567

*The legislation of this state, a brief abstract of which is given in the pleadings, beginning with the joint resolution adopted June 8, 1877, was manifestly designed to ascertain judicially by the rules and principles of law which regulate contracts between individuals, what was the valid debt of the state, and to make ample provision for the prompt and punctual payment of the interest on the debt so ascertained. In pursuance of this manifest design the legislature first directed a committee of its members, usually called the "Bond Commission," to make a thorough investigation of the debt of the state, and report all the facts, together with their conclusions, to that body. When that report was made, the legislature, without undertaking to decide for itself the various questions raised in said report, as to the validity of a large portion of the alleged debt of the state, and notwithstanding the fact that the state could not be sued without its consent, voluntarily threw down the barriers which exempted it from suit, established a special court, consisting of three of the Circuit judges of the state, called the "Court of Claims," invested it with jurisdiction "to hear and determine any case or cases brought to test the validity" of any of the bonds or other obligations of the state reported by the "Bond Commission" as invalid, and provided for a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the state, together "with a right of appeal by writ of error or otherwise, as provided by law, to the Supreme Court of the United States." Joint resolution, approved March 22, 1878, 16 Stat., 669.

Several of those holding bonds or coupons, reported as invalid by the "Bond Commission," embracing all of the various classes so reported, brought suits thereon against the state in the Court of Claims, and from the judgment of that court in favor of the state, appeals were taken to the Supreme Court of the state, which court, on September 29, 1879, rendered its decision, adjudging all of the various classes of bonds there brought in question to be valid obligations of the state, except those issued under an act entitled "an act to authorize a loan for the relief of the treasury," approved February 17, 1869 (14 Stat., 182), and the second issue of bonds under an act entitled "an act to authorize a state loan to pay interest on the public debt," approved August 26, 1868 (14 Stat., 18), which, together with the consolidation *bonds, issued in exchange therefor, under the act of December 22, 1873, cited above, and usually designated as the "consolidation act," were declared invalid. The coupons in question in these cases belong to the classes so declared to be invalid. From this decision no appeal was taken, either by writ of error or otherwise, and so far as we are informed, from the time when it was rendered, September 29, 1879, to the time of the commencement of these actions, December 5, 1882, and January 3, 1883, no person claiming to be a creditor of the state has instituted any proceedings to ascertain or enforce any liability on the part of the state on either of the two classes of bonds thus adjudged to be invalid, or any consolidation bond issued in exchange therefor.

*568

After the judgment of the Supreme Court of the state, above mentioned, was rendered, there being no intimation of any appeal therefrom, the legislature of the state passed an act entitled "an act to provide for the settlement of the consolidated debt of the state, in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court of South Carolina," approved December 23, 1879 (17 Stat., 104), which, with an amendment thereto, approved February 19, 1880 (17 Stat., 240), provided, amongst other things, for the appointment of a special commissioner, whose duty it should be to eliminate from the original consolidation bonds, presented for that purpose, so much thereof as had been adjudged to be invalid, reporting his action in the premises from time to time to the state treasurer, and for a new issue of consolidation bonds of a different color from the original, representing so much of the debt as had been adjudged to be valid.

In pursuance of these provisions a very large amount of the original consolidation bonds, which were colored green, and are usually designated as "green bonds" or "green consols," were exchanged for the new consolidation bonds, colored brown, and are usually designated as "brown bonds" or "brown consols," and represent the valid unquestioned debt of the state, the coupons on which are received for taxes, or are promptly paid on presentation. But as it was impossible to tell whether a "green bond" represented in whole or in part, and if so what part, any portion of the valid debt of the state, without an examination of the records of the office of the treasurer of the state, where the *various reports of the special commissioner above mentioned were filed, the various county treasurers of the state are not allowed to receive the coupons of the "green bonds" in payment of taxes until they have been examined, and any invalidity which they may contain eliminated and the valid portion converted into "brown bonds."

*569

It seems, therefore, that the scope and effect of this legislation was not to impair the obligation of any contract entered into by the state with its bondholders, whereby the state had agreed to receive the coupons of certain bonds in payment of taxes, but was simply to provide a mode of proceeding by which it could be definitely and easily ascertained whether a coupon offered in payment of taxes represented any portion of the valid debt of the state; for, unless it did, there certainly was no contract on the part of the state that it should be received in payment of taxes. It was in close analogy to the proceeding prescribed for ascertaining whether bills of a bank owned and controlled by the state, and which had been declared receivable in payment of taxes, were valid obligations of the state, and as such entitled to be received for taxes. Tennessee v. Sneed, 96 U. S. 69 [24 L. Ed. 610].

As is said by Waite, C. J., in South Carolina v. Gaillard, 101 U. S., at page 437 [25 L. Ed. 937], in speaking of similar legislation: "It does no more than provide a way of determining whether bills offered in payment of taxes are binding on the state." It certainly cannot be pretended that because a taxpayer tenders in payment of his taxes a coupon of a bond purporting to be a consolidation bond of the state, colored green, that the state and its fiscal officers are bound to receive it without question as to whether it is valid or invalid; and as the state cannot be sued except with its own consent, and then only in the mode which it permits, it follows necessarily that the only mode by which the validity of the coupon so offered in payment of taxes can be tested is that which has been prescribed by the state.

It is contended, however, that the plaintiffs in these actions were not parties to any of the actions instituted in the Court of Claims, and are, therefore, not bound by any adjudication therein. This position might possibly be very well maintained if the defence here was based simply on the doctrine of res adjudicata; but that *is not the ground upon which the defence rests. The true ground is, that as the state could not be sued except with its own consent, and then only in the mode which it had seen fit to prescribe, and as the state did prescribe a mode by which it could be sued, and the validity of its debt tested upon the same principle by which the contracts of individuals are tested, and having invited all persons having claims against it, whose claims were disputed, to come in and assert and establish their claims, one who has failed to avail himself of the opportunity thus offered, cannot afterward, in another proceeding, not permitted by the state, maintain an action against the state, or against any of its officers, for refusing to do that which the laws of the state forbid. Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U. S., 711 [2 Sup. Ct. 128, 27 L. Ed. 448]; Antoni v. Greenhow, 107 U. S. 769 [2 Sup. Ct. 91, 27 L. Ed. 468].

*570

But appellants contend that the act of 24th December, 1878, entitled "an act to facilitate the collection of taxes" (16 Stat., 785), expressly authorizes the plaintiffs to bring these actions against the county treasurer when their coupons have been tendered for taxes and refused. This position is, we think, based upon a total misconception of the true meaning of that act. It certainly never was designed to afford an opportunity to a bondholder to reopen the question as to the validity of any portion of the state debt, which it was supposed had been determined by the decision of this court in the Bond Debt Cases, from which no intimation of appeal had been given. The very object of the legislation of the state hereinbefore considered, was, as we have seen, to obtain a final determination of the question of the validity of the state debt; and certainly the legislature, by an act passed nearly a year before such final determination was reached, never intended to afford the means of reopening any of the questions thus finally determined. In addition to this, the phraseology of the act shows that it was never designed to afford a remedy to the bondholder in case his coupons were refused when tendered for taxes, but was intended solely to afford a remedy in case bills of the bank of the state were refused when tendered for taxes.

But even if it should be conceded that the terms of the act to facilitate the collection of taxes were broad enough to cover a case in which coupons of bonds purporting to be

*571

bonds of the state *are refused when tendered for taxes, as well as a case in which taxes are tendered and refused in other "funds and moneys" than the collecting officers are authorized, by the act levying such taxes, to receive, we do not see how these actions can be maintained. By the express terms of the act it must be made to appear that the county treasurer has illegally and wrongfully refused to receive payment of the taxes assessed against the plaintiff, in anything else but "gold and silver coin, United States currency, national bank notes, and coupons which shall become payable during the year 1882, on the valid consolidation bonds of this state known as 'brown bonds,'" as required to do by the 7th section of the "act to raise supplies and make appropriations for the fiscal year commencing November 1, 1881," approved February 9, 1882, 17 Stat., 1070. Practically this last mentioned act forbids county treasurers from receiving in payment of taxes any coupons of bonds which have not been ascertained in the manner prescribed by the legislation hereinbefore mentioned to be valid obligations of the state.

Now if, as we have seen, the state had the right to prescribe the mode by which the validity of any bond purporting to be an obligation of the state should be tested and determined, and if, as we have also seen, such mode was prescribed, and the validity of all the various classes of bonds purporting to be obligations of the state was passed upon and finally determined, it would seem to follow necessarily that the state had a perfect right to forbid its officers, charged with the collection of its revenue from receiving in payment of taxes any coupons or other form of obligation which had not only not been adjudged to be a valid obligation of the state, but which, on the contrary, had been expressly adjudged to be invalid. There certainly can be nothing illegal or wrongful in an officer of the state yielding obedience to a law of the state passed in the usual form, in pursuance of a judgment of its highest judicial tribunal, from which there had been no appeal to the tribunal of last resort, although express provision had been made for such appeal.

Even, therefore, if it be conceded that the language of the act to facilitate the collection of taxes could, by a liberal construction, be regarded as broad enough to cover a case in which cou*pons had been refused when tendered for taxes prior to the adjudication of the validity of the state debt, or in a case which might subsequently arise in which coupons of the "brown bonds" should be refused when tendered for taxes, if the legislature should hereafter see fit to prohibit the reception of such coupons for taxes, yet it is very clear that it cannot apply to the present case, in which the coupons refused have already been adjudged invalid. The decision in the Bond Debt Cases, whether right or wrong, settles the law of the state until it is reversed or overruled by competent authority, and until that is done any act passed by the legislature in pursuance of the principles there determined must be regarded as the law of the land to which every officer is bound to yield obedience, and his act in doing so cannot be characterized as either illegal or wrongful.

*572

We do not see, therefore, how the correctness of the principles determined in the Bond Debt Cases can be brought under review in these cases, so as to determine their decision. For even if it should now be determined that there was error in that decision in holding that the second issue of bonds to pay interest on the public debt, and the bonds issued for the relief of the treasury, together with the bonds issued in exchange therefor under the provisions of the "consolidation act" of 1873, were not valid obligations of the state, and that the coupons tendered by the plaintiffs in payment of their taxes are valid obligations of the state, we do not see how this could affect the result in the present actions. At the time the coupons were tendered and refused, the law, as it was then settled, justified such refusal, and any subsequent change in the law, either by statute or judicial decision, cannot affect a transaction occurring before such change in the law. Ohio Life Insurance and Trust Company v. Debolt, 16 How., 432 [14 L. Ed. 997]; Gelpeke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall., 206 [17 L. Ed. 520]; Lee County v. Rogers, 7 Wall. 181 [19 L. Ed. 160].

But was there any error in the decision in the Bond Debt Cases? According to the proper practice appellants applied for and obtained leave to be heard against some of the points determined in that case, and the questions involved have been ably and elaborately argued on both sides. We must say, however, that the additional light thus thrown upon these questions only *serves to convince us more fully of the correctness of the former decision. We do not propose to go over the ground covered by the former opinions, which will be found at page 263 and page 294 of 12 South Carolina Reports, but shall confine our attention to those points which it is supposed, erroneously however, were not fully considered before; for although some of the points now relied upon may not have been discussed in either of the former opinions, yet the most, if not all of them, were carefully considered in reaching our conclusion.

*573

First, it is contended that the act to authorize a loan for the relief of the treasury had been adjudged to be constitutional by the decision of the Supreme Court of this state in the case of Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller General, 4 S. C., 430, and that the subsequent decision in the Bond Debt Cases, holding this act to be unconstitutional, cannot affect the rights of those who acquired their bonds issued under that act and funded them in consolidation bonds under the act of 1873, as they "must be regarded as having acquired the bonds so surrendered upon the faith of the law as it was then declared to be, and their rights cannot be affected by any subsequent change in the law, whether such change be effected by statute or by judicial decision."

The decision in Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller General was rendered August 27, 1873, and the facts as gathered from the records in these cases are: That Whaley acquired the coupon upon which his action is based about November 9, 1882, from Eames & Moore, who had funded bonds under the consolidation act on October 14, 1874, but when they acquired the bonds which they then funded, whether before or after the decision in Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller General, does not appear. The other plaintiff, DeSaussure, acquired the coupons upon which his action is based on March 11, 1878, from Levy & Borg, and from the Yonkers Savings Bank, who had funded bonds under the consolidation act, the one in May and the other in October, 1875; but it does not appear whether they, or either of them, acquired the bonds so funded before or after the decision of the case of Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller General.

It seems, therefore, that Whaley acquired his coupon after the change in the law (as it is called) by the decision in the Bond *Debt Cases, and DeSaussure acquired his after the investigation into the validity of the state debt had been announced, and after the report of the bond commission had been made (February 7, 1878), by which the bonds from which his coupons were taken had been reported as invalid, and were soon after so adjudged to be. So that the doctrine relied upon cannot apply to these cases.

*574

But in addition to this the position of the plaintiffs cannot be maintained, because, conceding the correctness of the abstract proposition of law upon which it rests, it is based upon an entire misconception of the scope and effect of the decision in the case of Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller General. That case did not decide that the "act to authorize a loan for the relief of the treasury," was constitutional, but it simply decided that the objections to the constitutionality of that act, which were interposed in that case, were not tenable. The only objections there urged were, 1st, that the act was in violation of that clause of the constitution which required that no law providing for the contracting of a public debt should take effect "until it shall have been passed by the vote of two-thirds of the members of each branch of the general assembly," and 2d, the clause which declared that "every such law shall levy a tax annually sufficient to pay the annual interest of such debt," and the construction there given to these two clauses was recognized and followed in the Bond Debt Cases.

But when the question was presented, in the last mentioned case, whether the act in question was in conflict with two other distinct and separate clauses of the constitution, neither of which was construed, or considered, or even mentioned in the former case, it was clearly the duty of this court to construe those two clauses, and determine whether the act in question was in conflict with both or either of them. It is perfectly manifest from the language used by the court in Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller General, that they did not undertake to decide anything whatever, except whether the objections there urged to the constitutionality of that act were well founded. At page 462 of 4 S. C. Reports, the language is: "The objection of the respondent to the constitutionality of the acts in question, on the *ground that no such provision was made by tax for the payment of annual interest, is not well taken." Again, at page 467: "It must, therefore, be concluded that a vote of two-thirds of the members present at the time the vote was taken, satisfies the requirements of the constitution. The respondent's objections, in this respect, are not well taken." And again, on the same page: "We have now considered all the objections urged by the respondent involving the question of the constitutionality of the five acts of the legislature, set forth in the relator's petition, and find that they present no just ground of objection to the validity of either of such acts."

*575

This language of the court, thus carefully confining their decision to the points made in that case, was well calculated to put the bondholders, as well as the general public, upon their guard, by showing that the court did not intend to pass upon the general question of the constitutionality of the several acts there considered, but simply to determine whether the objections there urged were well founded. Finally, the language of Willard, C. J., who had prepared the opinion of the court in Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller General, in the concluding paragraph of his separate opinion in the Bond Debt Cases, shows conclusively that he did not understand that the general question of the constitutionality of the act to authorize a loan for the relief of the treasury was considered or determined in the case of Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller General.

The cases of County of Cass v. Johnston, 95 U. S., 360 [24 L. Ed. 416], and Douglass v. County of Pike, 101 U. S. 677 [25 L. Ed. 968], are relied upon by appellants to sustain their position upon the point which we have just been considering, but we think an examination of those cases, in connection with the previous case of Harshman v. Bates County, 92 U. S. 569 [23 L. Ed. 747], will show that they do not sustain their position. In those cases it was the same clause of the constitution of Missouri, which at different times had received different construction, and while it may well be that, when the construction of a particular clause of the constitution of a state has been settled by the highest judicial tribunal, rights accruing under such a construction cannot be impaired or affected by a subsequent change of such construction.

*576

it does not by any means *follow that rights claimed under a statute which is in conflict with any provision of the constitution, can be enforced by the courts, simply because it has been adjudged that such statute did not conflict with some other distinct clause of the constitution.

A statute which conflicts with any provision of the constitution is a dead letter, an absolute nullity, and the fact that the courts have decided in one case that it does not conflict with a particular clause in the constitution cannot impart any vitality to it, if it is found to be in conflict with some other clause of the constitution. Full effect was given to this view of the doctrine contended for in the decision of the Bond Debt Cases, and it was there held that the construction placed by the court in Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller General, upon those clauses of the constitution which were then brought in question, was conclusive and binding, although grave doubts were then entertained by a portion of the court, at least, as to the correctness of such construction.

In Boyd v. Alabama, 94 U. S. 645 [24 L. Ed. 302], which is recognized in Douglass v. County of Pike, 101 U. S. at page 687 [25 L. Ed. 968], as well expressing "the rules which properly govern courts in respect to their past adjudications," it is said: "Courts seldom undertake, in any case, to pass upon the validity of legislation where the question is not made by the parties. Their habit is to meet questions of that kind when they are raised, but not to anticipate them. Until then, they will construe the acts presented for consideration, define their meaning, and enforce their provisions. The fact that acts may in this way have been often before the court, is never deemed a reason for not subsequently considering their validity when that question is presented. Previous adjudications upon other points do not operate as an estoppel against the parties in new cases, nor conclude the court upon the constitutionality of the acts, because that point might have been raised and determined in the first instance."

In that case, Boyd was indicted under a statute of Alabama prohibiting lotteries, and relied for his defence on the privileges conferred by an act passed in October, 1868, which had been repealed by an act passed in 1871. Under a previous indictment against the same person it had been held by the Supreme *Court of the state that, inasmuch as by the terms of the act of 1868 a contract had been created between the state and Boyd, the repealing act was void as to him, and he was consequently acquitted. But in the second case, the court held that the act of 1868 was unconstitutional, and therefore conferred no rights upon Boyd, either by contract or otherwise, and hence it furnished no ground of defence, and that the former decision did not estop the state from raising the question of the constitutionality of the act of 1868. He was accordingly convicted, and the judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

*577

But appellants also contend that the decision of this court in the Bond Debt Cases was erroneous, and should now be reversed. First, as to the constitutionality of the act to authorize a loan for the relief of the treasury. The constitution of 1868, art. IX., sec. 7, provides that, "for the purpose of defraying extraordinary expenditures, the state may contract public debts, but such debts shall be authorized by law for some single object to be distinctly specified therein." It does seem to us that nothing can be clearer than that the act to authorize a loan for the relief of the treasury violates both of these clauses of the constitution. The body of the act affords no more information as to the object of the loan than the title; and for all practical purposes it might just as well have been entitled, an act to authorize a loan for the uses of the state government; for that was in fact the real object of the act. The debt thereby attempted to be contracted was certainly not "for some single object," and such object was not "distinctly specified in the act."

The purpose of this provision of the constitution undoubtedly was to indicate to the tax-payers, when it was proposed to create a loan, the precise purpose to which the money to be borrowed was to be applied; and when the purpose declared by the act is expressed in the general terms "for the relief of the treasury," it afforded no indication whatever of the particular object to which the borrowed money was to be applied. On the contrary, when the money was paid into the treasury, as the terms of the act necessarily implied it was to be, it would become applicable, and undoubtedly was applied, to any of the various demands that might be made upon the treasury.

*578

*It is equally clear that the debt sought to be created by this act was not for any "extraordinary expenditure," for provision had already been made for the redemption of the "bills receivable" by an act passed August 26, 1868 (14 Stat., 17), for the payment of the interest then in arrear on the public debt by an act passed on the same day (14 Stat., 18), and for funding the outstanding bills of the bank of the state by an act passed September 15, 1868 (14 Stat., 22), and we are not aware of any other expenditures which the legislature was then called upon to provide for, which could with any propriety be classed amongst "extraordinary expenditures," and none such have been suggested to us. The inevitable inference which accords with the well known facts is, that the object of this act was to raise money for the current demands on the treasury to meet the ordinary expenses of the state government, and therefore plainly in violation of the constitution.

The position taken by one of the counsel for appellants, that the question whether a debt proposed to be contracted is for the purpose of defraying an ordinary or extraordinary expenditure is one exclusively for the determination of the legislature, and the fact that they have authorized the loan must be regarded as sufficient evidence that its object was to meet an extraordinary expenditure, would, it seems to us, render the constitutional provision wholly nugatory. Such a provision was undoubtedly inserted as a check upon the power of the legislature to contract public debts, and it follows, necessarily, that it cannot determine conclusively the limits of its power in this respect; for otherwise there would be no check upon its power except its own will.

Next, as to the second issue of bonds for the payment of the interest on the public debt, we think it equally clear that there was no shadow of authority for such issue, and therefore that the bonds of that issue never did constitute valid obligations of the state. It will be observed that the question is not what the governor might have lawfully done under the authority of "an act to authorize a state loan to pay interest on the public debt" (14 Stat., 18), but the question is whether he had any lawful authority for what he did do. The question is not whether, under the peculiar phraseology of the act, the governor was lim*ited to the issue of bonds to the amount of one million of dollars, or whether he might not have issued as many bonds as would be necessary to raise that amount of money, provided he should deem such an amount necessary to pay the interest on the public debt, but the question is whether, after having made one issue of a million of dollars in bonds, he had any authority six or eight months afterwards to make a second issue of the same amount for the purpose of retiring the first issue, on account of some objectionable words used in the bonds of the first issue, the undisputed testimony showing that to be the sole object of the second issue.

*579

It is quite clear that the act in question does not even purport to contain any authority for the exercise of such a power. The legislature, under the provisions of section 10 of article IX., might have provided by law for the substitution of one set of bonds for another, and possibly might have authorized the governor to make such substitution; but they did not do so, and we do not see by what authority the governor, or any other officer of the state, could, in the absence of any legislation authorizing it, assume to exercise such a power; and hence the bonds so substituted by the governor, without any authority whatever, cannot constitute any part of the valid obligations of the state. But even if we could hold, in disregard of the testimony, that such was not the object of the second issue of the bonds, but that they were designed to create a new and additional debt of the state, then it is equally clear that the act contains no shadow of authority for the creation of such new and additional debt. If the governor could lawfully make a second issue, we see no reason why he might not make a third or fourth, or an indefinite number of issues—there being just as much authority, under the terms of the act, for a fourth issue as there is for a second, and certainly a construction leading to such a result cannot be regarded as a correct one.

Our next inquiry is as to the effect of the act of December 22, 1873 (15 Stat., 518), commonly called the "consolidation act." It is conceded that this act was not passed by the constitutional majority necessary for the creation of a public debt, and that it was not submitted to a vote of the people, as required by article *XVI. of the constitution, adopted January 29, 1873 (15 Stat., 466), and therefore nothing would seem to be clearer than that such act cannot have the effect of creating "any further debt or obligation" on the part of the state, and, as we said in the Bond Debt Cases, "must be regarded as simply a scheme for the readjustment of the then existing debt." It cannot have the effect of making anything a debt of the state which was not then a valid obligation of the state.

*580

The argument that the purpose and effect of the act was to reduce, and not to increase, the debt of the state, and therefore it was unnecessary that it should have been passed by a two-thirds vote, or submitted to a vote of the people, is not in our judgment entitled to any weight. The constitution having prescribed the only way in which a debt of the state can be contracted, any attempt by the legislature to create one in any other way must necessarily be futile, even though the legislature may at the same time, and by the same act, make such provisions as that the debt of the state, to a larger amount than the proposed new debt, shall be paid or otherwise extinguished. If there is a lack of power to create the new debt, that cannot be supplied by the payment of an old debt, but can only be supplied by complying with the requirements of the constitution. So that even if it be conceded that the effect of the "consolidation act," fully carried out, would be to reduce the gross amount of the debt of the state, yet it would by no means follow that bonds originally issued without constitutional authority would thereby become valid obligations of the state. They would still continue to be, as they were before, evidences of debt not contracted by the state in the only mode in which it could contract, and therefore not valid obligations of the state.

But it is contended that by the terms of the "consolidation act" a contract of compromise was entered into by the state with its bondholders, which is binding upon the state. It seems to us that the argument in support of this position wholly ignores the important and vital distinction between a state and the legislature of a state, and assumes that the latter is invested with supreme power so far as making contracts for the state is concerned. This, as we have seen, is an entire mistake, and that, on the con*trary, the power of the legislature in contracting a public debt is limited and controlled by the express terms of the constitution. It will not be denied that it is essential to the validity of any contract, whether of compromise or otherwise, that there should be power in the contracting parties to make the contract in question. Now, as the legislature in undertaking to pass the "consolidation act" did not pursue the mode prescribed by the constitution, in which alone any debt of the state could be contracted, any contract based upon that act, whether by compromise or otherwise, purporting to fix anything upon the state as a debt which was not so before, was without authority, and an absolute nullity.

*581

The whole question is one of power. The very object of the constitutional provisions was to place restrictions upon the power of the legislature to contract public debts, and to say that the legislature could, by the act of March 13, 1872 (15 Stat., 278), commonly called the "validating act," or by the "consolidation act," neither of which was passed by the requisite constitutional majority, make that a valid debt of the state which was not so before, would be to say that the very body whose power was intended to be restricted by these constitutional provisions could by these means evade and utterly disregard such restrictions.

Again, it is urged that the "consolidation act" must be regarded as a proposition by the state to its bondholders for a compromise of doubtful rights, and that the state having received all the benefits, must bear all the burdens of the arrangement. Without repeating here what we have just said as to the lack of power on the part of the legislature to make any such arrangement, in so far as it involved the creation or acknowledgment of any new debt on the part of the state, we think such a view is based upon an entire misconception of the terms of the "consolidation act." It was not a proposition to the bondholders as a class, or to the holders of any particular issue of bonds, that if they, or even a majority of them, would surrender all their bonds, new ones would be issued to them for one half of their face value, with the additional advantages proposed by the act, but it was a proposition addressed to each individual bondholder, and did not even involve the necessity that such individual bondholder should surrender all *of his bonds before he would be entitled to exchange or fund any of them under the act.

*582

For example, if A. held bonds the validity of which has never been questioned, and also other bonds issued under the act to authorize a loan for the relief of the treasury, he might, under the terms of the "consolidation act," have retained the former and funded the latter, as there is not a word in the act to prevent him from so doing. It is an entire mistake, therefore, to say that the holders of bonds were induced to fund their unquestioned bonds by the opportunity offered them of funding those which might be questioned, and thus a final composition was had between the state and its bondholders. There is nothing in the act to authorize the assumption that any such inducement was held out to the bondholders, and certainly nothing whatever to indicate that the state required, as a consideration for funding bonds that might be questioned, the surrender of other unquestionable bonds.

Indeed, there is nothing in the act to indicate that the legislature regarded any of the bonds, the funding of which was therein provided for, as questionable obligations of the state; and, on the contrary, the only bonds which seem to have been so regarded—a very large amount of the "conversion bonds"—were "declared to be absolutely null and void." So that it is difficult to conceive how either the legislature or the bondholders could then have regarded the "consolidation act" as a proposition for the compromise of doubtful claims, and that the surrender of unquestioned bonds should be regarded as a consideration for the privilege of funding those that were questionable. When, therefore, a bondholder surrendered, for the purpose of funding, invalid bonds, he parted with something which was of no value, and could, therefore, constitute no consideration for a contract, and the bonds which he received in exchange therefor rest upon no better foundation than those which he surrendered.

We do not think the "Lost Bonds Case" (15 S. C., 224), relied upon by the appellants, is in point. In the first place, in that case there was no lack of power to make the contract; and, in the second place, it is very manifest that the arrangement there entered into was entered into as a whole, and as a compromise of *disputed claims. In fact, that case turned upon the question whether the arrangement there brought in question was intended as payment or satisfaction, or whether it was intended as mere substitution of one class of bonds for the other, and it was held that the intention was payment, and not substitution.

*583

We have carefully considered the various cases cited by appellants, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States since our decision in the Bond Debt Cases was rendered, and we are unable to discover any conflict between the points there decided and the principles established by such cases; and after a careful consideration of the whole matter, we can see no reason why the former decision of this court should be overruled.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, in each of the cases above stated, be affirmed.

[Writ of error dismissed, De Saussure v. Gaillard, 127 U. S. 216, 8 Sup. Ct. 1053, 32 L. Ed. 125.]

---

21 S. C. 583

IVY v. CASTON.

DEVRIES & CO. v. SAME.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Attachment ⟸97.]

Where the affidavit upon which an attachment is issued by a clerk of court or Circuit judge positively alleges a mortgage given by the debtor to another, and contains a statement of belief, resting upon hearsay, inferences, and conjecture, that there was intent to defraud, but makes no positive averment founded on sufficient facts as to the intent and purpose of this mortgage—the attachment should be dissolved, on motion, for irregularity.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Myers v. Whiteheart, 24 S. C. 202; Kerchner & Calder Bros. v. McCormac, 25 S. C. 465; Monday v. Elmore, 27 S. C. 131, 3 S. E. 65; Baum v. Bell, 28 S. C. 209, 5 S. E. 485; Wando Phosphate Co. v. Rosenberg, 31 S. C. 307, 9 S. E. 969.

For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. § 249; Dec. Dig. ⟸97.]

[2. Attachment ⟸41.]

Quere: Is a mortgage a disposition of property within the meaning of the attachment law?

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Tabb, etc., Co. v. Gelzer, 43 S. C. 347, 21 S. E. 261; Brown v. Bank of Sumter, 55 S. C. 78, 32 S. E. 816.

For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. § 107; Dec. Dig. ⟸41.]

[3. Attachment ⟸250.]

Whether an attachment has been improvidently issued or not involves a question more of fact than of law.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Monday v. Elmore, 27 S. C. 129, 3 S. E. 65; Sease v. Dobson, 33 S. C. 237, 11 S. E. 728.

For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 877–889, 893, 895, 897; Dec. Dig. ⟸250.]

Before Fraser, J., York, November, 1883.

These were motions to dissolve attachments issued, the one by the order of Judge Witherspoon, of the sixth Circuit, in the case of William Devries & Co. against J. P. Caston; and the other by the clerk of court in the case of J. M. Ivy against the same defendant. Both were levied in September, 1883.

*584

*The affidavit in the Ivy case upon which the attachment issued was made by J. J. Waters, Esq., and was as follows:

I. That a cause of action exists against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff, to wit (the action being now pending and deponent being one of plaintiff's attorneys): (1.) Plaintiff is the holder of a note of which the following is a copy, the original signature being in the handwriting of the defendant: $1,377^{61}/_{100}$ Rock Hill, S. C., Sept. 8, 1883.

One day after date I promise to pay to the order of J. M. Ivy & Co. thirteen hundred and seventy-seven 61–100 dollars, with interest from date until paid, at ten per cent. per annum, for value received.

(Signed) J. P. Caston.

(2.) W. G. Reid & Co., at defendant's request, sold merchandise to him amounting to one hundred and sixty-three 60–100 dollars, which account is now due, and the same has been duly assigned to the plaintiff, everything stated with reference to this account being based upon information and belief growing out of communications had with W. G. Reid and the plaintiff.

II. That the defendant has recently executed a mortgage upon his stock of goods at Rock Hill to one S. K. Marks, of Chester, S. C., in the sum of ten thousand dollars, to wit, on April 30, 1883, which mortgage this deponent believes to be fraudulent and made to dispose of his said stock of goods with intent to defeat, hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, and among them the plaintiff. Deponent states his grounds of belief as follows: 1. The said S. K. Marks is the keeper of a small furniture store in the town of Chester, and cannot now be worth, and could not on April 30, 1883, judging from his surroundings, have been worth near the sum of ten thousand dollars. 2. That S. K. Marks is a relative of the said defendant, and during the past year there has been no apparent change in the extent of his business. 3. After allowing for the defendant's indebtedness outside and known to the deponent and heard of, including the claims of the plaintiff, deponent does not believe that the said defendant, judging from the character and extent of his business at Rock Hill, where deponent resides, can be indebted to the said S. K. Marks, or any other person or persons, in any such sum as ten thousand dollars, or even the half of said sum; and that during the past year there has been no apparent change in the extent of his business.

Wherefore deponent prays for a warrant of attachment against the property of defendant in behalf of the plaintiff.

The affidavit in the case of Devries & Co.

*585

against Caston, upon *which the attachment was issued, was made by G. W. S. Hart, Esq., and was as follows:

1. That he is one of the attorneys (Hart & Hart) for plaintiffs in above entitled action, and that plaintiffs are not residents of the state of South Carolina, but do business in the city of Baltimore, state of Maryland.

2. That plaintiffs have two causes of action against the defendant, which defendant has admitted to deponent, and which plaintiffs have set forth in their sworn complaint, hereto annexed.

3. That deponent, on the 31st day of August last past, went over from Yorkville to Rock Hill, S. C., where defendant does business, for the purpose of requesting defendant to pay, or to secure the payment of, the two notes described in the said complaint. That deponent did so request defendant, and defendant averred his inability to pay at said time, and stated that his stock of merchandise, etc., was already under mortgage for over ten thousand dollars. That deponent, on his return to Yorkville, proceeded to examine the public records of York county, and there found recorded in book "AAA," pp. 272, 273, a mortgage to S. K. Marks, of Chester county, S. C. That the copy mortgage hereto annexed is a true copy of said mortgage as recorded. That since his said return from Rock Hill, deponent has made inquiry as to the reputed worth of said S. K. Marks, whom deponent knows to be the keeper of a small furniture store in Chester, S. C.; and from said inquiries, and such personal knowledge as deponent had and has, deponent was strengthened in his belief, and does now verily believe, that said S. K. Marks is not, and was not at the time of the execution of said mortgage, worth so much as five thousand dollars, estimating therein any and every species of property of which the said S. K. Marks is now or was then possessed; and, therefore, that James P. Caston could not have been indebted to said S. K. Marks in any such sum as ten thousand dollars.

4. That from the terms of said mortgage, and the matters and things hereinbefore recited, deponent was led to believe, and does verily believe, that said mortgage was executed by the said James P. Caston to the said S. K. Marks (a relative, as deponent is informed and believes) with the intent so to dispose of the property so mortgaged as to defeat, hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors, and among them the plaintiffs above named, of him, the said James P. Caston.

5. That the books of the county auditor for York county show that James P. Caston has returned for taxation real estate valued at twelve hundred and fifty dollars, and personal estate valued at fourteen hundred and seventy-five dollars. That the public *records show that his real estate is under mortgage to secure the payment of ten hundred and eighteen dollars.

*586

Motions were made by defendant to set these attachments aside because both irregularly and improvidently issued. The affidavits relating to the second ground of the motions need not be stated. The Circuit judge overruled both grounds of the motion, saying as to the first: "If the matter were before me on an application for a warrant of attachment, I would have some doubt as to the sufficiency of the affidavits on which the warrant in the case of J. M. Ivy was issued; but I am not willing to disturb the conclusion of the clerk that the prima facie evidence of fraud is sufficient in the case of James M. Ivy. The additional facts stated in the affidavit on which the warrant was issued in the case of Wm. Devries & Co. are clearly sufficient for this purpose."

The defendant appealed in both cases upon the grounds following:

1. For error in not holding that in each of the above cases the warrant of attachment should be vacated upon the ground that the affidavits upon which they were based did not set forth a cause of action in favor of the plaintiffs against the defendant, and did not specify the amount of the claim and the grounds thereof.

2. Because the affidavit on which the warrant of attachment in the case of James M. Ivy was based should have been made by the said James M. Ivy instead of by his attorney.

3. Because it does not appear from the facts stated in either of the affidavits in above cases that the defendant assigned, or disposed of, or removed, or was about to remove, the property mentioned in the mortgage to S. K. Marks, or with intent to defraud his creditors.

4. Because said attachments were not issued in conformity with the provisions and requirements of section 250 of the code of procedure in this state.

5. Because his honor, it is respectfully submitted, erred in holding that the mortgage executed to S. K. Marks by the defendant was such an assignment or disposal of the property as is meant by the said attachment law.

6. Because said mortgage was satisfied and so marked several *months before said attachments were issued, and was not in existence at the date of said issuing.

*587

7. For error in not holding that said attachments were void.

8. Because the affidavits herein referred to were not in compliance with the provisions and requirements of the said attachment act, and his honor erred in holding that said defects could be cured by subsequent affidavits, and in not holding that said affidavits were fatally irregular and defective.

9. That his honor errer in holding that the facts of the case justified the issuing the warrants of attachment in above cases.

Messrs. Wilson & Wilson, for appellant.

Messrs. C. E. Spencer and Hart & Hart, contra.

November 14, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Motions were made in the above cases at chambers, before his honor Judge Fraser, in November, 1883, to discharge the attachments therein. The motions were made on two grounds First, for irregularity, the affidavits on which each was based being alleged to be insufficient. Second, that the warrants were improvidently issued, because the facts stated in the affidavits were untrue. Judge Fraser dismissed the motion in each case with $10 costs. The defendant has appealed, assigning error to the Circuit judge in holding the affidavits sufficient, and the warrants, therefore, regular; and also in holding that the facts alleged had been sustained; in other words, in holding that the warrants had neither been irregularly nor improvidently issued.

The remedy by attachment for the collection of a debt, though not strictly a common law proceeding, is yet of ancient origin, and has been incorporated into the legal systems of most countries where the rights of creditors are at all regarded. It has been engrafted by statute in some form upon the laws of perhaps all of our states. While no doubt it is a proceeding necessary to trade and commerce, yet it is a severe and somewhat harsh remedy, and should not be extended beyond its prescribed limits. *In our state its foundation is an affidavit, in which must be contained the conditions specified in the act, to wit, that a cause of action exists against the defendant, specifying the amount of the claim, * * * and that the defendant "has assigned, disposed of, or secreted, or is about to assign, dispose of, or secrete any of his property with intent to defraud his creditors."

*588

If such affidavit be not made, or if either of these conditions be wanting in the affidavit made, and this appears upon the face of the proceedings, it would not be regular to issue the warrant; and if, notwithstanding these defects, it should be issued, it may be dissolved on motion, on the ground of irregularity. This, of course, refers to cases where the attachment is sought on the ground of disposition of property, &c., &c. So, too, if the statements contained in the affidavit, which, if true, would be sufficient to sustain the warrant, should afterwards be made to appear by counter-affidavits to be untrue, the attachment may be dissolved on the ground that it has been improvidently issued. These attachments, as has been said above, are assailed here upon both of the grounds mentioned, to wit, because both irregularly and improvidently issued. The first was issued by the clerk of the court and the other by the judge of the Circuit, and each upon the affidavit of the attorney of the plaintiff. These affidavits will be found in the statement of the case.

We have three cases in our recent reports, in which the requirements of affidavits in attachment proceedings have been discussed and adjudicated. Smith & Melton v. Walker, 6 S. C., 169; Brown v. Morris, 10 S. C., 469; and Claussen v. Fultz, 13 S. C., 478. When the cases before the court are examined under the light of these cases just cited, we are constrained to the conclusion that the Circuit judge erred in holding the affidavits sufficient, and in refusing defendant's motions.

In Smith & Melton v. Walker, it was said, in substance, that where the attachment is sought upon the ground that the debtor has assigned, disposed of, or secreted his property, or is about to do so, the affidavit must not be founded simply upon information and belief, but it must state the facts upon which this belief is based.

In Brown v. Morris, where the plaintiff had attempted to conform to this rule, at least in form, by stating the facts upon which *he relied, it was held that in addition to the statements of the facts, and the sources from which the information is derived, the evidence presented in support thereof should be of such a character as would in an action at law prima facie establish the facts alleged, the court saying, "that in no other way than in such sense and by such means, can the requisite facts be made to appear to the judge or other proper officer before whom the motion is made." And in Claussen v. Fultz, where the attachment was obtained upon an affidavit in which deponent stated upon information and belief, that the defendant was disposing of his property and effects with intent to defraud his creditors, and that he was running his business as agent for that purpose, the court held that such affidavit was insufficient, and that the plaintiff should go further and "show an actual disposition of the property made or intended, with intent to defraud his creditors."

*589

Now the only fact found in the affidavits here, which stands free from mere information and belief, and which is sustained by a positive averment of the deponent, is the fact that the debtor, previous to the issuing of the attachment, had executed a mortgage of his property to one Marks, a relative. The affiant in each case, it is true, after stating this fact, does go on to say that from inquiry and such information as could be obtained, he does not believe that Caston could be indebted to Marks in the sum mentioned in the mortgage, and that said mortgage was executed with the intent to defraud the creditors of Caston.

Now the execution of the mortgage would not in itself be sufficient to satisfy the statute as a ground for the attachment; because it does not follow in every case that the execution of a mortgage is intended to defraud creditors. Mortgages are legitimate transactions and are of very frequent occurrence. There must be something more than this—something more than a disposition of the property even—there must be a disposition made or intended, with intent to defraud creditors; and the affidavit should contain facts bearing upon both of these conditions. Even assuming that the execution of the mortgage here might satisfy the first condition, i. e., a disposition of the defendant's property (which it is not necessary now to determine), yet the affidavits are wanting in the statement of facts to satisfy the second, viz., the *intent to defraud creditors. There is a statement of belief on the part of the affiants, but this belief when analyzed seems to rest more upon hearsay, inferences, and conjecture, than facts within the knowledge of the affiants, capable of being testified to by them.

*590

Of course, we decide nothing as to the character and intent of this mortgage. It may or not have been fraudulent in purpose. That is not the question before us. We are considering the sufficiency of the affidavits to sustain the attachments, and as the weight of these consists in the statement that the debtor had executed a mortgage of his property previous to the issuing of the attachments, with no positive averment founded on sufficient facts as to the intent and purpose of this mortgage, we think, under the principles laid down in the cases cited supra, that said attachments should have been dissolved for irregularity.

Having reached this conclusion upon the first ground of appeal, it is unnecessary to discuss the second, and especially as that involves more a question of fact than of law.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

21 S. C. 590

BUCK, HEFFLEBOWER & NEER v. MARTIN.

(April Term, 1884.)

[Reported and Annotated in 53 Am. Rep. 702.]

[1. Partition ⇐85.]

Where a widowed mother erected a dwelling house and out-buildings upon an unimproved tract of land belonging to herself and her four infant children, in which house they all lived together, she should be allowed in partition the portion of the tract on which the improvements were erected, or, in case of sale, the increased value by reason of such improvements.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Johnson v. Pelot, 24 S. C. 265, 58 Am. Rep. 253; Sutton v. Sutton, 26 S. C. 39, 1 S. E. 19; Annely v. De Saussure, 26 S. C. 505, 2 S. E. 490, 4 Am. St. Rep. 725; Charleston, C. & C. R. R. Co. v. Leech, 35 S. C. 149, 14 S. E. 730; Shumate v. Harbin, 35 S. C. 528, 15 S. E. 270; Cain v. Cain, 53 S. C. 353, 31 S. E. 278, 69 Am. St. Rep. 863; Hall v. Boatwright, 58 S. C. 548, 36 S. E. 1001, 79 Am. St. Rep. 864; Trimmier v. Darden, 61 S. C. 235, 39 S. E. 373; Vaughan v. Langford, 81 S. C. 288, 62 S. E. 316, 128 Am. St. Rep. 912.

For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 237; Dec. Dig. ⇐85.]

[2. Partition ⇐85.]

In giving the improving tenant the increased value by reason of the improvements, such increased value must be ascertained after sale, and determined with reference to the purchase money of the entire property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 236–245; Dec. Dig. ⇐85.]

[3. Tenancy in Common ⇐28.]

Infant children living with their mother on the common property have no just claim for rents and profits that were consumed by themselves.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Rhode v. Tuten, 34 S. C. 502, 13 S. E. 676; Shumate v. Harbin, 35 S. C. 528, 529, 15 S. E. 270.

For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. § 76; Dec. Dig. ⇐28.]

Before Hudson, J., Abbeville, February, 1884.

*591

*The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. Eugene B. Gary, for appellants.

Messrs. Noble & Noble, contra.

November 14, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. In January, 1865, the late William Smith made a deed of gift of a tract of land (525 acres) to the widow and children of his deceased son, Thomas W., viz., the widow, Edna F., and four children, Mary E., Samuel J., Jennie F., and Thomas W. Smith. In June, 1865, the widow Edna intermarried with Benj. M. Martin, and the family went into possession of the land. There were no improvements on the place, and Mrs. Martin and her husband erected a dwelling house and necessary out-buildings, which it is alleged enhanced its value about $300. In 1876, Mary E., one of the children, intermarried with Lawrence K. Dantzler, and on March 28, 1881, they conveyed the interest of the said Mary E., one-fifth, to Richey & Miller, and the same was sold as their property under execution against them, March, 1883, and purchased by the plaintiffs, who took sheriff's title, and instituted these proceedings for partition of the land.

B. M. Martin and his wife Edna both answered, that they had put permanent improvements upon the land, paid taxes therefor, and boarded, clothed, and educated the children, for which they were entitled to compensation, amounting in the aggregate to more than the entire value of the land. The plaintiffs replied, charging waste, denying the right to compensation for improvements, claiming rents and profits on their fifth, and pleading the statute of limitations, &c.

It was referred to the master, M. L. Bonham, jr., to hear and determine the issues. He took testimony and made report, finding as matter of fact that the improvements enhanced the value of the land $300, and holding that the same should be allowed to Martin and wife; that Martin paid the taxes, and that he should have refunded to him what he had paid within the last six years, viz., $96.00; and that the plaintiffs were not entitled *to rents and profits except for the year 1883, but were entitled to partition of the land. On exceptions to the master's report, the cause came on to be heard by Judge Hudson, who held that Martin and wife were not entitled to compensation for the improvements upon the common property, and ordered a writ of partition in the usual form to divide the land into five equal parts, recommitting the report as to the taxes paid.

*592

From this decree Martin and wife appealed to this court upon the following exceptions: "1. Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in sustaining plaintiffs' first exception. 2. Because the judge erred in failing to allow Mrs. Edna F. Martin compensation for improvements erected on the land described in the complaint. 3. Because the judge erred in signing a writ for the partition of the land in five equal portions."

We agree entirely with what Chancellor Dargan said in a note to Williman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq., 476: "The question whether compensation is to be allowed to a tenant in common, who has made improvements upon the common estate, as against his co-tenant, has been attended with much difficulty. Not to allow it, when the improvements are valuable, in many cases is highly inequitable; yet no safe rule of universal application can be laid down upon the subject. For in some cases, though the improvements may add to the permanent value of the estate, it might be undesirable, inconvenient, or even ruinous, for the co-tenant, who has not concurred in the improvements, to meet his share of the expense," &c. There is no doubt about the general rule. Our cases have settled the question against the right of an improving tenant-in-common to the exclusive benefit of his improvements. Thurston v. Dickinson, 2 Rich. Eq., 317 [46 Am. Dec. 56]; Dellet v. Whitner, Cheves Eq., 223; Hancock v. Day, McMull. Eq., 69 [36 Am. Dec. 293]; Thompson v. Bostick, McMul. Eq., 79.

To this rule however, there are well established exceptions, one of which is that where improvements are made by a tenant in common, who has reason to believe, and does honestly believe, that he has fee simple title in severalty to the land so improved. In such case the tenant is allowed compensation, and if practicable, in partition the part of the land so improved will be assigned to the tenant who made the improvements, without charg*ing him with the value of said improvements; that is to say, the partition will be made without any reference to the improvements. Williman v. Holmes, supra; Scaife v. Thomson, 15 S. C., 337; Annely v. DeSaussure, 17 Id., 391; Johnson v. Harrelson, 18 Id., 604.

*593

In this last case the principle is announced by the Chief Justice as follows: "As a general rule, and in ordinary cases, where the co-tenants are all known and easy of access, and one moves forward without consultation with the others, and erects improvements of his own accord whether desired or not by the others, he does so at his own risk, and such improvements will not be allowed. * * * Where, however, improvements have been erected by a co-tenant, which add value to the common estate, and erected under circumstances which would make it a great and obvious hardship upon the improving tenant to deprive him entirely of the benefit of such improvements, throwing their whole value into the common estate for partition, the disposition of the court of equity has always been to give the improving tenant the benefit thereof as far as consistent with the equity of his co-tenants. 1 Story Eq. Jur., § 655." It seems to us that the improvements in this case were erected by the mother and her husband, "under circumstances which would make it a great and obvious hardship upon them to be deprived of the benefit of such improvements, throwing their whole value into the common estate."

We do not regard the rule that the improving co-tenant is not entitled to compensation, as applying to the case where all the co-tenants concur in the improvements. From the peculiar circumstances of this case, we must regard it as belonging to that class of cases. It is true that the children were minors at the time the improvements were made and could not consent for themselves, but they were with their mother, and the family needed a home—indeed, it was absolutely necessary. If, at the time, an application had been made to the court for leave to build a little cottage on the common property as a shelter for the family, can there be a doubt that such application would have been granted by the court, acting for the children? Ex parte Palmer, 2 Hill Eq., 218; Corbett v.

*594

Laurens, 5 Rich. Eq., 316. *Then we regard that done which should have been done. It was not the legal duty of the mother or her husband to support the children without the use of their shares. The possession of the mother was also the possession of the children living with her, and of course they have no just claim for rents and profits which they consumed themselves. The plaintiffs have no higher rights than Mrs. Dantzler transferred to Miller & Richey. We think the facts require us to consider the improvements as made with the concurrence of all the co-tenants, through the court acting for them.

In this view, what equity could Mrs. Dantzler or her vendee have as to more than one-fifth of the land without regard to the improvements, to which she had in no way contributed? Possibly the land may be somewhat worn by cultivation, but that was the result of supporting and rearing the family of which she was a member, and of this she certainly had no right to complain. We think this is an exceptional case, and that under the circumstances Mrs. Martin ought to have the enhanced value the improvements have given to the land, and that the same may be allowed to her without the slightest injustice to Mrs. Dantzler or any one who stands in her place by purchase of her share; that the writ of partition be so framed that the commissioners should assign, if practicable, to Mrs. Martin the portion improved, without charging her with the value of the improvements; or if the land must be sold, that the amount added to its value by the improvements shall be allowed her out of the proceeds of sale, before an equal division of the same among her and the children or those now owning their shares, the amount added to the value by the improvements to be ascertained after the sale by the master fixing the ratable proportions of their value to that of the entire tract of land, considered only in reference to the purchase money of the whole. Hand v. S. & C. R. R. Co., 17 S. C., 220.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, subject to the modifications herein indicated, be affirmed.

256

NOTES OF CAUSES

Decided during the period comprised in this Volume, and not reported in full.

21 S. C. *595

*No. 1574. STATE v. JENKINS. April Term, 1884.

[Criminal Law ⊂⊃763, 764, 1144.]

Defendant was indicted for cow-stealing. The prosecutor missed his cow one morning. Following its tracks, he found it seven miles distant at the ferry opposite the town of Beaufort, in the possession of defendant, who was then butchering it. Prosecutor claimed it as his property. The defendant said he had bought it from a man, whose name was unknown; but if the cow belonged to the prosecutor, the defendant would pay for it. There was other evidence in the case that defendant's mother had agreed the day before to buy a cow from one F.; that on this morning, F. had come to town and reported the cow at the ferry, and that she had then sent her son, the defendant, across the river to butcher the cow. In argument, the defendant's counsel stated that such transactions as this might be careless, but there seemed to be no remedy.

In charging the jury, Judge Pressley said: "Is that the way an honest man would act? * * * Do honest people act so?" And again: "If that is the way business is done in Beaufort, then the sooner its morals be corrected, the better. The counsel suggests there is no remedy for this kind of business. I know a remedy, and a very good one; it is the verdict of the jury rendered in such cases—that is a legal and proper remedy." Defendant was convicted. Held, on appeal, that the natural and almost inevitable effect of this language was to influence the jury in reaching a conclusion by conveying to them the impressions which the testimony left upon the mind of the judge; and, therefore, that the Circuit judge transcended the limits prescribed for him by article IV., § 26, of the constitution.

The judge's charge was not given in the case, and the parts complained of were stated only in the exceptions. To the service *of exceptions, accepted by the solicitor, he added: "And I agree to this as a correct statement as corrected by the judge." The court say: "We take this occasion to say that the practice adopted in this case of incorporating in the exceptions only such portions of the judge's charge as it is desired to review is not a safe one for the appellant, and should be avoided. For unless it appears in the 'Case,' or otherwise than in the exceptions merely, that the judge charged, or refused to charge, the points excepted to, we cannot assume that any such points were in fact charged or refused. * * * In this case, the language of the acceptance of service of the exceptions affords the evidence that the judge did charge as is therein imputed to him. We have, therefore, felt at liberty to consider the exceptions in this case, which otherwise we could not properly have done."

*596

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Anderson, 26 S. C. 602, 2 S. E. 699; State v. Addy, 28 S. C. 13, 4 S. E. 814; State v. Howell, 28 S. C. 254, 5 S. E. 617; State v. Wyse, 32 S. C. 54, 10 S. E. 612; Norris v. Clinkscales, 47 S. C. 513, 25 S. E. 797; Sloan & Son v. Courtenay, 54 S. C. 345, 32 S. E. 431.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1731, 2736–2764, 2766–2771, 2774–2781, 2901, 3016–3037, 2940; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃763, 764, 1144.]

Judgment reversed. Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, June 16, 1884. W. J. Verdier, for appellant. F. H. Gantt, solicitor, contra.

No. 1575. STATE v. JONES. April Term, 1884. Several parties were indicted for murder, but only Jones, Allen, and Hutson were arrested; and they were put upon trial at Hampton C. H., before Judge Cothran, at June term, 1883, and were convicted of manslaughter. From the judgment pronounced in the case, Allen and Hutson appealed. Held—

[1. Criminal Law ⊂⊃756.]

That in reading to the jury his notes of testimony, the Circuit judge did not violate the provisions of article IV., section 26, of the constitution. State v. White, 15 S. C., 392.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Norris v. Clinkscales, 47 S. C. 516, 25 S. E. 797.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1766; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃756.]

[2. Criminal Law ⊂⊃841.]

If the Circuit judge misstates the testimony in charging the jury, the proper time and place to correct such misstatements are at the trial, or at most by a motion for new trial, when they would be corrected. Exceptions alleging misstatements in a charge present no errors of law.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Davis, 27 S. C. 613, 4 S. E. 567; Bowen v. Carolina, C. G. & C. R. Co., 34 S. C. 235, 13 S. E. 421; State v.

Milling, 35 S. C. 27, 14 S. E. 284; Rumph v. Hiott, 35 S. C. 459, 15 S. E. 235; Davis v. Elmore, 40 S. C. 537, 19 S. E. 204; Simmons Hardware Co. v. Bank of Greenwood, 41 S. C. 190, 19 S. E. 502, 44 Am. St. Rep. 700; Whaley v. Bartlett, 42 S. C. 474, 20 S. E. 745.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2022; Dec. Dig. ⟸841.]

[3. Homicide ⟸340.]

The judge charged the jury "that the jury could not find those charged as aiding and abetting guilty of manslaughter only if the principal be found guilty of murder." Inasmuch as defendants were found guilty of manslaughter only, an exception alleging error in this portion of the charge raises a purely speculative inquiry, in which courts of justice ought not to indulge.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Richardson, 47 S. C. 23, 24 S. E. 1028.

For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 715–717, 720; Dec. Dig. ⟸340.]

Judgment affirmed.

*597

Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, June *16, 1884. J. P. Youmans, for appellant. F. H. Gantt, solicitor, contra.

No. 1580. STATE v. WHITE. April Term, 1884. Defendant was indicted for assault and battery with intent to kill and murder, and for aggravated assault and battery, and was tried in Beaufort county, before Judge Cothran, at June term, 1883. The jury found a verdict of "guilty." Defendant appealed:

[1. Homicide ⟸89.]

The Circuit judge charged the jury "that perhaps the best test by which to determine the first grade of the offence, assault and battery with intent to kill and murder, would be to apply the testimony which they had heard to the case as if an actual homicide had occurred. And if from the testimony they would be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that if death had ensued in this case the defendant would be guilty of murder, then it would be their duty to find him guilty of assault and battery with intent to to kill and murder." Held, that this charge was in exact conformity to the law, and certainly favorable for the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Williamson, 65 S. C. 250, 43 S. E. 671; State v. Du Rant, 87 S. C. 535, 70 S. E. 306.

For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 118; Dec. Dig. ⟸89.]

[2. Criminal Law ⟸1038.]

In failing to go further and instruct the jury as to the different grades of homicide, no error was committed which can be here corrected, his attention not having been called at the time to such omission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2646; Dec. Dig. ⟸1038.]

Judgment affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Justice McGOWAN, June 26, 1884. W. J. Verdier, for appellant. F. H. Gantt, solicitor, contra.

No. 1588. ROOKHART v. DEAN. April Term, 1884. This was an action by plaintiff against one Alexander to recover the share of crop made by plaintiff on Alexander's farm, and after the death of Alexander revived against Dean et al., his executors. Before action brought, a settlement had been made by a trial justice (but not the nearest) between plaintiff and Alexander. Plaintiff at first objected to a settlement being made, until told by the trial justice that if it was not fairly made, the plaintiff could have his remedy at law. The settlement was then made by this officer, the plaintiff assenting to all the items, and saying that he did not recollect any others, all disputes being resolved in his favor by Alexander's direction, and both parties seemed *satisfied with the result. A balance in favor of Alexander was paid out of plaintiff's share of the corn, plaintiff carrying off the remainder and receiving pay for his part of the cotton seed. The referee, to whom the cause was referred, disallowed the settlement, and found in favor of plaintiff. On exceptions to this report, including exceptions to the admissibility of evidence by plaintiff, Judge Witherspoon overruled the report and gave judgment for defendants. Held, on appeal—

*598

[1. Witnesses ⟸159.]

That plaintiff's testimony was not incompetent under section 400 of the code, as he only testified to acts of his own with which he in no way, by his own testimony, attempted to connect the deceased—such connection being made by another witness.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Foggette v. Gaffney, 33 S. C. 311, 12 S. E. 260; Sullivan v. Latimer, 38 S. C. 166, 17 S. E. 701; Dyson v. Jones, 65 S. C. 314, 43 S. E. 667.

For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 629, 664, 666–669, 671–682; Dec. Dig. ⟸159.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⟸1003.]

That the Circuit judge having found the settlement to have been full, fair, and complete, such finding not being without evidence to support it, or opposed to the weight of the testimony, must be affirmed; and it therefore makes little difference whether the settlement was made by the proper officer, or by a private individual.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3938–3943; Dec. Dig. ⟸1003.]

Judgment affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, July 1, 1884. Wofford & Jennings, for appellant. Bobo & Carlisle, contra.

No. 1590. STATE ex rel. MAXWELL v. LEWIS. April Term, 1884.

[Infants ⊂⊃94.]

The relator, alleging infancy and non-service of process, applied to the Circuit Court for a writ of certiorari directed to Whaley, a trial justice, requiring him to certify the proceedings in the case of Lewis v. Maxwell, heard and decided by him October 27, 1883. The return by the trial justice set forth all the proceedings, which showed a service by the trial justice upon the defendant in that case of the summons and complaint, an appearance by the defendant, and that there was no plea of infancy, the trial justice stating "that no plea of minority was ever made before me in the oral answer or in evidence." Upon hearing this return, the court, Witherspoon, J., dismissed the proceedings, with costs. An appeal from this judgment was dismissed, the court saying that the question must be determined by an inspection of the return and the face of the proceedings, and they failed to show the relator's infancy, and did show his voluntary appearance, even though there had been an irregular and *perhaps unwarranted service.

*599

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State ex rel. Nesbitt v. Marshall, 24 S. C. 508, 510; Shumate v. Harbin, 35 S. C. 527, 15 S. E. 270; Williams v. Garvin, 51 S. C. 400, 29 S. E. 1.

For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. §§ 289, 290; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃94.]

Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, July 3, 1884. Bowen & Lee, for appellant. G. M. Trenholm, contra.

No. 1593. EPSTEIN & BRO. v. BROWN. April Term, 1884. This was an action to recover $457.88 damages for an alleged unlawful taking and carrying away by defendant of certain personal property of the plaintiffs, of the value of $228.94. Verdict for plaintiffs, $400; and defendant appealed. Held—

[1. Trover and Conversion ⊂⊃60.]

That in charging the jury that "they were allowed to punish a wrong-doer and deter others from like conduct, and that the jury might find vindictive damages in this case if they found there was wilful invasion of the plaintiff's right of property," the Circuit judge (Wallace) correctly charged a principle of law applicable to such cases.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hall v. South Carolina Ry. Co., 28 S. C. 267, 5 S. E. 623; Duckett v. Pool, 34 S. C. 325, 13 S. E. 542.

For other cases, see Trover and Conversion, Cent. Dig. §§ 281, 282; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃60.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⊂⊃110.]

A refusal to grant a new trial, which was moved upon the ground that the evidence did not sustain a verdict including vindictive damages, is not appealable to this court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 741; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃110.]

Judgment affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, July 7, 1884. J. J. Brown, for appellant. F. H. Gantt, contra.

No. 1594. FITZSIMONS v. GUANAHANI COMPANY. April Term, 1884. This was an action by plaintiff to recover from defendant $750 for analyzing 1,500 tons of guano at Port Royal, at defendant's request, the complaint alleging that plaintiff was then inspector of guanos for Richmond county, Georgia, under the laws of Georgia; that the compensation provided by the laws of Georgia for such services was fifty cents a ton; that plaintiff's services were reasonably worth $750; and that no part thereof had been paid. Defendant interposed an oral demurrer at the trial, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Judge Wallace overruled the demurrer and defendant appealed. Held—

[1. Appeal and Error ⊂⊃1099.]

That this case was not concluded by the former decision. 16 S. C., 192. That the former case only decided that under the pleadings there plaintiff should have been confined to the cause of action stated in his complaint, and the Circuit judge there having held otherwise, his ruling was reversed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4370–4379; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃1099.]

[2. Contracts ⊂⊃332.]

That the complaint here does state facts sufficient to consti*tute a cause of action.

*600

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1615–1639; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃332.]

Judgment affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, July 7, 1884. William Elliott, for appellant. W. J. Verdier, contra.

[For prior opinion, see 16 S. C. 192. For subsequent opinion, see 23 S. C. 603.]

No. 1599. ESTES v. WOODS. April Term, 1884. This was an action commenced May 12, 1883, on a sealed note, bearing date April 8, 1875, and upon an alleged new promise, to wit, a letter written by defendant to plaintiff on January 29, 1882, in words following: "My family has been sick and the weather so bad that I could not come over and see you concerning that note you wrote me about. I am going to Columbia this week, and when I come back I will come over and see you and see what must be done concerning the same."

The Circuit judge (Fraser) charged the jury that if they were satisfied that this letter was in reply to a letter received by defendant from plaintiff, and that in such letter of plaintiff the note sued on was sufficiently described to leave no doubt as to the particular debt intended, that then the letter of defendant was a sufficient acknowledgment of the debt to take it out of the operation of the statute of limitations. Verdict for plaintiff. Held—

[1. Limitation of Actions ⇐141.]

That the provision of section 131 of the code as to written acknowledgments has reference only to the evidence necessary to establish an acknowledgment or new promise, but does not change the pre-existing law as to what acknowledgments will continue a debt not barred, or what new promises will create a new contract.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hill v. Hill, 51 S. C. 141, 28 S. E. 309.

For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 574; Dec. Dig. ⇐141.]

[2. Limitation of Actions ⇐148.]

The note in this case was barred before the letter of January 29, 1882, was written, and such letter did not contain either an express promise to pay the old debt, or a clear and distinct admission of liability from which could be implied such a promise as would support an action. Therefore the Circuit judge erred in his charge to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 597–603; Dec. Dig. ⇐ 148.]

Judgment reversed. Opinion by Mr. Justice McGOWAN, August 13, 1884. W. A. Sanders, for appellant. S. P. Hamilton, contra.

No. 1605. McGOUGAN v. HALL. April Term, 1884. This was a case of chancery by certain legatees of William Hall, deceased, against the executor of the will and others. The following points were ruled:

*601

[1. Judgment ⇐714.]

*A decree of Chan. Carroll in this cause in 1866, construing the will, declaring the interest of the several parties, directing the executor to render an account of the "cotton and other visible personal estate," and that the life-tenants give bond for the forthcoming of the property at the termination of the life estate, was not an adjudication upon the accounts of the executor, and did not prevent further proceedings to that end.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1240, 1242, 1243; Dec. Dig. ⇐ 714.]

[2. Executors and Administrators ⇐503.]

Credit allowed without any voucher to sustain it, and not claimed in the account filed by the executor, overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 2154; Dec. Dig. ⇐503.]

[3. Executors and Administrators ⇐109.]

An executor should not be allowed fees paid a surveyor for designating the lines between several devises described in the will by metes and bounds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 438; Dec. Dig. ⇐109.]

[4. Appeal and Error ⇐1022.]

A finding of fact by the master, concurred in by the Circuit judge, approved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4015–4018; Dec. Dig. ⇐ 1022.]

[5. Appeal and Error ⇐203.]

No testimony is incompetent under section 400 of the code, if not objected to at the time when offered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1064; Dec. Dig. ⇐203.]

[6. Executors and Administrators ⇐266.]

Where an executor permitted all the assets of an estate to go into the hands of the life-tenants, without providing for debts outstanding, and then paid those debts with his own money, he is not entitled to interest on the amounts so paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1029; Dec. Dig. ⇐266.]

[7. Appeal and Error ⇐984.]

The Circuit judge having allowed commissions to an executor who had failed to make returns, this court will not interfere with the judge's discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3815, 3881–3888; Dec. Dig. ⇐984.]

[8. Executors and Administrators ⇐99.]

A legatee, at the time (1866) a married woman, is not liable for any part of a note given by the executor, and the widow to the attorney then representing them, this legatee's interest not being involved in the litigation on the side represented by such attorney. A surrender of property by the widow to the other parties, this legatee included, in consideration of the widow's release from her liability on this note, does not show an acknowledgment of liability by such legatee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 415, 417, 754; Dec. Dig. ⇐99.]

Judgment of Fraser, J., affirmed, and judgment of Pressley, J., with slight modification, also affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, September 9, 1884. W. H. R. Workman and W. H. Lyles, for plaintiffs. J. T. Hay, contra.

No. 1606. BENBOW v. RICHARDSON. April Term, 1884. Order of non-suit being entered in action for the recovery of land, the costs were taxed by the clerk, and on appeal from this *taxation Judge Mackey ruled that defendant was entitled only to $10, costs of motion. On appeal this ruling was reversed, the court holding—

*602

[1. Costs ⇐4.]

That costs should be taxed under fee-bill of force when non-suit was ordered, and not under fee bill of force when the judgment was entered thereon; citing Kapp & Rothschild v. Loyns, 13 S. C., 288; Lewis v. Brown, 16 S. C., 58.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. §§ 2, 3, 109; Dec. Dig. ⇐4.]

[2. Costs ⇐48.]

That in case of a non-suit, the defendant is entitled to the same costs as where trial is had.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 209; Dec. Dig. ⇐48.]

[3. Costs ⇐277.]

Whether a plaintiff may bring a second action before the costs of the first are actually paid, reserved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. §§ 1048–1060; Dec. Dig. ⇐277.]

Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, September 13, 1884. Moise & Huggins, for appellant. No counsel contra.

No. 1607. HILL v. RILEY. April Term, 1884.

[Infants ⇐30.]

The personal property of an intestate being in the hands of the administrator, and the real property having been partitioned under decree of the Probate Court (in 1873) and bonds given for the value of the lands assigned to parties in the cause, a minor daughter of intestate receipted in full for her share of the personalty, and also for her share of the real property, receiving therefor, after her majority, the note of her mother for the amount so receipted for. The bonds to the Probate Judge were then marked satisfied. This daughter seven years afterwards sued her mother on this note, but took a nonsuit, the statute of limitations being pleaded. She then brought this action for partition of these lands and for an account of the rents; or if the court held the partition valid, then for a foreclosure of the statutory lien. Judge Wallace dismissed the complaint. This court affirmed this judgment, approving the finding of master and Circuit judge that the note was received in payment; and holding that the subsequent acquiescence by plaintiff estopped her from questioning irregularities or want of jurisdiction in the Probate Court; and that if there were any lien in this case under the statute of 1791 ("which is by no means certain"), it had been discharged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. §§ 41–49, 54, 55; Dec. Dig. ⇐30.]

Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, September 13, 1884. S. C. Cason, for appellant. T. P. Cothran, contra.

REPORTS OF CASES

HEARD AND DETERMINED BY

THE SUPREME COURT

OF

SOUTH CAROLINA

VOLUME XXII

CONTAINING CASES OF APRIL AND NOVEMBER TERMS, 1884

BY ROBERT W. SHAND

STATE REPORTER

COLUMBIA, S. C.
JAMES WOODROW & CO., PUBLISHERS
1886

ANNOTATED EDITION

ST. PAUL
WEST PUBLISHING CO.
1916

Copyright, 1886
By JAMES WOODROW & CO.

(22 S.Car.)

JUDGES AND OTHER LAW OFFICERS

DURING THE PERIOD COMPRISED IN THIS VOLUME

JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT.

CHIEF JUSTICE.

HON. WILLIAM D. SIMPSON.

ASSOCIATE JUSTICES.

HON. HENRY McIVER. HON. SAMUEL McGOWAN.

CIRCUIT JUDGES.

FIRST	CIRCUIT,	HON.	BENJAMIN C. PRESSLEY.
SECOND	"	"	ALFRED P. ALDRICH.
THIRD	"	"	THOMAS B. FRASER.
FOURTH	"	"	JOSHUA H. HUDSON.
FIFTH	"	"	JOSEPH B. KERSHAW.
SIXTH	"	"	ISAAC D. WITHERSPOON.
SEVENTH	"	"	WILLIAM H. WALLACE.
EIGHTH	"	"	JAMES S. COTHRAN.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

HON. CHAS. RICHARDSON MILES.

SOLICITORS.

1*st Circuit*—W. ST. J. JERVEY.	5*th Circuit*—R. G. BONHAM.
2*d Circuit*—F. H. GANTT.	6*th Circuit*—T. C. GASTON.[2]
3*d Circuit*—J. J. DARGAN.[1]	7*th Circuit*—D. R. DUNCAN.
4*th Circuit*—H. H. NEWTON.	8*th Circuit*—J. L. ORR.

CLERK OF THE SUPREME COURT.

A. M. BOOZER.

[1] Until November, 1884, when T. M. Gilland succeeded.
[2] Until November, 1884, when J. E. McDonald succeeded.

LIST OF ATTORNEYS

ENROLLED IN THE SUPREME COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA DURING THE YEAR 1885

ALSTON, JOSEPH K.....Winnsboro.
ANDERSON, Z. B.....Sumter.
AUSTIN, WM.....Charleston.
BASS, W. L.....Kingstree.
BEACH, G. ALBERT.....Walterboro.
BRYANT, FERD. D.....Marion.
BUIST, JR., HENRY.....Charleston.
BUTLER, WM. ENSTON.....Charleston.
DANTZLER, C. G.....Orangeburg.
DANTZLER, M. O.....Orangeburg.
DARGAN, R. K.....Darlington.
DICKERSON, E. J.....Aiken.
EDWARDS, L. W.....Colleton.
EVANS, JUNIUS H.....Marion.
FEATHERSTON, C. C.....Anderson.
FITCH, W. M.....Charleston.
GREEN, JOHN T.....Darlington.
HEYWARD, WILLIAM N.....Hardeeville.
HOLMAN, W. A.....Barnwell.
HUGHES, EDWARD W.....Charleston.
HUNT, C. J.....Laurens.
IRVINE, W. H.....Greenville.
JEFFERIES, J. C.....Gaffney City.
KEELS, JOHN R.....Sumter.
LANIER, JOHN B.....Edgefield.
LOFTON, RICHARD M.....Charleston.
MACFARLAN, ROBERT.....Cheraw.
MASSEY, SAM. F.....Fort Mill.
MCDOW, THOS. F.....Lancaster.
METTE, J. A.....Edgefield.
MOONEY, J. ALLENDER.....Greenville.
MORGAN, B. A.....Greenville.
NELSON, P. H.....Camden.
PARKER, JR., WM. HENRY.....Charleston.
REYNOLDS, T. J.....Beaufort.
RICE, JR., S. M.....Union.
RICHEY, W. R.....Abbeville.
SAWYER, E. J.....Bennettsville.
SEARSON, Z. A.....Yemassee.
STEVENSON, HAVILAND.....Aiken.
STUCKEY, A. B.....Darlington.
THOMSON, THOS. P.....Abbeville.
THRUSTON, GEO. B.....Greenville.
WASHINGTON, E. C.....Columbia.
WATSON, B. E.....Columbia.
WELBORN, JAMES C.....Rock Hill.
WHITTAKER, J. C.....Charleston.
WILLIAMS, JOHN C. P.....Ridgeway.
WINDLER, CORNELIUS L.....Camden.
WOODS, E. O.....Marion.

TABLE OF CASES REPORTED

	Page
Andrews v. Loeb	274
Arthur v. Allen	432
Bauskett v. Keitt	187
Best v. Sanders	589
Bird v. Calvert	292
Bomar v. Ezell	394
Caldwell v. Bennett	1
Carroll County Sav. Bank v. Strother	552
Charleston, City Council of, v. Ryan	339
Childs v. Alexander	169
City Council of Charleston v. Ryan	339
Clemons v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co	590
Collins v. Roumillat	589
Corley v. Holloway	380
Couch v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co	557
Covar v. Sallat	265
Cureton v. Stokes	583
Cureton v. Westfield	583
Darby v. Stribling	243
Dauntless Mfg. Co. v. Davis	584
Davis v. Schmidt	128
De Leon v. Barrett	412
Dominick v. Farr	585
Donnan v. Watts	430
Douthit v. Westfield	588
Dulany v. Elford	304
Dunlap v. Gooding	548
Duren v. Sinclair	361
Emory v. Hazard Powder Co	476
Epting, Ex parte	399
Fellers v. Davis	425
Ferguson, Ex parte	591
Gist v. Rutherford	399
Hair v. Goldsmith	566
Hosford v. Wynn	309
Hyrne v. Erwin	587
Jordan v. Lang	159
Lang v. Workman	582
Latimer v. Latimer	257
Lipscomb v. Seegers	407
McKeegan v. O'Neill	454
McMahan v. Dawkins	314
Maybin v. Columbia & G. R. Co	587
Miller v. Morrison	590
Moffatt v. Hardin	9
Moore v. Davidson	92
Moseley v. Hankinson	323
Murphy v. Stribling	243
Norwood v. Faulkner	367
Oliver v. Fowler	534
Pelzer v. Steadman	279
Piester v. Piester	139
Polson v. Ingram	541
Quattlebaum v. Black	587
Railroad Com'rs v. Railroad Co	220
Sheorn v. Robinson	32
Shiell v. Carderelli	151
Shiell v. Sloan	151
Smythe v. Tolbert	133
Sprouse v. Littlejohn	358
Stark v. Hopson	42
State v. Cofield	301
State v. Davis	484
State v. Duncan	87
State v. Huckie	298
State v. Pacific Guano Co	50
State v. Pinckney	484
State v. South Carolina Phosphate Co	593
State ex rel. Boozer v. Mayor, etc., of City of Columbia	582
State ex rel. Savannah Val. R. Co. v. City Council of Anderson	586
Steele v. Exum	276
Sullivan v. Hamblin	591
Templeton v. Lowry	389
Todd v. Davenport	147
Waldrop v. Leonard	118
Walker v. Bollmann	512
Werts v. Spearman	200
Whaley v. Keitt	247
Whitesides v. Barber	47
Whitmire v. Wright	446
Wiley v. Stribling	243
Wilks v. Walker	108
Woolfolk v. Graniteville Mfg. Co	332
Wright v. Mars	585
Zimmerman v. McMakin	372

REPORTS OF CASES

ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE

SUPREME COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA

JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT DURING THE PERIOD COMPRISED IN THIS VOLUME.

HON. WILLIAM D. SIMPSON, CHIEF JUSTICE.
HON. HENRY McIVER, ASSOCIATE JUSTICE.
HON. SAMUEL McGOWAN, " "

22 S. C. *1

*CALDWELL v. BENNETT.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Trial ⟸139.]

If there is any evidence tending to support the plaintiff's case, it is the province of the jury to determine its force and effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 332, 333, 338–341, 365; Dec. Dig. ⟸ 139.]

[2. Malicious Prosecution ⟸71.]

In an action for malicious prosecution, there being evidence that the prosecution was ended, and circumstances proved which tended to show a want of probable cause (from which malice may be inferred), the Circuit judge properly refused a nonsuit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 160–167; Dec. Dig. ⟸71.]

[3. Malicious Prosecution ⟸71.]

In actions for malicious prosecution, the jury should be instructed, as matter of law, as to what constitutes probable cause, and then it is for them to say, from a review of all the facts and circumstances proved to have been present to the mind of the prosecutor, at the time he commenced his prosecution, or the plaintiff, when he instituted his civil action, whether there was or was not probable cause for such proceeding.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Taylor v. Dominick, 36 S. C. 376, 15 S. E. 591; Ashley v. Holman, 44 S. C. 165, 21 S. E. 624; McCall v. Alexander, 84 S. C. 189, 65 S. E. 1021.

For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. § 161; Dec. Dig. ⟸71.]

[4. Malicious Prosecution ⟸32.]

In such cases malice may be inferred from the want of probable cause.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Baker v. Hornick, 57 S. C. 227, 35 S. E. 524.

For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. § 67; Dec. Dig. ⟸32.]

*2

*Before Wallace, J., Colleton, October, 1883.

This was an action by Thomas H. Caldwell against Abraham Bennett, for malicious prosecution, commenced in November, 1881. The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Fisburne & Rice, for appellant.
Messrs. Howell & Murphy, contra.

November 14, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The action in this case was for malicious prosecution, in which the plaintiff was charged, upon the oath of defendant, with stealing cotton from the field. The plaintiff was arrested on the warrant and carried before a trial justice, who, on a preliminary examination, dismissed the prosecution for insufficiency of evidence. The only testimony as to the facts and circumstances, which were supposed to give rise to the prosecution, came from the plaintiff himself, who testified that he was charged by the defendant with stealing cotton from the field on the place where one Becky Pool lived; that he had bought the place and agreed to let Becky live there and plant some cotton; that she thinned and hoed the cotton and plaintiff worked it; that when she left in September or October she was owing him some six dollars; that defendant came to plaintiff and said he wanted to see him about Mrs. Pool's cotton, adding: "I understand you have picked the cotton." Plaintiff replied: "You have understood rightly." Defendant said: "You have got yourself into the law." Plaintiff asked: "What have you got to do with it?" Defendant replied: "I have a great deal to do with it," that he had bought it and paid his money for it. A few days afterwards plaintiff was arrested for stealing the cotton. On his cross-examination plaintiff explained more particularly his arrangement with Becky Pool, and said that he did not know that she had sold any of this cotton before she went away.

On the close of the testimony for the plaintiff the defendant moved for a non-suit, "on the ground of insufficient proof of *malice and probable cause." The motion was overruled and the case went to the jury under the following instructions from the Circuit judge: "That probable cause was a question of law, and when I had explained to them what probable cause was, as a matter of law, then they were to decide from the testimony whether or not such probable cause existed. That probable cause was the existence of such facts as would induce a reasonable man to believe that a crime had been committed by the defendant. In considering this question as to whether such probable cause existed, the defendant here has a right to demand that the jury should consider the facts as he saw them at the time of the institution of the prosecution. The jury were further told that express malice was ill-will, a desire to injure the defendant, and whether such malice existed in the breast of the prosecutor, was a question of fact for them upon the evidence. The jury were further told that if they found that the prosecutor had probable cause, then the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, even if the prosecution was malicious."

*3

The jury having found a verdict for the plaintiff, the defendant appeals upon the following grounds: "1. For that the presiding judge charged the jury: 'Probable cause is a question of fact for your consideration, after I have explained to you what probable cause is. That which would excite in the mind of a reasonable man a belief that a crime had been committed would be probable cause, and that it is for you to decide whether probable cause existed upon the preponderance of evidence'; all of which, they respectfully submit, was error. 2. Because his honor neglected to charge the jury that they were only judges of the truth of the facts stated, and that he was the judge whether they showed a want of probable cause, which, it is respectfully submitted, was error. 3. Because his honor, in charging the jury, neglected to define what express malice was, and charged them that if they found that there was want of probable cause and express malice in bringing the prosecution, that they must bring in a verdict for plaintiff, which, it is respectfully submitted, was error."

The defendant also gave notice that he would renew his motion for non-suit on the ground that plaintiff had wholly failed to *prove his case. Upon this, the Circuit judge, in his report, says that the motion for non-suit was refused "because the plaintiff having put in evidence of facts and circumstances relating to the matter, I regarded it proper to leave it to the jury to say whether want of probable cause had been proven, and whether express malice was indicated."

*4

We will first consider whether there was any error in refusing the motion for a non-suit. The question in such a motion is, not whether the evidence is sufficient to support the plaintiff's case, but whether there is any evidence tending that way. If there is, then it is the province of the jury to determine its force and effect. It is quite manifest, therefore, that the ground upon which the motion was based in the court below, "insufficient proof of malice and probable cause" (meaning, doubtless, want of probable cause), could not be sustained. But, aside from this, we do not think it can be said that there was no testimony tending to establish plaintiff's case. For it is quite clear that there was testimony that the prosecution was ended; that there were circumstances tending to show a want of probable cause; and the rule is well settled that malice may be inferred from a want of probable cause. Bell ads. Graham, 1 N. & McC., 278 [9 Am. Dec. 687]; Campbell v. O'Bryan, 9 Rich., 206. So that all the three elements necessary to sustain the action were shown, at least prima facie, and hence there was no error in refusing the motion for non-suit.

The next inquiry is that presented by the first and second grounds of appeal, for, as we understand these grounds, they practically raise the same question. We lay no stress upon the fact that the phraseology imputed to the Circuit judge in the first ground differs from that actually used by him, as appears by that portion of his charge as reported by him, which we have copied above; for we think they may be construed as amounting substantially to the same thing. Construing these two grounds in the light of the argument submitted by the appellant, we understand that his complaint is that the Circuit judge should have confined the jury to a single inquiry whether the testimony adduced by the plaintiff was true, and should himself have determined whether the facts which they found to be established were *sufficient in law to constitute probable cause, or the want of it. In other words, that he should have instructed the jury that if they believed the testimony adduced by the plaintiff, then such testimony did or did not constitute sufficient proof of a want of probable cause as matter of law, and that it was error on his part, after instructing them as matter of law, what was probable cause, to leave it to the jury to say from the testimony whether such probable cause existed. Strictly speaking, the proper way to have raised the question would have been by a request to charge, which the appellant omitted to make; but waiving this, we will proceed to consider the question.

*5

It must be admitted that the exact boundary line between the province of the judge and that of the jury, in determining the existence or want of probable cause in actions for malicious prosecution, does not seem to be well defined by the authorities in this state. There is no doubt that, upon well-settled principles, it is the exclusive province of the jury to pass upon the truth of the facts and circumstances relied upon as establishing the presence or absence of probable cause; and it seems to be well settled that a fact occurring after the matter or transaction which gives rise to a prosecution, or a civil action, such as the finding of "no bill" by the grand jury, the entry of a nolle prosequi by a prosecuting officer, the failure to prosecute, or the discontinuance of a civil action, will, as matter of law, be held insufficient to constitute even prima facie evidence of a want of probable cause. Lipford v. McCollum, 1 Hill, 82; Fulmer v. Harmon, 3 Strob., 576; Ford v. Kelsey & Deas, 4 Rich., 365; Frederick v. Halberstadt, 14 Rich., 41. But when testimony is adduced as to alleged facts and circumstances attending the supposed commission of the offence charged, or relied upon as evidence to show that there was, or was not, any ground for the charge, there does not seem to be any clear and well-defined rule.

It is true that there are several cases in this state which contain expressions going to support the position contended for by the appellant, but we do not think that the point is distinctly decided in any one of them. See Thomas v. Rouse, 2 Brev., 75; Nash v. Orr, 3 Brev., 94 [5 Am. Dec. 547]; Paris v. Waddell, 1 McMull., 358; Horn v. Boon, 3

*6

Strob., 307. On the other hand, we find *other cases in which the course pursued by the Circuit judge in this case received the sanction of the tribunal of last resort. Paris v. Waddell, 1 McMull., 358; Sims v. McLendon, 3 Strob., 557; Frederick v. Halberstadt, 14 Rich., 41.

The case of Hogg v. Pinckney, 16 S. C., 387, is relied upon by appellant; but we think that case, when properly understood, tends rather to support a contrary view. In that case the action was for a malicious arrest in a civil suit, charging fraud in the contracting of the debt for which the action was brought. The fraud alleged was that the goods were sold by the defendants to the plaintiff upon his promise to give a lien on his crop, which the plaintiff had failed and refused to give. The Circuit judge instructed the jury that the plaintiff must show a want of probable cause for the charge of fraud: "That the material points for them to consider was [sic] whether the plaintiff, at the time he agreed to give the lien to defendants, had no intention of giving the same, and that if they found he had no such intention, it would go far to show probable cause for the arrest; but, on the other hand, if they found that at the time he did intend to give it, it would go far to show a want of probable cause." Then, after instructing them as to damages, he said, in speaking of the evidence adduced to assail or substantiate the statements contained in the complaint and affidavit upon which the order of arrest was obtained: "If the evidence disproves these statements, then of course the probable cause is overthrown. If, on the contrary, the evidence supports these statements, or pointedly increases their strength, the probable cause is sustained. That if the jury, as reasonable men, under the circumstances proved, would have acted as the defendants did, then the jury might conclude the defendants had probable cause for their action; but, in view of the testimony, if the jury would not have acted as the defendants, then the jury might conclude the defendants did not have probable cause." The plaintiff having obtained judgment, the defendants appealed upon the ground, inter alia, that the Circuit judge had left the question of probable cause to the jury as a question of fact. This court, however, did not so understand the charge, but, on the contrary, construed it as amounting in effect to an instruction to the jury that if they believed the facts stated *in the complaint and affidavit, then there was probable cause; but if, on the other hand, they did not believe the statements therein contained, then there was a want of probable cause.

*7

This part of the opinion, standing alone, might possibly give rise to the inference, that it would have been error on the part of the Circuit judge, after explaining what would, in law, constitute probable cause, to leave it to the jury to say whether, upon a consideration of all the facts and circumstances present to the mind of the defendants at the time they acted, the want of probable cause was, or was not, shown. But when considered in connection with what was said as to the fifth exception, it is manifest that such an inference would be altogether unwarranted. In reference to that exception the following language was used: "The judge seems to have charged the jury that, if they, as reasonable men, under the circumstances proved, would have acted as the defendants did, then they might conclude the defendants had probable cause for their action; but in view of the testimony, if the jury would not have acted as the defendants, then the jury might conclude the defendants did not have probable cause. If the judge had confined the jury to the facts and circumstances which surrounded the defendants at the time they acted, then his charge would not have been objectionable. But he went further than this, and permitted them to consider all the facts developed on the trial, whether they were present before the defendants at the time of the arrest or not. This we think was error." From this language it is quite clear that, if the jury had been instructed, as they were in this case now under consideration, that in considering whether the testimony showed the presence or absence of probable cause, as defined to them, they must confine their attention to such facts and circumstances as were present to the minds of the defendants at the time they obtained the order for arrest, the court would have held that the charge was unobjectionable.

Under this state of the authorities here, we think that the question which we have been considering is still an open one in this state. If the rule contended for by the appellant should be adopted, it seems to us that it would lead to great complexity and confusion, and that it would, in many cases, be very difficult to apply it practically. Many prosecutions rest mainly, if not *entirely, upon circumstantial evidence, and in such cases it would be very difficult, if not impossible, so to present alternative views of the testimony to the mind of the average juror as to enable him to reach an intelligent conclusion, as to whether there was or was not a want of probable cause for the prosecution. The failure to establish to the satisfaction of the jury a single circumstance in the chain, although apparently quite insignificant in itself, or the proof of some other, apparently unimportant, fact, might very materially affect the conclusion which should be reached. So that if this is the rule, then the only safe course would be to require a special verdict in every case, and let the judge say whether the facts as found by the jury did or did not constitute probable cause.

*8

Indeed, the difficulty in applying such a rule seems to have been fully recognized, for in some of the strongest cases cited by the appellant it is conceded that the rule does not apply where the testimony is complicated or contradictory, and that it applies only where the testimony is undisputed. This concession demonstrates the impolicy of the rule, as it would be necessary to determine in each case what degree of complexity or contradiction would take the case out of the rule, or when the facts were so undisputed as to require its application.

But there is another and more formidable objection to this rule, in that it invests the judge with power to determine a question of fact. For assuming the definition of probable cause, as given by the Circuit judge in this case, to be the correct one, inasmuch as no exception is taken to it, after the jury have found what were the facts and circumstances present to the mind of the prosecutor at the time he instituted the prosecution, another question of fact would still remain, i. e., whether such facts and circumstances would be sufficient to induce a reasonable man to believe that the offence charged had been committed, and this question of fact should be decided by the jury and not by the judge; for the question is not whether such facts and circumstances would induce a well educated lawyer, such as every judge is supposed to be, to believe that an offence had been committed (as is well illustrated by the remark of Judge O'Neall in the case of Lipford v. McCollum, supra), but whether such facts and cir*cumstances would be sufficient to induce an ordinarily reasonable and impartial man, a class which the jury is supposed to represent, to believe that the offence had been committed.

*9

Unless, therefore, we are compelled by authority, as we do not think we are, to adopt the rule contended for by the appellant, we are not inclined, for the reasons indicated, to do so. On the contrary, we think the true rule is, that after the jury have been instructed as to what constitutes probable cause, as matter of law, it is for them to say, from a review of all the facts and circumstances proved to have been present to the mind of the prosecutor at the time he commenced the prosecution, or to the plaintiff at the time he commenced his civil action, whether there was or was not probable cause for such proceeding. This rule is, as we have seen, not without the support of authority is easy of application, and is in analogy with the rule in cases of negligence, which like probable cause presents a mixed question of law and fact.

The third ground of appeal seems to have been taken under a misapprehension of the judge's charge; for, from his report, it appears that he did distinctly instruct the jury what express malice was, and if there was any error at all, it was in favor of the defendant; for, as we have seen, malice may be inferred from the want of probable cause. Indeed, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, such would seem to be the legitimate inference; for it is difficult to conceive any motive but a malicious one for instituting a prosecution without any probable cause.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 9

MOFFATT v. HARDIN.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Witnesses ⇦140.]

In action by assignees to foreclose a junior mortgage given to the deceased mortgagee by his grantee, a clerk of court, who held officially the senior mortgage given by such mortgagee, and as such made a party defendant, is not incompetent to testify to communications between himself and the deceased relating to the ownership of *the mortgaged property; especially where he has ceased to be clerk of court and owner of the mortgage.

*10

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Griffin v. Earle, 34 S. C. 252, 13 S. E. 473.

For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 614; Dec. Dig. ⟸140.]

[2. Witnesses ⟸206.]

An attorney for a trust estate in a cause just ended was called upon by the trustee to draw a deed from the trustee to the cestui que trust, and a bond and mortgage in return, which he did without further charge, and signed his name to them as a witness. Held, that he might be called as a witness in a subsequent action to prove statements made at that time by the trustee to the cestui que trust in his hearing.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Brazel v. Fair, 26 S. C. 386, 2 S. E. 293; Catoe v. Catoe, 32 S. C. 596, 597, 10 S. E. 1078; Monaghan Bay Co. v. Dickson, 39 S. C. 149, 17 S. E. 696, 39 Am. St. Rep. 704; Wilson v. Gordon, 73 S. C. 158, 53 S. E. 79; Strickland v. Capital City Mills, 74 S. C. 22, 54 S. E. 220, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 426.

For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 761; Dec. Dig. ⟸206.]

[3. Evidence ⟸441.]

Parol testimony is admissible to prove contemporaneous declarations of mortgagee explaining the uses to be made of the mortgage and the conditions of its existence.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Moses v. Hatfield, 27 S. C. 329, 3 S. E. 538; Lindsay v. Garvin, 31 S. C. 261, 9 S. E. 862, 5 L. R. A. 219; Lipscomb v. Lipscomb, 32 S. C. 246, 10 S. E. 929.

For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2039; Dec. Dig. ⟸441.]

[4. Evidence ⟸408.]

Parol testimony is admissible to explain a receipt.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Bulwinkle & Co. v. Cramer & Blohme, 27 S. C. 381, 3 S. E. 776, 13 Am. St. Rep. 645; Catoe v. Catoe, 32 S. C. 597, 10 S. E. 1078; Rapley v. Klugh, 40 S. C. 144, 18 S. E. 680; Lenhardt v. Ponder, 64 S. C. 365, 42 S. E. 169.

For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1829; Dec. Dig. ⟸408.]

[5. Trusts ⟸231.]

From the facts of this case, a mortgage by a cestui que trust to her trustee held to be entitled to a credit for an amount then in the hands of the trustee, for which he held a receipt, and for a further amount in the hands of the clerk of court belonging to the cestui que trust, for which the trustee held her order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 330–335; Dec. Dig. ⟸231.]

[6. Witnesses ⟸37.]

The testimony of a respectable witness as to transaction of years ago should not be disregarded because of his forgetfulness of the execution of a receipt between the parties at that time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 80–87; Dec. Dig. ⟸37.]

[7. Mortgages ⟸257.]

The innocent assignees for value of such bond and mortgage, without notice of the credits to which the mortgagor was entitled, took these securities subject to the defences of the mortgagor against his mortgagee.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Harris v. McCaslan, 31 S. C. 425, 10 S. E. 104.

For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 687; Dec. Dig. ⟸257.]

8. This case distinguished from Montgomery v. Scott, 10 S. C., 449.

[This case is also cited in Patterson v. Rabb, 38 S. C. 148, 17 S. E. 463, 19 L. R. A. 831, and Rapley v. Klugh, 40 S. C. 143, 18 S. E. 680, without specific application, and in Patterson v. Rabb, 38 S. C. 150, 17 S. E. 463, 19 L. R. A. 831, as to facts.]

Before Kershaw, J., Chester, March, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

This action was tried before a referee, and was heard by me upon exceptions to his report, taken by the defendants, Julia L. Hardin and the clerk. The plaintiffs, as assignees of a bond and mortgage given by the defendant, Julia L. Hardin, née Stroud, before her marriage, to George W. Melton, now deceased, upon the land described in the complaint, seek to foreclose the same. Macoy, the former clerk, was made a party, because as clerk he held a prior mortgage of the same land.

Mrs. Hardin resists the foreclosure upon the ground that she had paid the debt in part, and had provided Melton, the mortgagee, with means sufficient to pay the balance, before the trans*fer of the bond and mortgage to the plaintiffs, and that they are liable to account for said payments and funds in settlement of the mortgage, in the same manner and to the same extent as Melton would be if he were the present holder of the bond and mortgage seeking to foreclose the same. She also claims that at the time of the purchase of the land for which the mortgage was given by her to Melton, he was her trustee, and that she is entitled to set aside the transaction, and does elect to set it aside, on account of the fiduciary relation existing between them. As to this latter contention, it is sufficient to say that the mortgage having been executed on the 22d day of May, 1874, nearly nine years ago, and she having enjoyed the benefit of the purchase during all that time, it is too late to avail herself of that defence, however it may aid the court in solving the question of fact involved in the other branch of the case.

*11

Before entering upon the consideration of the merits of the defence, there are questions relating to the competency of witnesses to be disposed of. First, as to Mrs. Hardin. I have no doubt that her testimony as to her transactions with the deceased Melton, as whose assignees the plaintiffs claim, was properly excluded by the referee. The exception of the defendant on this ground is therefore overruled.

Next, as to the testimony of Macoy, as to communications made to him while clerk by Mr. Melton. I consider that he was competent. He had no interest whatever that could be affected by the result of the present suit. He was made a party as the officer of the court, holding securities for litigants—a merely formal party. He has ceased now to to be a party at all, having been succeeded in office, and in the technical ownership of the mortgage, by reason of which he was originally made a party. His examination, or any judgment or determination in this action, can in nowise affect his interest or the interest heretofore owned or represented by him; hence the code (Section 400) will not exclude him. Moreover, plaintiffs themselves examined Macoy on their own behalf, touching declarations of Melton, and transactions with him, the effect whereof was to waive the objection previously made by them to his competency.

Plaintiffs also objected to the competency of Mr. Hamilton to *testify to the declarations of Melton, and transactions between him and Mrs. Hardin, upon the ground that they were confidential communications between client and attorney. It is not very clear who was Mr. Hamilton's client at the time. Plaintiffs, in the argument upon other parts of the case, insist that he was the attorney of Miss Stroud, while the referee seems to regard him sometimes as her attorney, and at other times as the attorney of both her and Melton. For the purpose now under consideration, however, it is immaterial who was his client. Communications made by Melton in the presence of Miss Stroud are not privileged, and cannot be excluded. Whart. Evid., § 587. If it had been otherwise, the objection could only have been made by Melton, or for the protection of his interests by his personal representatives. Ibid, § 584.

*12

The objection that Hamilton's testimony tended to vary the written contract to which he testified is not tenable. He was the subscribing witness to the deed, and was competent to testify to the conversation between the parties at the time it was executed. Spencer v. Bedford, 4 Strobh., 96. The testimony was explanatory of the transaction. It does tend to show that no money passed between the parties, but the receipt which it appears to contradict had not been produced at the time the objection was made. But if it had been, the testimony would have been admissible. Trimmier v. Thomson, 10 S. C., 190. I therefore conclude that Mr. Hamilton's testimony was properly admitted by the referee.

These preliminaries being disposed of, the case will be considered upon its merits. The result depends upon the degree of credit to be attached to the testimony of Major Hamilton. He is the only witness to the negotiations between Mrs. Hardin and Mr. Melton whose lips are not sealed. Mr. Melton is dead, and Mrs. Hardin has been excluded from testifying under plaintiffs' objection. Mr. Hamilton's testimony has been put aside by the referee as unworthy of credit, on two grounds: first, because of his failure of memory in relation to the receipt given by Mrs. Hardin to Melton on the day of the settlement; and next, because the settlement itself was considered by the referee "strange," and presumably improbable.

*13

*I do not find in either of the reasons assigned just cause for discrediting the testimony of a gentleman holding high position at the bar, unimpeached in any respect, intelligent, disinterested, having every opportunity of knowing the facts, and testifying positively. If the testimony of such a witness must be set aside as unworthy of belief, because he is shown to have forgotten one of many circumstances connected with the transactions to which he testifies, we should have little human testimony worthy of credit.

The discrepancy is shown thus: Mr. Hamilton, being cross-examined, said: "On the day the note and mortgage were executed, Miss Julia L. Stroud never, within my knowledge, receipted Melton for $1,214.11, due by him as trustee, as ascertained by the court." In the reply, plaintiffs produced and proved a receipt in Maj. Hamilton's handwriting, signed by Julia L. Stroud, acknowledging the receipt from Mr. Melton of the sum of $1,245.24, in full settlement of the said sum reported against him, &c. It might have been more satisfactory if Mr. Hamilton had been shown this receipt, and examined in reference to it, when he was on the stand, rather than to have led him on to deny any knowledge of the paper, and then confront him with it in reply. The judicial mind seeking for truth would have been more favorably impressed had the other course been pursued.

As it is, however, it is not charged upon Mr. Hamilton that he is thereby placed under any worse imputation than that of having forgotten an important fact involved in the transaction. It is possible that this apparent contradiction or lapse of memory might have been explained by Mr. Hamilton, had he been allowed the opportunity after the production of the receipt. He offered to go upon the stand and testify, but it was objected to, and the matter must remain as presented, to wit, that a paper is shown to exist, of which he had once had knowledge, but which he had forgotten at the trial. Yet I cannot agree with the referee, that the testimony of a credible and disinterested witness is to be disbelieved as to those matters which he swears he does remember, because of the existence of some other fact connected with the transaction which he does not remember.

Nor do I consider the improbabilities of
*14
Mr. Hamilton's statement so great as to throw doubt upon it. It appears to me less improbable than the hypothesis advanced by the plaintiffs. Mr. Melton had purchased the land in question for Mrs. Hardin, and at her request, paying therefor part cash, and securing the balance by his own bond and mortgage, while Mrs. Hardin was in possession of the land and enjoyed its benefits. Mr. Melton owed her $1,214.00, and there would be also due to her from the proceeds of the land sales a sufficient sum to pay, or nearly to pay, the price of the land, when the amount due to her by Mr. Melton had been applied. According to Mr. Hamilton's testimony, on May 22, 1874 (the land having been sold in December previous), Mr. Melton sent for him. He found him in company with Miss Julia L. Stroud (Mrs. Hardin). Mr. Melton requested him to draw the note and mortgage which is the subject of this suit. He did so, and returned with the papers to Mr. Melton's office, where he found Miss Stroud, Melton, and W. D. Simpson. At the time of, or immediately preceding, the execution of the papers, Melton stated to Miss Stroud that the court had ascertained that he (Melton) was indebted to her some $1,200, and that there would be a sum of money coming to her from the clerk of the court, and he was confident these two sums would be sufficient to pay for her purchase of these two tracts of land; that as he had paid the cash portion of the purchase, and it was not certain what sum would be coming from the clerk of the court, he would get her to execute the note and mortgage for his protection, and if it should turn out, after a settlement with the clerk, that the amount due by him and coming to her from the clerk, would be sufficient to pay the bonds given by him for the purchase money, he would cancel the note and mortgage; if not, he would give her credit for as much as the two sums amounted to.

At that time the note and mortgage were executed, and Melton gave his deed, with the usual warranty, to Miss Stroud, conveying the mortgaged premises, Mr. Hamilton being a subscribing witness thereto. At the same time she gave to Mr. Melton her receipt for the balance due her by him as trustee, and her release of him as trustee. These were dealings between a trustee and his cestui que trust, a young lady said at the trial to have recently come of age. He had written her a letter a short time *before, seeking to impress her with the idea that some one or more persons were trying to cheat her out of her interest, claiming credit for defeating them, enjoining secrecy as to their correspondence, and warning her against "outside influences," &c.; whereas nothing has been made to appear showing that any one was trying to injure or get any advantage over her. He was evidently seeking to establish an influence over her, to the exclusion of all others, and there is no reason to doubt that he had her entire confidence.
*15

It was his duty, under the circumstances, to protect her interests against all the world, and to have acted out honorably the rôle he had assumed towards her. If he had looked to her interest, he would have transferred his bid to her for the purchase of the land and paid the cash portion of it out of the funds in his hands as trustee, to which she was entitled. Or he would at least have shown some reason why that was not done. Giving to Mr. Hamilton's testimony due credit, he paid her nothing, but undertook to account to her for the amount for which she receipted to him, upon her note and mortgage. He ought to have given her credit then for that amount, but he used it to obtain his discharge as trustee, and held the note and mortgage open against her. When the next instalment became due on the land purchased in December, 1874, he took from her an assignment of the amount which might be coming to her out of the estate in the hands of the clerk. He paid that instalment out of his own funds and assigned her note and mortgage, and the assignment of the funds in the clerk's hands, to the plaintiffs, without giving her credit for anything, and without notice to her.

These dealings on the part of Mr. Melton, his further assignment of the collaterals to Irwin, hereafter mentioned, and his subsequent insolvency indicate that he was then in failing circumstances and anxious to secure the control of all the credits possible. The plaintiffs seek to overcome the testimony of Mr. Hamilton by producing the receipt of Miss Stroud and an assignment by Mr. Melton to her of a note of Joseph Stroud, secured by a mortgage on mules, which assignment bears date May 22, 1874. This paper is produced by plaintiffs, and there is absolutely no testimony to connect Mrs.
*16
Hardin with it. It is fair *to conclude that Melton intended to give her that paper in order to secure her in some way in regard to these transactions, but there is no evidence which will authorize the conclusion that it was ever delivered to her, or that she accepted it on account of what Melton owed to her. Why should she do so, and leave her mortgage standing open? The referee finds that Melton paid her the amount due her by the transfer of this paper and the cash paid by him on the land purchase, which was $733.19; yet he does not find that Mrs. Hardin is entitled to credit for the amount so paid to Melton. Her note to Melton was for the entire price for which he bid off the land, including the cash portion paid by him; and when she paid him, as the referee finds, the cash advanced by him and paid on the land, she was certainly entitled to credit for that amount.

But the assignment of the note and mortgage of J. L. Stroud cannot be inferred to have been received by Mrs. Hardin, there being no evidence of her acceptance of it. The presumption would rather be, that she had declined to take it, and that Melton had delivered it to plaintiffs (who produce it without explanation) among the other securities transferred to them. If Mrs. Hardin did not accept the assignment of that note and mortgage as cash from Mr. Melton, then it is clear that she is entitled to have credit for the whole amount due her by Melton as her trustee, and for which her receipt was given him, to wit, $1,214.00, of the date of the note and mortgage, May 22, 1874. The receipt was given for $1,245.24, but that included Melton's commissions.

The referee has been led away by the doctrine applicable to purchasers for valuable consideration without notice. That doctrine has no application whatever to the purchase of unnegotiable notes and securities. These plaintiffs, as assignees, stand in all respects in regard to this mortgage as Melton stood at the time of the transfer, and are bound by all the equities which then existed between Melton and Mrs. Hardin, affecting the mortgage debt. It is wholly immaterial whether they had notice or not. If it had not been, I would have held that there was sufficient to put them upon the inquiry. But it is not worth while to go into that question, for plaintiffs took these securities absolutely without prejudice to any set off or other defence existing *at the time of or before notice of the assignment. Authorities might be multiplied upon this point, but it is sufficient to say, ita lex scripta. Code of Procedure, Sec. 133.

*17

This provision of the law also excludes the application of the doctrine of estoppel, which was invoked for the protection of the plaintiffs. The exceptions taken on behalf of the clerk must also be sustained. It was manifest error in the referee to recommend that the plaintiffs be allowed the relief demanded in the complaint, without providing for the balance due on the first mortgage in the hands of the clerk of the court.

Since the hearing by the referee, a petition has been entered by T. J. Irwin, asking to be made a party, and that he be decreed to be paid any balance that may remain after satisfying the demands of the plaintiffs out of the mortgaged property. He claims as assignee of the receipt of the plaintiffs which Mr. Hemphill gave to Mr. Melton for the collaterals. Irwin has been made a party by an order of the court, and is entitled to the relief he demands, if there should be anything remaining due after satisfying plaintiffs' demand.

It is therefore adjudged and decreed, that the defendant, Julia L. Hardin, be credited upon her note and mortgage in the hands of the plaintiffs with the sum of one thousand two hundred and fourteen dollars and eleven cents ($1,214.11), as of the date of the same, May 22, 1874; that the said Julia L. Hardin pay the balance due to the clerk of the court upon the bond and mortgage of the same premises, given by George W. Melton, and set up in the answer of Mr. Macoy, as clerk; that upon such payment being made, she have further credit upon her note and mortgage held by plaintiffs, for the amount so paid to the clerk; that in the said payment to the clerk of the court, she be allowed the proportion to which she is entitled, out of the funds and securities in the hands of the clerk, arising from the sales of the land of the estate of Dr. William Wylie; that if anything remain due by her after the application of the credits aforesaid to her note and mortgage, she pay the same to the plaintiffs, or so much thereof as will satisfy the debt of G. W. Melton to plaintiffs, for which they hold the said note and mortgage as collateral security, they crediting the note and mortgage to the extent of such pay*ment; that if any balance be then due on her said note and mortgage, the said Julia L. Hardin pay the same to T. J. Irwin, and that her note and mortgage be thereupon satisfied and discharged, and satisfaction thereof be entered upon the records by the clerk of the court, and the said note and mortgage be delivered up to the said Julia L. Hardin.

*18

That upon the failure of the said Julia L. Hardin to pay the said sums of money, or any of them, as required by this decree, on or before the first day of September next, the said Julia L. Hardin be thereafter forever foreclosed and barred from all title, claim, and equity of redemption in the premises described in the complaint, and that the same be sold by the sheriff of Chester County, after due advertising, on the first Monday in October next, or on some convenient sales-day thereafter, for cash, and that he do pay from the proceeds of said sale, first, the costs of these proceedings, and then the amounts herein ordered and decreed to be paid by the said Julia L. Hardin; the clerk allowing, in the payment to be made to him, credit as hereinbefore directed to be allowed to the said Julia L. Hardin, in case the settlement be made by her, for the amounts to which she is entitled, in the estate of Dr. William Wylie, deceased, in his hands.

That if this decree be complied with by the said Julia L. Hardin, by the payment of the said sums, and the mortgaged lands be not sold, the said Julia L. Hardin pay the costs of this action.

That the report of the referee herein be reversed, so far as it conflicts with this decree.

That the said referee ascertain and report, as soon as may be, the sums of money required to be paid by Julia L. Hardin, under the terms of this decree, and that the payments herein ordered to be made, conform to the amounts to be ascertained by the said report.

Messrs. John J. Hemphill and A. G. Brice, for appellants.

Mr. S. P. Hamilton, contra.

November 14, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

*19

*Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action to foreclose a mortgage on two tracts of land, called for convenience C and D, executed by Julia L. Stroud, now Julia L. Hardin, to one George W. Melton, on May 22, 1874, to secure a note under seal of same date, given to the said Melton, for $2,204.08¾, due January 1, 1875, with interest. On June 22, 1875, the said Melton borrowed money from Mr. James Hemphill, acting for himself and Mrs. Moffatt, and gave him two notes, one payable to Mrs. Moffatt, for $1,500, and the other payable to James Hemphill, for $1,000, and to secure these notes assigned and transferred the note and mortgage of Miss Stroud, to foreclose which this action was brought, making also a party defendant G. W. Curtis, clerk of the court, who, as clerk, held a senior mortgage on the said lands, to be more fully explained hereafter. The defense was that the note and mortgage were not due, but had been substantially paid, and should have been marked satisfied, at least to a large extent, before Melton, the payee, assigned them to the plaintiffs.

The cause was referred to W. A. Sanders, Esq., as special referee, when the facts appeared, of which the following is a general outline: Miss Julia L. Stroud had an interest under the will of Dr. William Wylie, of which George W. Melton was appointed trustee. A proceeding was instituted to settle the estate, entitled Alexander P. Wylie, executor, v. George W. Melton, trustee. In this cause there was an order of sale, by authority of which, besides other property, the tracts of land C and D were sold December 1, 1873, and bid off by George W. Melton at the aggregate price of $2,199.58. The terms of sale were complied with by Melton, who made the payment required in cash and took title from the clerk, who made the sale, and mortgaged the lands back to him to secure the remainder of the purchase money. The allegation is, that this purchase was made by Melton, trustee, for Miss Stroud, who immediately went into possession of the lands.

On May 20, 1874, the report upon the accounts of Melton, trustee, was filed, by which it appeared that, for rents of land, personalty, &c., he was indebted to Miss Stroud in the sum of $1,214.11; and a few days thereafter, May 22, 1874, Melton *executed a conveyance of C and D to Miss Stroud, and took from her the note and mortgage for the whole purchase money, which he afterwards assigned, and are in contention here. Although the account against Melton had not then been confirmed, yet he took from Miss Stroud at that time a receipt in full for the amount ($1,214.11) which the report showed he owed her.

*20

Afterwards, on June 1, 1874, the account was confirmed by order of court, which provided, "that upon the payment of the sums of money reported due by the trustee to his cestui que trusts, Mrs. M. J. Wylie and Miss Julia Stroud, and the production or the filing of the receipts from one or more of them, or the payment of the said sum of money into court, that said George W. Melton be released and discharged from his said trusts." Three days after this order was passed, June 4, 1874, Melton produced the receipt previously taken, and filed it in the office of the clerk, taking from him (the clerk) a receipt for the same, which stated that it was "in full release of her said trustee, as provided by the order of court, June 1, 1874."

On December 23, 1874, Miss Stroud gave to the clerk of the court an order directing him to pay to Melton "all moneys in his hands as clerk of the court at any time due in the above stated case (Wylie v. Melton), and take a receipt from the said George W. Melton for the same." Accepted by the clerk, "to be paid when in funds applicable thereto." There was at that time no money in the clerk's hands due to Miss Stroud, but on the assumption that Melton would pay the remainder of his land bonds, there would be in his hands for her the sum of $961.15, and this must have been the anticipated funds upon which that order was given. This order (known in the proceedings as "assignment G") was taken out of the clerk's office and assigned by Melton to the plaintiffs as further collateral security for the money borrowed as aforesaid.

It appeared also that one of the attorneys for the plaintiffs found in the record of the case (Wylie v. Melton) in the clerk's office a mortgage of one Joseph H. Stroud to George W. Melton, February 3, 1873, covering sixteen mules and horses, to secure a note for $874. There were endorsements on the paper, showing that Melton himself had sold most of the mules and horses.

*21

*This mortgage had on it an assignment, "without recourse," by Melton to Miss Julia L. Stroud, but there was no proof that the mortgage was worth anything, or had ever been delivered to Miss Stroud, or any other evidence whatever concerning it.

In July, 1876, George W. Melton died intestate and insolvent, and the plaintiffs, after crediting what they could realize from his estate, which left still a balance unpaid of about $2,300, as assignees instituted this proceeding to foreclose the mortgage against Julia L. Hardin, impleading also G. W. Curtis, successor of Macoy, as clerk of the court, who held officially unpaid balances of the senior mortgages on the lands C and D, executed for the purchase money by George W. Melton, while the legal title to the same was in him under the clerk's deed.

Mrs. Hardin was excluded under section 400 of the code from testifying to any agreement or transaction with Melton, when the note and mortgage and receipt and assignment G were placed at his disposal. But C. C. Macoy, the then clerk, testified (subject to objection), "that C and D were sold to Mr. Melton, and when I called upon him to comply, he objected until he could see Miss Stroud, his reason being, to the best of my recollection, that he had bid off the lands at the sale for her, and there being some money transactions between them, the matter would have to be delayed until he could see her. * * * * At the time the assignment G was lodged with witness, there was no fund in court for Miss Stroud. It was lodged with me, to the best of my recollection, on the day it bears date. My recollection is that assignment G was taken out of the office and never returned. I do not recollect who took it out. * * * * I applied to Mr. Melton to pay the instalment on these bonds several times. He claimed that he had money coming to him from Miss Stroud, then in the office under this assignment G, and that it should be applied to the bonds, and that it was unnecessary for him to pay the money into court. Witness said if these bonds had been paid in full, there would have been due Miss Stroud $961.15."

S. P. Hamilton, Esq., testified (subject to objection) as follows: "I drew the note made by Julia Stroud, payable to George W. Melton, also the mortgage taken to secure it. I am a witness to the mortgage. The suit of Wylie, executor, v. Melton, trustee, *had been concluded, so far as the litigation was concerned. In that litigation I represented George W. Melton, trustee, and Miss Stroud. On April 4, 1873, the court, by its order, required the trustee to pay me a fee of $200 for my compensation in and about the litigation of the trust estate. * * * * On May 22, 1874, I was sent for by Mr. Melton to come to his office in the town of Chester. I found Miss Julia L. Stroud there. Mr. Melton requested me to draw the deed and the note and mortgage, which are the subject of this suit. I received no fee for this, other than I received under the order of court. I returned after the papers were drawn and found Miss Stroud and Mr. W. D. Simpson there in Melton's office. At the time, or immediately preceding the execution of the papers, Melton stated to Miss Stroud that the court had ascertained that he was due her as her trustee some $1,200, and that there would be a sum of money coming to her from the clerk of the court, and that he was confident that these two sums of money together would be sufficient to pay for the purchase of the two tracts of land. He said that as he had paid the cash portion of the purchase, and that it was not certain what sum would be coming from the clerk of the court, he would get her to execute the note and mortgage for his own protection, and that if it should turn out after a settlement with Macoy, the clerk, that the amount due by him and the amount coming from the clerk, would be sufficient to pay the bonds given by him for the purchase of the lands, that he would cancel the note and mortgage; if not, he would give her credit on the note and mortgage for as much as the two sums of money came to," &c.

*22

The plaintiffs objected to this testimony on the ground that Major Hamilton was acting as the attorney of Mr. Melton, and he was not at liberty to disclose such communications; and also because the testimony tended to vary written contracts made at the time. The testimony was taken subject to objection.

On the cross examination the witness stated: "I do not know of Melton's turning over money or valuable assets on the day the note and mortgage were executed. Miss Julia L. Stroud never, within my knowledge, receipted Melton for the $1,214.11, due by him as trustee, as ascertained by the court," &c. In reply *the plaintiffs offered the receipt of Miss Stroud to George W. Melton for the sum of $1,245.24 (commissions added), "in full settlement of said sum reported against him as trustee in the case of A. P. Wylie, executor, v. George W. Melton, trustee," &c. This receipt was in the hand-writing of Major Hamilton. The defendants claimed the right to reply, which would have given an opportunity for explanation, but the referee ruled that the plaintiffs had the reply, and no testimony was admissible after they had concluded.

*23

The referee held that the agreement between Melton and Miss Stroud at the time the papers were executed indicated in the testimony of Macoy and Major Hamilton was not established by satisfactory proof, and recommended that the relief demanded should be granted, and the mortgage foreclosed for the whole amount remaining due upon the notes. Exceptions were filed to this report by Mrs. Hardin and the clerk, G. W. Curtis, and upon the hearing, Judge Kershaw reversed the findings of the referee, and recommitted the report, with instructions that "Mrs. Hardin should pay the balance due to the clerk of the court upon the bond and mortgage of the same premises given by Geo. W. Melton, and set up in the answer of Mr. Macoy as clerk; that upon such payment being made, she have credit upon her note and mortgage held by plaintiffs for the amount so paid to the clerk, and that in this payment she be allowed the proportion to which she is entitled out of the funds and securities in the hands of the clerk arising from the sales of the lands of the estate of Dr. William Wylie; that Mrs. Hardin be also credited upon her note and mortgage in the hands of the plaintiffs with the sum of $1,214.11, as of the date of the same, May 22, 1874; and that if anything remained due by her after the application of these credits on her note and mortgage, she pay the same to the plaintiffs, or so much thereof as will satisfy the debt of G. W. Melton to the plaintiffs," &c.

From this decree the plaintiffs appeal to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. "Because his honor held that the testimony of C. C. Macoy as to communications between himself and G. W. Melton was competent and admissible.

*24

*2. "Because he held that the examination of Macoy by the plaintiffs was a waiver of the objection to his testimony made by them.

3. "Because he held that the testimony of S. P. Hamilton, Esq., was properly admitted by the referee, and that it did not tend to vary the written contract between Mrs. Julia L. Hardin and Melton.

4. "Because he holds that Melton bought the land described in the complaint for Mrs. J. L. Hardin, and at her request.

5. "Because he holds there is no testimony to connect Mrs. Hardin with the mortgage of Joseph H. Stroud on certain mules, and the plaintiffs produced it without explanation.

6. "Because he holds that plaintiffs are bound by all the equities existing between Melton and Mrs. Hardin, even without notice of them; that the plaintiffs had sufficient notice to put them upon inquiry, and that Mrs. Hardin cannot be estopped by her conduct.

7. "Because he adjudges and orders that Mrs. Julia L. Hardin be credited upon her note and mortgage in the hands of the plaintiffs with $1,214.11, as of date May 22, 1874.

8. "Because he orders and adjudges that Mrs. Hardin pay to the clerk the balance due on the bond and mortgage of Melton to the clerk of the court, and that such payment be entered as a credit on her bond and mortgage held by plaintiffs.

9. "Because he orders and adjudges that in the payment to the clerk of the court, Mrs. Hardin be allowed the proportion to which she is entitled out of the funds and securities in the hands of the clerk arising from the sales of the lands of Dr. William Wylie.

10. "Because he orders that Mrs. Hardin pay plaintiffs the balance only, if any, due on her bond and mortgage, after allowing the above credits, or so much of said balance as will satisfy the debt of Melton to them; and that the overplus, if any, due on her note and mortgage be paid to T. J. Irwin, and that thereupon her note and mortgage be marked satisfied and discharged, and delivered up to her, and satisfaction entered on the record.

11. "Because he reverses the referee's report so far as it conflicts with his decree herein.

*25

*12. "Because he did not adjudge that the plaintiffs were entitled to an order of foreclosure and sale and judgment against Mrs. Julia L. Hardin for the balance, if any, due after application of the proceeds of the sale to their debt," &c.

First. In regard to the preliminary question as to the admissibility of the evidence. The testimony of Mr. Macoy as to conversations with Melton, who is now dead, was objected to as inadmissible under section 400 of the code. It is true that he was once a party, made so by the plaintiffs for the reason that as clerk he held officially a senior mortgage on these same lands. We suppose that in any event that mortgage would have to be first paid, and that he really had no interest in the event of the suit. He could not be made incompetent to testify by simply being made a party defendant. This court has lately held that section 400 of the code did not exclude those who were competent to testify before its passage; that the word "affect" should be construed in the sense of "promote the interest of said witness"; and that if the evidence of the witness does not tend to promote his interest, he is competent, whether he is a party or not. Robinson v. Robinson, 20 S. C., 570.

Besides, as the Circuit judge says: "He was made a party as the officer of the court holding securities for litigants, a merely formal party; and he has now ceased to be a party at all, having been succeeded in office and in the technical ownership of the mortgage by reason of which he was originally made a party. His examination or any judgment or determination in this action can in nowise affect his interest or the interest heretofore owned or represented by him. Moreover, plaintiffs themselves examined Macoy on their own behalf, touching declarations of Melton and transactions with him," &c.

Second. The plaintiffs also object to the competency of Major Hamilton to testify as to the declarations of Melton and transactions between him and Mrs. Hardin, upon the ground that they were confidential communications between client and attorney. It is a wise rule to hold professional communications privileged, but it does not follow that everything which passes between parties in the presence of a lawyer must be regarded as communications made to him under the seal of confidence. It has been *held that privilege does not protect statements made to the counsel in the presence of third parties, such persons not being concerned in a confidential communication. 1 Whart. Evid., §§ 587, 588. We do not understand that the arrangement between Melton and Miss Stroud as to the use to be made of the papers executed was in the nature of a communication to the counsel. He was in no way consulted about it, but in preparing the papers as requested, he was present and happened to hear the agreement between them. There could be nothing confidential or secret in its nature about an honest agreement between parties. Major Hamilton signed the mortgage as a witness, and that entitled him to state the conversation which occurred at the time. Spencer v. Bedford, 4 Strobh., 96.

*26

Besides, it seems to us that if he was present as counsel for any other purpose than the preparation of the papers, he was counsel for both parties. In the litigation then just ended, out of which the business arose, he had represented the trust estate, and in doing so represented both the trustee and cestui que trust. For that service he had been paid from the trust estate, and he prepared those papers between trustee and cestui que trust as a supplemental matter, without further charge. Mr. Brice, in his admirable argument for the plaintiffs, properly admitted that if Major Hamilton were counsel for both, his testimony could not be excluded on that ground. If one of two parties to a verbal agreement abuses the confidence of the other, who is excluded from testifying, it would certainly be unfortunate if a person who happened to hear the agreement should also be excluded for the reason that he was a lawyer present, preparing the papers at the instance of both. "In regard to the person to whom the communications must have been made in order to be thus protected, they must have been made to the counsel, attorney, or solicitor acting for the time being in the character of legal adviser." 1 Greenl. Evid., § 239.

Nor do we regard this testimony as inadmissible on the ground that it tended to vary the terms of written instruments. The purpose manifestly was not to vary the terms of the papers, but to explain the uses to be made of them and the conditions of their existence; as stated in the case of Kaphan v.

*27

Ryan, 16 S. C., *357, "to show the whole agreement in which they originated and of which they constituted only a part." It is said in 1 Greenleaf's Evidence, § 284, that the rule does not apply to the admission of parol evidence in cases where the original contract was verbal and entire, and a part only was reduced to writing. Lewis v. Gray, 1 Mass., 297; Knight v. Knotts, 8 Rich., 35; McGrath & Byrum v. Barnes, 13 S. C., 332 [36 Am. Rep. 687].

Besides, a receipt is not one of those solemn papers in writing as to which parol evidence is not admissible, but is always capable of explanation. "In itself a receipt does not express the terms of any contract or uniting of the minds of the parties between whom it has passed, but merely indicates, by way of admission, the fact stated in it; consequently it is not governed by the rule which prescribes the effect of instruments adopted by parties as the special means of evidencing some compact or understanding had between them, but, like evidence not enjoying any special privilege, it is capable of being contradicted or modified by other classes of evidence." Heath v. Steele, 9 S. C., 92.

Third. Then as to the merits of the case, the evidence being admissible. If this question were between these defendants and George W. Melton, or his personal representative, it seems to us that there could be little doubt about it. It is clear, not only from Melton's letter, but from the testimony of Macoy and the acts of the parties, that the lands were bid off for Mrs. Hardin. They were most likely bought for her for the reason that she had money due to her from the estate, and she went into immediate possession. Neither Melton, who is dead, nor Mrs. Hardin can testify upon the subject; but from anything that appears, we are unable to reach the conclusion that Melton, on the day the note and mortgage were signed, had a settlement with Mrs. Hardin and paid her what he owed her as trustee, and advanced her the money for the order upon the clerk, not given until long after, leaving the whole of the note and mortgage due to himself personally. The undisputed record facts of the case would seem to indicate that lands purchased for Mrs. Hardin from the estate of Dr. William Wylie should be paid for out of money due to her from that estate.

It does not seem to us probable that Melton, a man in busi*ness, and evidently needing all the money he could raise, should pay for lands bid off for his cestui que trust out of his private means, and give her credit for the advance as an investment, when at the same time he owed her in the very matter of the estate, money about enough to pay for them; and it would seem to be still less probable that Mrs. Hardin should encumber her newly acquired lands to secure the purchase money, when there was lying to her credit in the case in which they were sold money to pay for them. It would require strong proof to make it appear that any such settlement was made, and that Mrs. Hardin received the money.

*28

But instead of such full proof, there is really none, except what may be fairly inferred from Melton's possession of the receipt for $1,214.11 and the order on the clerk given long afterwards; for we cannot give to the little balance of the chattel mortgage, found in the record assigned to Mrs. Hardin, the importance claimed for it. There is no evidence that it had any value, or that Mrs. Hardin ever had knowledge of its existence, and it is therefore impossible for us, simply from the fact that it was found in the record, to infer that Melton that day had a full and final settlement with Mrs. Hardin, in which he paid her as cestui que trust what, as trustee, he owed her, without using in any way what the record showed he owed her as trustee. If such settlement were made, it is very unfortunate that there was no record of it.

But when we take into consideration the testimony of Mr. Macoy and Major Hamilton, the matter is made intelligible, in accordance with what would seem to be the probabilities of the case. As it seemed reasonable that Mrs. Hardin left with the clerk her order in favor of Melton (assignment G) in order to enable him to set off that fund against the land bonds, so Mr. Macoy says Melton informed him. As we would suppose in advance that Mrs. Hardin would use the money due to her from Melton in paying for her lands, and had given him the control of the receipt for that purpose as soon as the account against him was confirmed by the court, accordingly, Major Hamilton states that such was his distinct undertaking "at the time, or immediately preceding the execution of the papers." Surely the tes*timony of a gentleman so respectable as Major Hamilton should not be disregarded only for the reason that, in respect to a transaction which took place some seven or eight years before, he had forgotten that on the occasion referred to a receipt was actually given, especially as his testimony is in exact conformity to the view suggested as probable by all the circumstances of the case. We think that as against Melton himself, or his personal representative, the defence made should prevail.

*29

It is said, however, that this is not an action to enforce these securities by Melton, or his personal representative, but new parties have been introduced; that Melton, without making the proper credits on the note and mortgage, assigned them for full value and without notice to the plaintiffs, who are now entitled as innocent purchasers to enforce them in the condition in which, as assignees, they received them, without regard to the omission of Melton to credit them in accordance with his agreement. This would certainly be true if the securities were negotiable in their nature, and had been transferred before due for full value, and without notice. See the recent case of First National Bank of Parkersburg v. Johns, 46 Amer. Rep., 516, where a great number of the authorities are collected.

But the bond and mortgage assigned here were not negotiable securities transferred before due, but mere choses in action, and very different principles apply. They are not subject to the doctrines of implied warranty and of purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. Maybin v. Kirby, 4 Rich. Eq., 116. The books are full of cases upon the subject, but we are not aware that the general doctrine is anywhere stated with more clearness than by Judge Butler in the case of Hodges v. Connor, 1 Speers, 123: "This case, according to the legal character and purport of the paper sued on, must be regarded as a contest between the original parties to it. That is, the intermediate holders have acquired no higher rights, nor should they occupy any better position than the original payee."

This principle has been expressly embodied in section 133, Revised Code, which declares that, "In the case of an assignment of a thing in action, the action by the assignee shall be without prejudice to any set-off or other defence existing at the time *of, or before notice of, the assignment; but this section shall not apply to a negotiable promissory note or bill of exchange transferred in good faith and upon good consideration before due." Nothing could be plainer or more positive than this provision. As we understand it, the debtor, in executing such securities, gives no authority expressly or impliedly in fact or in law, that they may be sold at all; and if they are sold, the purchaser is notified by the law that he takes them at his peril under the principle of caveat emptor.

*30

So far as the debtor is concerned the doctrine of estoppel cannot displace this positive provision of express law. We suppose that under certain circumstances he might be estopped from denying that he uttered the security or matters of that kind, which would avail the payee as well as any subsequent holder, but he cannot be estopped from setting up any defence against the holder, which would be good against the payee himself. This results from the nature of the security. The law so declares in terms. Mr. Pomeroy does say that, in reference to certain kinds of securities, such as certificates of stock, which are of a quasi negotiable character, the doctrine of estoppel has been held to apply in certain cases between assignor and assignee; but he denies its application between the debtor and assignee. After discussing the whole subject he sums up as follows: "All defences, either legal or equitable, in favor of the debtor himself against the original creditor at the time of the assignment, or of notice to him of the assignment of a non-negotiable thing in action, will avail against the assignee, who seeks to enforce the demand against such debtor," &c. Pomeroy's Rights and Remedies, § 162.

But it is still further strongly pressed upon the court that there is a general principle in the law applying to all cases, "that when one of two innocent parties must suffer, he by whom the loss was occasioned must suffer;" and that the inexcusable negligence of Mrs. Hardin in parting with the control of the receipt and order on the clerk put it in the power of Melton to do an injustice to innocent parties, and she ought to suffer the consequences; and the case of Montgomery

v. Scott, 10 S. C., 449, is relied on to sustain the proposition. We think this case *differs from that in several very important particulars. In that case the alleged mortgagor brought the action to set aside the mortgage itself on the ground of fraud and imposition in obtaining her own signature. Here the mortgagor does not deny the existence of the mortgage, but insists, by way of defence, that the mortgagee undertook to make certain credits upon it, which he did not make. In that case the question was whether the mortgagor was guilty herself of negligence in failing to take proper precaution against signing a paper not intended; here the alleged negligence of the mortgagor is not in her signing the mortgage, but in trusting the matter of credits to her friend, the mortgagee, who abused that confidence.
*31

It would certainly have been better if the credits had been endorsed at the proper time, when Melton was furnished with the means of doing so; but in considering the matter of negligence we cannot overlook the relations that the parties held to each other as trustee and cestui que trust. They were not on equal terms in the matter. The confidence of Mrs. Hardin was natural, but, as it turned out, misplaced. The fault was that of Melton in not endorsing the proper credits at the proper time, and we have already held that as against him or his estate, the credits should now be allowed. It seems to us that in any view the over-confidence or want of caution of Mrs. Hardin cannot be considered as reaching beyond the law involved in the nature of the securities.

It is not claimed that she authorized the assignment. The utmost that can be said is, that the absence of the credits enabled Melton to assign them. Even if that unauthorized act of his could be regarded in any proper sense as caused by her omission to have the credits endorsed, yet that assignment could not be so made as to escape the public well known law, which declares that it was subject to all defences against the original payee. The securities were fair upon their face, without credit or endorsement, and the plaintiffs were misled. That they should lose their money is matter of the sincerest regret, but from our view of the facts and the law, we are constrained to hold that the defendants are entitled to have the credits entered, as directed by the Circuit judge.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. *32

*SHEORN v. ROBINSON.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Vendor and Purchaser ⇨232.]

Actual possession of land by a vendee under a contract to purchase operates as notice to a subsequent purchaser from the vendor, although such possession, as matter of fact, is unknown at the time to such subsequent purchaser. Mr. Justice McIver, dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Biemann v. White, 23 S. C. 492, 493; Graham v. Nesmith, 24 S. C. 295; Sweatman v. Edmunds, 28 S. C. 63, 5 S. E. 165; Daniel v. Hester, 29 S. C. 149, 7 S. E. 65; Ellis v. Young, 31 S. C. 325, 326, 9 S. E. 955; Tant v. Guess, 37 S. C. 500, 16 S. E. 472; Manigault v. Lofton, 78 S. C. 499, 501, 502, 59 S. E. 534; Foster v. Bailey, 82 S. C. 381, 64 S. E. 423; Folk v. Brooks, 91 S. C. 9, 74 S. E. 46.

For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 544; Dec. Dig. ⇨232.]

2. Per McIver, A. J. A purchaser of land under a decree of foreclosure is chargeable with notice of the rights of a purchaser in possession under a contract to purchase (prior in date to the mortgage) where the title deeds held by the mortgagor gave notice, which, if prosecuted, would have led to knowledge of such contract.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Daniel v. Hester, 29 S. C. 150, 7 S. E. 65.]

Before Fraser, J., Kershaw, May, 1884.

To the statement of the case as made by the Circuit decree, it will be proper to add the following facts, which appear in the brief:

In compliance with defendant's notice, plaintiff produced the following deeds, which defendants offered in evidence, to wit:

I. Deed of J. D. Dunlap, receiver of John Chesnut, to Thos. Moore and A. L. Monroe, March 1, 1869, 618 acres, more or less, bounded west by Wateree river, No. 19 of the general plat, plat whereof is attached to the deed.

II. Thos. Moore to A. L. Monroe, February 16, 1873, "all my right, title, and interest in 286 acres of said land," "bounded north by land of Jos. Brevard, Scipio Williams, and Paris Watts, east by land of Wm. J. Gerald, south by Wm. D. McDowall, and west by Thos. Moore, as shown by plat hereto annexed and by plat annexed to deed to Robert Robinson from myself, bearing even date herewith, being the eastern portion of the tract of 618 acres conveyed by Dunlap to Thos. Moore and A. L. Monroe" as above stated. Defendant offered in evidence the record book, "C. C.," p. 106, showing the plat of the last mentioned deed, which calls for 220 acres. The plat was made by S. M. Boykin, D. S., at the request of A. L. Monroe, on November 15, 1869.

III. Deed of A. L. Monroe to Robert Robinson, dated February 17, 1873, for 66 acres, at two hundred and ninety-seven dollars, plat attached with renunciation of dower. This deed *was never delivered or recorded, and was found in possession of A. L. Monroe after his death.
*33

The description, boundaries, marks, &c., of the land in mortgage of A. L. Monroe to Witte Bros., is the same as in deed of Moore to Monroe, except that no reference is made to plats or deed to Robinson.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

This case came before me at the June term of the court for Kershaw County, on the report of the master and exceptions thereto. The action was brought originally against Robert Robinson and Wesley Truesdel, and the former having departed this life, it was duly continued against his heirs at law. The action was brought to recover possession of a tract of land containing (66⅔) sixty-six and two-thirds acres of land, and an equitable defence was set up, and by consent all the issues of law and fact were referred to the master.

In March, 1869, A. L. Monroe and Thomas Moore purchased at the sale of the lands of the late John Chesnut a tract of 618 acres of land. Both parties in this action claim under A. L. Monroe, and it is therefore unnecessary to inquire into the validity of the title of John Chesnut, or in what way partition was made between Thomas Moore and A. L. Monroe, so as to give title in severalty to A. L. Monroe for 286 acres of said tract of 618 acres, and of which 286 acres the land in dispute is a part. For the purposes of this case neither party can dispute his title, and the pleadings show this derivation of title from a common source without any evidence on the subject.

The tract of 618 acres was mortgaged by Thomas Moore and A. L. Monroe to secure the purchase money to the estate of John Chesnut. A. L. Monroe gave to Witte Bros. a mortgage of the 286 acres in 1875, and one in 1876 for advances, and one again in 1877, by which the two former were cancelled; with money borrowed from Witte Bros. the Chesnut mortgage was paid up. The mortgage to Witte Bros. of 1877 was foreclosed by a decree of the court, and at the sale on June 8, 1880, plaintiff became the purchaser and took title, and the sale was confirmed by order of the court. Before this sale defendants gave notice of their claim, the plaintiff being present, and there receiving actual notice.

*34

*The master thus states the defense set up by Robert Robinson, who is now represented in this case by his heirs at law: "A. L. Monroe, in March, 1870, agreed to sell, and did sell, to Robert Robinson, sixty-six and two-thirds acres of said land, and on that day received from Robert Robinson $130 in part payment, and put Robinson into possession of the same, and had a dividing line between his land and Robinson's run out by a surveyor; that Robinson also paid Monroe $189.50 in part payment of the same land in the years 1872, 1873, and 1875, and then ceased paying, leaving a balance still due for the 66⅔ acres. The proof is that Robinson built a frame house on the land, worth two hundred dollars, with two rooms and passage, brick chimney and windows; and that he cut timber on the land and sold it as firewood; that he boxed the pine trees for turpentine and sold the rosin; that he cleared up a part of the land in 1870, and has cultivated it from then until this time."

A deed with renunciation of dower was made out and signed, but not delivered, by Monroe. The testimony by Wesley Truesdel, which I think not excluded by section 400 of the code, and if it had been, could only have been objected to by Robinson and his heirs (9 S. C., 392), shows that he entered and is still in possession of 30 acres of this 66⅔ acres, under some agreement with Robert Robinson. I am unable to ascertain, from anything before me, the exact amount still due on the contract between A. L. Monroe and Robert Robinson, or how much has been paid by Wesley Truesdel on his contract with Robinson (if anything), though it does appear that he has erected a log house on the land.

If Wesley Truesdel is in possession as a tenant, his possession inures to the benefit of Robert Robinson, who put him in possession. If he is in possession as a purchaser from Robert Robinson, he is entitled to the full protection of any equitable rights which Robert Robinson may have acquired in the land. In Jones on Mortgages, § 600, we find the following: "Possession by a vendee under a contract of purchase, whether it be personal or by a tenant, is constructive notice of his equitable rights as purchaser, and any one taking a mortgage under such circumstances from his vendor, takes subject to his rights. The mortgage lien, *under such circumstances, covers the property only to the extent of the unpaid purchase money."

*35

In the discussion of the subject in Pomeroy Eq. Jur., § 615, we find that "the constructive notice thus described, like that arising from a record or registration, does not seem to depend upon any actual knowledge or information of the possession communicated to or had by the subsequent purchaser, since he is held to be charged with notice even though he is a resident of another state. * * * The purchaser cannot say, and cannot be allowed to say, that he made a proper inquiry and failed to ascertain the truth." See Knox v. Thompson, 13 Amer. Dec., 246, and note.

The case of a purchaser at a sale by the sheriff under an execution is not exactly analogous to that of a purchaser at private sale and who holds under a mortgage as an individual deed; but in Kairson v. Puckhaber, 14 S. C., 626, No. 990, it is said "that possession was notice," which I take to mean without any actual notice of the possession; possession, like recording, operating as notice. At any rate, I think that a man who buys or takes a mortgage of land is presumed to know whether the possession corresponds with the paper title, and if inconsistent with it, this would be sufficient to affect him with notice of all the rights which accompany such possession. I therefore hold that Robert Robinson was entitled to have a specific performance of the contract with A. L. Monroe, and that Wesley Truesdel is protected thereby in his contract with Robert Robinson; that Witte Brothers took subject to these equities, and that the plaintiff takes no higher title than Witte Bros.

For want of accurate information, I cannot make a complete decree, but can only announce my judgment on the principles which govern the case.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the report of the master be overruled; that the plaintiff has the right to have payment of the full amount of the purchase money, and interest, which remains unpaid, according to the contract between A. L. Monroe and Robert Robinson; that it be referred to the master to inquire and report what this balance so unpaid amounts to; that upon the coming in and the confirmation of such report, if *such balance be not paid within a time to be fixed by the court, that the master do sell the said 66⅔ acres on such terms and at such time as the court may order, and out of the proceeds of sale he do pay the costs of the plaintiff and expenses of the sale, and then to the plaintiff such unpaid balance; then the costs of the other parties to this action, and any balance to the defendants in the proportions they may be entitled to under the agreement with Wesley Truesdel made by Robert Robinson.

*36

It is also ordered and adjudged, that the master do inquire and report the terms of the contract between Robert Robinson and Wesley Truesdel, and what amount is due thereon, and if the amount of the balance due to plaintiff on the coming in of the master's report, and the confirmation of the same, shall be paid as directed by the court, or if a sale shall be made as above provided for, then the title to the 66⅔ acres to be made, or the distribution of any balance coming to the defendants to be paid out to them in such proportion as their interests shall appear under said report, the heirs of Robert Robinson being entitled to the whole, land or fund, as the case may be, except so much as may be coming to Wesley Truesdel under his contract.

If the whole balance due to the plaintiff shall be paid in as may be directed by the court, on the coming in of the master's report, then all the costs to be paid by the several parties who have incurred them.

The plaintiff appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. That his honor errs in holding that one "who buys, or takes a mortgage of land, is presumed to know whether the possession corresponds with the paper title, and, if inconsistent with it, this would be sufficient to affect him with notice of all the rights which accompany such possession."

2. That his honor erred in holding that possession of land by one who claims to hold under contract of purchase, is constructive notice to a subsequent mortgagee for value of the claims of such party in possession.

3. That his honor erred in holding that the defendants are entitled to demand of plaintiff a specific performance of contract with A. L. Monroe, mortgagor; the mortgagees having no notice of their occupancy or claims.

*37

*Mr. J. T. Hay for appellant cited 108 U. S., 517; Jones Mort., §§ 570, 576, 591–2; Dart Vend. & Pur., 402–5; 2 Wh. & Tud. Lead. Cas., 407; Pom. Eq. Jur., §§ 660, 664; 6 Serg. & R., 179; Bail. Eq., 266, 386; Speer's Eq., 159; McMull. Eq., 196; 17 S. C., 593; 1 McCord, 428; 2 Bail., 101.

Mr. W. H. R. Workman, contra.

November 19, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Witte Bros., of Charleston, held a mortgage on one A. L. Monroe, of Kershaw County, executed in 1877, and covering the land in dispute. This mortgage was foreclosed by proper proceedings in 1880 and the land ordered to be sold. At this sale, made in February, 1881, the appellant, Sheorn, became the purchaser, and finding the defendants in possession of sixty-six acres of the land mortgaged, brought the action below for possession and damages for the detention. The defendants interposed an equitable defence growing out of the following facts: That in 1870, some years before the execution of the mortgage by Monroe to Witte Bros., the defendant Robinson bought from the said Monroe the sixty-six acres in controversy, a portion of which he sold to his co-defendant Truesdel, and although no conveyance was delivered by Monroe, yet that he immediately went into possession under this purchase, and with his co-defendant has continued in possession ever since, having in the meantime paid nearly all, if not the entire, purchase money.

The fact of possession by the defendants, as stated, from 1870 is conceded, and it is also admitted that Sheorn, appellant, had full knowledge of this possession at the time he bought at the foreclosure sale. Witte Bros., however, had no actual knowledge of the sale by Monroe to Robinson, or of the possession of Robinson, at the time they took their mortgage under the foreclosure of which Sheorn purchased. Under this state of facts, the Circuit judge held that although Witte Bros. had no actual knowledge of the possession of Robinson, yet the fact of this possession, like the record of a deed, operated as notice, and that there*fore the appellant, standing in the shoes of Witte Bros., was not a subsequent purchaser without notice. The appeal questions this ruling, and this is the only question in the case.

*38

The ruling of the Circuit judge in its full meaning is that possession of land by a vendee under a contract of purchase operates as notice to a subsequent purchaser or encumbrancer, although such possession as matter of fact is unknown to such subsequent purchaser at the time of said purchase. The possession in such case stands in the place of a record of the deed where the vendee has purchased with a conveyance regularly executed and delivered, and as the record of a prior deed is notice, whether it is actually known or not, so possession, whether known or not, is also sufficient notice.

In Jones on Mortgages, section 600, the doctrine on this subject is laid down in general terms as follows: "Possession by a vendee under a contract of purchase, whether it be personal or by a tenant, is constructive notice of his equitable rights as purchaser, and any one taking a mortgage under such circumstances from his vendor takes subject to his rights." It is not distinctly stated here whether the knowledge of the fact of possession must be brought home to the subsequent encumbrancer or purchaser, yet it is held that the possession is the foundation of the notice, and therefore, like recording, must operate as constructive notice, whether actually known or not.

The ground upon which the recording of a deed operates as notice, whether the fact of record be known or not, is that it is always in the power of the subsequent purchaser, by searching the records, to ascertain whether or not there has been a previous conveyance; and if he fails to make the necessary examination, it is his own fault, and his rights must be determined by the facts of the record within his reach on the subject. So, too, it is an easy matter for a purchaser of land to ascertain at the time of his purchase whether his vendor or some one else is in possession, and if he fails to do so, he should take the consequences. Mr. Pomeroy, in treating of constructive notice, says: "The constructive notice thus described, like that arising from a record or registration, does not seem to depend upon any actual knowledge or information of the possession communicated to or had by *the subsequent purchaser, since he is held to be charged with notice even though he be a resident of another state." Pom. Eq. Jur., § 615.

*39

And in our case of Massey v. McIlwain, McCardell and King, 2 Hill Eq., 427, where the land of King had been sold under executions against him in favor of creditors who had no knowledge of the possession of Massey, who was holding under a contract of purchase, the court, in discussing the effect of the possession, said: "He (Massey) was also in possession, and that, according to some of the English cases, was not only a notice to creditors, but sufficient to repel the claim of a subsequent purchaser. In Daniels v. Davidson (16 Ves., 254), the Lord Chancellor (Eldon) observes that there was considerable authority for the opinion which he held, that where there was a tenant in possession under a lease or agreement, a person purchasing the estate was bound to inquire on what terms he was in possession, and was bound by the terms of the lease or agreement, and refers to the case of Douglas v. Whitrong, in which Lord Kenyon held that possession was sufficient notice, and to the case of Taylor v. Stibbert, 2 Ves., Jr., 440, in which it was expressly ruled; and if possession alone be notice to a purchaser, it is necessarily so to creditors."

In the case of Massey v. McIlwain and others, supra, while it was conceded that McIlwain and McCardell, the purchasers, had full notice of the transactions between Massey and King before they purchased at the sheriff's sale, yet it was not pretended that the creditors of King had any information whatever as to the sale by King to Massey, or of Massey's possession; and it was also conceded that McCardell and McIlwaine had the right to stand in the shoes of the creditors who had no notice. With these facts, however, the court held that the claim of Massey was superior to that of the purchaser, basing its judgment partly at least on the ground that the possession of Massey operated as notice.

We have examined the English cases of Daniels v. Davidson and Taylor v. Stibbert, above referred to. In the latter, it seems that the possession of the adverse claimant was known to the purchaser, and the court said that there was no difficulty in hold*ing that whoever purchases an estate from the owner, knowing it to be in possession of tenants, is bound to inquire into the estates of these tenants. In the former case, it was said: "That to maintain the plea of purchase for valuable consideration without notice, the defendant must aver that the vendor was, or pretended to be, seized, and that he was in possession, which would be satisfied by the possession of his tenant." This seems to imply that if he bought with some one else in possession, other than his vendor, his failure to know this fact would be inexcusable, and he could not aver that said vendor was in possession, a necessary averment in the plea of bona fide purchase without notice.

*40

There are two kinds of notice, actual and constructive. Either is sufficient to prevent the plea of bona fide purchase without notice. It is not necessary to discuss actual notice. That is well understood, and such notice is not claimed here. The case turns on constructive notice. An illustration of constructive notice is found in the recording of deeds. As we have said, recording amounts to notice, whether known or unknown, because the means of information are at hand. We think this principle should apply where at the time of the sale the vendor is out of the possession and a third party is in. It is the business of one who buys land, or attempts to secure a lien on land, to know the surroundings. In justice to his own interests, and certainly in justice to the interests of a party who has contracted to buy in advance of his purchase, and who is notoriously in possession, claiming it and using it as his own, he should examine into and ascertain the facts. One in possession under an equitable title has nothing that he can record; and possession, open and unconcealed, is the only mode by which he can give notice to the world of his rights; and when this notice is given in the only way in which it could be given, he should be protected. We think, upon authority and principle, the ruling of the Circuit judge was correct.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN concurred.

*41

*Mr. Justice McIVER. It seems to me that the terms of the deed from Moore to Monroe, one of the links in the chain of plaintiff's title, were sufficient to put the purchaser upon inquiry, which, if followed up, would have disclosed the facts that the sixty-six acres had been sold to Robinson; that he was put into possession, and that a deed for the same, with plat attached, had been signed, though not delivered. This, according to well-settled principles, would have been sufficient notice of Robinson's equity. I therefore concur in the result reached by the majority of the court.

I am not prepared, however, to assent to the doctrine that mere possession, unknown by the purchaser, or rather by the creditor under whom he claims, is sufficient notice. This would, in effect, annul the recording law, for the logical result would be that one in possession under an unrecorded deed would prevail over another holding a deed duly recorded; and this is conceded to be the necessary consequence by the distinguished author upon whose authority the conclusion reached by the majority of the court mainly rests. See Pom. Eq. Jur., § 615. Besides, it would be mounting a presumption upon another presumption: first, a presumption that the purchaser knew of the possession; second, that he knew such facts as a knowledge of the possession would lead him to, by a proper prosecution of the inquiry.

Again, the very idea of the efficacy of constructive notice, in defeating a better legal title, is based upon fraud; that one should not be permitted to buy property which he has good reason to know some one else has a just claim to. Now, unless he knows the facts which would lead to such a conclusion, he cannot be said to be guilty of any fraud. When a purchaser examines the records of the proper office, which the statute law informs him is the proper source to go for information, and finds that his vendor has a clear legal title, he has a right to presume that everything is right, as the law presumes that he who has the legal title is constructively in possession; and unless some fact, as, for example, the fact that some one, other than his vendor, is in actual possession, is brought to his knowledge, which would naturally lead him to suppose that there was some outstanding equitable claim, he has a right to stand upon such legal title.

*42

*It is true that the doctrine announced in the opinion of the majority of the court has the support of authority, cited in the opinion, of great weight. But, while recognizing the weight of such authority, I do not think it should be allowed to control, when the effect, as it seems to me, would be to annul, or at least defeat, the operation of a portion of the statute law of this state. I do not think that the case of Massey v. McIlwain, 2 Hill Eq., 421, decides the point now before us; for although it did appear, in that case, that the creditors had no notice of the equity set up by Massey, yet it did not appear whether they did or did not have knowledge of the fact of Massey's possession, and therefore it does not seem to me that the question which we are now called upon to determine was considered in that case.

In the absence of any authoritative decision in this state, I am unwilling to adopt a conclusion, however well supported by authority elsewhere, the effect of which would be to defeat the operation of a part of the statute law of this state.

Judgment affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 42

STARK v. HOPSON.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Dower ⇐79.]

In action by a widow for dower in the lands of her husband, especially in those sold during his life, she is not required, under the issue of non-seizin, to make strict proof of her husband's title; she may make out a prima facie case by the slightest and lowest order of evidence.

[Ed. Note. Cited in Morgan v. Smith, 25 S. C. 338; Ex parte Steen, 59 S. C. 223, 37 S. E. 829.

For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 306; Dec. Dig. ⇐79.]

[2. Trial ⇐91.]

It is error to strike out on motion testimony as incompetent under section 400 of the Code, where such testimony had been previously given without objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 242 244, 252; Dec. Dig. ⇦91.]

[3. Appeal and Error ⇦1177.]

A probate judge struck out certain testimony as incompetent and decided the case without regarding it; the Circuit judge held the excluded testimony to be competent, but sustained the decree of the court below, after taking such testimony into his consideration. Held, that, the Circuit judge erred; that he should have ordered a new trial, so that this testimony might be considered in the first instance by the probate judge.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ex parte White, 33 S. C. 447, 450, 12 S. E. 5; Mordecai v. Canty, 86 S. C. 479, 68 S. E. 1052.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4607; Dec. Dig. ⇦1177.]

Before Fraser, J., Richland, July, 1883.

*43

*For a full understanding of the points decided on this appeal, the case is sufficiently stated in the opinion of this court.

[For subsequent opinion, see 30 S. C. 370, 9 S. E. 345.]

Messrs. Bacon & Moore, for appellant.

Messrs. Clark & Muller, contra.

November 20, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was a petition in the probate court of Richland County by Eliza C. Stark, the widow of Theodore Stark, deceased, for dower in a square of land in the city of Columbia, described as containing four acres, more or less, and bounded by Taylor, Harden, Laurens, and Blanding streets. It was admitted that the petitioner was married to Theodore Stark, deceased, in April, 1835, and that he had recently died (the precise date not given), leaving the petitioner him surviving. It was also admitted that the defendant, Hopson, was in possession of part of the aforesaid square; so that the only question in the case was that of the seizin of Stark during the coverture.

It seems that the square, having no house on it, was not actually occupied by any one until about the year 1840. Mrs. Stark testified, without objection at the time, that "Major Stark was in possession of the square during her marriage with him, owned and controlled it, and paid taxes on it, but never lived on it, or cultivated it, as it was an open lot." On her cross-examination she said that "Major Stark came in possession of it long before her marriage as a present from Mrs. Taylor, the mother or grandmother of Governor John Taylor. I think he sold it to Joe Black. I never had any other evidence that Major Stark owned it, only from his own statements. I heard his sisters, Martha, Mary, and Emma, say that it was a present from Mrs. Taylor. I heard the family say so. The lot of land was given to Major Stark and three maiden sisters; the sisters sold their interest to Major Stark long before I was married. I heard him say that he had sold the property. I never relinquished dower," &c.

The defendant proved that he had a deed of the premises occu*pied by him from the heirs of Latta (March, 1860), which was destroyed when Columbia was burned during the war. He was allowed, against objection, to state verbally that, "to the best of his knowledge," Latta bought from J. A. Black, and then to introduce what purported to be a conveyance (1840) by N. A. Peay, as trustee for A. F. Peay, to Jos. A. Black, of "all that lot or parcel of land lying and being in the town of Columbia, containing four acres, being one square in said town, bounded north by Walnut street," &c., and reciting that it was the lot which had been conveyed to him (Peay) by B. F. Taylor, executor of Robert Stark, deceased. It thus, for the first time, was intimated that the street known as "Blanding" had formerly been called "Walnut street"; but it still did not appear how the lot had ever become the property of Robert, the father of Theodore Stark.

*44

In reply the petitioner offered as a witness A. R. Taylor, who testified that he had resided all his life—seventy-one years—in Columbia; that he was the grandson of the first Thomas Taylor and his wife Ann, and the son of Governor John Taylor. "Major Stark and his maiden sisters, Martha, Mary, and Emma, were grand-nephew and nieces of Thomas Taylor. Mrs. Ann was very fond of the Misses Stark, particularly Martha. Colonel Thomas Taylor died in November, 1833, Mrs. Ann in July, 1834. * * * * Knows the lot now in litigation; have known it ever since I was a boy. It was not built upon until L. F. Hopson built upon it. That part of the town was generally known as 'Taylor's town,' because it was owned by the Taylors. I never heard of Robert Stark owning the land in this case." [Ruled that no testimony be admitted to prove that Theodore Stark owned the land in question. Plaintiff excepted.] The witness proceeded: "According to the best of my recollection the land in this case passed out of the Taylor family in 1833. I am not positive as to the time. The period fixed in my mind was caused by my brother having died in 'nullification times.' [Again ruled that no testimony that Theodore Stark owned the land can be adduced in attacking the deed marked A. Plaintiff excepted.] Thomas Taylor was the second son of his father, Thomas Taylor, whose will was admitted in evidence," &c.

On the next day after it was taken without objection, the *judge of probate, on motion, struck out so much of the testimony of Mrs. Stark as was based on what she heard from her husband, under section 400 of the Revised Code [plaintiff excepted], and after striking out that evidence against objection, proceeded to consider the case without reference to it, and decreed for the defendant on the following grounds: "I. As a matter of fact, Theodore Stark never had possession of the land as set forth in the petition of Mrs. Eliza C. Stark. II. As a matter of law, that Theodore Stark never had a title to the land in question. III. As a matter of law, that Mrs. E. C. Stark, the petitioner, is not entitled to dower in the said land."

*45

From this judgment Mrs. Stark appealed to the Circuit Court, and at the same time gave notice of an application for a new trial, on the ground of surprise and newly discovered evidence in the will of Thomas Taylor, the twelfth clause of which contained a devise "to the children of my niece, Sarah Stark," of a square in Columbia, which, although bounded on Walnut street, was probably the identical lot in which dower was claimed. The appeal and motion were both heard by the Circuit judge, who, among other things, ruled that it was error in the probate judge to strike out any part of Mrs. Stark's testimony; "that the motion to strike out came too late, and the whole of the testimony should have been considered;" but after this ruling he went on himself to consider the testimony stricken out (which was in the record), and affirmed the judgment of the probate court. From this judgment Mrs. Stark appeals to this court upon nineteen exceptions; but from the view which this court takes, it will not be necessary to consider them in detail.

In an action by a widow for dower in the lands of her husband, and especially those sold during his life, some indulgence as to proof is regarded proper. She is not required to make strict proof of her husband's title under the issue of non-seizin. She is not the custodian of her husband's title papers, and therefore, in making out a prima facie case, the slightest and lowest order of evidence is all that can be exacted at her hands. 2 Scrib. Dower, 197; Forrest v. Trammell, 1 Bail., 78; Reid v. Stevenson, 3 Rich., 66; Pickett v. Lyles, 5 S. C., 275. It is very manifest that in this case all the facts were not considered *by the probate judge; but we will not go into the matter of the alleged surprise as to the devise in the will of Thomas Taylor, nor of the exclusion of certain evidence alleged to be cumulative.

*46

We agree with the Circuit judge that it was error on the part of the probate judge to strike out, upon subsequent motion, any part of the testimony of Mrs. Stark not objected to at the time it was given. "The time to object to the incompetency of a witness to speak as to any particular matter is when the testimony is offered. It would be unfair to allow a party to postpone his objection as to competency until after the testimony has been given, for in that case he would be enabled to retain the evidence if it enured to his advantage, and to exclude it if it made against him. Such speculative advantages are discountenanced by the courts." Burris v. Whitner, 3 S. C., 512.

We think, however, that having made such ruling correctly, the Circuit judge himself should not then have proceeded to consider the evidence which had been stricken out and not taken into consideration by the probate judge; but he should have reversed the judgment and ordered a new trial in the Probate Court. Mrs. Stark was entitled to have the evidence considered in the first instance by the judge of probate. Section 55 of the Revised Code provides that "the Circuit Court shall have appellate jurisdiction of all matters originally within the jurisdiction of the Probate Court." So far as the rejected testimony was concerned, the Circuit judge took original jurisdiction of the case, which we think was error. It was like taking in the appellate court new testimony which had never been before the probate judge, whose judgment was under review upon appeal. See Griffin v. Griffin, 20 S. C., 486.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the cause be remanded to the Probate Court of Richland County in order that there may be a new trial.

---

22 S. C. *47

*WHITESIDES v. BARBER.

(April Term, 1884.)

[Appeal and Error ⇐123.]

In action for recovery of an interest in land, the jury found a verdict for the interest claimed and also for plaintiff's proportion of the net amount of rents and profits received by the defendant, which were stated in the verdict; the Circuit judge then passed an order directing the cause to be transferred to Calendar 2, that the plaintiff have leave to apply for judgment thereon, and that defendant have leave to set up any proper equities, and for this purpose may perfect his pleadings by amendment or otherwise. From this order defendant appealed. Held, that there being nothing but a verdict and an administrative order in the case, this court could not entertain the appeal.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Moore v. Smith, 24 S. C. 316, 319; Whitesides v. Barber, 24 S. C. 374; Murdock v. Courtenay Mfg. Co., 52 S. C. 434, 29 S. E. 856, 30 S. E. 142.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 877; Dec. Dig. ⇐123.]

Before Fraser, J., York, November, 1883.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion of this court for a proper understanding of the ruling made.

[For subsequent opinion, see 24 S. C. 373.]

Messrs. John P. Gage and Hart & Hart, for appellant.

Mr. W. B. Wilson, Jr., contra.

November 20, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Thomas Whitesides had a life estate in a small tract of land, 210 1–5 acres, with limitation over to his three sons, James, John, and Austin Whitesides. During his life all of the three sons died intestate and without issue, leaving as their heirs at law the said Thomas Whitesides, their father, and two sisters, Mrs. Margaret Dunlap and Mary Whitesides. Mrs. Dunlap died in 1862, intestate, leaving as her heirs at law her husband, Thomas N. Dunlap, and two children, Missouri and B. T. Dunlap, the plaintiff. Mary Whitesides died in 1863, unmarried and intestate, leaving as her heirs at law her father, the said Thomas Whitesides, and niece, the said Missouri Dunlap, and her nephew, the said B. T. Dunlap. Missouri intermarried with one James M. Smith, and died childless and intestate, leaving as her heirs at law her said husband (Smith) and her father, Thomas N. Dunlap, and her brother, B. T. Dunlap.

*48

*In 1876 the father, Thomas Whitesides, the life tenant, died seized and possessed of the different interests which he had inherited as before stated, amounting in the aggregate to two-thirds of the said tract of land, which he held as tenant in common with his grandson, B. T. Dunlap, and with T. N. Dunlap and James M. Smith, in unequal shares. The said Thomas Whitesides left a widow, Jane M. Whitesides, and she, with the said B. T. Dunlap, his grandson, were his heirs at law as to his undivided interest in the land.

When the plaintiff, B. T. Dunlap, arrived of full age, he found the land in possession of one Ferguson H. Barber, claiming it as his own; and he instituted this action against the said Barber for the recovery of his interest therein, including that as heir at law of his grandfather, Thomas Whitesides, as well as his own interest as tenant in common. Pending the action, the plaintiff, B. T. Dunlap, died, and his sole executor and devisee, Thomas W. Whitesides, was by order substituted in his place. The said Barber answered, claiming that he purchased the land at a sale ordered by the Probate Court of York County, which was conveyed to him by the sheriff who made the sale on January 17, 1877.

It appeared that Thomas Whitesides left debts, but that no will had been proved or administration granted on his estate, or an account taken of his personalty; that a creditor filed a petition in the Probate Court of York County, J. H. Clawson, assignee, v. Jane M. Whitesides et al., alleging that the personal property of the deceased debtor was not sufficient for the payment of his debts and praying that the interest of the deceased (two-thirds) in the said tract of land should be sold in aid of the personalty, and the assets marshalled. The heirs at law of the deceased, as well as his co-tenants, were made parties, but as there was neither executor nor administrator, his personal representative of course was not a party.

While this proceeding was pending, Jane M. Whitesides, the widow, filed her petition in the nature of a cross-bill for partition and dower in her late husband's portion. In this action, which was entitled Jane M. Whitesides v. B. T. Dunlap et al., Missouri and B. T. Dunlap, the plaintiff, were minors, and, as it was sup*posed, were made parties by accepting service of summons. Being over fourteen years of age, they indicated the defendant, F. H. Barber, as their guardian ad litem, who was appointed and consented to the proceeding. From this time forward the orders of the probate judge were made in both cases, united and stated together in the caption.

*49

On September 22, 1876, the probate judge ordered the whole tract of land sold; but in December thereafter he issued another order, staying the sale "until the further order of the court," and issued a writ of partition to divide the land. The commissioners recommended that the land (with small exception, unnecessary to state here) should be sold and the proceeds divided, and this return was simply marked "approved and confirmed," without repeating the express order of sale, which had been "stayed." The land was sold by Glenn, sheriff of the county, and the defendant Barber became the purchaser for $715, which he paid, and received sheriff's titles, January 17, 1877. The judge of probate paid the proceeds of sale to the costs, the widow's dower, and the few debts of the deceased, Thomas Whitesides, and set down for the plaintiff what was termed his share; but he refused to receive it, and, as before stated, when he came of age brought this action for his part of the land.

The cause came on to be heard before Judge Fraser, and the jury found a special verdict as follows: "We find that the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of 65–144 of the land in dispute, of which 41–144 in his own right, and 24–144 as heir of Thomas Whitesides. We find that the net value of the rents and profits, after deducting taxes and other expenses and value of timber used, to be $1,750.04; and that the plaintiff is entitled to the same, in the same proportion and in the same right as to the land." Upon receiving this verdict, the Circuit judge made the following order: "The jury having rendered a special verdict against the defendant, Ferguson H. Barber: It is ordered, that the case be transferred to calendar No. 2; that the plaintiff have leave to apply for judgment thereon; that the defendant, Ferguson H.

Barber, have leave to set up in the cause such equities as he may properly do in this action, and that for this purpose he may apply for leave to perfect his pleadings, either by amend*ment or otherwise, as he may be advised, and as may be proper in the case."

*50

From this order the defendant Barber appealed and filed numerous exceptions, which it is unnecessary to set out, as from the view taken we have no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal. This court has the right to review upon appeal only final judgments and such intermediate judgments, orders, and decrees as involve the merits. There is nothing in this case but a special verdict and an administrative order. From the verdict of a jury no appeal lies to this court. State v. Rankin, 3 S. C., 438 [16 Am. Rep. 737]; Sloan v. Westfield, 11 S. C., 445; First National Bank of Charleston v. Gary, 14 S. C., 571.

There was no final judgment. Indeed, no judgment could be entered on the verdict, for the reason that the Circuit judge ordered that "the case be transferred to calendar No. 2, and that the plaintiff have leave to apply for judgment thereon." Section 286 of the code provides that "upon receiving a verdict the clerk shall make an entry in the minutes, &c., &c. If a different direction be not given by the court, the clerk must enter judgment in conformity with the verdict." Here "a different direction" was given by the court, and it may turn out that when the equities are heard on calendar 2, the plaintiff may not recover judgment at all.

The judgment of this court is that the appeal be dismissed, without prejudice, for the want of jurisdiction to entertain it at this stage of the proceedings.

---

22 S. C. 50

THE STATE v. PACIFIC GUANO COMPANY.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. States ⇐190.]

When the state comes into her own courts to assert a right of property, she is bound by all the rules established for the administration of justice between individuals.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Evans, 33 S. C. 186, 11 S. E. 697.

For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 178; Dec. Dig. ⇐190.]

[2. Public Lands ⇐169.]

When the state sues for the recovery of land she can recover only on the strength of her own title; but as sovereign and the source of title, she may rest upon this prima facie showing, until the defendant makes proof that her original title has been divested.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Pinckney, 22 S. C. 503; State v. Evans, 33 S. C. 186, 11 S. E. 697.

For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. § 502; Dec. Dig. ⇐169.]

*51

[3. Navigable Waters ⇐1, 37.]

*The title to the soil in all navigable streams in which the tide ebbs and flows, remains in the state, and does not pass under her grant of the superjacent land; but tidal channels are navigable in law only when they are navigable in fact for trade and commerce by craft of some kind. Cases cited and reviewed.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State ex rel. Port Royal Min. Co. v. Hagood, 30 S. C. 526, 9 S. E. 686, 3 L. R. A. 841; Heyward v. Farmers' Min. Co., 42 S. C. 150, 19 S. E. 963, 20 S. E. 64, 28 L. R. A. 42, 46 Am. St. Rep. 702; State v. Columbia Water Power Co., 82 S. C. 186, 63 S. E. 884, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 435, 129 Am. St. Rep. 876.

For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. §§ 5, 212; Dec. Dig. ⇐1, 37.]

[4. Action ⇐22.]

Whether a cause is a "case of chancery" can only be determined by considering whether it belongs to that class which, previous to the Constitution of 1868, would have been appropriately presented in the court of chancery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. §§ 124–139, 143, 145; Dec. Dig. ⇐22.]

[5. Appeal and Error ⇐987.]

Information by the attorney general on behalf of the state to recover damages for an intrusion upon her soil and to enjoin further trespass, is substantially an action for the recovery of real property and is not "a case of chancery." This court therefore cannot review findings of fact by the Circuit judge in such a case; but if the right existed, the findings in this case would not be disturbed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3895; Dec. Dig. ⇐987.]

[6. Navigable Waters ⇐46.]

A grant by the state of the lands on the shore of a navigable tidal channel, gives title only to high water mark.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Pinckney, 22 S. C. 507; Nathans v. Steinmeyer, 57 S. C. 389, 35 S. E. 733.

For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. §§ 287, 288; Dec. Dig. ⇐46.]

[7. Appeal and Error ⇐251.]

Whether a grant can issue from the executive department of the state government for lands as "vacant" down to low water mark, not determined, the question not being raised by proper exception.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1476–1484; Dec. Dig. ⇐251.]

[8. Estoppel ⇐29.]

The acceptance of a grant in aid of title previously claimed does not estop the grantees from setting up any other prior or more extended title, if they can do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 69; Dec. Dig. ⇐29.]

[9. Navigable Waters ⇐37.]

Under a deed calling for a boundary in the middle of the channel of tidal navigable streams, the defendant could not claim the presumption of a grant to the soil below common high water mark under color of title.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Pinckney, 22 S. C. 504; Heyward v. Farmers' Min. Co., 42 S. C. 148, 19 S. E. 963, 20 S. E. 64, 28 L. R. A. 42, 46 Am. St. Rep. 702.

For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. § 204; Dec. Dig. ⇐37.]

10. Can the state be disseised in such manner as to be divested of title either under the statute of limitations or by the presumption of a grant against her remonstrances? And if so, could such disseisin be effected by a mere constructive possession for any length of time under color of title only?

[11. Navigable Waters ⟸37.]

The state holds the beds of the channels of her tidal navigable streams for the public use of her citizens; such property may be disposed of by an act of the legislature, but may not be granted by her officers as "vacant land."

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Heyward v. Farmers' Min. Co., 42 S. C. 157, 19 S. E. 963, 20 S. E. 64, 28 L. R. A. 42, 46 Am. St. Rep. 702.

For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. §§ 201–226, 285; Dec. Dig. ⟸37.]

[12. Navigable Waters ⟸37.]

It not having been the policy of the state to part with her right to such beds of channels, an act of the legislature making a grant of any part of them cannot be presumed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. § 204; Dec. Dig. ⟸37.]

[13. Public Lands ⟸169.]

For these reasons, a grant from the state cannot be presumed in favor of one who after purchase of several grants bordering on both sides of tidal navigable streams, caused all these lands to be included in one survey and plat, and thereafter held under such plat claiming the whole.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. § 502; Dec. Dig. ⟸169.]

[14. Mines and Minerals ⟸6.]

The fact that the state had granted the right to another corporation *to dig and mine for phosphates in these streams does not prevent the state from bringing this action to assert her title to the soil.

*52

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. ⟸6.]

[15. Mines and Minerals ⟸51.]

The value of the phosphates taken by the defendant corporation from the soil of the state should be estimated at the value of the phosphates, less the amount defendant has added to their value by their removal and preparation for market, defendant having acted under an honest but mistaken belief in its right to these phosphates.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Lewis v. Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co., 69 S. C. 367, 368, 48 S. E. 280, 104 Am. St. Rep. 806.

For other cases, see Trespass, Cent. Dig. § 139; Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. ⟸51.]

[This case is also cited in Frampton v. Wheat, 27 S. C. 293, 3 S. E. 462, without specific application.]

Before Wallace, J., Beaufort, November, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

This information, on behalf of the state, alleges as the cause of action that the defendants on the first day of August, 1882, and at divers times before and after that date, at Palmer's creek, otherwise known as Fisherman's or Sheephead creek, at Big creek, at Haulover creek, at Horse creek, at South Wimbee creek, and at Chisolm's otherwise known as Frenchman's or House creek, navigable waters in the County of Beaufort and State of South Carolina, useful for the purposes of trade and commerce, and in which the tide from the sea ebbs and flows, did intrude upon the rights and property of the State of South Carolina, by removing from the beds of the streams named before, below high water mark, large quantities of phosphate rock and phosphatic deposits, and converting the same to their own use, and demands damage therefor and an injunction to perpetually restrain defendants from continuing the acts complained of. The answers of the defendants are in substance a denial that the beds of the creeks named are the property of the state. Whether they are or not is the leading question in the case.

The state rests her claim to the property upon her rights as successor to the British crown to the fee of all vacant ungranted lands in the limits of her territory. 3 Kent's Com., 377, 521. The defendants, admitting this right of sovereignty, claim that their grantors having been in possession of the beds of these creeks and holding them adversely for a century, they are entitled to the legal presumption that they entered under a grant, and that the title of the state is now in these defendants.

The legal rule under which defendants claim is certainly well *established, and nowhere more clearly stated than by Mr. Justice Evans in the case of McLeod v. Rogers and Gardner, 2 Rich., 19. Says the learned judge: "Ever since the case of McClure v. Hill, 2 Mill Con. R., 420, it has been regarded as the settled law in this state that twenty years' continuous adverse possession is as good a title as a grant or a deed, where there is an absence of any of those facts which go to rebut the presumption. After a possession continued for so long a time undisputed by any, and acquiesced in by all, the law will presume that the possession in its incipiency was rightful, and that the tenant when he took possession did so under a grant or deed, or whatever may be necessary to invest him with the legal title. He who claims under a presumption of a grant is entitled to stand on the same ground as if he produced the grant. The law substitutes the presumption in place of the grant." These principles have been frequently affirmed by the courts of the state since the case of McLeod v. Rogers. See Riddlehoover v. Kinard, 1 Hill Eq. 378; Godfrey v. Schmidt, Cheves Eq., 57; Boyce v. Lake, 17 S. C., 481 [43 Am. Rep. 618].

*53

The defendants, with the view of bringing themselves within the scope of the rule first stated, produce and put in evidence the will of Mary Bull, dated May 1, 1781. This will devises "all the lands included within the ditch of Bull's Island, in Prince William's parish," to Daniel Blake, Miles Brewton, and Arthur Middleton, in trust for her granddaughter Mary Butler. Defendants also put in evidence a conveyance which recites the will of Mary Bull above referred to, and conveys "all that plantation, island, or tract of land situate, lying, and being in Prince William's parish, in the state aforesaid, containing by estimation four thousand (4,000) acres, more or less; butting and bounding to the south, southeast, and southwest on Coosaw river, to the east and northeast on Bull river, north, northeast, and west by certain tide waters flowing from Coosaw and Bull's rivers into a creek or channel commonly called by the name of Bull's ditch."

These instruments, both the will and the deed, describe the land penetrated by the creeks in question, and defendants establish an unbroken chain of paper title to themselves down from these papers to the present time, and claim that their grantors and *themselves have held the land adversely under this color of title for a much longer period than is sufficient to raise the presumption of a grant. The case of McLeod v. Rogers, supra, is authority for the rule that for the purpose of making out a state of facts upon which to predicate the presumption of a grant, the possession of grantors and grantees may be connected.

*54

In reply to this ground it is insisted that as time does not run against the sovereign, a grant cannot be presumed against the state when she comes into court to establish her proprietary rights, and that such defence can only prevail in actions between individuals. And, secondly, it is insisted that no such adverse possession of the beds of these creeks has been established as is necessary to raise the presumption of a grant, even if such presumption could be set up against the state. In regard to the doctrine of nullum tempus interposed in answer to the defence, it may be observed that until a recent period, when the state by her own act provided otherwise, the statute of limitations did not run against the state, and no proprietary right of hers could be barred by it. The reason of the rule is twofold. First, because the plea admits the right, but claims that it is barred by laches, and laches cannot be imputed to the sovereign. Second, because an intrusion or trespass upon the land owned by the state does not operate to dispossess the state, and there is no time of ouster from which the statute could ever begin to run. 1 Bl. Com., 247; 3 Wash. Real Prop., 191, 159, and cases there referred to; Harlock v. Jackson, 1 Tread., 135; State v. Arledge, 1 Bail., 551.

The presumption of a grant, however, proceeds upon different assumptions. "One who claims under the statute was a trespasser throughout, and his possession began in a trespass and so continued until the statutory time had run out." McLeod v. Rogers, supra. The presumption of a grant is the negation of a trespass. It does not impute laches or claim the benefit of a successful disseisin. It does not claim title against, but from, the state. Instead of producing the highest evidence of a grant, to wit: the grant itself, a rule of evidence which is now also a rule of property, allows the proof of certain facts to establish the equivalent of a grant to put the tenant in the same strong position that he would occupy if he held an actual grant that he was able *to produce. No right of the state is thus denied. Time does not run against her and create a bar, but proof of years of acquiescence are allowed to raise the presumption of the performance of a sovereign act. To attribute a voluntary act to a free and intelligent agent, and to hold others bound by it, while the agent himself was not, would be unreasonable. It appears, therefore, that the reasons why the statute of limitations does not run against the state do not apply to the presumption of a grant, and such presumption may be set up against the state.

*55

The next question to be considered is, have the defendants made out such a case of adverse possession as is sufficient to raise the presumption of a grant of the beds of the creeks? The lands held by this state as successor to the British crown, were with very limited exceptions held for the purpose of being granted to settlers. Any freeman who chose to institute and pursue the prescribed method of proceeding to that end, could obtain a grant to vacant land. Hence the reasonableness of the grounds of the presumption of a grant. These grants, too, when bounded on fresh water rivers or on their margins carry the exclusive rights and title of the grantee to the middle of the stream; for according to the common law the beds of fresh water rivers are the property of the adjacent proprietors. Cates v. Wadlington, 1 McCord, 580 [10 Am. Dec. 699]; McCullough v. Wall, 4 Rich., 84 [53 Am. Dec. 715]. So the beds of fresh water streams, whether navigable or not, stand upon the footing of land not covered by water, and were held only to be granted. Upon the other hand, when grants of land were bounded upon navigable streams in which the tide from the sea ebbs and flows, the right and title of the grantee only extended to the river, and did not include any part of its bed. 3 Kent's Com., 427 and 428; Shands v. Triplet, 5 Rich. Eq., 77.

It would seem, therefore, that the common law in its wisdom made a difference in the effect of grants of land, whether bounded upon fresh water streams and navigable streams in which the tide ebbs and flows; and that beds of streams of the latter class were not held by the state solely for the purpose of being granted to individuals, as the adjacent land was. The inference cannot be resisted, therefore, that the beds of this class of streams were held by the state in trust for the use and benefit of all her citi*zens who might desire to avail themselves of their privilege. While the state, as sovereign, had perhaps the power to grant these beds, they were not held by her entirely for that purpose, and to do so might in some degree be held a breach of duty. It will be obvious, therefore, that if a grant of these beds can be presumed at all, it would require stronger proof than would be sufficient to raise such a presumption in relation to the adjacent land. Palmer v. Hicks, 6 Johns, 133, and notes; Commonwealth v. Roxbury, 75 Mass., 451.

*56

These observations are intended to apply to only navigable streams in which the tide ebbs and flows; for although every stream in which the tide ebbs and flows is, according to the common law, prima facie a navigable stream, yet this presumption may be rebutted by showing that the conditions and objects of navigation do not exist. In the case of the Mayor of Lynn v. Turner, Cowp., 86, Lord Mansfield is reported to have said: "How does it appear that this is a navigable stream? The flowing and reflowing of the tide does not make it so, for there are many places into which the tide flows which are not navigable rivers, and the places in question may be a creek in their own private estate." In Miles v. Rose, 5 Taunt, 706, Gibbs, C. J., said: "The flowing of the tide, though not absolutely inconsistent with the rights of private property in a creek, is strong prima facie evidence of its being a public navigable river;" and Heath, J., expressed the same opinion.

In our own case of the State v. Duncan, 1 McCord, 404, the question considered by the court was whether a creek in which the tide ebbed and flowed was such a highway, for the obstruction of which an indictment would lie. In the report of the case the words highway and navigability seem to be used as meaning the same thing, and the case, therefore, lends some support to the view just stated. If a channel, therefore, in which the tide ebbs and flows, and in the language of the civil law is floatable, can be used for the purpose of trade and commerce, it is a navigable stream. Neither the character of the craft with which it is accomplished, nor the relative ease or difficulty of the navigation, are tests of navigability.

In the case of The Montello, 20 Wall., 441
*57
[22 L. Ed. 391], the following *language occurs: "It would be a narrow rule to hold that in this country, unless a river was capable of being navigated by steam or sail vessels it could not be treated as a public highway. The capability of use by the public for purposes of transportation and commerce affords the true criterion of the navigability of a river rather than the extent and manner of that use. If it is capable in its natural state of being used for purposes of commerce, no matter in what mode the commerce may be conducted, it is navigable in fact, and becomes in law a public river or highway. Vessels of any kind that can float upon the water, whether propelled by animal power, by the wind, or by the agency of steam, are or may become the mode by which a vast commerce can be conducted, and it would be a mischievous rule that would exclude either in determining the navigability of a river." In the case of The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 563 [19 L. Ed. 999], the court hold that those rivers are navigable in law, which are navigable in fact; and they are navigable in fact when they are used or are susceptible of being used in their ordinary condition as highways for commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water.

By applying the tests, derived from the above cited cases, to the creeks in controversy here, it will be at once perceived that Big creek and Chisolm's creek are not navigable streams. Although the tide ebbs and flows through them, yet the conditions necessary to sustain trade or commerce of any kind do not exist. Flowing out of Coosaw river with the tide into Chisolm's Island, they lose themselves in the marshes with which they are surrounded. They are entirely in the private estate of the owners of the island and make no connections with thoroughfares of travel or trade, and are none themselves. With regard to South Wimbee, Horse Island, Haulover, Palmer's and Fish creeks, the case is different. Each of these constitute part of water communications between the two great navigable thoroughfares—Coosaw and Bull rivers. It appears in the testimony that each can be, and has been, navigated with small craft by any and all who chose to so use them. The navigation of parts of some of them may be difficult, but it has been proven to be practicable. South Wimbee connects waters of
*58
Coosaw and Bull *rivers through Bull's ditch; Horse Island creek, out of Bull river, connects with Palmer's creek out of Coosaw, by means of Haulover creek and Grand Doll gutters. That this latter connection has existed from time immemorial is proved by a conveyance of Horse Island by William Bull to John Bull in 1748, in which Horse Island is described as "bounded to the northeastward on a creek running out of Coosaw river into Bull river," &c. This is the creek referred to as Horse Island creek, and it reaches Coosaw river now by means of Grand Doll gutters, Haulover, and Palmer's creek. Fish creek, too, runs out of Bull river and forms a junction with Palmer's creek. I am satisfied from the testimony that this latter creek has afforded means of communication from Bull river to Palmer's creek from time immemorial, yet, at the point called the Hammock, I am equally satisfied that it has been artificially widened. These creeks, therefore, to wit: Horse Island, Haulover, Palmer's, Fish, and South Wimbee creeks, are navigable waters in which the tide ebbs and flows.

It now becomes necessary to inquire into the alleged adverse possession of the beds of these last named creeks by the defendants and their grantors. The defendants have taken actual possession of the beds of these creeks, and by damming up some of them and mining in them, have clearly evinced their intention to hold them as their private property against any one. Their acts in pursuance of a claim of right are of a nature to raise the presumption of a grant if the duration of their possession had been sufficient. This latter essential, however, is wanting, as their deed bears date on June 3, 1877, unless they can connect themselves with such a possession on the part of their grantors as will sufficiently supplement their own.

As has been seen, the defendants claim by adverse possession under the deed from Mary Bull above referred to, as color of title. It is important, therefore, to inquire what the will of Mary Bull conveyed. Several grants by the lords proprietors were put in evidence by the plaintiffs. While there may be some difficulty in locating some of them with certainty, yet there is no doubt that the part of Chisolm's Island penetrated by these creeks is covered by some of these grants. Those that relate to this part of the island call for metes and bounds that exist by the *same names now. They are bounded by creeks and marshes and rivers, but do not convey any channels. The claims of title which have their source in these grants all finally converge to Mary Bull. She owned the fee in all the land penetrated by these creeks under muniments of title, none of which covered the beds of these creeks. She, by her will, conveys all the land included within the ditch of Bull's Island. This includes the land penetrated by these creeks, except South Wimbee creek, which is the north, northeast, north, northwest boundary of the land.

*59

The color of title of defendants, therefore, does not cover this creek, because the land is bounded on it, and it is a navigable stream in which the tide ebbs and flows, and right of grantee does not cover its bed. It would seem, too, that their color of title, while calling for the outlines of the island as boundaries, and ignoring the existence of the creeks, should be construed with reference to the light thrown upon the title of their grantor by the colonial grants. It is certain Mary Bull had no title to the creeks, but owned on all sides of them. She could convey only what she had, although the terms of her conveyance were general. I would be unwilling to hold, however, that defendants are restricted in their claim by the descriptions in the grants after they had renounced all claim under them. Yet it is clear that a chain of paper title, beginning at the paper title of these defendants, can be traced up to existing grants from the lords proprietors to all this land, except the beds of these creeks. The papers are in evidence in this case. The defendants, however, renounce all claim under the paper title, which they did not put in evidence, and rest upon their claim of the presumption of a grant. These facts are important with reference to the extent of the possession and the nature of the holding of defendants' grantors. They would seem to establish a strong probability that these grantors held under this claim of paper title until the value of the beds of the streams was discovered, and then renounced that part of it which did not include them.

While, therefore, the boundaries mentioned in Mary Bull's will, and in the conveyance of the trustees appointed by her, included the creeks, yet that would not of itself be sufficient *to raise the presumption of grant to the beds of these streams, nor is the fact of the boundaries sufficiently aided by the proof of the building of a bridge and the warning off a sloop which came to pick oysters, while the public used the streams for navigation at their pleasure. I do not think, therefore, that defendants have established a state of facts that makes out such an adverse holding of the beds of these streams for a sufficient length of time to entitle them to the presumption of a grant. It follows that the title is in the state.

*60

It is argued on behalf of defendants that the state, having granted an exclusive right to other corporations to dig and mine and remove phosphate rock from the beds of these creeks, cannot, therefore, maintain this action. It is true there are acts of the General Assembly which grant to other corporators the right to remove phosphate rock from these creeks, but there is no proof that these corporators have ever availed themselves of the privilege, or performed the conditions on which it was to exist. But if they had, they would have only the right to enter upon the property of the state and remove the phosphates, and what they removed would be their property. The fee still remains in the state, and the right of property in all the phosphate rock not removed. For an unauthorized entry upon the land and injury to the property of the state, she has the right of redress.

It appears that defendants have been mining and removing valuable phosphate deposits from the beds of these creeks, and the state thereby having suffered wrong and injury is, according to familiar principles, entitled to damages. The measure of damages for a willful trespass upon property, like that involved here, is the full value of the property, without deduction for labor and expense. But if the trespass is committed under an honest but mistaken belief of right, then the measure of damages is the value of the property, less the amount which the trespasser has added to its value by its removal and preparation for market. Sedgwick on Damages, 670–673; 36 Am. Rep., 769, and notes. The trespass in this case, I am sure, belongs to the latter class.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed: First. That the beds of the creeks on Chisolm's Island, known as Horse Island creek, Haulover creek, Fish creek, Palmer's creek, and South *Wimbee creek, are the property of the State of South Carolina. Second. That the defendants, their servants, agents, and employees, be perpetually enjoined from mining in and removing from the beds of said creeks phosphate rock and phosphatic deposits. Third. That it be referred to Simeon Hyde, jr., Esq., to take testimony and report to this court what quantity of phosphate rock and phosphatic deposit have been taken from the beds of said creeks and converted to the use of defendants, and the value of the same in its natural state and position; and that the State of South Carolina is entitled to a judgment for the sum so ascertained. Fourth. That plaintiff have leave to apply at the foot of this decree for further necessary and proper orders.

*61

[For subsequent opinions, see 24 S. C. 598; 26 S. C. 610, 2 S. E. 265; 28 S. C. 63, 5 S. E. 167.]

Messrs. A. T. Smythe, W. J. Verdier, and A. M. Lee, jr., for the plaintiff.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, for defendants.

Possession under color of title for the period from 1799, when A. R. Chisolm went in, to 1882, creates the presumption of a grant for everything within the color of title, including the beds of these creeks, be they navigable or not. What is color of title? When one sets up a claim based upon possession under color of title, whether it be deed, will, plat, or anything, such deed, &c., is used only to show the extent of the claim, and not as a muniment of title. The title depends on the possession, and the office of the deed, &c., is to show the extent of the claim. The question is, does the possession by its duration warrant the presumption of title, and then the deed, plat, &c., is used to show the area of such possession? 3 McCord, 260; 2 Id., 273; 2 Hill, 495; 11 Am. Dec., 739; 14 Id., 578, 580, and notes; 18 Id., 463. Possession under color of a part is possession of the whole. 1 Nott & McC., 357, 374; 1 Mill Con. R., 85; 2 Id., 426; 2 Speer, 451; 1 Strob., 145. Our possession for eighty-three years presumes a grant—is a grant. 1 Bay, 26; 2 Bail., 101; 17 S. C., 141. And this as against the state, as well as against a citizen. 2 Mill Con. R., 423; 2 Rich., 22. We do not claim against the state by adverse possession, and *could not. We claim under the state by the presumption of a grant from her. Nor is this presumption affected by the fact that the land is the bed of a navigable stream. 3 Kent, 427; 7 Cush., 82; 9 Am. Dec., 507; 16 Id., 54; 33 Id., 329; 39 Id., 685. The state may grant these beds, provided the jus publicum, the right of passage, is not obstructed. Whatever can be granted can be presumed to have been granted. 60 E. C. L. R., 894. Claims were distinctly made by building and maintaining a causeway and a bridge.

*62

His honor objects to our presumption of a grant by saying that Mary Bull could not dispose of the beds of streams; but we do not rely on title under Mary Bull's will and the Butler deed, but on presumption from possession, using this will and deed to show the extent of our possession. 2 Mill Con. R., 426; 2 McCord, 273; 3 Id., 261. He further holds that as our paper title covers all our claim, except these beds, the probability is that we held only under our paper title, until the discovery of these phosphates. But the evidence shows that we always claimed them, and our paper title, traced back to the lords proprietors, does not cover all of our claim. These colonial grants did not cover even all the marshes. The presumption is that a subsequent grant was obtained covering this magnificent estate. 2 Mill Con. R., 426. The new grant of 1869, taken to perfect title, does not affect the claim under older deeds. 1 Strob., 1; 7 Wheat, 535; Herm. Estop., 249, 362, 366, 378, 386–7; 15 S. C., 133; 1 N. Y., 254; 39 Am. Dec., 669; 43 Id., 553.

These creeks are not navigable streams. 3 T. R., 253; 10 E. C. L. R., 414. Fresh water rivers are called navigable. Cheves, 259; Rice, 450; 1 McCord, 582; 2 Strob., 12. And both salt and fresh water streams, indiscriminately, declared to be navigable. 10 Stat., 300; 12 Stat., 268, 474, 923; 13 Stat., 288, 439; 16 Stat., 840; Gen. Stat., §§ 1062, 1097. These creeks are not public highways, as defined in 1 McCord, 404–5. The Code of Procedure prescribes a statute of limitations, which, as to actions for the recovery of land, fixes twenty years; but section 109 establishes a rule of property applicable to all actions thereafter prosecuted. We have been charged with the *value of the rock in position, but one dollar a ton is the royalty fixed by the state.

*63

Messrs. William Elliott and H. B. Sargent, jr., same side.

November 21, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This action was commenced in September, 1882, by information filed on behalf of the state by the attorney general, under section 79, General Statutes, which provides that "the attorney general may, when in his judgment the interest of the state requires it, file and prosecute informations or other process against persons who intrude upon the lands, rights, or property of the state, or commit or erect any nuisance thereon."

The information alleged that the defendant company "The Pacific Guano Company," a corporation under the laws of Massachusetts, and William Weymouth, their superintendent, had intruded upon certain territory, the property of the state; that this property consisted of the beds of certain creeks known as South Wimbee creek, Fish or east branch of Palmer's creek (and sometimes called Sheephead or Fisherman's creek), Horse Island or Palmer's creek, Big creek (otherwise called Haulover cut), and Chisolm's creek—five in number—all tide waters between Bull and Coosaw rivers, in Beaufort County, and running through or forming the boundaries of what is now commonly called "Chisolm's Island"; that the beds of these creeks contained large deposits of phosphatic rock; that the defendants had engaged in the business of digging and removing these deposits from said territory, and had removed large quantities therefrom and appropriated the same to their own use, and that they intended to continue so to remove such rock; that the state had by sundry acts of the General Assembly asserted her interest and property in such deposits, and provided the manner in which those so desiring could lawfully dig for the same, with a penalty for those who dug unlawfully. The state therefore asked three hundred thousand dollars damages for the rock so unlawfully *removed, and for an injunction restraining the defendants from further intruding and removing such rock.

*64

The defendants answered, denying the ownership of the state in the creeks named or in the phosphatic deposits therein. After issue joined and before trial the defendants filed a petition in the Court of Common Pleas for Beaufort County, praying that the case should be transferred to the United States Court. The petition was refused by the Circuit judge, and no further action was taken thereon. In October, 1882, an order was taken referring the case to Simeon Hyde, jr., to take the testimony and state an account of all the phosphate rocks dug by the defendants from the creeks mentioned in the information, or any of them; and requiring the defendants to enter into bond in the penal sum of fifty thousand dollars, conditioned to file monthly true and faithful returns with the clerk of the court of all rock dug from said creeks, from the date of the commencement of the action, and to pay such royalty or other damage as the court might ultimately determine, and on failure to execute such bond, enjoining them from further digging therein. The bond was executed and filed, and the defendants continue to dig under its provisions.

A number of references were held and much testimony taken, particularly as to the size, condition, and navigable capacity of the different creeks indicated. This testimony is all printed in the brief, and cannot of course be reproduced in this preliminary statement; but it may contribute to clearness to give a short outline of the general scope of the evidence.

The sea coast of the state, notably in the neighborhood of Beaufort, is characterized by a net-work of marine channels, in which, being very little above the level of the sea, the tide ebbs and flows. These channels, known as rivers or creeks, afford water communication, more or less perfect, according to their size and the state of the tide, to and from the mainland and among the numerous islands of this tide-water region. Coosaw or Chisolm's Island is one of the larger of them. It forms a long strip between Bull and Coosaw rivers. Bull river lies on the north, Coosaw river on the south, and the eastern end of the island is the point of intersection of these rivers. The western boundary is formed by South Wimbee creek, which runs in a *southwesterly direction from Bull river and meets Adam's creek, which runs in a northwesterly direction from Coosaw river. The junction of these two creeks is called "Haulover cut." The three together, South Wimbee, Haul-over cut, and Adam's creek, make up the western boundary of "Chisolm's Island." The island itself, about seven miles long and two miles wide, is penetrated by a number of smaller creeks, each having on its margin strips of salt marsh, so that of the superficial area of the island at least three-fourths consist of water in the creeks, of salt marsh between high and low water mark, and of little islets.

*65

There can be little doubt, indeed it was not seriously contested, that all the high land of the island had been granted before the revolution. Original grants of different parcels to different persons were in evidence from the lords proprietors and King George the Second, from 1703 to 1733. These grants had not been actually located, but it was manifest from inspection that they covered lands on the island, being "in free and common socage, with ye privilege of hawking, hunting, fishing, and fowling in ye boundaries of ye same, with all woods and trees and whatever else is thereon standing and growing, or therein being or thereunto belonging or in any manner appertaining, except all royal mines and quarries of gems and precious stones, and one-sixth part of all base minerals when digged," &c.

The Circuit judge upon this subject says: "Several grants were put in evidence by the plaintiff. While there may be some difficulty in locating some of them with certainty, there is no doubt that part of Chisolm's Island, penetrated by these creeks, is covered by some of these. Those that relate to this part of the island call for metes and bounds that exist by the same names now. They are bounded by 'creeks,' 'marshes,' and 'rivers,' but do not convey 'channels.' The claims of title which have their source in these grants all finally converge to Mary Bull. She owned the fee in all the land penetrated by those creeks under muniments of title, some of which covered the beds of these creeks."

In 1771, Mary Bull executed her will, by which she devised "all the lands included within the ditch of Bull's Island [then the name of Chisolm's Island], in Prince William's parish, to *Daniel Blake, Miles Brewton, and Arthur Middleton, in trust for her granddaughter, Mary Bull." In 1797, Pierce Butler (husband of Mary Bull) and others conveyed by lease and release to Alexander R. Chisolm "all that plantation, island, or tract of land situate, lying, and being in Prince William's parish, in the state aforesaid, containing by estimation four thousand (4,000) acres, more or less; butting and bounding to the south, southeast, and southwest on Coosaw river; to the east and northeast on Bull's river; north, northeast, north northwest, and west by certain tide-waters flowing from Coosaw and Bull rivers into a creek or channel commonly called by the name of Bull's ditch." Henceforth the island was known as "Chisolm's Island." In 1826, Alexander R. Chisolm executed his will, by which he devised to his son, Edward Neuville Chisolm, the upper one-third of the island, and to his son, Robert Chisolm, the remaining two-thirds, for and during the term of his natural life, with remainder over, &c. The latter is the parcel now known as "Palmetto Hall," which the defendants afterwards purchased, and the present contention is as to creeks running through it.

*66

Within a period comparatively recent, probably less than thirty years, the fortunate discovery was made that the beds and marshes of these marine channels contained large quantities of phosphatic rocks, making that valuable which before had been regarded utterly worthless as property; and, as a consequence, the defendant corporation, in 1869, with a view to mining these deposits, took from the family of Robert Chisolm (through the court) a lease of Palmetto Hall, excepting the residence and one hundred acres adjacent. The lease was for a rental of $5,000 per annum, and included expressly "all and singular the waterways, landings, easements, and rights, members, hereditaments, and appurtenances to the said premises belonging," &c.

It seems that about this time some persons entertaining doubts as to the title of the Chisolms to the marshes on the different creeks not having been included in the grants of their vendors, filed with the clerk of the court for Beaufort County applications for warrants of survey of the same, and on or about July 30, 1869, James Adger, jr., John B. Warren, and Henry K. Silliman each took out a grant from the state of a separate and distinct parcel *of the marsh lands aforesaid. All these grants, after reciting that they were issued "in pursuance of an act of the legislature entitled, an act for establishing the mode of granting the lands now vacant in the state," &c., passed 19th day of February, 1791, conveyed marsh lands included within the lines of the plats attached, "and on each and every of said water courses extending to low water mark." Afterwards these grantees all released and relinquished their respective grants aforesaid and all interest therein, to the Chisolms, for the benefit of their lessees, the defendants.

*67

Finally, in 1877, the defendant company purchased the whole property for $70,000, and, by authority of another proceeding in court and through the referee therein appointed, C. H. Simonton, Esq., received a conveyance of the same, which embraced all the right of the Chisolms under the three grants of marsh lands aforesaid, and "all that plantation or tract of land known as Palmetto Hall, situate in Prince William's parish in the state aforesaid, comprising two-thirds of Chisolm's Island (previously and in the will of A. R. Chisolm called Coosaw Island) containing about 1,500 acres of high land and ——— acres of marsh; and butting and bounding to the north on South Wimbee creek, extending to the middle line of said creek; to the east on Bull river, to the north on Coosaw river, extending to low water mark on said rivers, and to the west on that portion of said island now or late belonging to George S. Brown on which are located the works of 'the Coosaw Mining Company,'" &c. The Pacific Guano Company established their works near the mouth of Horse Island creek, or where it connects with the waters known as North Wimbee creek, or Bull river; and commenced to take the phosphatic deposits from the beds and streams of the South Wimbee and the creeks which penetrate into or through the island.

There had been a plat of the whole island made by one Gaspar Trotti in 1781, which being somewhat defaced by the abrasions of time, Mr. Chisolm had copied by W. B. Buckner, surveyor, in 1828. The dividing line between Edward and Robert Chisolm under the will of their father, was plainly marked on this copy plat, which also sets forth from the old Trotti plat the boundaries, creeks, marshes, little islands, and high land on the part of the *island which was given to Robert and is now known as "Palmetto Hall." Other plats of the same were in evidence, viz., a chart of the United States coast survey; resurveys especially with reference to the marsh lands made in 1868 by William Hume, jr., D. S.; plans of South Wimbee creek and the other creeks ranging through the island by Thomas W. Willett; and plat made by John W. Gregorie at the instance of the defendant company and for their use as late as 1883. This plat last named, shows that the whole superficial area of Palmetto Hall is 6.358 acres, of which 1,902 are high land, and that the remainder consists of marsh, little islands, and the creeks aforesaid.

*68

In 1878 the legislature passed "an act to protect the rights and interests of the state in the phosphate rocks and phosphatic deposits in the navigable streams and waters of the state" (16 Stat., 615), of which section 11 (p. 619) provides as follows: "That the stock of the Oak Point Company shall consist, &c., &c.; that said company, when organized in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall have the exclusive right to dig, mine, and remove phosphate rock and phosphatic deposits from the beds of Bull river and North and South Wimbee creeks," &c.

The cause came on to be heard by Judge Wallace, who held, among other things, that "Chisolm's creek and Big creek were not navigable streams. Although the tide ebbs and flows through them, yet the conditions necessary to sustain trade or commerce of any kind do not exist. Flowing out of Coosaw river with the tide into Chisolm's Island, they lose themselves in the marshes with which they are surrounded. They are entirely within the private estate of the owners of the island and make no connection with thoroughfares of travel or trade and are none themselves. With regard to South Wimbee, Horse Island, Haulover, Palmer's, and Fish creeks the case is different. Each of these constitute part of water communications between the two great navigable thoroughfares, Coosaw and Bull rivers. It appears in the testimony that each can be and has been navigated with small craft by any and all who chose so to use them. The navigation of parts of some of them may be difficult, but it has been found to be practicable. South Wimbee connects waters of Coosaw and Bull rivers through Bull's ditch.

*69

Horse Island creek, *out of Bull river, connects with Palmer's creek out of Coosaw, by means of Haulover creek and Grand-Doll Gutter. That this latter connection has existed from time immemorial is proved by a conveyance of Horse Island by William Bull to John Bull in 1748 in which Horse Island is described as 'bounded to the northeastward on a creek running out of Coosaw river into Bull river,' &c. This is the creek referred to as Horse Island creek, and it reaches Coosaw river now by means of Grand-Doll Gutter, Haulover and Palmer's creeks. Fish creek, too, runs out of Bull river and forms a junction with Palmer's creek. I am satisfied from the testimony, that this latter creek has afforded means of communication from Bull river to Palmer's creek from time immemorial, yet at the point called 'the Hammock' I am equally satisfied that it has been artificially widened. These creeks therefore, to wit, Horse Island, Haulover, Palmer's, Fish, and South Wimbee, are navigable waters in which the tide ebbs and flows," &c.

And as to these last named creeks, overruling the defence that the defendants were entitled to the presumption of a grant from long possession of the high lands with color of title under a plat covering the whole island, the Circuit judge sustained the claim of the state to the beds of these streams, enjoined the defendant company from further mining in and removing therefrom phosphate rocks and phosphatic deposits, and referred it to a referee to take testimony and report what quantity of phosphatic deposits had been taken from the beds of said creeks and converted to the use of the defendants, and the value of the same in its natural state and position—holding that the measure of damages here should be the value of the property less the amount which the trespasser has added to its value by its removal and preparation for market, as the trespass was committed under an honest but mistaken belief of right.

From this decree both parties have appealed to this court, and the novel questions involved have been argued here with exhaustive research and great ability.

Plaintiff's grounds of appeal. 1. "Because his honor erred in not holding that the beds of Big and Chisolm's creeks are the property of the state.

*70

*2. "Because his honor erred in holding that grants bounding on tide waters, go to the centre of the stream unless the same be navigable in fact; whereas he should have held that grants bounding on any and all tide waters extend only to high water mark.

3. "Because his honor erred in holding that in a suit between the state and an individual, a grant can be presumed against the state from the possession of the defendant or his grantors.

4. "Because his honor erred in drawing a distinction as to the proof necessary to presume a grant to the soil under tide waters navigable in fact, and to the soil under other tide waters.

5. "Because his honor erred in holding that a presumption of a grant can arise from,

and in connection with, constructive possession under color of title.

6. "Because his honor erred in holding that any presumption of a grant can arise in this case, the source of title being known.

7. "Because his honor erred in not holding that the defendants, having accepted valuable grants from the state as part of their title, are estopped from now denying the title of the state to the property so granted to them; and this whether they entered under such grants or not.

8. "Because his honor erred in not holding that even if a grant can be presumed against the state by constructive possession under color of title, the defendants are estopped from claiming under color of title which they now set up below low water mark on the creeks in question; because their grantors, for the very purpose of removing all cloud from their color of title, admitted and defined the extent of the same, by applying for and accepting grants from the state, which limited such claim to low water mark; and this with the concurrence of defendants.

9. "Because his honor erred in not holding that the defendants, having by valuable grants from the state fixed and settled the uncertain boundaries of their territory, are estopped from now claiming beyond the boundaries so fixed and settled."

Defendants' grounds of appeal. 1. "Because, when one is entitled to the presumption of a grant arising from possession under color of title, he stands before the court as if he had in his hands and produced to the court the grant of the state under its *seal for all the territory embraced within the bounds of his color of title; and his honor erred in not holding this.

*71

2. "Because possession of an area of territory under color of title for nearly one hundred years will presume a grant for every foot of such territory, and will include all the realty within the boundaries of the color of title; and his honor erred in not holding this.

3. "Because the possession of a part of the territory included within clear and distinct boundaries as color of title, is possession of the whole and every part thereof within such boundaries; and his honor erred in not so holding.

4. "Because the defendants proved an uninterrupted possession and user for nearly one hundred years by their grantors, Alexander Chisolm and Robert Chisolm, and his children, and themselves under color of title of 'all that plantation, island, or tract of land, situate, lying, and being in Prince William's parish, in the state aforesaid, containing by estimate 4,000 acres, more or less, butting and bounding south, southeast, and southwest on Coosaw river, east and northeast on Bull river, northwest and north, northwest, and west by certain tide-waters flowing from Coosaw and Bull rivers into a creek or channel commonly called Bull's ditch,' shown by a deed dated February 24, 1797, and referring to a plat of Gaspar Trotti, dated 1784; and because this creates the presumption of a grant for all the land covered or not covered by water included within these boundaries without exception or reservation; and his honor erred in not holding this.

5. "Because his honor, having found as a question of fact that these instruments (the will of Mary Bull and the deed of the Butlers) described the land penetrated by the creeks in question, and that the defendants had established an unbroken chain of paper title to themselves, down from these papers to the present time, and claim that they and their grantors and themselves have held the land adversely under color of title for a much longer period than is sufficient to raise the presumption of a grant (which claim, as to a part of this land, is not disputed), should have held as a conclusion of law that they had established *a grant to the whole territory, land not covered as well as land covered by the waters of these creeks.

*72

6. "Because the defendants put in evidence the deed of Butler and wife and the will of Mary Bull to show the extent of their claim and as color of title, not as evidence of title in the Butlers or in Mary Bull; and his honor erred in holding them to the proof of the validity of the title of Mary Bull.

7. "Because the plaintiff in this case, which is an action to try title, can only succeed on the strength of his own title; and his honor erred in deciding the case on the supposed flaw in the defendants' title.

8. "Because the grants produced by the plaintiff did not cover the territory claimed by the defendants, who, on the contrary, relied on another grant, one proved by presumption, covering all of the territory within certain known clear and distinct boundaries, and including the lands under the creeks in question; and his honor erred in not so holding.

9. "Because his honor erred in not holding that the state can grant the beds of navigable streams, and that a grant can always be presumed of that which is the subject of a grant.

10. "Because his honor erred in holding that if a grant of these beds can be presumed at all, it would require stronger proof than would be sufficient to raise such presumption in relation to the adjacent soil.

11. "Because his honor erred in holding that defendants' color of title, whilst calling for outlines of the island as boundaries, and ignoring the existence of the creeks, should be construed with reference to the light thrown upon the title of Mary Bull by the old colonial grants.

12. "That, on the contrary, his honor erred in holding that the Butler deed ignored the existence of the creeks, and should have held that the omission to except the beds of the creeks in question from the conveyance, showed an intent to convey them; that being within the color of the title, they were in fact conveyed, and that the grant thus presumed to the whole territory, including these beds, is independent of the colonial grants.

13. "Because his honor erred in holding that whilst the boundaries mentioned in Mary

*73

Bull's will, and in the deed of the *trustees appointed by her (the Butler deed) included the creeks in question, and that there was subsequent possession under these as color of title for one hundred years, yet this was not of itself sufficient to raise the presumption of a grant of the beds of these creeks.

14. "Because the acts of ownership of the creeks by the defendants and their grantors were such as the nature of the case required, and were sufficient; and his honor erred in not holding this.

15. "That no use of these streams by any other persons than the defendants and their grantors has been shown, except such as is perfectly consistent with their ownership of the soil underlying them.

16. "Because the evidence, taken as a whole, shows that the creeks in question are not such navigable streams, the beds of which are reserved as the property of the state.

17. "Because his honor erred in requiring the defendants to account for all the phosphate rock dug and mined in the beds of the creeks named by him, without distinguishing between rock dug and mined above low water-mark, and in not excepting the former from such accounting.

18. "Because his honor, having found as a question of fact that the defendants and their grantors had held for a period of more than forty years, under deed conveying all the territory penetrated by these creeks in question, and thus including these creeks, he erred in not holding the title of these defendants good as against the world.

19. "Because it having been proved that the state had granted to other persons the exclusive right to dig, mine, and remove phosphate rocks and phosphatic deposits from the bed of South Wimbee creek, the defendants cannot be called to account to the state for phosphate rocks so dug, mined, and removed from said creeks; but if accountable at all, they are accountable to the grantees of the state for such rock.

20. "Because his honor erred in his conclusion of fact that Fish creek had from time immemorial afforded means of communication between Bull river and Palmer's creek.

21. "Because his honor erred in his conclusion of fact that *Palmer's creek, Horse Island creek, and South Wimbee creek, are navigable streams."

*74

We will not undertake to consider separately the exceptions of plaintiff and defendants, but take them up together according to the subject matter.

When the state comes into her own courts to assert a right of property she is, of course, bound by all the rules established for the administration of justice between individuals. This is practically an action for the recovery of real estate, and one of the rules of procedure applicable in such case is that the plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title, and not the weakness of the defendant's. Has that rule been violated in this case? The state at the close of the revolutionary war succeeded to all the territorial rights of the British crown and became the owner in fee, upon feudal principles, of all the lands within her limits which had not been granted by her predecessor. She exhibits no paper title. She acquired her right by the strong hand, and her title has been conceded by all the world, and especially by the former owner, by right of discovery and conquest. 3 Kent, 377.

These are historical facts of which the court will take judicial cognizance. Having once been the proprietor of the beds of the streams named in the information as a part of the soil of the state, she still owns them, unless she or her predecessor at some time and in some way was divested of title in them. She is the sovereign, the source of title, and upon this prima facie showing she rests, at least until it is removed by a counter-showing. That is for the defendants to make, if they can. Have they shown that they or those from whom they hold acquired title to these beds, either from the British crown before the revolution, or from the state since that time?

If we clearly understand the scope of the defence, it is not claimed that there ever has been an express grant for the beds in question. Such express grant for lands at all times under water, and as property regarded worthless, until the discovery of the phosphate deposits, was probably never desired or applied for; and if made, would not have been worth the cost of obtaining it, or even the paper on which it was written; but *the claim is that the vendors of the defendants were for a very long time—some eighty years—in possession of the high lands of Chisolm's Island, under a plat which covered the whole island, through which most of these channels penetrate, and that such possession of part with color of title to the whole island must be considered as giving title to the beds of these channels in one of two ways: either by construction of the grants of the high lands, that is to say, by force of the doctrine applicable to riparian proprietors, which, in certain cases, gives to the owner of the soil on both sides of a stream title to the bed of that stream; or, second, that such long possession of the high lands under such color of title authorizes and requires the presumption of a new grant from the state, expressly covering and giving title to the beds of these streams.

*75

Before these defences can be properly considered, it is necessary first to determine what is the character of these channels. Are they merely channels of inconsiderable character through a private estate, or are they public navigable waters? The doctrines of the common law as to the seashore and the soil lying under tide-waters and navigable streams were peculiar. The fundamental idea was that the property in the sea and tide-waters, and in the soil and shore thereof, was in the sovereign. In the view that they partook somewhat of the nature of the sea, the fact alone that the tide ebbed and flowed in a stream, was considered proof of its navigability. Martin v. Waddell, 16 Peters, 367 [10 L. Ed. 997]; 3 Kent, 377. We know of no law or judicial decision which, up to this time, has changed that rule in this state. On the contrary, it has been decided more than once "that as to such waters the common law definition (those in which the tide ebbs and flows) has not been changed by any authoritative decision in this state." McCullough v. Wall (4 Rich., 68 [53 Am. Dec. 715]), which was followed and repeated in the case of Shands v. Triplet (5 Rich. Eq., 78), in which Chancellor Wardlaw said: "The term 'navigable' is equivocal. By the common law, rivers are regarded as navigable only to such extent as the tide flows and ebbs; and the property in the beds of rivers navigable in this sense, is undoubtedly in the state. But in our statutes and in *popular speech, 'navigable' rivers mean those which may be navigated by ships or boats," &c.

*76

This doctrine that all tidal streams are navigable, is purely technical, and it would seem has not been regarded as entirely satisfactory even in England, from what Lord Mansfield is reported to have said in The Mayor of Lynn v. Turner, Cowp., 86: "How does it appear that this is a navigable river? The flowing and reflowing of the tide does not make it so, for there are many places into which the tide flows which are not navigable rivers, and the place in question may be a creek in their own private estate," &c. In the case of King v. Montague, 4 Barn. & C., 602, the court, in speaking of navigability arising from the flowing of the tide, said: "The strength of this prima facies arising from the flux and reflux of the tide must depend upon the situation and nature of the channel. If it is a broad and deep channel, calculated for the purpose of commerce, it would be natural to conclude that it has been a public navigation; but if it is a petty stream, navigable only at certain periods of the tide, and then only for a short time, and by very small boats, it is difficult to suppose that it ever has been a perfect navigable channel," &c.

Nor has the technical standard of navigability always been adhered to in this country. In the case of The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall., 563 [19 L. Ed. 999], it was said by Mr. Justice Field: "The doctrine of the common law as to the navigability of waters has no application in this country. Here the ebb and flow of the tide do not constitute the usual test as in England, or any test at all, of the navigability of waters. There no waters are navigable, in fact, or at least to any considerable extent, which are not subject to the tide, and from this circumstance tide-water and navigable water there signify substantially the same thing." See also Gould on Waters, § 67.

In the case of The Montello, 20 Wall., 441 [22 L. Ed. 391], the following language occurs: "It would be a narrow rule to hold that in this country, unless a river was capable of being navigated by steam or sail vessels, it could not be treated as a public highway. The capability of use by the public for purposes of transportation and commerce affords the true criterion of the navigability of a river *rather than the extent and manner of that use. If it is capable in its natural state of being used for purposes of commerce, no matter in what mode the commerce may be conducted, it is navigable in fact, and becomes in law a public river or highway. Vessels of any kind that can float upon the water, whether propelled by animal power, by the wind, or by the agency of steam, are, or may become, the mode by which a vast commerce can be conducted, and it would be a mischievous rule that would exclude either in determining the navigability of a river," &c.

*77

Following these cases, the Circuit judge, notwithstanding the positive rule of the common law as to the navigability of all tidal streams, held that even tidal channels are navigable in law only when they are navigable in fact, and in ascertaining whether they are navigable in fact, adopted the standards indicated in the above stated cases; and we cannot say that this was error of law. Taking the test as thus stated he considered the testimony and reached the conclusion before stated, that Big creek and Chisolm's creek are not navigable waters, but that Palmer's creek, Haulover, and Horse Island creek, making one continuous connection through the island, and Sheephead or Fish creek, a branch of Palmer's creek, making another such passage through the island, and South Wimbee creek, are public navigable waters. These were pure findings of fact by the Circuit judge, and if this is a law case, they must stand as a special verdict, not being subject to review by this court. In reference to the jurisdiction of this court, the words of the constitution are: "The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction only in cases of chancery, and shall constitute a court for the correction of errors at law, under such regulations as the General Assembly shall by law provide."

Is this a case in chancery? No matter what else it may be, if it is not a case in chancery, this court has no right to review the findings of fact. We do not understand upon what principle this can properly be called a case in chancery. Before the jurisdictions of law and equity were united, that question might possibly have been determined simply by the court from which the appeal came, but now we suppose it can only be determined by considering whether the case belongs to that class which previous *to the union would have been appropriately prosecuted in the court of chancery. There must have been some reason for the distinction in the constitution, probably arising out of the different forms of procedure or the nature of the remedies administered in the two courts; and if so, we must regard the real nature of the proceeding and issues joined, and not merely the form which they assume. "The circumstance that forms of proceedings as it regards law and equity, are assimilated under the code, does not affect the jurisdiction of this court as established under the constitution; but we look to the substantial character of the controversy before us for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of our powers in relation to said case, rather than to the nature of the court from which the case comes, in the technical mould in which the case is cast." Sullivan v. Thomas, 3 S. C., 546.

*78

Notwithstanding the technical mould in which the case comes to us (information by the attorney general on behalf of the state, praying, among other things, for an injunction), the substantial character of the controversy here certainly is an action for the recovery of real estate, which is in no respect equitable. But for the accidental fact that the state is the real plaintiff, the action would have been in form, trespass to try title, pure and simple. The form of information by the attorney general under the statute was adopted only for the reason that the state, on account of its supposed legal ubiquity, cannot be disseized or dispossessed, and therefore cannot maintain the direct action of ejectment or trespass to try title. State v. Stark, 3 Brev., 104; State v. Arledge, 1 Bail., 551. In the case of Stark, Judge Brevard evidently regarded the proceeding by information as in the Court of General Sessions. He says, "I have no scruple in saying, that if any judicial process is necessary, it must issue from the Court of General Sessions, and not from the Court of Common Pleas, because the breach of public rights or those which affect the whole community, considered as a community, is distinguished by the harsh appellation of crimes and misdemeanors. The redress of private injuries is to be sought by civil suit or action, but public wrongs require a more speedy remedy. 3 Bl. Com., 2. An information of intrusion would probably be the most appropriate means of redress," &c.

*79

*We have not been able to take the view that the case is "in chancery," and therefore we have no right to review the findings of fact by the Circuit judge, which must stand as the established facts of the case. But, considering the unusual nature of the action as one of those prerogative proceedings allowed on the part of the state, in which injunctions are granted; and the earnest manner in which it has been pressed upon us that the proceeding is in analogy to that allowed in England on the equity side of the Court of Exchequer, which had in special charge the revenues of the crown; we have looked through the book of evidence in the case with care, and can only repeat the words of Judge McIver, in the case of Gary v. Burnett, 16 S. C. 632: "We are not to substitute our judgment for that of the Circuit judge as to the comparative weight of the testimony. It is only where there is no testimony to support his conclusion, or where manifest error is shown that this court will undertake to overrule a finding of fact by a Circuit judge. * * * In this case there was certainly much conflict of testimony, and we cannot say that there was any such manifest error on the part of the Circuit judge as would warrant our interference," &c.

Assuming, then, the facts to be as found by the Circuit judge, Big creek and Chisolm's creek, not being navigable waters, go out of the case. We cannot hold that the bed of a creek not navigable, although tidal, belongs to the state to the exclusion of the riparian proprietor. But as to the other creeks found to be navigable, viz., Palmer's creek, connecting with Horse Island creek through Haulover, Fish or Sheephead, and South Wimbee creeks, the question recurs, what are the rights in the beds of these streams of the owners of the high lands of Chisolm's Island? Do they belong to the proprietors of the high lands upon the principle of riparian proprietorship? We think not. These are all channels in which the tide ebbs and flows, and as to such the well established rule is, that a grant of the shore gives title only to the high water mark, the mean between extreme high and low tides. Chancellor Kent says: "It is a settled principle of the English law that the right of owners of land bounded by the sea or on navigable rivers where the tide ebbs and flows, extends to high water mark; and the shore below common, but *not extraordinary high water mark, belongs to the public. * * * But grants of land bounded on rivers or upon the margins of the same or along the same above tide water carry the exclusive right and title of the grantee to the centre of the stream," &c. 3 Kent, 426, and authorities.

*80

This is another rule of the common law, but unlike that which we have just considered in regard to navigability it has not, so far as we can understand, undergone any modification whatever in this country. It seems to have been considered that there are not the same reasons here for modifying the rule of the common law as to boundaries on arms of the sea, as exist in reference to that of navigability: some change in the latter being made necessary by the size and importance of the fresh water rivers in our wide and extended territory. But be that as it may, the rule as to boundaries on navigable tide waters or arms of the sea is well established both in England and America. 3 Wash. Real Prop., 634; Tyler on Boundaries, Chap. 2, 3; Angel on Tide Waters, Chap. 2; United States v. Pacheco, 2 Wall., 587 [17 L. Ed. 865].

In this connection it is proper to advert to the new grants, taken out from the land office in the manner usual as to vacant lands, by certain gentlemen in 1869 and assigned to the defendants, which reach below the common law line of proprietorship on such streams, and cover what is generally known as the "flats," "shore," or "marsh," down to low water mark. Upon this subject the defendants complain, in their 17th ground of appeal, that the Circuit judge required them to account for all the phosphate rock dug and mined in "the beds" of the creeks named by him "without distinguishing between rock dug and mined above low water mark and the rock dug and mined below low water mark, and in not excepting the former from such accounting." We think this view is founded upon a misconception of the Circuit decree. It is true that the Circuit judge did not in express terms make the distinction indicated between high and low water mark; but he held that "the beds" of certain creeks, naming them, on Chisolm's Island are the property of the state, and from the decree itself, as well as the course of the argument, and the admission of plaintiff's counsel, who introduced in evidence the grants of 1869, we understand that the state did not claim "the marsh" *lands covered by the grants, and that the Circuit judge meant by the phrase "beds of the streams," the bottom proper, or the soil lying below low water mark. Assuming this to be the proper construction of the judgment below, the state did not except upon the point, and therefore the question as to whether the grants of 1869 were issued by proper authority and are binding upon the state, is not before us for adjudication.

*81

The state, however, by her 9th exception, did claim that the defendants, by accepting the grants which reach down to low water mark, thereby acknowledged that to be the full extent of their right; "that having by valuable grants from the state, fixed and settled the uncertain boundaries of their territory, they are estopped from now claiming beyond the boundaries so fixed and settled"; that is to say, beyond low water mark. We do not think that the acceptance of these grants in aid of their title estopped the defendants from setting up any other prior or more extended title if they could do so. Herman on Estoppel, 249, 362, 366; Cruger v. Daniel, McMull. Eq., 157. "It would be too much to say that, if a man who is in possession under a good or even colorable title, buys in a defective title, he will thereby defeat his own object, and be estopped from relying on his better right, as an answer to a prior deed or mortgage of the vendor." Herman Est., § 228; Blight's Lessee v. Rochester, 7 Wheat., 535 [5 L. Ed. 516].

This brings us to the defence most earnestly urged for the defendants—that the possession of the Chisolms from 1797, under a plat extending to the boundaries of the whole island, creates the presumption of a grant from the state for everything within the island, including the beds of these streams, whether they be navigable tide waters or not; or, to state it in the words of one of defendants' counsel: "If we were in possession under color of title of any part of the island or tract of land included within the boundaries of Trotti's plat, we were in possession of every atom of soil, of every blade of the marsh of the land not covered by water, and of all the lands covered by water within these boundaries * * * and such possession presumes a grant, is in fact a grant of the premises embraced in the color of title, and that in an action by the state herself as well as by a citizen." *That is to say, as soon as all the different parcels of the island become the property of one person, and he had it, in consolidated form, represented by one plat, calling for the outer boundaries of the island, henceforth that person was in possession of everything within the island, unaffected by the terms of the grants of the different parcels under which he purchased, which, being no longer necessary, might be discarded as the true chain of title, substituting therefor a grant by presumption coincident with the boundaries of the plat.

*82

Upon this subject the Circuit judge held: "It would seem that their color of title, while calling for the outlines of the island as boundaries, and ignoring the existence of the creeks, should be construed with reference to the light thrown upon the title of their grantors by the colonial grants. It is certain Mary Bull had no title to the creeks, but owned on all sides of them. She could convey only what she had. I would, however, be unwilling to hold that defendants are restricted in their claim by the descriptions in the grants after they had renounced all claim under them, yet it is clear that a chain of paper title, beginning at the paper title of the defendants, can be traced up to existing grants from the lords proprietors to all these lands except the beds of those creeks. The defendants, however, renounce all claim under the paper title and rest upon their claim of a presumption of a grant. These facts are important with reference to the extent of the possession and nature of the holding of defendants' grantors. * * * I do not think, therefore, that defendants have established a state of facts that makes out such an adverse holding of the beds of these streams for a sufficient length of time to entitle them to the presumption of a grant. It follows that the title is in the state."

In this result reached by the Circuit judge we concur, but upon grounds somewhat different from those stated by him. In the first place, it is proper to observe that this defence does not embrace South Wimbee. That is not one of the creeks which penetrates Chisolm's Island, but is one of its boundaries. No claim is made that the defendants or any of their vendors ever owned the soil on both sides of it, or that it is within their color of title. The deed of the defendants purports to convey the bed *to the middle of the stream; but assuming the fact heretofore established, that it is a navigable tidal channel, we do not see how the defendants can have in the bed of this boundary any greater right than they have in the beds of the other boundaries, Coosaw and Bull rivers, as to both of which, by the express terms of their own deed, they only claim down to low water mark. That also is the limit of their right in the South Wimbee.

*83

As to the other creeks which penetrate the island, it is clear that the defendants cannot claim their beds, as heretofore explained, against the state, by adverse possession under the statute of limitations. Until 1870, the doctrine of nullum tempus occurrit regi prevailed in this state, and since that time twenty years had not elapsed, so that it is not necessary to consider the scope and effect of the new provision in the code as to when and under what circumstances "the state will not sue." It is also quite clear that down to the year 1869, when the defendants took their first lease from the Chisolms and began to mine for phosphatic deposits, there had been no actual adverse possession of the beds of these channels, unless the building of a bridge across one of them and warning off a sloop which came to pick oysters can be considered as such possession.

But without entering into the question whether the state, having title and theoretical ubiquity to the full extent of her boundaries, could be disseized in such manner as thereby to be divested of that title, either under the statute of limitations or by the presumption of a grant against her remonstrance; and if so, whether that could be effected by mere constructive possession for any length of time under mere color of title, or in any way short of an actual pedis possessio for the whole period required; it seems to us enough to call attention to the peculiar character of the rights to be taken from the state by the proposed presumption of a grant.

The state had in the beds of these tidal channels not only title as property, the jus privatum, but something more, the jus publicum, consisting of the rights, powers, and privileges derived from the British crown, and belonging to the governing head, which she held in a fiduciary capacity for general and public use; in trust for the benefit of all the citizens of the state, and in *respect to which she had trust duties to perform. 3 Kent, 377; Martin v. Waddell, 16 Peters, 367 [10 L. Ed. 997]; Commonwealth v. Roxbury, 9 Gray, 451. The absolute rule heretofore referred to, limiting land owners bounded by such streams to the high water mark, unless altered by law or modified by custom, accords with the view that the beds of such channels below low water mark are not held by the state simply as vacant lands, subject to grant to settlers in the usual way through the land office.

*84

There seems to be no doubt, however, that the state as such trustee has the power to dispose of these beds as she may think best for her citizens; but not being, as it seems to us, subject to grant in the usual form under the provisions of the statute regulating vacant lands, it would seem to follow that in order to give effect to an alienation which the state might undertake to make it would be necessary to have a special act of the legislature expressing in terms and formally such intention. In this view, the state, asserting her rights to the deposits "in the beds of the navigable streams and waters of the state," has, by numerous special acts of her legislature, granted licenses to different companies to mine in these beds, imposing penalties on those who undertake to do so without such license. General Statutes, § 65.

Under the proof in this case, the court could not presume a special act of the legislature making the beds of these streams the private property of individuals. The doctrine is well settled that no act of the legislature will be presumed against the policy of the state. It will not be presumed that the law-making power of the state, overlooking the rights and duties of the state, enacted a law in conflict with what was declared to be the best interest and true policy of the state. Counter presumptions intervene and forbid it. Lyons v. Holmes, 19 S. C., 409; Vinyard v. Passalaigue, 2 Strob., 536. "Presumptions are called the intendments of the law. They are in pursuance of the allowed principles or permissions of the established law; but cannot be permitted when they are in hostility to them." We are not aware that it has been the practice of the state to grant to private individuals absolute title to the beds of these tidal streams. At least we have been cited to no case in which it has been done below low water mark by an act of the legislature either passed *in fact or presumed to have been. We see nothing to show an intendment of the law to that effect.

*85

What was so well said of the North Wimbee by Judge Maher in his able circuit opinion never appealed from, in the Oak Point Mine Case,[1] may be appropriately applied to the beds of the creeks in question here: "As to the title to the bed of the creek below ordinary low water mark, I hold that it is in the state. No express grant conveying this land has been produced. No long continued acts of ownership in the bed of the creek have been shown in support of a prescriptive right. Angel Tide Waters, 96; Tyler Bound., 36. The possession for forty (or eighty) years of the adjacent land by those under whom the defendants claim undoubtedly raises the presumption of a grant coextensive with the limits of such possession. But to extend the boundary to the centre of the creek would be to overturn an established principle of the common law, which has never yet been questioned by any court in England or this country. The tendency of the American decisions has been to restrict riparian proprietorship, even upon navigable rivers above the tide, and not to enlarge it in respect to navigable streams in which the tide ebbs and flows. Wherever the common law test of navigability has been repudiated, the common law consequences of navigability have been held to attach. Nothing more can be claimed under the grant presumed from the possession of the upland than would result from an express grant calling for the creek as a boundary, conceding that usage (in this case express grant) would carry the line to low water mark. The principle on which it could be extended further, upon the facts of this case, is not to be found in the common law, nor in any decision that has come within my notice."

Finally, it is urged that the state cannot maintain this action, at least as to South Wimbee, for the reason that she had previously granted to others the exclusive right to dig, mine, and remove phosphate rocks from the bed of that creek, "and the defendants cannot be called upon to account to the state for phosphatic deposits so mined and removed from said creeks; but if accountable at all, they are accountable to the grantees of the state *for such rock," &c. We do not consider the action as brought to recover the phosphates which have been discovered in the aforesaid streams. That may have prompted the bringing of the action, but its avowed object is to establish the ownership in the soil of the beds. This includes, of course, the phosphates or any other deposits which may happen to be found there, but the right of the state to the soil is the same, whether phosphates exist there or not. The act of 1878 provides that "The Oak Point Company," when organized, "shall have the exclusive right to dig, mine, and remove phosphate rock and phosphatic deposits from the beds of Bull river and North and South Wimbee creeks," &c. It does not appear in the evidence that the "Oak Point Company" ever organized or accepted this grant.

*86

But assuming that they did, they are not here making objection to this action. If they were, however, such objection could not prevail. The act contains no words of grant of the soil, nor of anything that implies it. The right "to dig, mine, and remove phosphate rocks and phosphatic deposits," &c., simply confers an authority, a privilege, or franchise, like the permission to exclude the tide from the Roxbury flats for the purpose of a mill-power. In all grants from the government to the subject, the terms of the grant are to be taken most strongly against the grantee, and in favor of the grantor, reversing the rule as between individuals, on the ground that the grant is supposed to be made at the solicitation of the grantee, and the form and terms of the particular instrument of grant proposed by him and submitted to the government for its allowance. But this rule applies a fortiori to a case where such grant by a government to individual proprietors is claimed to be not merely a conveyance of title to land, but also a portion of that public domain which the government held in a fiduciary relation, for general and public use. Commonwealth v. Roxbury, 9 Gray, 492. The act conferred upon the Oak Point Mine Company simply a license "to dig phosphates," and did not carry the title to the soil, which remained in the state.

We see no reason to doubt the correctness of the conclusion on the Circuit, that another reference was necessary. It may have the effect of preventing injustice. In regard to the principle on *which the judge directed the damages to be ascertained, we see no error. We concur with him that the defendants mined in the beds of these streams running through their lands under an honest but mistaken belief of their right to do so.

*87

[1] Printed in full as an appendix to this volume. —REPORTER.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court, as interpreted herein, be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 87

STATE v. DUNCAN.

(April Term, 1884.)

[Courts ⇦244; Habeas Corpus ⇦113.]

From an order made by two trial justices discharging a prisoner under a habeas corpus proceeding had before them, an appeal cannot be taken direct to the Supreme Court. McGowan, A. J., dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 733; Dec. Dig. ⇦244; Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. § 103; Dec. Dig. ⇦113.]

This was an appeal by the state direct to this court from an order made by two trial justices of Spartanburg County, discharging the defendant, Worth J. Duncan, who had been brought before them under a writ of habeas corpus, he being in the custody of the sheriff, charged with breach of trust with fraudulent intent. The order of discharge bears date February 2, 1884. The only question considered by the court not having been raised by exception or in argument, a fuller statement of the case is unnecessary.

Mr. Solicitor Duncan, for appellant.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, contra.

December 21, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This is an appeal on behalf of the state from the order of two trial justices discharging the defendant without day, who had been brought before them under the provisions of the habeas corpus act. It appeared from the return to the writ that the defendant was in custody under a warrant of commitment for breach of trust with a fraudulent intent.

The preliminary question presented in this case is whether this court has jurisdiction to hear this appeal. The constitution *(art. IV., § 4) provides as follows: "The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction only in cases of chancery, and shall constitute a court for the correction of errors at law, under such regulations as the general assembly may by law prescribe." Now, as it is manifest that this is not a "case of chancery," and as the constitution does not confer jurisdiction upon this court for the correction of errors at law in general terms, but only "under such regulations as the general assembly may by law prescribe," it is necessary to ascertain what regulations the general assembly has by law prescribed, under which this court has power to correct errors at law. These regulations are to be found in section 11 of the code of 1882, which provides as follows: "The Supreme Court shall have exclusive jurisdiction to review upon appeal: 1. Any intermediate judgment, order, or decree, involving the merits in actions commenced in the Courts of Common Pleas and General Sessions, brought there by original process, or removed there from any inferior courts or jurisdiction, and final judgments in such actions," &c., the remainder of the section being immaterial to the present inquiry.

*88

Now, as these regulations provide for an appeal to the Supreme Court only in actions "commenced in the Court of Common Pleas and General Sessions, brought there by original process, or removed there from any inferior courts or jurisdiction," and as the order from which this appeal was taken was not made in any action or proceeding originally commenced, either in the Court of Common Pleas or General Sessions, and was not removed there from any inferior court or jurisdiction, it would seem to be clear that this court has not been invested with power to hear such appeal.

But again, the code in section 358, expressly declares that "when a judgment is rendered by a trial justice's court, by the county commissioners, or any other inferior court or jurisdiction, save the probate court heretofore provided for in this Code of Procedure, the appeal shall be to the Circuit Court of the county wherein the judgment was rendered." While it may possibly admit of some doubt whether two trial justices in granting a writ of habeas corpus could be properly considered as an inferior court, yet it is quite clear that they are exercising inferior juris*diction to that conferred upon the judges of the Court of Common Pleas and General Sessions, or justices of the Supreme Court; for while these judges and justices are authorized to grant the writ of habeas corpus in any case, whether the charge be of felony or otherwise, by virtue of their common law powers, and of the provisions of section 2093, so far as the justices of the Supreme Court are concerned; and even under the habeas corpus act may grant the writ where a person is in confinement under a charge of felony not punishable by death—two trial justices cannot grant the writ in any case of felony, the punishment of which is death, or imprisonment for life. See section 2335 of general statutes. So that it is manifest that they are only invested with a limited or inferior jurisdiction; and being an inferior jurisdiction, an appeal from any order or judgment entered by them must be to the Circuit Court, under the express terms of section 358 of the code above quoted.

*89

It may be urged that the last clause of the habeas corpus act, section 2340 of the general statutes, provides that "an appeal from all final decisions rendered on applications for writs of habeas corpus shall be allowed as is provided by law in civil actions," and that as the power to grant such writs is expressly granted to two trial justices this section secures the right of appeal in this case. There is no doubt that the section does secure the right of appeal, but the question remains as to what court such appeal shall be taken, to the Supreme Court or to the Circuit Court. It will be observed that the section just quoted only secures the right of appeal in general terms without declaring in specific terms the court to which such appeal shall be taken. But it does not leave that matter in doubt, for it declares that the appeal "shall be allowed as is provided by law in civil actions." Now we have seen that the law prescribes that in civil actions the appeal from a judgment of any inferior court or jurisdiction shall be to the Circuit Court, and therefore when an appeal is taken from an order of two trial justices, which we have seen is an inferior jurisdiction, granting a writ of habeas corpus, the appeal must be to the Circuit Court in the first instance, and not directly to the Supreme Court.

The case of Ex parte Peter Smith, 8 S. C., *90
495, is not in *point, for in that case the appeal was from an order of a Circuit judge discharging a prisoner brought before him under a writ of habeas corpus, and not from an order made by two trial justices. It is true that there is no law providing in express terms that the appeal from an order of a Circuit judge at chambers, made on an application for a writ of habeas corpus, shall be to the Supreme Court; yet this is necessarily implied, as section 2340 of the general statutes above quoted expressly secures the right of appeal in all such cases, and there is no other court to which such appeal could be taken, as it would be anomalous for the appeal to be taken to the Circuit Court, consisting, so far as this matter is concerned, of a judge of co-ordinate and concurrent jurisdiction, and perhaps of the same judge from whose order the appeal would be taken, and therefore the appeal in such case must necessarily be to the Supreme Court. But no such necessary implication arises in case of an appeal from an order of two trial justices, for, as has been shown, the appeal in such a case not only can, but is required to be, taken to the Circuit Court.

From these views it follows that this court has no jurisdiction to hear and determine any of the questions made by this appeal, and therefore the judgment of this court is that the appeal herein be dismissed for the want of jurisdiction.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I cannot agree with my brethren as to the right of appeal to this court from the order of two trial justices discharging the defendant Duncan in habeas corpus proceedings. It is undoubtedly the general rule that the state cannot appeal, especially when the defendant has been discharged and is beyond the jurisdiction, making it a useless waste of time to proceed further with the case; but the right to discharge from confinement under habeas corpus is given to two trial justices by express statute, as also the right to appeal from such decision.

Chapter XCIII. of the general statutes upon the subject of habeas corpus provides: "Any two trial justices are authorized and required to grant the writ of habeas corpus as fully, effectually, and lawfully, as any judge of the Court of Common Pleas *and General Sessions or justices of the Supreme Court of the state, except in cases of felony, the punishment for which is death or imprisonment for life, in which cases trial justices shall have no jurisdiction in applications for habeas corpus," &c. Section 2340 of the same chapter provides that "an appeal from all final decisions rendered on applications for writs of habeas corpus shall be allowed as is provided by law in civil actions," &c. It is therefore clear that an appeal is allowed from a decision in habeas corpus proceedings made by two trial justices, as well as from an order in such application made by a judge of the Common Pleas and General Sessions or a justice of the Supreme Court.
*91

It is said, however, that such appeal from an order made by a judge or justice of the Supreme Court at chambers is direct to the Supreme Court, while that from an order made by two trial justices under and by authority of the same act must be to the Circuit Court, and can only reach the Supreme Court through the medium of that court. I cannot think that such was the intention of the legislature. If such difference in the character of the appeal provided was intended by the legislature, it would have been easy to say so in express terms, as was done in reference to appeals from a single trial justice, county commissioners, and the probate judge. The appeal is given in general terms "from all decisions rendered on applications for writs of habeas corpus," and it would seem that the proper construction of the section should require all appeals from orders made by authority of the act, no matter by whom, to be taken to the same court, viz., the Supreme Court.

But it is argued that we are required to give the act allowing an appeal the construction contended for because of the words "shall be allowed as is provided by law in civil cases"; that as other provisions of the law direct expressly that appeals from inferior courts or jurisdictions in civil cases shall be made to the Circuit Court, and as the authority in habeas corpus conferred upon two trial justices may be taken to be an inferior jurisdiction, therefore the conclusion must follow that the legislature intended that an appeal from an order made by them must be to the Circuit Court. It requires a process of reasoning to reach *this result, and it does not seem to me that such circuity was in the minds of the law-makers, or that, in giving the appeal as they did, they intended more than to declare the manner of taking to the Supreme Court the appeal in a habeas corpus proceeding, which is not a "civil action," that is to say, in the manner or "as is provided by law in civil actions." It has been decided that an appeal under this act from an order made by a judge at chambers must be direct to the Supreme Court. Ex parte Smith, 8 S. C., 513. In that case it was said that "there are no words in the section implying that the legislature intended to limit the right of appeal to any particular class of cases," and I do not think there are any indicating a different court to which orders made by trial justices must be appealed.

*92

From the nature of the subject, promptness was intended. It seems to me that the only object of the provision giving the right to execute the habeas corpus act to two trial justices was to meet the possible case of the absence of a judge, and in favor of the liberty of the citizen, to afford at all times speedy relief to any held in custody. If this is true, the very purpose of the provision will be entirely defeated by requiring appeals in such cases to be made to the Circuit Court, to which the application could have been made in the first instance, without invoking the exercise of the authority conferred by trial justices.

Appeal dismissed.

---

22 S. C. 92

MOORE v. DAVIDSON.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Executors and Administrators ⇐272.]

The personal estate is the primary fund for the payment of debts and legacies, but a testator may make both or either a charge upon real estate devised.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1052–1057, 1059, 1065, 1068; Dec. Dig. ⇐272.]

[2. Wills ⇐822.]

Where a testator bequeathed to his three sons, in trust for the use and benefit of his three granddaughters, each $10,000, when they arrive at the age of eighteen years, and willed and bequeathed "(my debts being paid) the remainder of my property, both real and personal, to my three sons, to be equally divided amongst them," and appointed his said sons his executors, the legacies to the granddaughters were made a charge upon the real estate devised.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Jaudon v. Ducker, 27 S. C. 296, 298, 299, 3 S. E. 465; Clarke v. Clarke, 46 S. C. 244, 24 S. E. 202, 57 Am. St. Rep. 675.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 2120; Dec. Dig. ⇐822.]

*93

[3. Wills ⇐740.]

*Two of the sons having conveyed to the third their interest in the lands devised, in consideration (in part) of liabilities of the estate assumed by the grantee: Held, under the facts of the case, that the liabilities so assumed were not intended to include these legacies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1888–1895; Dec. Dig. ⇐740.]

[4. Appeal and Error ⇐1097.]

The judgment in the case of Davidson v. Moore, 14 S. C., 251, held that the legacies were a charge upon the real estate devised; and that question is therefore res adjudicata.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Earle v. Earle, 33 S. C. 504, 12 S. E. 164.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4358; Dec. Dig. ⇐1097.]

[5. Executors and Administrators ⇐513.]

Where a Circuit decree ascertains a balance in an executor's hands based upon a charge of the real estate as assets of the estate, and from this decree no appeal is taken, the question is finally determined as to such executor, and also as to his judgment creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2267–2291; Dec. Dig. ⇐513.]

[6. Executors and Administrators ⇐513.]

The executor having been charged in his accounting with the value of the real estate devised, and thus a balance ascertained out of which the legacies (in part) were payable, he did not thereby become the purchaser for value of such real estate until he made payment of this balance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2267–2291; Dec. Dig. ⇐513.]

[7. Executors and Administrators ⇐109.]

The executor cannot claim to be reimbursed for debts of the estate paid by him, where the decree has ascertained a balance due by him individually, and to that extent has charged him with a devastavit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 435; Dec. Dig. ⇐109.]

[This case is also cited in McFadden v. Hefley, 28 S. C. 321, 5 S. E. 812, 13 Am. St. Rep. 675, and Floyd v. Floyd, 29 S. C. 107, 7 S. E. 42, without specific application, and in Allen v. Ruddell, 51 S. C. 366, 375, 377, 29 S. E. 198, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Hudson, J., York, July, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case, but see also Davidson v. Moore, 14 S. C., 251. The Circuit decree was as follows, omitting its statement of facts:

The positions taken by the plaintiffs in the complaint, and urged before the referee, are substantially these, viz.: First, that the devise to the three sons in the residuary clause of the will is specific, and is in no way charged with the payment of three legacies of $10,000 each to testator's granddaughters, two of whom are Mrs. Davidson and Mrs. Fickling. Second, that should it be decided that this residuary devise is so charged with the payment of these legacies, nevertheless the devise in the hands of its present sole owner, S. R. Moore, cannot be sold to pay said legacies until the said executor, S. R. Moore, should first be refunded the large amount of money which he has advanced from his personal funds in paying debts of the testator; that he has an equity to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors whose claims he has paid, and to that extent must be preferred to the said legatees out of the proceeds of this land, if sold. On the part of the legatees it is contended that the first *position of the plaintiffs is untenable in law, and the second not founded in fact, and that the conveyance of William A. Moore and Theodore A. Moore to Samuel R. Moore, of May, 1877, and the judgment of Theodore A. against Samuel R. Moore, of September, 1877, are fraudulent and void.

*94

On May 23, 1883, the referee (Patterson) filed his report and with it the testimony, to which said report and testimony reference must be had for the facts of the case in detail. The referee found against the plaintiffs on their positions, and for the legatees, in holding that the legacies are a charge upon the real estate, and take precedence of the judgments against S. R. Moore by Theodore A. Moore and J. F. Wallace, both of which are valid. On exceptions to this report by the plaintiffs, the cause came on before me for full hearing. The legatees (defendants) do not except.

We will direct our attention to the first position of the plaintiffs taken before the referee and renewed here. An examination of the will of John S. Moore and of the opinion of our late Court of Appeals in Laurens v. Read (14 Rich. Eq., 245–270) will readily convince any one that the will of Margaret H. Laurens in that case gives the rule for the construction of the will of John S. Moore in this case, unless the act of 1858 (12 Stat., 700) has the effect, as is intimated by Justice Wardlaw, to convert a residuary devise in a will of a testator, dying after that date, from a specific to a general devise.

The case of Laurens v. Read is so full to the point, and the authorities so learnedly examined, that I do not deem it necessary to do more than to refer to that case as conclusive of this, unless we are driven by the act of 1858 to a different rule of construction. In that case the testator died before the act, but in our case the will being made before the act, the testator died after the act, but betwixt the making of his will and his death acquired no additional real estate whatever. The act therefore has no application, unless it has the effect in all cases to change a residuary devise from what was specific before the act into a general devise, or one not specific. The point was not involved in that case, because the act had no application, nor is the point decided. There is an intimation in the opening of the opinion *of the court that such is the effect. But at most this a mere obiter dictum of the judge delivering the opinion, and is not of binding authority.

*95

The question, so far as I am informed, has never been directly raised nor decided by our Supreme Court, and I shall deal with it as res integra. Both in England and America devises of real estate, whether by description or in the residuum, have been uniformly treated as specific. Our courts have borrowed their rules of construction from the courts of the mother country in interpreting wills generally, and especially in this particular. Now, under the 24th section of the English wills act (1 Vic., ch. 26)—which makes the will speak as if it had been made immediately before the death of the testator, and is, therefore, in effect, the same as our own act of 1858—residuary devises of land are held to be specific. Hausman v. Fryer, Law Rep., 3 Ch. Ap., 420; Gibbons v. Eyden, Law Rep., 7 Eq. Ca., 374. See note by reporter to Laurens v. Read.

I learn from a full note on page 450 of 3rd Jarman on Wills (5th Am. from 4th Lond. edit.) that at first the courts of England were inclined to take the same view as to the effect on a residuary devise of this wills act, as Judge Wardlaw intimates concerning our act of 1858. But this view was, after some conflict of decisions, abandoned, and it was the settled rule of construction in the courts of England that residuary devises are as well specific since as they were before the act. With this view we concur, as being more in accord with reason and principle, founded in the very nature of real as contra-distinguished from personal estate.

The land embraced in the residuary clause of a will is ordinarily as well defined, as fixed, as certain in the mind of the testator, as tracts specifically named in specific devises, especially when, as in this case, no additions are made by purchase or descent cast. Even when additions are made to it after the publication of a will, still the whole is by no means of that undefined, changing, variable character as is personal estate. Wherefore we see no valid reason, since the act of 1858, to depart from that wise and wholesome rule of construction that prevailed before; and we hold that the devise in the residuary clause of *John S. Moore's will is specific, and not chargeable with the payment of the legacies to Mrs. Davidson and Mrs. Fickling.

*96

Now, as to the plaintiffs' second ground, to wit: That, having advanced money out of his private funds towards the payment of the testator's debts, Samuel R. Moore, the executor, is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors to the extent of the funds so expended. The defendants concede the correctness of the equity, but deny the fact of the outlay. One thing clearly appears from the accounts of the executor as stated by the referee, and that is that he has been charged with the entire value of this real estate. It was appraised at $17,600, and the evidence shows this sum to cover its fair value. Charging him with this sum in the accounts, and with all other moneys received and goods converted, and giving him credit for all payments and disbursements made, the referee finds a balance against him of a little more than $7,000 in favor of the legatees jointly, viz., in favor of Mrs. Davidson $1,985.53, and in favor of Mrs. Fickling $5,194.14.

Under this method of accounting, S. R. Moore has been made to pay the estate of John S. Moore in full for this land. Clearly, then, it cannot be still regarded as the property of that estate so as to be subject to the satisfaction of the judgments of these legatees. It is so liable, but as the property of S. R. Moore, and not of the estate. In levying on it, therefore, these legatees must treat it as his property, and their liens take rank, among the other judgments against S. R. Moore, according to date; and hence the judgments of Theodore A. Moore and J. F. Wallace must take precedence of these legatees, being four years older.

The findings and conclusions of the referee against the plaintiffs on the two main points herein noticed are overruled; and his finding that the conveyance by Theodore A. Moore and W. A. Moore of their shares in the residuary devise of S. R. Moore is valid, and that the judgment of Theodore A. Moore against S. R. Moore is not fraudulent, not having been excepted to, and being sustained by the proof, is affirmed.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the residuary devise in the will of J. S. Moore is specific, and not chargeable with the payment of the pecuniary legacies in the first clause of *said will, given in trust for the testator's three granddaughters, two of whom are Mrs. Davidson and Mrs. Fickling. It is further adjudged that the said last named legatees, defendants to this action, and R. H. Glenn, as sheriff of York County, be perpetually enjoined and restrained from levying upon and selling said land as other than the individual property of Samuel R. Moore, liable to the payment of his judgment debts in the order of priority as fixed by law. It is further ordered and adjudged that the said defendants, Laura B. Davidson and Buena V. Fickling, do pay the costs of this action.

*97

From the foregoing decree the defendants duly appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. For that his honor held that the interpretation of the will of Margaret H. Laurens, in the case of Laurens v. Read (14 Rich. Eq., 245–270), gives the rule for the construction of the will of John S. Moore in this case, unless the act of 1858 (12 Stat., 700) has the effect to convert a residuary devise in a will of a testator dying after that date from a specific to a general devise; and that such act has no such effect in cases where the will of the testator was made before the passage of the act, and testator died after the passage of the act.

2. Because his honor held that residuary devises are as well specific since as they were before the passage of the act of 1858.

3. Because his honor held that the devise in the residuum of John S. Moore's will is specific, and not chargeable with the payment of the legacies to Mrs. Davidson and Mrs. Fickling.

4. For that his honor held that under the method of accounting adopted by the referee, S. R. Moore has been made to pay the estate of testator in full for the real estate; and that the same cannot still be regarded as the property of the estate so as to be subject to the satisfaction of the judgments of Mrs. Davidson and Mrs. Fickling.

5. For that his honor held that in levying on said real estate, Mrs. Davidson and Mrs. Fickling must treat the real estate as the property of S. R. Moore; and their liens must take rank among the other judgments against S. R. Moore, according to date.

6. For that his honor overruled the findings and conclusions of the referee herein against the plaintiffs.

*98

*7. For that his honor ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the residuary devise in the will of J. S. Moore is specific, and not chargeable with the payment of the pecuniary legacies in the first clause of said will, given in trust for the testator's three granddaughters, two of whom are Mrs. Davidson and Mrs. Fickling.

8. For that his honor erred in virtually holding that the account taken by the referee to ascertain the value of the estate, real and personal, of the testator, which furnished the assets, real and personal, which were subject to the provisions of the will, was an accounting by the executor of his administration of the estate.

9. For that his honor did not hold that the real estate was a real asset, subject to the provisions of the will, until the legacies and debts were paid.

10. For that his honor held that the real estate had become the private property of S. R. Moore before the debts and legacies had been paid.

11. For that his honor so construed the will of J. S. Moore, and so gave effect to the acts of those named as executors and trustees under said will, as to enable them to defeat the trusts created by the will.

12. For that his honor adjudged that the defendants be perpetually enjoined and restrained from levying upon and selling said land as other than the personal property of S. R. Moore, liable to the payment of his judgment debts in the order of priority as fixed by law.

Messrs. Hart & Hart and James H. Rion, for appellants.

Messrs. Wilson & Wilson, contra.

December 18, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. On September 21, 1859, John S. Moore departed this life, having duly made and executed his last will and testament, bearing date January 7, 1858. The terms of his will are as follows: "1st.

*99

I will and bequeath to my sons, *Theodore A., Samuel R., and William A. Moore, in trust for the use and benefit of my granddaughters, Amanda J. Springs, Laura B. Springs, and Buena V. Springs, each ten thousand dollars, when they arrive at the age of eighteen years old, for and during their natural lives, and should either of them die, then to her issue; but if either die leaving no issue alive, then to her surviving sisters, my granddaughter, Margaret Lyon, being one of them, or their surviving issue for ever; but if all my said granddaughters die leaving no issue alive, then to revert back to my estate, and be equally divided amongst my sons. My sons, trustees as aforesaid, may, if they deem it necessary and prudent, vest the above legacies in stocks or other property for the use of my said granddaughters severally, but the property so obtained to be held by said trustees upon and subject to the same terms and conditions aforesaid. 2d. I will and bequeath (my debts being paid) the remainder of my property, both real and personal, to my sons, Theodore A., Samuel R., and William A. Moore, to be equally divided amongst them; and I hereby appoint my said sons my executors."

Of the persons named as executors, Samuel R. Moore alone qualified as such, and under proceedings commenced against him in 1876, by the appellants, Davidson and wife and Fickling and wife, to recover the legacies given by the will to these ladies, Judge Aldrich, on June 30, 1881, rendered judgment against the said Samuel R. Moore, individually as well as executor as aforesaid, for the balances due on said legacies.

On May 9, 1877, two of the sons of the testator, Theodore A. and William A., residuary devisees under the will, conveyed to their brother, S. R. Moore, the other residuary devisee, their interest in the real estate so devised to the three sons. The deed by which this conveyance was made recites that "it was agreed in 1863, that in consideration of the said S. R. Moore advancing certain sums of money and assuming certain liabilities on account of the estate of the said John S. Moore, deceased, the real estate of the said deceased, hereinafter mentioned, should be vested in the said S. R. Moore absolutely in fee simple"; and the considerations mentioned in the deed are: "The large sums of money heretofore advanced by S. R.

*100

Moore to pay the indebtedness of the *estate of John S. Moore, and liabilities of said estate assumed by the said S. R. Moore, and the sum of three dollars."

On August 31, 1877, the respondents, T. A. Moore and J. F. Wallace, entered judgments against the said Samuel R. Moore individually, and not as executor, for large sums of money, and under the executions issued upon these judgments the sheriff levied upon all the property of S. R. Moore, including the real estate devised by his father's will, and advertised the same for sale on the first Monday in November, 1881, as the property of said S. R. Moore. In the meantime, under the executions issued on the judgments recovered by the appellants, Davidson and wife and Fickling and wife, against S. R. Moore, as executor of John S. Moore, deceased, the sheriff had levied on the real estate devised by the will of said John S. Moore, and advertised the same for sale on the first Monday in November, 1881, as the property of John S. Moore, deceased.

Thereupon this action was commenced for the purpose of perpetually enjoining said appellants from selling the said devised real estate as the property of John S. Moore, deceased, or failing in that, to enjoin them from so doing until an account can be taken and decree made for the amount due S. R. Moore for advances made for said estate, and for what sum he is entitled to reimbursement as a prior charge to the judgments of said appellants. The Circuit judge held that the devise was specific and not chargeable with the payment of the pecuniary legacies to the appellants, and that S. R. Moore having accounted fully for the value of the land, it could no longer be considered as part of the estate of said John S. Moore. He therefore granted the injunction asked for. From this judgment Davidson and wife and Fickling and wife appeal on various grounds set out in the record.

The main questions raised by the appeal are, first, whether the legacies in question were charged upon the real estate devised; and second, if so, whether, in his accounting, S. R. Moore has been made to pay the estate of John S. Moore the full value of said real estate and thus acquired an absolute right thereto. Third, if the legacies are a charge upon the real estate, whether S. R. Moore is not entitled by subrogation first to be reimbursed *amounts advanced by him for the purpose of paying the debts of the testator.

*101

There is no doubt that the primary fund for the payment of debts and legacies is the personal estate, but there is as little doubt that a testator, if so minded, may make both or either a charge upon real estate devised. It is true that the rule is that such intention must appear either from the express words of the will or must be clearly inferable from the language therein used. Kirkpatrick v. Chesnut, 5 S. C., 216; Wright

v. Dunn, 10 Wheat., 229 [6 L. Ed. 303]. It is a question of intention to be solved by a consideration of the terms of the will, and if the intention to charge the real estate appears by the express terms used, or is clearly implied by such terms, such intention must be carried into effect, otherwise the general rule must prevail.

Now, as we think the language used by the testator in the will under consideration clearly implied an intention on his part to charge his entire estate, both real and personal, with the payment of the legacies to his granddaughters, we do not deem it necessary to enter into a consideration of the question whether the act of 1858, 12 Stat., 701 (which clearly applies to this case, the testator having died subsequent to the passage of the act, although the will was executed some time before. Bell v. Towell, 18 S. C., 94), has had the effect of changing the rule by which it was held that all devises were specific, by removing the reason for such rule as given by Mr. Jarman in his work on wills (vol. 1, p. 595); or whether the fact stated in the Circuit decree, that the testator acquired no real estate between the time of the making of his will and the time of his death, would affect the question of the applicability of the act of 1858.

For even if it be conceded that the residuary devise here in question should be regarded as specific, we think that the terms of the will clearly show that the intention of the testator was that the legacies should be paid at all events, thus constituting them a charge upon the whole estate, both real and personal. It will be observed that there are but two general dispositions of his estate made by the testator: first, the legacies of specific amounts of money to each of his three granddaughters; second, all the remainder of his estate to his sons. There is not even any pro*vision for debts, except incidentally. The intention of the testator as expressly declared is, first, that each of the three granddaughters is to have a certain specific sum of money, and all that is given to the sons is what may remain of his estate, out of which remainder his debts are to be paid. In other words, he gives nothing to his sons except what remains, after the legacies are taken out and after his debts are paid.

*102

It is absolutely certain that the intention was that the sons should only have the remainder of his property. Now that word necessarily implies that something was to be previously taken from the estate. What was that something? There was no previous devise or bequest, except of the legacies to the granddaughters, and therefore there could have been nothing to be taken from the estate, except the legacies. The rather peculiar manner in which the testator provided for the payment of his debts negatives the idea that he had reference to them only in the use of the word remainder; and besides, if everything that remained after the payment of the debts was to go to the sons, then there would be no fund out of which the legacies were to be paid.

Nor is there any warrant for applying the term remainder to the personal estate alone. It is true that, in the absence of any direction to the contrary, the legacies, as well as the debts, would be payable out of the personal estate, and the testator must be presumed to have known that this was the law; but, notwithstanding this, having, as he did have, the right to make other provision for the payment of the debts and legacies, what did he do? He made no distinction whatever between his real and personal estate; but, on the contrary, blended it into one common mass and gave it, or rather what remained of it, after the payment of the legacies and debts, to his sons. His language is: "I will and bequeath (my debts being paid) the remainder of my property, both real and personal, to my sons." Where is the warrant for confining the term remainder to the personal property only? The testator has not done so, but, on the contrary, according to the strict grammatical construction, the term remainder applies equally to the real as well as to the personal property. The testator does not content himself with saying simply "the *remainder of my property," but, as if his purpose was to express his intention more fully, he adds the words "both real and personal." So far from saying the remainder of my personal property and all my real estate, he uses language showing that he intended to apply the term remainder to both kinds of property. It was as if he had said: "When I say remainder of my property, I mean the remainder of both my real and personal property."

*103

Now if, as we have shown, the term remainder applies as well to the real as to the personal property, and if, as the will shows, there was no preceding devise of real estate, it follows necessarily that the sons could only take what remained of the estate after the debts and legacies were paid. When we look to the circumstances surrounding the testator, both when he made his will and when he died, we are unable to perceive anything unnatural or unreasonable in the construction which we have arrived at. It is conceded that the testator, at the time he made his will and up to the time of his death, was possessed of a very large estate, amply sufficient to pay the debts and legacies and leave a very handsome residue for the sons. It was quite natural, therefore, for him to determine that, as there would be a large estate for his sons, after making provision for his granddaughters, the best mode of effecting his purpose would be to give to his sons the whole of his estate which would remain after provision was made for his debts and legacies to the granddaughters, especially as the sons were to be their trustees. If the results of a disastrous civil war, which was not probably anticipated by the testator, or other unforeseen causes, have defeated his plans, it only adds another to the many instances in which human foresight has proved itself incapable of foretelling the future.

Inasmuch as the intention of the testator, as gathered from the words he has used, is the controlling rule in the construction of a will, and inasmuch as it is seldom the case that the same language is used in any two wills, it is often difficult, if not impossible, to find cases precisely in point. General rules may be found which afford aid in arriving at the proper construction to be given to the language of a testator, and for this purpose it is always well to consult the authorities. An examination of the numerous cases cited in the argument will show that the con-clu*sion at which we have arrived is not in conflict with any well-settled principle, but, on the contrary, is well sustained by authority. In Laurens v. Read, 14 Rich. Eq., 245, Mr. Justice Wardlaw has collected and reviewed the authorities upon the subject. He arranges the cases in which lands devised have been charged with the payment of legacies under six heads; and we think the case now under consideration falls under his third and fourth heads, for the terms and conditions upon which the legacies are given plainly imply that they are to be paid by the executors, and the real estate is devised to them. So also, as we have said, the testator has blended the real and personal estate together as one mass, and that mass is the only fund out of which the legacies could be paid.

*104

It is true that Wardlaw, J., in the case of Laurens v. Read, held that, under the terms of that will, which it is claimed is very much like Moore's, the pecuniary legacies did not constitute a charge upon the real estate, yet there is at least one material and vital distinction between that case and the one we are now considering. In the will of Mrs. Laurens there was no devise to the executors, while in Moore's will there is. It is true that in the Laurens will the residue was bequeathed and devised to the same persons as those who were named as executors, but the devise was not to them in their own right, but as trustees, without any power to sell, and this circumstance seems to be strongly relied upon by Judge Wardlaw, because the devise being to them as trustees, without the power to sell, they had no means of applying the real estate to the payment of the legacies. But this difficulty would not arise where, as in our case, the devise is to the executors absolutely in their own right. We think, too, that the authorities cited in 3 Jarman on Wills (edit. of 1881, by Randolph & Talcott), 422 and note 10, 427 and note 14, and 429, especially the case of Greville v. Browne, 7 H. L. Cas., 689, fully sustain our view. See also Knotts v. Bailey, 54 Miss., 235.

We do not think that the position taken by one of the counsel for the appellants, based upon the terms of the recital and the consideration stated in the deed from Theodore A. and William A. Moore to Samuel R. Moore, can be maintained. The "lia*bilities" there referred to could not have been intended by the parties to that deed to embrace the legacies, because some time prior to that time the executor had, as he supposed, made ample provision for the legacies by setting apart certain notes for that purpose, as appears by the record in the previous case of Davidson v. Moore, 14 S. C., 251, which the parties in this case agreed might be used here. It is true that in that case it was eventually determined that these so-called investments of the said legacies could not be sustained by the court, but still, at the time the deed above referred to was made, the executor was stoutly contending that the legacies had been thus fully provided for, and therefore we do not think that the term "liabilities" used in that deed could have been intended to embrace the legacies.

*105

But we think there is much force in another of his positions, that the respondent, S. R. Moore, is estopped by the judgment in the former case of Davidson v. Moore, supra, from raising the question whether the legacies constitute a charge upon the real estate. In that case the Circuit judge held that "the assets and the real estate were sufficient in amount, as I have heretofore found, to pay all debts and the legacies provided in the will. Hence I adjudge the recovery against the defendant personally and as executor." This plainly shows that the Circuit judge in that case regarded the real estate liable to the payment of the legacies, and in effect so decreed. In appealing from that decree the executor, Samuel R. Moore, who was then the sole owner of the residue of the real estate, took no exception to such ruling, based upon any alleged error in holding the real estate chargeable with the legacies; and the Supreme Court in rendering its judgment, after modifying the account in some particulars, not material to the present issue, uses this language: "How the accounts will stand after these modifications, it will be for the Circuit Court to ascertain, and until that is done, it is impossible to say whether the decree should be against the executor personally as well as in his representative character. If it shall appear that assets of the estate of the testator, including therein the real estate, and excluding the value of the slaves, have come, or ought to have come, into the hands of the executor, sufficient to enable him to pay the debts and the legacies, then the decree should be *against him personally, as well as in his representative character." This was a plain recognition and affirmation of the ruling of the Circuit judge that the real estate constituted assets for the payment of the legacies, as well as the debts.

*106

Again, when the accounting thus ordered by the Supreme Court was taken, in which the real estate was charged as part of the assets, and when the result of such accounting was, with certain modifications, not material to the present inquiry, confirmed by the decree of Judge Aldrich, from which there was no appeal, it seems to us that the question was concluded. S. R. Moore not only then had the opportunity, but it was his duty, to have raised the question now raised, and not having done so then, he is estopped from doing so now. If the position now taken—that the real estate is not chargeable with the legacies—could have been maintained, it is manifest that no decree could have been rendered by Judge Aldrich in favor of Davidson and wife and Fickling and wife against S. R. Moore individually, for unless the real estate was charged as part of the assets, the balance would have been in his favor. The decree of Judge Aldrich, therefore, must necessarily have been based upon the theory that the real estate was chargeable with the legacies, and as there was no appeal from that decree, the question was finally determined, at least so far as the parties to that case are concerned.

It is true that none of the plaintiffs in the present case, except Samuel R. Moore, were parties to that case, but they are claiming here solely through S. R. Moore, and if he is estopped, they are so too. They can only claim whatever rights S. R. Moore may have, and as it has been already adjudged, by a court of competent jurisdiction, in a proper proceeding, that his rights are subordinate to those of the appellants, they can take in this proceeding nothing more than the rights so adjudged to S. R. Moore.

2nd. Respondents contend that, even if it be conceded that the legacies constitute a charge upon the real estate devised by the residuary clause of the will, yet that S. R. Moore having been charged in the accounting with the full value of the real estate, he has been made to pay the estate of John S. Moore the full value thereof, and has thus acquired an absolute right thereto freed from the charge of the legacies. We do not *see how this position can be maintained. The main object of the accounting was to ascertain whether sufficient assets had gone into the hands of the executor to enable him to pay the debts and legacies, and the fact that the value of such assets, including the real estate, has been charged in the account against the executor certainly does not constitute him a purchaser of such assets until he has paid the debts and legacies chargeable thereon. Under the terms of the will, as we have construed it, he had no claim upon any of the assets until all of the debts and legacies were paid; and as the account shows that a sufficient amount of assets did go into his hands to pay both debts and legacies, it is quite clear that such assets in his hands are liable to pay whatever balances have been found due the legatees, before any portion thereof can be claimed by him as his individual property.

*107

Finally, it is contended that S. R. Moore, the executor, upon the principle of subrogation, is entitled first to be reimbursed the amounts advanced by him in paying the debts of the testator, before the legatees can claim anything. Without questioning the legal principle upon which this position is based, it appears to us to be without any foundation in fact. There is not only no proof that the executor has advanced from his own funds money to pay the debts of the testator, but the proof is conclusive the other way. On the accounting a devastavit has been fixed upon him, as is conclusively shown by the fact that the decree is against him not only as executor, but individually, and how, under these circumstances, he can claim to be in advance of the estate we are at a loss to conceive. If he was in advance of the estate then, clearly no decree should have gone against him individually; and the fact that such a decree has been rendered against him, from which there was no appeal, is conclusive of the fact that he could not be in advance of the estate.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the views herein announced.

---

22 S. C. *108

*WILKS v. WALKER.

(April Term, 1884.)

[Reported and Annotated in 53 Am. Rep. 706.]

[1. Assignments for Benefit of Creditors ⇨23.]

The manifest object of section 2014 of the general statutes is to prevent an insolvent debtor from transferring or assigning his property for the benefit of one or more creditors to the exclusion of others, and whether this object is sought to be effected by a formal deed of assignment or in any other mode, can make no difference.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Austin, Nichols & Co. v. Morris, 23 S. C. 405, 407; Lamar v. Pool, 26 S. C. 445, 447, 2 S. E. 322; Magovern & Co. v. Richard, 27 S. C. 285, 3 S. E. 340; Putney v. Friesleben, 32 S. C. 494, 496, 11 S. E. 337; Archer v. Long, 38 S. C. 281, 16 S. E. 998; Armstrong v. Hurst, 39 S. C. 504, 18 S. E. 150; Leake v. Anderson, 43 S. C. 455, 21 S. E. 439; Porter v. Stricker, 44 S. C. 189, 21 S. E.

635; Perkins v. Douglass, 52 S. C. 133, 29 S. E. 400; Secrest v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 68 S. C. 381, 47 S. E. 680.

For other cases, see Assignments for Benefit of Creditors, Cent. Dig. §§ 75–77; Dec. Dig. ⟸23.]

[2. Assignments for Benefit of Creditors ⟸ 104.]

Where an insolvent debtor transfers all of his property to one creditor by means of a chattel mortgage and, at a later date, by a bill of sale and a deed of conveyance, all under a design originally determined on by himself and the favored creditor, for the benefit of such creditor and another, to the exclusion of all other creditors, the transaction is void because in violation of the statute that prohibits assignments for the benefit of creditors from giving preferences.

Mr. Chief Justice Simpson dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Verner v. McGhee, 26 S. C. 249, 2 S. E. 113; Lamar v. Pool, 26 S. C. 441, 2 S. E. 322; Meinhard Bros. & Co. v. Strickland, 29 S. C. 495, 497, 7 S. E. 838; McGahan v. Crawford, 47 S. C. 582, 25 S. E. 123.

For other cases, see Assignments for Benefit of Creditors, Cent. Dig. §§ 354, 355; Dec. Dig. ⟸104.]

[This case is also cited in South Carolina Loan & Trust Co. v. McPherson, 26 S. C. 436, 2 S. E. 267; Lamar v. Pool, 26 S. C. 446, 2 S. E. 322; Magovern & Co. v. Richard, 27 S. C. 284, 3 S. E. 340; Meinhard Bros. & Co. v. Strickland, 29 S. C. 497, 7 S. E. 838; Threatt v. Brewer Mining Co., 49 S. C. 130, 26 S. E. 970, without specific application, and in Verner v. McGhee, 26 S. C. 250, 251, 2 S. E. 113; Hairston v. Hairston, 35 S. C. 306, 14 S. E. 634, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Fraser, J., Chester, October, 1883.

The opinion sufficiently states the case. The appeal was taken upon the following exceptions:

1. Because his honor ruled and decided that the following question propounded by the attorney for the defendants to Addison F. Kitchens, a witness for the plaintiff, on cross-examination, to wit: What property did you own on the 5th day of October, 1882? was incompetent and irrelevant.

2. Because his honor refused to allow or require the said witness to answer the said question.

Messrs. Patterson & Gaston, for appellants, cited General Statutes, ch. 72, §§ 2014–16; 1 McCord Ch., 441; Bump Fr. Conv., 355–6; Burr. Ass., 495–500; 30 Ala., 199; 22 Pick., 269; 8 Iowa, 96; 42 Me., 445; 12 S. C., 5; 13 Id., 368; 22 Pick., 275.

Mr. John M. McNeel, contra.

At common law, a debtor may prefer one creditor to another. 1 McCord Ch., 441, 475; 1 Bail., 571; Rice Ch., 7, 300; 2 Hill Ch., 444; 2 S. C., 354. This right has been taken away only where there is an assignment for the benefit of creditors generally. An assignment is a transfer in trust to pay creditors; *a formal paper with certain essential parts. Dudley, 51. The papers in question here are not such an assignment. Bump. Fr. Conv., 330; 10 Paige, 445; 1 Coms., 201; 3 Sumn., 345; 4 Watts & S., 383; 7 Id., 335; 23 Pick., 446; 13 N. H., 298; 10 Conn., 280; 26 Vt., 686; 18 Ga., 668; 2 Metc., 99; 3 S. C., 266. This action has nothing to do with the land of Kitchens, and these several papers cannot be construed together. If they were, the statute makes void assignments giving preferences, that is, where the deed of assignment by its own terms declares a preference. Whatever the law ought to be, this case is not reached by the law as it is. The court can only say, ita lex scripta est; and should carefully avoid the evils of judicial legislation.

*109

January 6, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. On October 5, 1882, one A. F. Kitchens, being indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of fifteen hundred and forty-three dollars, a large portion of which had been antecedently contracted, executed a mortgage on sundry articles of personal property, including the cotton which is the subject matter of the present controversy, to secure the payment of said debt on or before the first day of January, 1883. On February 10, 1883, the said Kitchens, in consideration of said indebtedness, and of a credit of fourteen hundred and ninety-eight dollars on the mortgage debt, executed a bill of sale for the property mentioned in the mortgage to the plaintiff—all of the cotton having been ginned and packed in bales, except so much thereof as was estimated to be sufficient to pay certain agricultural liens held by Barber & Drennan, the payment of which was assumed by the plaintiff. On or about February 23, 1883, the said cotton was seized by the defendant Walker as sheriff under a warrant of attachment issued by the defendants, Cousar & Son, against the said Kitchens, and upon repeated demands made therefor by the plaintiff he refused to deliver it up to the plaintiff. On April 5, 1883, the said sheriff levied upon the cotton under an execution obtained in the case in which the above mentioned warrant had been issued, and a bond of indemnity having been executed to him by Cousar & Son, with the de*fendant, Allen Beard, as surety, he sold the same to Cousar & Son, they being the highest bidders therefor. Whereupon this action was brought to recover the value of the said cotton.

*110

The defendants, in their answer, allege that on October 5, 1882, the said Kitchens was insolvent, and that plaintiff had good reason to believe that he was so, and that the transfers of property above mentioned embraced all of the personal property of the said Kitchens subject to execution: and that on the same day the said Kitchens conveyed to the plaintiff all his real estate subject to execution, in consideration that the plaintiff would pay an antecedent debt due to the estate of Robert Patterson by the said Kitchens, and they therefore claim that these transactions between the plaintiff and Kitchens were in violation of section 2014 of the general statutes and therefore void.

At the trial, defendant's counsel proposed to ask Kitchens, while on the stand as a witness, the following question: "What property did you own on the 5th day of October, 1882?" which, upon objection being interposed by the counsel for plaintiff, "the presiding judge stated that he would have preferred to meet the question on a demurrer to the answer, but thought he ought to meet it in the shape he found it; that he thought the answer, if made out by the testimony, was no valid defence to the plaintiff's case, and that he would treat the matter in the same way he would have done if there had been a demurrer to the answer, for want of facts sufficient to prove a defence. The point to which the question was directed, and it was so conceded, was to establish the facts set out in paragraph VII. of the answer, which transactions it was claimed constituted such an assignment as was contrary to the provisions of chapter LXXII., section 2014, of the general statutes of this state, and therefore void."

The Circuit judge ruled that the said question was incompetent and irrelevant under the pleadings, and refused to allow or require the witness to answer the question. After this ruling, the defendants, of course, offered no further testimony, and the plaintiff had a verdict. The sole question, therefore, raised by this appeal is as to the correctness of this ruling.

Treating the question as if it arose upon a demurrer to the answer, that being the way in which it was considered by the *Circuit judge, and should be by us, all of the material allegations of the answer must be taken to be true. It is there alleged that at the time of the transactions between the plaintiff and Kitchens the latter was insolvent and the former had good reason to know that fact, and that these transactions "were had and made in pursuance of an original design and intent of the said Addison F. Kitchens and John W. Wilks, determined on by them in the beginning, to transfer and assign all the property of Addison F. Kitchens, subject to execution for debt, to John W. Wilks, for the benefit of the said John W. Wilks and the estate of Robert Patterson, to the exclusion of all the other creditors of the said Addison F. Kitchens."

*111

Assuming these allegations to be true, they amount to an admission that Kitchens and Wilks intended to effect the precise object which is declared to be illegal and absolutely null and void by section 2014 of the general statutes, which reads as follows: "Any assignment by an insolvent debtor of his or her property, for the benefit of his or her creditors, in which any preference or priority is given to any creditor or creditors of the said debtor by the terms of the said assignment over any other creditor or creditors, other than as to debts due to the public, or in which any provision or disposition of the property so assigned is made or directed, other than that the same be distributed among all creditors of the said insolvent debtor equally, in proportion to the amount of their several demands, and without preference or priority of any kind whatsoever, save only as to debts due to the public, and save only as to such creditors as may accept the terms of such assignment and execute a release of their claim against the debtor, and except as hereinafter provided, such assignment shall be absolutely null and void and of no effect whatsoever."

The manifest object of the act is to prevent an insolvent debtor from transferring or assigning his property for the benefit of one or more of his creditors to the exclusion of all others; and whether this object is sought to be effected by a formal deed of assignment, or in any other mode, can make no difference. Any other view, it seems to us, would sacrifice substance to mere form, and enable insolvent debtors, by evasion, to effect a pur*pose declared by statute to be unlawful. The statute is a remedial one, and should be so construed as to suppress the mischief which it was manifestly designed to prevent. It being conceded, as we have seen, that the object of Kitchens and Wilks was, by the means of the papers above referred to, determined on in the outset, to effect an assignment of the property of A. F. Kitchens, who was then insolvent, for the benefit of Wilks and the estate of Patterson, to the exclusion of all the other creditors of Kitchens, the transaction was in violation of the statute, and therefore void.

*112

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I concur upon the additional ground that the conveyance of the land to Wilks, in consideration that he would pay the donor's debt to the Patterson estate, was substantially "an assignment" for the payment of that debt. It has none of the characteristics of a sale pure and simple, but rather of an assignment, in which priority was given to a certain creditor, to the exclusion of all others. It seems to me that if parties could escape the consequences of this just provision of the law, simply by avoiding the use of the word "assignment," the act would soon become a dead letter.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, dissenting. One A. F. Kitchens, an insolvent debtor, being indebted, among others, to the plaintiff, for the purpose of securing said indebtedness, on October 5, 1882, executed and delivered to the plaintiff a paper styled in the complaint a chattel mortgage, conveying to the plaintiff a considerable quantity of personal property—in fact, as is stated, all that Kitchens possessed. This mortgage was regularly recorded, and was executed upon the condition "that if the sum of $1,543, the amount of plaintiff's claim, was not paid by the 1st day of January, 1883, with the interest thereon, then the said plaintiff was empowered to sell the property, or so much thereof as might be necessary to satisfy said indebtedness." On the same day the said Kitchens conveyed to the plaintiff certain real *property, all that he owned, subject to execution for debt, in consideration of thirty-five bales of cotton to be delivered by the plaintiff to the estate of one Robert Patterson, another creditor of Kitchens.

*113

On February 10, 1883, the mortgage debt secured by the chattel mortgage above mentioned, not having been paid, in consideration thereof, and further, the plaintiff having agreed to credit said indebtedness with $1,498.99, Kitchens transferred by bill of sale to the plaintiff the greater part of the property embraced and described in said mortgage, including among other articles a considerable quantity of cotton, some twenty-five bales, then on the railroad platform at Richburg, in said county.

On April 5, 1883, the defendants, Cousar & Son, having obtained a judgment against Kitchens, and having executed an indemnity bond to the sheriff, with the defendant Leard as surety thereto, caused this cotton to be levied and afterwards sold in satisfaction of said judgment, Cousar & Son being the highest bidders, at 9⅝ per pound, the whole purchase amounting to $1,071.45—no part of which was paid to the plaintiff. Under this state of facts, the action below was commenced, the plaintiff having demanded possession of the sheriff more than once before the cotton was sold. In the complaint plaintiff prayed judgment for the sum of $1,071.45, with interest from the day of sale and costs.

The defendants alleged in their answer that Kitchens was insolvent at the time the papers above referred to were executed, and that such being the fact the said papers, covering as they did the entire property, both real and personal, of Kitchens, and making provision for the payment of a debt to the estate of Patterson, another creditor of Kitchens, on the delivery of twenty-five bales of cotton to said estate by the plaintiff, were executed in fraud of chapter 72 of the general statutes in reference to assignments for the benefit of creditors, and therefore void.

At the trial the defendants (endeavoring to sustain the allegations in the answer, i. e., that Kitchens had embraced all of his property in the conveyances to the plaintiff), when Kitchens was on the stand as a witness, propounded to him the following question, i. e., "What property did you own on the 5th of October, *1882?" Upon objection, this question was ruled incompetent and irrelevant under the pleadings, the Circuit judge holding that, admitting the truth of the allegations interposed in the defence, yet they would constitute a legal defence, as the transactions therein charged, even if true, were not violative of chapter 72 of the general statutes. Upon this ruling, no further evidence was offered, and a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff for the sum of $899.98. The appeal assigns error to this ruling.

*114

The sole question, therefore, before us is, Do the facts of the case, as herein above stated, bring the case under the provisions of chapter 72 of the general statutes? If so, the appeal must be sustained, otherwise the judgment below must be affirmed. We will confine ourselves to this question, anything further would be obiter and misleading.

Chapter 72 of the general statutes contains twelve sections, and it is entitled "Of assignments for the benefit of creditors." The most important sections, and the only ones necessary to be considered here, are sections 2014 and 2015. Section 2014 imperatively forbids an insolvent debtor from giving a preference to any one creditor over another in any assignment made for the benefit of creditors, except to the public, and to such creditors as may release their claims upon accepting the terms of the assignment; and it declares that any assignment executed by an insolvent debtor, with a preference other than as stated, shall be absolutely null and void. Section 2015 provides that if any insolvent person shall, within ninety days before the execution of an assignment for the benefit of creditors, prefer one debtor, by procuring or suffering any part of his property to be attached, sequestered, or seized in execution in his behalf, or makes any payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance of any part of his property, &c., &c., the person securing such payment, pledge, &c., having cause to believe that such debtor is insolvent, the same shall be void; and the assignee may recover the said property, or the value of it, from the person so benefited.

It is hardly necessary to refer to authorities for the position that a debtor, as a general rule, may pay one creditor in advance and in preference of another. Nor can it be denied that he can sell and transfer his property, in part or in whole, as he may *desire, without consulting, and even in defiance of, his creditors, provided the transaction is based upon a sufficient consideration and is bona fide. This acknowledged right springs from that recognized dominion which every person has over his own property, and which is so necessary to the pursuits and duties of life. It is true that it is difficult to harmonize this dominion of the debtor with the just claims of creditors in all cases, and sometimes injustice no doubt is done in the application of the above principle. Yet, as a general principle of law, it has been long established and is well recognized.

*115

Where, however, a man becomes insolvent, and he finds it necessary to surrender his property, in whole or in part, to his creditors, either voluntarily or by force of law, equity demands that creditors of all grades and classes should come in for a share of his estate, and all insolvent laws should be enacted to this end. The act under discussion seems to have recognized this principle, and was based upon it. But this act does not undertake to repeal the common law right referred to above except to the extent of prohibiting a preference within ninety days prior to the execution of an assignment for the benefit of creditors generally. At any time before ninety days prior to such assignment the right of debtors is the same since the act as before its passage.

This does not seem to be denied by the appellants, and it is not contended by them that the mere fact that Kitchens preferred the plaintiff in the mortgage and bill of sale of his personal property, and that he made provision for the payment of the estate of Patterson in the sale of his real estate to the plaintiff, per se renders said sales invalid and void. These sales, if regarded as ordinary transactions, and governed by the common principles in such cases, if founded upon valuable considerations and bona fide, would be unimpeachable. It is, however, urged that all of these papers must be considered together as one transaction, and it is insisted that when so considered they constitute in substance an assignment for the benefit of creditors, and a preference being given therein to the plaintiff and to the estate of Patterson over other creditors, they must be held void under the express terms of the act. If this be the proper construction of these papers, then this position of appellants is well founded.

*116

*But can such construction be sustained? Do these papers, when considered as a unity, amount to an assignment for the benefit of creditors, with a preference expressed in favor of the plaintiff and the estate of Patterson over all other creditors, and therefore in violation of section 2014 of the act? There is no pretence that the other section, 2015 has been violated, as there is no allegation of a sale or transfer by Kitchens within ninety days previous to the execution of the papers relied on as constituting the assignment, the position being, that all of the papers must be regarded as one transaction, and in that way constituting an assignment. Nor can it be seriously urged that these papers, when united and considered as one instrument, with the provisions in each examined as if contained in a single paper, are characterized with the form or any of the features of a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, such an assignment as the act under consideration was intended to regulate and control.

When these instruments are examined separately, the first is a mortgage in form and in all of its features, and was intended to secure the payment of a single debt to a single creditor; the second is an ordinary conveyance of real estate upon the consideration that the purchaser would pay a debt of the grantor to a third party, a valuable and legal consideration, and the third is a bill of sale of a portion of the property embraced in the mortgage, in payment of the debt intended to be thus secured. When taken together, they amount to a sale and conveyance by Kitchens to the plaintiff of the property therein described, upon a sufficient consideration and upon a fair and just valuation, there being no allegation that the debts secured and paid were fictitious, or that the property was taken by the plaintiff at an undervalue. In an assignment for the benefit of creditors it is usual to name the creditors specifically and individually, or at least to provide for them as a class, and generally an assignee is nominated and appointed, who upon accepting the appointment becomes a trustee, holding for the creditors who are cestui que trusts, and who are invested with rights under and by virtue of the assignment, which they must seek either through or against the assignee, as the facts may require.

Now, there is not an expression in either of the papers, when *considered singly or together, which indicates that it was the purpose of Kitchens to execute an assignment for the benefit of his creditors generally, under the act of assembly above. No creditors are named either individually or as a class, otherwise than as in an ordinary sale. No assignee is nominated or appointed, nor do the papers possess a single feature in form of an assignment. On the contrary, as we have already stated, nothing more appears than a sale by an insolvent debtor of his entire property to one of his creditors, in consideration of an antecedent debt due said creditor and the payment by said creditor of a debt due another creditor; the effect of which transaction, it is true, is to place the property beyond the reach of all other creditors. Such a transaction may or may not be fraudulent at common law and under the statutes of Elizabeth, dependent upon the fact of its bona fides, but it cannot be ...ed under chapter 72 of the general ...tes, as the main feature which that act requires to be present in order to be applicable is absent, i. e., an assignment for the benefit of creditors.

*117

The appellants in their argument seem to feel the force of this position when they urge that the transaction, if not against the letter of the act, is certainly against its spirit, insisting that it is a patent evasion of the manifest purpose of the act. This may or may not be true, but yet the act is specific in its terms, and describes in well understood and in precise language the class to which its sections are intended to apply, and this court cannot enlarge its provisions by embracing other classes under the light of what may be termed the spirit of the act. This would be judicial legislation instead of judicial construction. The latter power we possess, but not the former.

It was urged by appellants, as a second position, "that the transactions were void under the provisions of 13th and 27th Elizabeth." This question was not raised in the pleadings, nor was it made before the Circuit judge, or ruled upon by him. It cannot, therefore, be considered here. Whether the dealings between Kitchens and the plaintiff were fraudulent at common law or under the statutes of Elizabeth, which in substance were but legislative declarations of the common law, depend upon altogether different facts and circumstances from those which would *render them invalid under chapter 72 of the general statutes. The appellants in this case have seen proper in their pleadings to rest their defence on the provisions of the latter act, and they must stand or fall upon the case as made.

*118

With these views I am unable to concur with the majority of the court, and this is filed as a dissenting opinion.

Judgment reversed.

---

22 S. C. 118

WALDROP v. LEONARD.

(April Term, 1884.)

[Parties ⇐96.]

Where there is a misnomer in defendant's name, but the summons is served on the party intended and he fails to appear and object to the misnomer, and suffers judgment to be obtained by default, he is concluded; and in all future litigation, he may be connected with the judgment by proper averments.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Genobles v. West, 23 S. C. 167; Benson v. Carrier, 28 S. C. 122, 5 S. E. 272; Simmons Bros. v. Cochran, 29 S. C. 34, 6 S. E. 859; State v. Scheper, 33 S. C. 575, 11 S. E. 623, 12 S. E. 564, 816.

For other cases, see Parties, Cent. Dig. § 177; Dec. Dig. ⇐96.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Spartanburg, April, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. J. S. R. Thomson and McCrary & Calvert, for appellants.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, contra.

January 6, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The plaintiff undertook to sue one Jonas P. Leonard for an alleged trespass. The writ was issued against James P. Leonard, but served on Jonas. Upon being served he went to a lawyer to file his answer, when it was discovered that the defendant named in the writ was James, and not Jonas Leonard, and thereupon he made no appearance or answer, and the verdict was rendered for the plaintiff by default. Judgment and execution were issued on the verdict against James P. Leonard, and the execution returned "unsatisfied."

About that time it was discovered that the name of the party intended to be sued was Jonas P. Leonard, and the plaintiff, desiring to take out supplementary proceedings against him, A. *B. Calvert, Esq., one of his attorneys, made the usual affidavit, and an order was obtained requiring "Jonas P. Leonard, alias James P. Leonard, to appear and answer concerning his property," &c. A copy of this order was served on Jonas P. Leonard, who appeared and denied "that he had been served in any case in which the plaintiff had obtained judgment against him, or that he had ever been known by any other name than Jonas P. Leonard. The deputy sheriff proved that Jonas P. Leonard was the party served in the action of trespass; that afterwards Leonard said that he had gone to his lawyer to prepare his answer, when it was discovered that the summons ran against James Leonard, and they concluded to pay no attention to the proceedings.

*119

The plaintiff's attorney moved for leave to amend the judgment and execution by inserting the name of Jonas in place of that of James P. Leonard. This Jonas P. Leonard's attorney resisted, and moved for an order declaring the judgment absolutely void as against him, and dismissing the supplementary proceedings, which latter order was granted by the Circuit judge, and the plaintiff appeals to this court, alleging error: "I. In ruling that the judgment was absolutely void, and the record thereof not subject to amendment. II. In refusing to rule that Jonas P. Leonard was estopped from denying himself the party defendant in said judgment. III. In ruling that supplementary proceedings would not lie on account of the misnomer. IV. In not allowing Jonas P. Leonard to be examined regarding his property. V. In dismissing the proceedings herein supplementary to execution."

There is no doubt whatever that the action would have been dismissed if Jonas P. Leonard, when served with the summons addressed to James, had made the objection of misnomer to set aside the service, by answer, in lieu of the former plea in abatement. Norris v. Graves, 4 Strob., 32; Bull v. Franklin, 2 Speers, 46. It is equally clear that if Jonas had answered to the merits, he would be held to have waived the objection of error in the process served upon him. Myers v. Sealy, 5 Rich., 476. But it is not so clear as to what should be the result where one person, served with a complaint issued against another, makes no *appearance, objection, or answer; but simply disregards the proceeding as no concern of his.

*120

It is certainly remarkable how little can be found in the reports upon this precise point. The cases are numerous as to what is and what is not a fatal misnomer when the parties in the case make the question; but we have been referred to no case in this state where the misnomer was in the name of the party intended to be sued, and he disregarded it as not binding him. There are some authorities outside of the state, but they are not only conflicting, but absolutely contradictory. For instance, Mr. Freeman says: "The weight of authority is that if the writ is served on the party by a wrong name, intended to be sued, and he fails to appear and plead the misnomer in abatement, and suffers judgment to be obtained, he is concluded, and in all future litigation may be connected with the suit or judgment by proper averments," &c. Freem. Judg., § 154. While Mr. Wait says: "If the defendant appears and does not set up this defence in his answer, he will be deemed to have waived the objection. But a failure to appear and defend does not deprive the defendant of the right to prevent the sale of his property on an execution not directed against it. Thus where a defendant sued by a wrong name fails to appear in the action, he does not waive his right to object to the misnomer even after judgment and execution." 1 Wait Prac., 473; 32 Barb., 277.

This wide difference of opinion seems to arise out of the view which is taken as to whether error in the summons as to the defendant's name should be considered as a mere misnomer, or as going deeper and touching the very jurisdiction of the Court. It is familiar doctrine that there can be no binding judgment against a party, unless the court has jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. Does service upon a party by the wrong Christian name bring the person so served within the jurisdiction of the court, where he is himself entirely passive, doing no act that can be construed into a waiver, as appearing and answering, &c.?

As before stated, the authorities are not in accord, but all the authorities hold that it is the duty of the party served to inform *the court of the error and have the service discharged; and it would seem to follow that there should be some liability on his part for omitting to do so, and that when the party intended is served, the proper principle is announced in one of the oldest cases on the subject. Crawford v. Satchwell, 2 Strange, 1218 (18 Geo. II.). In that case the defendant, whose real name was Arthur Satchwell, was sued in trespass by the name of Archibold Satchwell. Held, "that if the defendant omits to plead misnomer, he may be taken in execution by the wrong name."

*121

Doo v. Butcher, 3 T. R., 611 (1790), was a rule calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the proceedings should not be set aside for irregularity, because the declaration was against the defendant by the name of Thomas, and that in which he was served was John: held, "that if the plaintiff sue defendant by a wrong Christian name and the defendant appear by his right name, the plaintiff may declare against him by the right name; secus, if the plaintiff file common bail for him, according to the statute by his right name."

Corbett v. Bates, 3 T. R., 660 (1790), held that "if the latitat be sued out against the defendant by one Christian name, and the alias by another, and the plaintiff afterwards proceeds, the court will set aside the proceedings for irregularity."

Cole v. Hindson, 6 T. R., 234 (1795), holds that "if a defendant be sued by the wrong Christian name and fails to appear to the action, he is not concluded." In this case Lord Kenyon said that in the case from Strange, above cited, the party had appeared in the original action, but this does not appear from the report of the case.

Oakley v. Giles, 3 East., 167 (1802), holds that "if a defendant be sued with process by a wrong Christian name, and afterwards the plaintiff enter an appearance for him, and serve him with notice of declaration by his right name and proceeds to judgment and execution, the court will not set aside the proceedings for irregularity merely on the ground that the defendant never appeared; because he ought to have pleaded such misnomer in abatement." The defendant was, however, let in to defend upon payment of costs, and upon affidavits that he was misled by advice of counsel, and of merits in the case.

*122

*Smith v. Bowker, 1 Mass., 76 (1804), holds that "mistakes in the addition of place, must be pleaded in abatement; and cannot be ground for maintaining trespass against an officer who serves an execution issuing on the judgment." In that case one Samuel Switzer brought an action against Aaron Smith on a note, which was admitted to have been signed by Smith, but in the writ as well as in the judgment and execution obtained thereunder, he was described as Aaron Smith of "Orange," in the county of Hampshire, whereas in fact he was of "Athol," in the county of Worcester. It appeared that the summons for his appearance was left at the residence of Smith in Athol in the county of Worcester. Under the execution issued upon the judgment thus obtained, the defendant, as deputy sheriff, levied on certain cattle of Smith, and this action was brought for trespass in seizing the property of Smith under an execution against Aaron Smith of Orange in the county of Hampshire. The court held as above, saying: "If he was not properly described in the writ, he should have taken advantage of the mistake by plea in abatement. This he did not do, but permitted judgment to be rendered against him." And the only authority cited is the case of Crawford v. Satchwell, 2 Strange, supra.

Delanoy v. Cannon, 10 East., 328 (1808), holds that "after a writ sued out and common bail filed against a defendant by the name of 'J,' it is irregular for the plaintiff to declare against him by the name of 'R,' sued by the name of 'J,' and the defendant may set aside the proceeding before plea." The court, in answer to plaintiff's counsel, who relied upon Oakley v. Giles, supra, observed that "the application to set aside the proceedings for irregularity was not made until after judgment and when the defendant might have before pleaded in abatement; but here it is before plea." This would seem to indicate that if the motion had not been made before plea or until after judgment, the motion would not have been entertained. The case of Summers v. Wason, 1 Bos. & P., 105, was cited as authority.

Dring v. Dickenson, 11 East., 225 (1809), holds that "if a defendant be served with a writ by a wrong Christian name of 'W,' and do not appear to it, the plaintiff cannot file common bail for him in his right name of

*123

'E,' sued by the name of 'W,' *nor declare against him de bene esse in that form, and the proceedings were set aside for irregularity after interlocutory judgment signed for want of a plea." This decision was made by a court very nearly identical as to the judges with that which had previously decided Oakley v. Giles and Delanoy v. Cannon, supra; and although these cases were cited and relied on by counsel, no notice is taken of them in the decision of the court, and no effort made to distinguish them. In fact, no authority is cited or reasons given by the court. The only distinction apparent between this case and that of Oakley v. Giles is, that here there was only an interlocutory judgment, while there it was final.

Smith v. Patten, 6 Taunt., 115, 1 E. C. L. R., 330 (1815), holds that "where a defendant sued by a wrong name omits to plead in abatement and suffers the plaintiff to proceed to judgment, though he never has appeared to the wrong name, this court will not interfere to set aside the proceedings." In this case, however, it did appear that the plaintiff had addressed a letter to the defendant by the name of Joseph Patten, to which the defendant replied, promising payment of the debt and not complaining of any misnomer. The plaintiff sued him by the name of Joseph Patten, and served him with notice of the declaration, entered an appearance for him (which it appears from some of the cases was authorized by statute) signed interlocutory judgment and executed a writ of inquiry, the defendant during all these proceedings remaining wholly passive, having done no act to countenance them. The motion was to set aside the whole proceeding upon the ground that they were a nullity, the defendant's real name being John and not Joseph, and in support of it the case Greenslade v. Prothero, 2 New R., 132, and Cole v. Hindson, supra, were cited. The counsel for the plaintiff rested his argument upon the fact that the defendant had misled the plaintiff by not noticing the misnomer in the letter addressed to him. "The court did not adopt the argument that the defendant by not noticing the misnomer had misled the plaintiff, but they decided on the ground that the defendant might have pleaded the misnomer in abatement, and that not having availed himself of that opportunity, he could not now come to set aside the proceedings. It would be of the worst consequence if defendants should be permitted, instead *of pleading in abatement, to lie by and increase expenses, and then to move to set aside the proceedings; they therefore refused to interfere." While it does appear by implication that this was an action to recover a debt, from defendant's answer to plaintiff's letter, "promising payment of the debt," yet it does not appear whether the debt was due by open account or by some instrument of writing signed by the defendant. It could hardly have been the latter, for if the debt was represented by a note or bond signed by the defendant, he could have been sued by the name signed, and if signed by his correct name John, it is barely possible that, with the paper before him, the plaintiff would have addressed him as Joseph.

*124

Griswold v. Sedgwick, 6 Cowen, 456 (1826), holds: "If process against the body, out of any court, do not on its face authorize an arrest, it is void, and will not protect any person concerned in the arrest, even the officer to whom directed. Where Daniel S. Griswold was arrested on process of attachment, issued out of the equity side of the Circuit Court of the United States against Samuel S. Griswold: held, that an action of false imprisonment lay by Daniel S. Griswold against the marshal, his deputy, and the solicitors concerned in the arrest, and this, though Daniel S. Griswold was the person intended." This decision is rested on the ground that Daniel S. had not appeared in the action, for if he had, the decision would have been otherwise (citing Cole v. Hindson, 6 T. R., 234; Shadgett v. Clipson, 8 East., 328; Wilkes v. Lorck, 2 Taunt., 400; Scandover v. Warne, 2 Camp., 270; Margans v. Bridges, 1 Barn. & Ald., 647); the court saying, upon the authority of Lord Kenyon in Cole v. Hindson, "that in Crawford v. Satchwell, 2 Strange, 1218, the defendant had appeared, and that the same remark might be made as to Smith v. Bowker, 1 Mass., 76," which fact, however, does not appear in the report of either of the cases. The court also attempts to distinguish the case from that of Reynolds v. Corp, 3 Caines Cas., 267, by the remark that in the latter case the court held that the judgment was not void, but voidable only, and that the sheriff should, therefore, have first applied to have the writ (which is supposed to have been issued in the wrong name) set aside.

Guinard v. Heysinger, 15 Ill., 228 (1853), holds "that if a *party suffers a judgment to pass against him by the wrong name, he is estopped from availing himself of the misnomer in an action on that judgment." There is nothing in the case from which it can be discovered whether the defendant did or did not appear in the original action.

*125

Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How., 404 [15 L. Ed. 451] (1855), was an action brought in Indiana on a judgment obtained in Ohio, and it appeared that the judgment had been recovered in Ohio against the company by an erroneous name; held, that "if the judgment was recovered in Ohio against the company by an erroneous name, but the suit upon the judgment was brought in Indiana against the company, using its chartered name correctly, accompanied with an averment that it was the same company, this mistake is no ground of error. It could only be taken advantage of by a plea in abatement in the suit in which the first judgment was recovered," &c. It is not distinctly stated that the defendant corporation did not appear to the action in which the judgment was recovered against it, in the Commercial Court of Cincinnati, in the state of Ohio, but it is plainly inferrible from what is said in the case, especially from the language of the second ground of objection to the introduction of the record of the Ohio judgment in these words: "Because said judgment record does not show or evidence the service of process upon this defendant as required by law, nor the appearance of this defendant by attorney or otherwise in said action or suit in said Commercial Court, and that said judgment, as a judgment, is therefore a nullity," &c. Of course, if the defendant corporation had appeared and pleaded to the action, this must have appeared in the record. It may be proper to explain also, that the service of process was made upon the agent of the company in Ohio under a law of that state which made it a condition of allowing foreign insurance companies to do business in the state, that they should have an agent there, upon whom process could be served. In delivering the judgment of the court, Mr. Justice Curtis uses this language: "The only question open here is, whether, if a mistake be made in the name of a defendant and he fails to plead it in abatement, the judgment binds him, though called by a wrong name. Of this we have no doubt. Evidence that it was an erroneous name *of the same person must therefore be admissible; otherwise a mistake in the defendant's name, instead of being assailable only by a plea in abatement, would render a judgment wholly inoperative."

*126

Barry v. Carothers, 6 Rich., 332 (1853), one of our own cases, was somewhat like the one just quoted, the principal difference being that in our case the alleged misnomer was in the name of one of the plaintiffs. This was also an action upon a judgment, which had been recovered in North Carolina by a co-partnership in the firm-name of J. H. Barry & Co. The defence was nul tiel record: that Andrew G. Gingles, one of the partners named as a plaintiff, was not the same person called Samuel G. Gingles in the original proceeding in which the judgment was obtained. In delivering the judgment of the court, Judge Wardlaw said: "A name is, however, but the designation of an individual. The judgment in North Carolina establishes the indebtedness to the plaintiff; no death, assignment, nor other change supervening that judgment, could be shown by the plaintiffs here, to maintain their action; and if proof, under proper allegations, that they are in fact the persons who recovered that judgment, should be held not to suffice for the plaintiffs here, the result would be that the defendant in an action on a judgment would make an impenetrable shield of a misnomer, which he waived in the first action when he failed to plead it in abatement."

In Hammond v. People, 32 Ill., 473 (1863), it is said, upon the authority of Ex parte Kellogg, 6 Vt., 511, "That matter in abatement, if there be notice to the defendant in fact, is waived if not pleaded, and cannot be assigned for error." This was said in a case where the party, whose name was Joseph Vacaro (an Italian), had been sued by the name of Joseph only. The right man was served, but made default, and judgment having gone against him, he was arrested under a Ca. Sa.; and this was a proceeding to obtain his discharge under the writ of habeas corpus. At page 472 it is said, after stating the facts as above: "What, under the circumstances, was it his duty to have done? It was to have appeared and pleaded the misnomer in abatement of the suit and give in his name in full."

First National Bank of Baltimore v. Jaggers, 31 Md., 38 (1869), holds that "where a party is served by a wrong name, *and the writ is served on the party intended to be served and he fails to appear and plead the misnomer in abatement, and suffers judgment to be obtained by default against him in the erroneous name, he is concluded, and execution may be issued on the judgment in that name and levied upon the property and effects of the real defendant." In the opinion of the court it is said: "There is no doubt that when a party is sued by a wrong name and he appears to the suit and does not plead the misnomer in abatement, and judgment is rendered against him in the erroneous name, execution may be issued upon it in that name and levied upon the property and effects of the real defendant; but there is some conflict in the decisions, whether the same result will follow if he does not appear and the judgment is obtained by default. The weight of authority, however, is that this makes no difference, and if the writ is served on the party intended to be served, and he fails to appear and plead in abatement, and suffers judgment to be obtained by default, he is concluded, and in all future litigation may be connected with the suit or judgment by proper averments."

*127

The language just quoted is approved and incorporated into section 154 of Freeman on Judgments, which was cited in the beginning of this opinion. We agree that this view is sustained by the weight of authority, extending back certainly to the reign of George II. It is true that there are some New York decisions to the contrary, but it seems to us that they are not sustained by principle, and we do not see that the code should have any effect in that direction, section 194 of which provides that "the court may, before or after judgment, in furtherance of justice and on such terms as may be proper, amend any pleading, process, or proceeding by adding or striking out the name of any party or by correcting a mistake in the name of a party, or a mistake in any other respect; or by inserting other allegations material to the case," &c.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case remanded for such further orders as may be necessary to carry out the conclusion herein announced.

22 S. C. *128

*DAVIS v. SCHMIDT.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Pleading ⇐355.]

A reply without an order of court and alleging no counter-claim, may be improper, but a refusal by the Circuit judge to formally strike it out, is not error of law.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Kingman v. Lancashire Ins. Co., 54 S. C. 602, 32 S. E. 762; Norris v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 57 S. C. 368, 35 S. E. 572.

For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1109; Dec. Dig. ⇐355.]

[2. Judgment ⇐585.]

An issue raised by the lienor under a warrant to enforce an agricultural lien, and an action by such lienor against the lienee for damages for not advancing supplies under the contract of lien, are two distinct actions and not founded upon the same cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1095; Dec. Dig. ⇐585.]

[3. Appeal and Error ⇐1008.]

Findings of fact by the Circuit judge in a law case, tried by him without a jury, cannot be reviewed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ollever v. Duval, 32 S. C. 276, 10 S. E. 1070; Speer v. Meschine, 46 S. C. 511, 24 S. E. 329.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3964; Dec. Dig. ⇐1008.]

Before Aldrich, J., Richland, November, 1883.

This was an action by Calvin Davis against Margaret Schmidt. The Circuit judge rendered the following judgment:

The plaintiff, a negro farmer, on March 6, 1883, entered into an agricultural lien with the defendant, who was to furnish him advances for agricultural purposes to the amount of $200. He complains that the defendant did not keep her part of the contract, whereby he was damaged in the sum of $250. The defendant, in her answer, admits the lien, denies that she refused to furnish supplies, and claims the benefit of a receipt for $150, and that the plaintiff is still indebted to her in a large sum of money, for which suit is now pending. The plaintiff replies to the answer and denies the same.

The facts and merits of the case will more fully appear in the testimony. The plaintiff's statement is that the defendant's husband, by her sanction and as her agent, offered to sell him a mare for $150, which he warranted as a good work animal, and was to advance him $50 worth of provisions, in instalments of ten dollars a month, and wait on him for payment until he made his crop; that on the assurance that the mare was a good work animal, he gave the receipt for $150, and got $8 worth of provisions, and took the mare home; that when he tried to plough her, he found she would not work, but did nothing but paw and kick up; that he carried her back, and the defendant's husband, still acting as her agent took the mare back and offered him a poor mule, which plaintiff was unwilling to receive, but by persuasion he was *induced to try her, and found she was not able to do a half day's work; that he returned the mare, and Schmidt, still acting as his wife's agent, promised to get him a mule; that when he went for the mule, he was refused both the mule and further advances on the crop; that as it was getting late in the season, Mr. Maxcy, from whom he had rented 30 acres of land, said that if he could not get a work animal and advances he would have to take his land back; that after some efforts, he was able to get a mule from Harmon, about March 20; that by his 13 year old boy ploughing the mule, and his daughter ploughing him, the plaintiff was able to get in his cotton by May 25, but could only put in 25 of the 30 acres rented from Mr. Maxcy. He also states that in consequence of the refusal of the defendant to let him have provisions, he was forced to work out for wages to get supplies for his family and farm; that he would have made 12 bales of cotton if he had been able to get in his crop in time, but in consequence of the delay occasioned by defendant he did not make one-half as much as his neighbors.

*129

Mr. Maxcy corroborates plaintiff's statement, and says he ought to have made 8 bales, if he could have got his crop in in time. That Schmidt acts as the agent of his wife, is so considered generally, and was present at the time her husband had the transactions with the plaintiff. Sheriff Rowan said that the husband of the defendant transacts all of her business, and is regarded by the community as her agent. Mrs. Schmidt, the defendant, was examined, but her statement was so unsatisfactory that it made no impression on the court at all favorable to her.

I am satisfied in my own mind, that while Mrs. Schmidt may be a very industrious and hard-working woman, she is simply held out to the community as a blind; her husband is the real actor, and does all the dirty work. My theory of the case is, that learning from Mr. Maxcy that the plaintiff is a hard-working, industrious man, and a good farmer, he tried to put off on him two worthless mares at an extortionate price. Failing in that, he refused to let him have supplies. The only question is, how much has the negro plaintiff been damaged by his conduct? Mr. Maxcy's lowest estimate is that he would have made 8 bales. He made 3. His loss, therefore, is at least 5 bales, which, at *$40 a bale, the lowest price paid, is $200, and it is so adjudged. Let the plaintiff, Calvin Davis, have judgment against the defendant for $200 and costs.

*130

The defendant appealed upon the exceptions set forth in the opinion.

January 10, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, respondent, in March, 1883, gave an agricultural lien to the defendant, who was to furnish advances for agricultural purposes to the amount of $200. The plaintiff complains that defendant did not keep her part of the contract, having failed to furnish the advances agreed upon, to his damage $250. The defendant in her answer admits the lien, but denies that she refused to furnish the supplies, and claims that she holds a receipt for $150, advanced in money, and that there is due her a large sum by the plaintiff, for which she has instituted suit, now pending. To this answer the plaintiff filed a reply, in which he denied the advance of $150 in money, but admits that he gave a receipt for $150, alleging that this receipt was given for a mare valued at that sum, which mare defendant warranted to be suitable for the purposes for which she was bought; which proved to be untrue. He further admitted that there was a proceeding pending in the Court of Common Pleas, under the provisions of the agricultural lien law (his crop having been levied upon) under which he had raised the issue of the amount due.

At the trial the defendant moved to strike out the different paragraphs of this reply on various grounds. He also demurred to so much thereof as admitted the pending action on the "ground of insufficiency, because the defendant in her answer alleged that there was an action then pending between the same parties under this lien, which, being admitted by the plaintiff, shows that he had no right to bring this action; and further, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because the plaintiff in his reply admits his indebtedness to the defendant, and that he had previously applied to the court to determine the amount."

*131

The Circuit judge reserved his opinion *upon the motion and demurrer, and the trial proceeded before him on the merits. At the conclusion of the testimony, he decreed that plaintiff have judgment for $200 and costs.

The defendant has appealed upon ten exceptions: "1. Because his honor erred in not striking out paragraphs 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the reply. 2. Because he did not dismiss the complaint when the plaintiff admitted in his reply that there was another action pending between the same parties for the same cause. 3. Because the plaintiff having admitted that he was indebted to the defendant and that action had been instituted by him to determine the amount under the agricultural lien, his honor should have dismissed the complaint. 4. Because his honor erred in not stating his conclusions of law submitted in the motions and demurrers. 5. Because his honor erred in decreeing that the only question is, how much the negro plaintiff has been damaged. 6. Because his honor erred in decreeing that Margaret Schmidt was liable to $200 damages and costs, after finding as matter of fact that it was by the conduct of Frederick Schmidt that the damage was caused, he being no party to the action. 7. Because his honor erred in decreeing as matter of law that the agency of Frederick was legally established by his being so regarded by the community. 8. Because his honor erred in judicially fixing the lowest price of a bale of cotton to be forty dollars, and basing the amount of damages on such estimate, when no evidence had been introduced to prove the lowest value of a bale of cotton to be forty dollars even. 9. Because his honor erred in finding that the plaintiff would have made five bales of cotton on five acres of land, if he had planted them, when, as matter of fact, he only made three bales of cotton on twenty-five acres which he did plant, the land all being about equal. 10. Because the judgment is erroneous, over forty dollars costs having been taxed up without notice to the defendant."

The case was submitted upon the pleadings, testimony, and exceptions, without argument, either oral or printed, and without reference to any authority; counsel should not be surprised, therefore, if the court has failed to see the pertinency and force of many of the exceptions. In addition to this, notwithstanding the case was one at law, and consequently as we have often said *in such cases, could involve on appeal only questions of law, yet several questions of fact are raised in the exceptions. These questions cannot be considered, as the authority of this court under the constitution in cases at law extends only to errors at law, made through omission or commission, and properly brought before us.

*132

We see no error of law in the Circuit judge failing to rule on the motion and demurrer interposed by the defendant to the reply of plaintiff. It is true the reply was not put in under the provisions of the code, there being no statement that a reply was ordered by the court on account of new matter in the answer constituting a defence by way of avoidance. Nor was there a counter-claim set up in the answer requiring a reply. Code, §§ 174, 175. The reply therefore was wholly unnecessary and perhaps improper, but we do not see that it should have been formally stricken out. In fact, the motion to strike out certain portions of it was not made on the ground of improper pleading, but upon other grounds. This motion, as well as the reply, as far as we can ascertain from the meagre statement in the case submitted, seems to have been ignored by the Circuit judge, and the case was tried by him on its merits, independent of the reply. Besides, the reply amounted to nothing but a denial in substance that the defendant had furnished the plaintiff $150 in money under the agricultural lien, as alleged in the answer, and which the plaintiff no doubt would have had the right to deny by testimony without the reply, in the issue raised by the complaint and the answer.

As to the demurrer based on the 5th paragraph of the reply, we have not discovered that there was a pending action between the same parties for the same cause, when the action below was commenced. There appear to be two actions going on between these parties, it is true, but they are not founded upon the same cause. In the first, the defendant here is the plaintiff endeavoring to enforce an agricultural lien for alleged advances, in which the plaintiff in this action has, under the special proceeding provided in the lien law for that purpose, raised the question of the amount due. Gen. Stat., § 2398. In the other, the plaintiff here has instituted suit to recover damages for the breach of defendant's *contract to furnish the supplies agreed upon, on account of which he alleges that he failed to make the crop which he could have made if these supplies had been furnished.

*133

Disregarding, then, the reply, and the motion and demurrer made thereupon, the only real question in the case was one of fact, i. e., "whether the plaintiff had been damaged." This question might have been submitted to a jury, had the parties demanded it, but it was tried by the judge, by consent, as we suppose, and being a case at law his finding of fact is beyond our review, as would have been the finding of the jury, had the jury tried the case, both as to the fact of damages and its amount, based upon the price of a bale of cotton, and the number of bales the plaintiff might have made on five acres of land, had he planted them, referred to in exceptions 8 and 9.

We do not see the pertinency of the exceptions 6 and 7, founded upon the remarks of the Circuit judge as to the agency of Frederick Schmidt, defendant's husband.

Exception 10 raises an objection as to the amount of costs taxed in the case. The Circuit judge made no ruling as to the amount of the costs. He simply adjudged damages to the plaintiff with costs. In this there was no error. If too much has been taxed, of which we have no means of knowing from anything that appears in the case, yet this could not have resulted from the rulings of the court.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 133

SMYTHE v. TOLBERT.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Ejectment ⟸15, 90.]

In action for recovery of land, plaintiff need not trace his title back beyond a common source; when it is not admitted in the pleadings that both parties do claim under such common source, it is then a question of fact to be determined by the evidence. Martin v. Ranlett, 5 Rich., 541 [57 Am. Dec. 770], recognized and followed.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Rhett v. Jenkins, 25 S. C. 458; Bradley v. Drayton, 48 S. C. 243, 245, 26 S. E. 613; Thomas v. Dempsey, 53 S. C. 221, 31 S. E. 231; Bryce v. Cayce, 62 S. C. 563, 40 S. E. 948; Kilgore v. Kirkland, 69 S. C. 84, 48 S. E. 44; Bethea v. Allen, 95 S. C. 484, 79 S. E. 639.

For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 59, 254; Dec. Dig. ⟸15, 90.]

[2. Evidence ⟸271.]

Declarations by defendant that he claimed title under S. (a common source) were admissible in evidence against him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1078; Dec. Dig. ⟸271.]

*134

[3. Appeal and Error ⟸1050.]

*The admission of incompetent testimony that could not have affected the result, is not sufficient ground for reversing the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Wardlaw & Edwards v. Rayford, 27 S. C. 186, 3 S. E. 71.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1068, 1069, 4153–4157, 4166; Dec. Dig. ⟸1050.]

Before Aldrich, J., Edgefield, October, 1883.

This was an action by J. Ellison Smythe against John R. Tolbert. The case was brought to this court upon the following exceptions: "1. Because his honor erred in admitting any testimony as to any claim of title by the defendant, John R. Tolbert, to the land in dispute; there being no such claim set up in the pleadings when they were submitted to the jury. 2. Because his honor erred in admitting the testimony of O. Sheppard, Esq., as to a claim of title by the defendant, John R. Tolbert, to the land in dispute, without requiring the deed, under which said claim is alleged to have been made, to be first produced or its loss accounted for; said deed being the highest evidence of said claim of title. 3. Because there was no competent proof of title claimed by the defendant, John R. Tolbert, to the land in dispute, such as to show that such title came from a common source with that of the plaintiff. 4. Because defendant having set up no claim of title to the land, and having denied the title of the plaintiff, his honor erred in refusing to charge the jury that the plaintiff could not recover in this case without proving a perfect title—tracing it to a grant from the state, or a presumed grant. 5. Because his honor erred in not instructing the jury that plaintiff had failed to prove a perfect title in himself to the land in dispute. 6. Because the plaintiff failed to prove such title in himself as would trace his title to a common source with a title of the defendant. 7. Because, if the defendant does not set up a claim of title to the land in dispute, the plaintiff cannot set it up for him, and the defendant may rely upon his defence of denial of title in plaintiff, and his honor erred in refusing to instruct the jury accordingly."

Mr. A. J. Norris, for appellant, cited 1 Tread. Con. R., 90, 125; 1 McMull., 450; 5 Rich., 545; 9 S. C., 440; 15 Id., 263; 17 Id., 89; 19 Id., 411; 7 Wheat., 547.

Messrs. Sheppard Bros., contra, cited 5 Rich., 541; 1 Hill, 382; 1 Strobh., 1; 2 Rich., 581; 12 Id., 474; 3 Strobh., 367.

*135

*January 10, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, respondent, brought the action below to recover possession of a certain tract of land situate in Edgefield County, and for damages for the unlawful withholding thereof. The defendant, appellant, denied respondent's title, and the case at the trial turned upon the question of title.

The respondent relied upon the following papers as evidence of title, to wit, a deed from Johnson & Leopold to one J. L. Shumate, sheriff's deed to Leopold, a mortgage from Shumate to George H. Walter & Co., the foreclosure of this mortgage and a deed from the master of foreclosure sale to the respondent. Some days before the trial an agreement was entered into between the attorneys of respondent and appellant as follows: "We agree to admit the execution of the deeds to be offered in this case by the plaintiff, to wit, mortgage by J. L. Shumate to George H. Walter & Co., and deeds of J. D. Johnson and F. M. Leopold & Leopold to J. L. Shumate, and sheriff's to the Leopolds. Also deed from the master to Smythe—four papers. Also execution of deed from J. L. Shumate to J. R. Tolbert, defendant's deed." This paper was submitted to the court by the plaintiff as evidence.

The plaintiff here introduced as a witness O. Sheppard, Esq., one of his attorneys, who testified that the defendant Tolbert told him that he had bought the land in dispute from J. L. Shumate, under whom plaintiff claims, and that he had a deed from Shumate; that during the litigation to foreclose the mortgage of Shumate to Walter & Co., and up to the present time this deed had never been recorded, and, further, that defendant Tolbert told him that when he bought the land from Shumate, Shumate assured him that the said mortgage had been satisfied, and that thereby Shumate had fooled him. He further testified that he had seen the deed from Shumate to Tolbert, and that it was junior to the mortgage to Walter & Co.; and, further, that at the foreclosure sale the defendant Tolbert was present and competed in the bidding, offering to take the land at the last bid. This testimony was objected to by the defendant upon several grounds.

*136

*The defendant introduced no testimony, and no objection was taken to the charge, except "that his honor refused the following request: 'We ask the court to charge the jury that plaintiff cannot recover in this case without proving a perfect title, tracing it to a grant from the state, or a presumed grant.'" Upon which the judge endorsed as follows: "The general rule contended for is correct, but it does not apply to this case, and the request is refused." The jury found for the plaintiff the land in dispute and two hundred dollars damages.

The appeal involves, first, the legal question, whether in an action for the recovery of real estate upon the ground of title, where the pleadings do not show that both parties claim from a common source, the plaintiff may be released from the necessity of going back to a grant from the state by proving at the trial by testimony that the defendant, notwithstanding he has not set up in his answer title derived from a common source, yet that such is his claim in fact.

There is no doubt that as a general rule the plaintiff, in an action to recover possession of real estate on the ground of title must show a complete and perfect title in himself, going back to a grant either actual or presumed. To this rule, however, there are several exceptions, one of which is that where both parties claim from a common source, the plaintiff need go no further back than this source, and having done so, the question then is, which of the two has the superior title. Hill v. Robertson, 1 Strobh., 1. These principles are not denied, but the question here is, how shall it be made to appear that both parties claim through a common source, so as to bring the case under the exception above referred to? Must this fact appear in the pleadings, or can it be shown in the evidence on the part of the plaintiff?

The case of Martin v. Ranlett, 5 Rich., 541 [57 Am. Dec. 770], is decisive of this question. In that case, which was an action of trespass to try title, like this one, Marsh was the original owner of the land in dispute. In 1829 Rogers & Latimer recovered a judgment against Marsh. In 1837 Marsh mortgaged the land to one Gary, and in 1840 Gary recovered a judgment on the bond secured by the mortgage. Under this latter judgment the land was sold in 1843, and was purchased by Gary. This sale was held void, *and the land was afterwards sold under the older judgment and bought by Martin. The heirs of Gary were in possession through their tenant, Ranlett. The plaintiff gave in evidence no title beyond the sheriff's deed, which conveyed the interest of Marsh. To supply the deficiency and to show that both parties claimed under Marsh, he introduced and proved, 1st, that Gary at the sale, under his judgment, exhibited a paper which he said was a mortgage from Marsh to himself; 2d, notice to the defendant to produce this mortgage; and, 3d, the book of the register where this mortgage was recorded. Upon this testimony the question was made whether the plaintiff had made out title in himself, and the court held that the evidence developed the fact that both parties traced their title to a common source, sufficiently to render it improper to grant a non-suit. The court further held, however, that this did not preclude the defendant from showing that he had acquired a better title than that which he derived from Marsh, which the defendant, having failed to show, the plaintiff recovered simply upon the sheriff's deed, and the proof that defendant claimed under Marsh.

*137

The facts of the case now before the court are somewhat similar to those of Martin v. Ranlett, and the rule applied there must govern here. Whether, then, the general rule or the exception is to govern in any special case must depend upon the fact whether or not the parties claim through a common source. If they do not, then the plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of that of his adversary, and must trace back to a grant; if they do, then the plaintiff may stop in the first instance at the title of the common grantor; and whether they thus claim or not, is a question of fact to be determined (unless admitted in the pleadings) by the jury upon the evidence.

Such being the law, it will be seen at once that the Circuit judge could not have charged as requested by the appellant. The request was that he should charge "that plaintiff could not recover in this case without proving a perfect title, tracing it to a grant from the state, or a presumed grant." The judge might have charged the general proposition that, in the absence of a common claim, or rather a claim from a common source, this was *necessary; but to have charged this as necessary in this case he must have assumed the fact that the parties did not claim from a common source, which he could not do without invading the province of the jury, on the question of fact involved.

*138

II. Was there error in admitting the testimony of the witness, Mr. Sheppard? That testimony consisted of declarations of the defendant showing that he, the defendant, had bought the land from Shumate; that he had a deed from Shumate, executed after the mortgage under which plaintiff claimed, which mortgage the defendant, when he bought, supposed had been satisfied. Mr. Sheppard also testified that he had seen the deed from Shumate to the defendant, and that it was junior in date to the mortgage. As to the declarations of the defendant, we know of no rule of evidence which could have excluded these. They were not objectionable as hearsay, nor were they irrelevant, nor were they obnoxious to any rule governing the introduction or competency of testimony. There was no error, therefore, in admitting this testimony to the extent of these declarations.

It may be, however, that the witness's statement that he had seen the deed of Shumate to the defendant, and that it was junior to the mortgage, was incompetent, in the absence of notice to produce it, on the ground that there was better evidence of the fact of the date of the deed, i. e., the deed itself. Admitting this, yet we do not think that this should reverse the judgment. This witness had already testified as to declarations of the defendant, in which the defendant admitted that his deed was junior to the mortgage. He said that Shumate had told him before he bought that this mortgage had been satisfied, and in this he had been "fooled." With this admission before the court, the evidence of Mr. Sheppard as to the date of the deed could not have affected the result. With that stricken out, there is enough left to sustain the finding.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

22 S. C. *139

*PIESTER v. PIESTER.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Interest ⟸37.]

A sealed note payable one day after date, "with interest at the rate of two per cent. a month," carries the stipulated rate of interest after maturity.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Smith v. Smith, 33 S. C. 216, 11 S. E. 761; Gibson v. Hutchins, 43 S. C. 296, 21 S. E. 250; Dyson v. Jones, 65 S. C. 310, 43 S. E. 667.

For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. §§ 77, 78; Dec. Dig. ⟸37; Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 281.]

[2. Mortgages ⟸175.]

A subsequent creditor for valuable consideration without notice of an unrecorded mortgage is protected by the act of 1843, not only as to the land covered by the mortgage, but also as to the general assets of the estate of the mortgagor after his decease.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in King v. Fraser, 23 S. C. 570; Carraway v. Carraway, 27 S. C. 583, 5 S. E. 157; Norwood v. Norwood, 36 S. C. 343, 15 S. E. 382, 31 Am. St. Rep. 875.

For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 417, 418; Dec. Dig. ⟸175.]

[3. Mortgages ⟸169.]

Proceedings in the Probate Court and an order therein directing a sale and requiring a mortgage for the purchase money, do not constitute constructive notice of an unrecorded mortgage taken pursuant to such order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 386; Dec. Dig. ⟸169.]

[4. Executors and Administrators ⟸264.]

A mortgage as such has no precedence in the administration of the estate of one deceased, except to the extent of its specific lien upon the property mortgaged; that being exhausted, it ranks according to the grade of the demand secured thereby. Kinard v. Young, 2 Rich. Eq., 258, approved, and Edwards v. Sanders, 6 S. C., 316, reversed.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in McLure v. Melton, 24 S. C. 559, 565, 566, 568, 58 Am. Rep. 272; Wheat v. Dingle, 32 S. C. 479, 11 S. E. 394, 8 L. R. A. 375.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1007; Dec. Dig. ⟸264.]

[This case is also cited in State ex rel. George v. Aiken, 42 S. C. 228, 20 S. E. 221, 26 L. R. A. 345, without specific application.]

Before Hudson, J., Newberry, November, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Suber & Caldwell, for R. H. Wright.

Mr. Geo. S. Mower, contra.

January 10, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action in the nature of a bill to marshal the assets of David B. Piester, who died intestate in 1873. In his life-time, November, 1869, the intestate executed a mortgage of 400 acres of land to John T. Peterson, probate judge for Newberry County, to secure his bond as guardian of Laura Lake, and on December 21, 1869, he executed another mortgage of the same land to the said judge of probate, to secure his other bond as guardian of Robert G. Lake. The intestate had been appointed guardian of these minors, upon his own ex parte petition in the said Probate Court.

These mortgages were not recorded in the register's office of the county until August 7, 1872; and in the meantime, April 7, 1871, the intestate having borrowed money from

*140

Robert H. *Wright, in order to secure it, executed a sealed note to him as follows: "$400.00. One day after date I promise to pay to the order of R. H. Wright four hundred dollars, with interest at the rate of two per cent. per month, for value received. Witness my hand and seal, 7th August, 1871. (Signed) D. B. Piester. [L. S.]" Wright had no actual notice of either of the mortgages at the time he loaned the money and took the above note, or indeed until they were produced in this action in 1884. The Circuit judge ruled that the Wright note bore interest after as well as before maturity, at the rate of two per cent. per month; and, second, that the guardianship bonds should rank equally with the Wright note (all being specialty debts) as to the 400 acres of land embodied in the mortgage; but that the guardianship bonds should, under the act of 1789, take precedence as "debts of mortgage" over the mere specialty demand of Wright, as against Piester's general estate outside of the mortgage.

The parties appeal to this court upon two grounds: First. That his honor, the Circuit judge, committed error in allowing interest on the Wright note after its maturity at a greater rate than seven per cent. per annum. Second. That his honor, the Circuit judge, erred in not allowing the demand based upon the sealed note of Wright to rank equally with the guardianship bonds in regard to the general estate of the intestate Piester.

I. In regard to the interest on the Wright note, we concur with the Circuit judge that it should bear interest as specified after it fell due. It is well settled by numerous cases that in general an obligation to pay interest at any other rate than seven per cent. per annum only carries that interest to the date of its maturity, unless the obligation contains an agreement of the parties that the peculiar rate shall run as well after as before maturity, if this latter is also provided for. And whether the obligation expresses such agreement is simply a matter of construction. Langston v. R. R. Co., 2 S. C., 248; Briggs v. Winsmith, 10 Id., 133 [30 Am. Rep. 46]; Sharpe v. Lee, 14 S. C. 341.

Do the terms of the note in this case, properly construed, contain such an agreement? We think they do. The phrase "one day after date" is generally adopted to express a due note, and it seems unreasonable to suppose that the parties intended that the *note should bear interest only for one day, if so much. But without putting much stress on this, it is a well-recognized rule of construction that every word, if possible, should have attached to it some meaning. The note really does not bear interest at all until the day after its date, April 8, 1871, when it fell due. There is no such expression as "interest from date," but the words are "one day after date, with interest at the rate of two per cent. per month."

*141

It is a mistake to suppose that the case of Briggs v. Winsmith, 10 S. C., 133 [30 Am. Rep. 46], was in this respect similar. The report of that case shows that the note was payable twelve months after date, "with interest from date at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum." As this note has no such statement, the interest indicated could only begin to run on the day of its maturity. "The general rule is that when a sum is liquidated and ascertained and to be paid on a day certain, without any reference to the subject matter of the contract, interest is allowed from the day fixed for payment. It is a compensation by way of damages for the detention of another's money after the time at which by law or contract it should have been paid." Schmidt v. Limehouse, 2 Bail., 276. The words "per month" may possibly have reference only to the rate and not the time, but, as we have seen, it could only be the time after the maturity of the note, the interest to accrue thereafter.

II. As to the rank of the bonds to the probate judge to secure which the mortgages not registered within time were given. The act of 1843 provides that "no mortgage or other instrument of writing in the nature of a mortgage of real estate shall be valid so as to affect the rights of subsequent creditors or purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, unless the same shall be recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyance for the district wherein such real estate lies within sixty days from the execution thereof," &c. There can be no doubt that in 1871, when Wright loaned his money and received the note of the intestate (Piester), he became a subsequent creditor for valuable consideration without notice of the mortgages, which were not recorded until August 7, 1872. There is no allegation that he had actual notice.

*142

*It is insisted, however, that constructive notice would suffice, and he must be charged with that, for the reason that these mortgages were executed under an order made in a case in the Probate Court, which being a court of record, all the world must take notice of what transpired therein. There are several answers to this view, but it cannot be necessary to do more than to refer to the express terms of the act of 1843, which declares mortgages "invalid as against subsequent creditors for valuable consideration," unless the same shall be recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyance, &c.; which was not done until after Wright's debt was contracted, and the case does not belong to that class which holds that actual notice supersedes the necessity for recording.

Assuming, then, that Wright was a subsequent creditor without notice of the mortgages, they were as to him "invalid," and, as we think, he stands precisely as if they had never been given. The Circuit judge admits this, so far as concerns the alleged lien on the 400 acres of land covered by the mortgages. He says: "The act of 1843 declares that mortgages shall not be valid, so as to affect the rights of subsequent creditors without notice, unless recorded in sixty days after execution. It is conceded that if these mortgages had been recorded before Wright's note arose, though later than sixty days after execution, this would have constituted constructive notice. But this was not the case, and as the act declares them 'invalid' so as to affect the rights of one in Wright's position, it seems impossible to escape the conclusion that these mortgages cannot affect Wright's claim as to the estate of the debtor therein conveyed. The terms are broad and sweeping, but they necessarily restrict the operation of such mortgages to the property specifically embodied in them," &c.

But, as we understand, the judge goes further and holds that the judge of probate, as mortgage creditor, must take precedence of ordinary specialties, as to all other property of the intestate outside of the land embraced in the mortgage. He says: "The act of 1789 declares the relation of mortgage creditors to all other creditors of a decedent, and it would be erroneous to hold that the mortgages in these cases became inoperative as to the property specifically embraced in them, and should lose rank as *mortgages, as to everything not embraced in them. In marshaling the assets, the mortgages retain their rank except as to the Wright note, and as to that they lose their rank only as a lien on the land conveyed. In the fund arising from the sale of that land Wright will share ratably with them as specialty claims. All other specialty claims are excluded from such participation, because as against such these mortgages are valid," &c.

*143

In this we cannot concur. We do not mean to say that, the mortgages, having been recorded (although out of time), may not have a valid lien on the land embraced, as to such creditors as do not come within the category of subsequent creditors without notice; but it seems to us that it was error to hold that the bonds secured by mortgages should have precedence over other specialties, as to the general property of the estate, outside of the mortgage. As we understand it, a mortgage is a pledge, a mere security quoad the property mortgaged, and takes rank only by virtue of its lien on the specific property embraced in it. As soon as the property pledged is exhausted or destroyed, the lien ceases to exist. With its subject matter expunged and its lien gone, a mortgage cannot possibly be more than the sealed covenant of the party. There is nothing in principle or in the nature or terms of the instrument itself, which authorizes the mortgagee to foreclose it upon any other property of the mortgagor, while living; and why should it be otherwise after his death?

If such arbitrary right exists, it can only be by the express terms of the act of 1789. As stated in several of the cases, that act was very badly drawn and abounds in obscurities, but we fail to see that there is anything in it which requires us to confer upon a mortgage a distinct grade attaching to the instrument itself, as distinguished from its lien upon the property embraced in it. In classifying the debts of a decedent, and fixing the order in which they shall be paid, the act says: "Judgments, mortgages, and executions, the oldest first." * * * Section 4. "No preference shall be given among the creditors in equal degree where there is a deficiency of assets, except as to judgments, mortgages, and executions, the oldest of which shall be paid first, mortgages to date from the day of recording, and executions from the day when entered in the sheriff's office, saving *to creditors their rights under any special lien," &c. Does this give a mortgage, apart from the property embraced, a rank with judgments?

*144

Mortgages were properly, if not necessarily, placed in the class with judgments, for the reason that they had liens, and to that extent should be paid—"the oldest first." But the lien of a mortgage is special, while that of a judgment is general, and the reason for the classification ceases as soon as the special lien is discharged. Why say that the oldest should be first paid, unless reference was especially to the lien? After they were discharged there could be no propriety in requiring that the oldest should be first paid. Can it be contended that a mortgage on land is not only made a preferred claim on personalty, but even in this new character must be paid according to registry, which of course can give no notice as to property not embraced in the instrument recorded? Other specialties take rank according to dignity, not their age. We think that a creditor of a decedent's estate, whose claim is secured by a mortgage on particular property, has under the act a lien upon that property; but when that is exhausted the mortgage as such is functus officio; and in further marshaling the assets, the demand must rank according as it may be a single contract or specialty.

This construction, as we think, is in accordance with principle and supported by the weight of authority. Tunno v. Happoldt, 2 McCord, 188, was a law case, an action of assumpsit on promissory notes against the representative of John M. Happoldt, the maker. The administrator obtained leave to file the plea of plene administravit præter, and the question was whether a certain instrument of writing (a mortgage) was to be ranked in the legal order of payment of intestate's debts among bond creditors. There was a special verdict, finding that the intestate left "one obligation or sealed instrument of mortgage and covenant to Thomas Ogier;" that the administrator had paid off all the other demands, and had in hand a certain sum of money, to be divided in average proportion among the simple contract creditors. If the court should be of opinion that the aforesaid sealed instrument to Thomas Ogier is an obligation, and to be preferred to simple contract creditors, we find for the defendant on his second *plea. But if the court should be of opinion that the said instrument to Thomas Ogier is to be paid in average and proportion only with the simple contract creditors, then we find for the plaintiff." It was held, "that a mortgage upon certain property to secure a note (not under seal) will not, under our administration law, give such creditor a priority as in the nature of a deed, to simple contract creditors."

*145

In Kinard v. Young, 2 Rich. Eq., 258, Chancellor Johnston rendered a circuit decree criticising and construing the act of 1789 differently, but the old Court of Appeals in Equity, including that distinguished Chancellor himself, reversed the judgment, sustaining Tunno v. Happoldt, supra, and holding that "in the assets of an insolvent testator or intestate, mortgages as mortgages, are not entitled to priority over rent, specialties, and simple contract debts, except so far as they are liens on any particular part of the estate. After the lien is exhausted the grade of the demand must be determined by the nature of the instrument which the mortgage was given to secure," &c.

We think we may safely say that this was regarded as the settled construction of the act of 1789 until as late as 1875, when the judgment of this court was pronounced in the case of Edwards v. Sanders, 6 S. C., 316, which disregarded the cases above cited and held, that "under section 26 of the act of 1789 prescribing the order in which debts of a decedent are to be paid, mortgages rank in the third class and are entitled to payment out of the general estate in preference to specialty and simple contract debts." This is the case upon which the Circuit judge rested his decree; but with all due respect, and an anxious desire to maintain consistency in the adjudications of this court, we are constrained to say that, in our judgment, the case of Edwards v. Sanders is not only unsustained by proper rules of construction, but is in direct opposition to the decided cases, and what was at that time considered the settled law of the state.

The judgment was rested mainly on the view that "the order of priority prescribed by the act was only to be observed in the application of such general assets in the hands of the executor or administrator as were not bound by any specific lien. * * * It is then not the lien which the act deals with, but the character *of the debt, and it is that which is to determine its rank in the order of payment," &c. We think that the most cursory reading of the act will show that this is a mistake. If the order prescribed only referred to such general assets as were not bound by liens, why mention "judgments, mortgages, and executions" at all? And as the rights of liens are declared, by what authority can it be said that there was no declaration as to the rights of specific liens? We see no authority for such assumption and think mortgages were only classed with judgments on account of their liens.

*146

So strong was the general opinion of the profession upon the subject that in 1878, soon after the judgment was published in the case of Edwards v. Sanders, the legislature passed an act reaffirming the doctrine of Kinard v. Young and declaring: "That in the administration of the assets of a decedent, mortgages shall not be entitled to a priority over rents, debts by specialty, or debts by simple contract, except as to the particular parts of the estate affected by the liens of such mortgages. That after the property covered by the liens is exhausted, the grade of the demand shall be determined by the nature of the instrument which the mortgage was given to secure." 16 Stat., 686. It is true the facts of the case at bar arose before that act was passed, and therefore they are not in terms controlled by it. But the act seems to be somewhat in the nature of a declaratory law, upon a subject as to which there were differences of opinion; but whether that is so or not, in our judgment the act only declared what has been the law of the state since the act of 1789.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified according to the conclusions herein announced.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred.

Mr. Justice McIVER. As to the first question involved I concur generally, but as to the second question I concur in the result only, preferring to rest my conclusion upon the effect of the act of 1843, which in terms declares that unrecorded mortgages shall not be valid, "so as to affect the rights of subsequent creditors or purchasers for valuable consideration without notice." *The necessary effect of this declaration is that an unrecorded mortgage is void—is in fact not a mortgage—whenever the effect of so regarding it would be to affect the rights of a subsequent creditor without notice. Now as Robert H. Wright is conceded to be such a creditor, it seems to me that it follows necessarily that his rights cannot, in any way, be affected by the mortgages of which he had no notice, and therefore in determining his rights these papers cannot be treated as mortgages, but must, as to him, take only the rank of sealed claims.

*147

Judgment modified.

---

22 S. C. 147

TODD v. DAVENPORT.

(April Term, 1884.)

[Guardian and Ward ⇐174.]

An amount due by an administrator to the widow of his intestate was assigned by this widow to her infant son, of whose estate this administrator was also the guardian. Held, that the debt due by the administrator as such was paid and the amount became assets in his hands as guardian, for which he and the sureties on the guardianship bond were liable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. § 595; Dec. Dig. ⇐ 174.]

Before Hudson, J., Laurens, September, 1883.

This was an action by Patrick H. Todd against Ludy P. Davenport, the former guardian of plaintiff, John Davenport, a surety on the guardianship bond, and the executors and devisees of Martin Shaw, the other surety. The action was instituted in May, 1882. The cause was referred to C. D. Barksdale, master for Laurens County, to take the testimony and to determine all the issues and report the same to the court. Several issues were passed upon by the master, but it is unnecessary to state any except that he found that the mother of plaintiff had assigned her interest in the estate of Dr. Todd, her deceased husband, to the plaintiff, then a boy of five years of age, about the time that L. P. Davenport was appointed guardian, the whole personal estate of Dr. Todd then consisting of a note due by said Davenport; that the defendant, John Davenport, was not released from his liability by reason of his discharge in bankruptcy, because there *was not such a breach of the guardianship bond prior to the adjudication of bankruptcy as would have created a liability provable against his estate; and the master recommended judgment against all of the defendants for $3,922.82, with interest from August 30, 1883, the executors and devisees of Martin Shaw not to be chargeable beyond the value of assets received on property descended.

*148

To this report the defendants filed several exceptions, the seventh being as follows: "In not finding that John Davenport was discharged as to this debt by his discharge in bankruptcy."

Judge Hudson filed the following decree: "After hearing the report of the master in this case, and exceptions thereto filed on the part of the defendants, and after full argument of counsel, it is ordered and adjudged that all the exceptions to the report be overruled except the seventh exception, which is sustained under the authority of Jones & Calhoun v. Knox, 46 Ala., 53, and which is not at variance with the principles laid down in the case of Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company v. Maffett, 8 S. C., 307; and with this exception, it is ordered and adjudged that the report of the master be confirmed and made the judgment of this court, and that the plaintiff have his judgment against the defendant, Ludy P. Davenport, guardian, for the full amount reported by the master, and against the estate of Martin Shaw, the surety, for the amount of the penalty of the guardianship bond, to wit, the sum of thirty-six hundred dollars and four cents, and disbursements. It is ordered that the report of the master, in so far as it creates a liability against the surety, John Davenport, be overruled, with costs."

The defendants, other than John Davenport, appealed.

Messrs. Ball & Watts, for appellants.

Messrs. B. D. Cuningham and Holmes & Simpson, contra.

February 14, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. Some time in 1858 Dr. Patrick Todd died intestate, leaving as his heirs at law and distributees his *widow and his son, the plaintiff in this action. Ludy P. Davenport administered on his estate, and entered into bond with John Davenport and Martin Shaw as his sureties. On an accounting before the ordinary, on January 30, 1860, it was found that said administrator was indebted to the widow in the sum of $573.99 as her distributive share of her deceased husband's estate, and to the plaintiff, then an infant of tender years, in the sum of $1,147.99, as his distributive share of his father's estate. On April 5, 1861, John Wharton was appointed guardian of the plaintiff, who settled with Ludy P. Davenport, as administrator as aforesaid, for the distributive share of his ward, by taking the note of said Ludy P. Davenport for the amount due by him as administrator.

*149

John Wharton, the first guardian, having died some time in 1863, the said Ludy P. Davenport became the guardian of the plaintiff, and entered into bond for the faithful discharge of his trust, with John Davenport and Martin Shaw as his sureties; and a few days thereafter had a settlement with the executor of the first guardian, in which the executor turned over to him his own note previously given by said Ludy P. Davenport to the first guardian, and paid the small balance due the ward in Confederate money, which balance was scaled on the accounting. About the time that Ludy P. Davenport was appointed guardian of the plaintiff, his mother, the widow of Dr. Patrick Todd, assigned all of her interest in her deceased husband's estate to her son, the plaintiff in this action.

All the other grounds of appeal having been abandoned at the hearing, the only question presented for our determination is whether the court below erred in charging the guardian with the amount found due by him as administrator to the widow, which had been assigned to the ward, less the amount admitted to have been paid to the widow by the administrator prior to such assignment. There can be no doubt that the administrator, as well as his sureties on his administration bond, were liable to the widow, and if so, to her assignee, for the amount thus found due to her; and that when, by such assignment, such liability was transferred to Ludy P. Davenport as guardian of the plaintiff, he united in himself the character of both debtor and creditor, and that by *operation of law the debt was paid, and the amount thereof cash in his hands as guardian. Schnell v. Schroder, Bail. Eq., 334; Enicks v. Powell, 2 Strob. Eq., 206; Griffin v. Bonham, 9 Rich. Eq., 77; Jacobs v. Woodside, 6 S. C., 490.

*150

It is argued here, in behalf of appellants, that it would be a great hardship to allow the widow, by assigning her interest to her son, to recover a debt, which she could not recover from an insolvent administrator, by transferring the liability to his guardianship bond. But in the first place, there is no evidence before us that Ludy P. Davenport is insolvent even now, and certainly none that he was insolvent in the early part of 1864, when the assignment was made. So far as we can perceive there was nothing to prevent the widow in 1864 from recovering the amount found to be due her by the administrator by action on the administration bond; and even if it should be conceded that Ludy P. Davenport was all the while insolvent, when it is remembered that the same persons who were sureties on his administration bond are the sureties on his guardianship bond, we are unable to perceive any ground whatever for the imputation that this assignment was made with a view to secure a bad debt by transferring the liability for it from the administration bond to the guardianship bond, for in either case the same persons would be called upon to meet such liability. If the claim is good now against the sureties on the guardianship bond, there is certainly no reason to suspect that it would not have been equally good in 1864, when it was assigned, against these same persons as sureties on the administration bond.

Again it is urged that the sureties on the guardianship bond only intended to assume liability for the amount received from the first guardian, and not for the additional amount transferred to the ward by his mother. It is a sufficient answer to this to say that such was not the condition of the bond. By it they become responsible for the faithful administration of the ward's whole estate, whether it comes to him before or after the execution of the bond. McDowell v. Caldwell, 2 McC. Eq., 55 [16 Am. Dec. 635]; Administrators of Johnson v. Executors of Johnson, 2 Hill Eq. 287 [29 Am. Dec. 72]; Crenshaw v. Crenshaw, 4 Rich. Eq., 14. But, in addition to this, the facts do not seem to support the assumption of *appellants. The guardianship bond was for thirty-six hundred dollars, which is a little more than double the amount due the ward, including the amount assigned to him by his mother, and as it is usual to take a bond in double the value of the ward's estate, and as the assignment was made about the time Davenport was appointed guardian—according to the widow's testimony, the same day that he was appointed—the reasonable inference would be that the widow's interest was included in the estimate of the value of the ward's estate.

*151

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 151

SHIELL v. SLOAN.

SAME v. CARDERELLI.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Dower ⟸16.]

A widow is dowable of her deceased husband's interest in lands held by him in joint-tenancy during coverture.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 61; Dec. Dig. ⟸16.]

[2. Dower ⟸46.]

But where such right attached at the marriage upon land then subject to a charge, a subsequent sale in satisfaction of such charge defeated the right of dower.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Brown v. Cave, 23 S. C. 258; Shell v. Duncan, 31 S. C. 563, 10 S. E. 330, 5 L. R. A. 821.

For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 145; Dec. Dig. ⟸46.]

[3. Dower ⟸46.]

A and B were devisees of a city lot, charged with the duty of paying to their mother an annuity of $500 during her life, and of providing for her a comfortable house to live in. A afterwards married. The buildings having been destroyed by fire, the two sons filed a bill against their mother and the contingent remaindermen, praying a sale of portions of the lot for the purpose of enabling complainants to build upon the remainder, and to pay arrears of the annuity; in this prayer the mother joined, and portions of the lot were sold. B died and A subsequently filed a second bill against the same defendants for a sale of other portions of said original lot to complete the payments due for the building erected and for arrears of the annuity; and other unimproved portions of the lot were sold. Afterwards A died and his widow claimed dower from these purchasers. Held, that she was not entitled to dower in the portions of the lot so sold.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. §§ 92, 145–153; Dec. Dig. ⟸46.]

[This case is also cited in Holley v. Glover, 36 S. C. 417, 15 S. E. 605, 16 L. R. A. 776, 31 Am. St. Rep. 883, without specific application.]

Before Hudson, J., Richland, April, 1883.

The opinion fully states the facts of these two cases. In the *case of Shiell against Sloan and Seibels, the Circuit decree, omitting its statement of facts, was as follows:

*152

By the terms of the will of Adam Edgar, the annuity to Elizabeth Shiell, and her right to a dwelling house, were clearly charged upon the entire lot of land devised to William Shiell and John A. Shiell, and their seizin was consequently to that extent burdened with the rights of Elizabeth Shiell under the will itself; and the inchoate right of dower of the wife of one of the devisees, though strongly favored in law, could not rise higher or be superior to the seizin of her husband.

The right is indeed but an inchoate interest in the lands of which the husband is seized during coverture, and if his seizin is, in its inception or before her inchoate right attaches, encumbered with a charge, her interest is subordinate to that, and if the land be sold to satisfy the charge, her right is entirely defeated.

This principle has been repeatedly recognized by our courts of last resort. In Crafts v. Crafts, 2 McCord, 54, it was held that the wife is not entitled to dower in lands purchased by the husband and immediately mortgaged for the purchase money. Under the foreclosure of such a mortgage the purchaser would take the property divested of the wife's right of dower, and she would have to resort to the surplus proceeds of sale if her estate was consummated at the time. In Mey v. Mey, Rich. Eq. Cas., 378, the right of dower of the widow of a devisee of lands was held to be subject to the debts of the devisor. And in the recent case of Jones v. Miller, 17 S. C., 380, it was held that a purchaser at an execution sale under a judgment recovered against the husband before his marriage, takes the land divested of the wife's right of dower.

It is, however, urged by the plaintiff in this case that the sale under the decree in the cause above mentioned, was not for the purpose of paying off the annuity to Elizabeth Shiell, but for the improvement of the remaining portions of the lot for the benefit of the complainants in that action. I, however, am forced to the conclusion that the object of the proceedings and sale was to provide the means for meeting the annuity to Elizabeth Shiell and providing her with a dwelling house, as directed by the will, and that the purchasers at the sales under the decree in said *cause took the lots purchased by them divested of plaintiff's inchoate right of dower therein. Nor would the result be different if the question could have been determined upon purely equitable principles, for the lot brought its full market price and the proceeds went directly to enhance the value of the remainder of the lot, thereby largely increasing the value of plaintiff's right of dower in that, and having derived the benefit, she should also bear the burden.

*153

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that plaintiff's complaint be dismissed, and that the defendants have the costs of this action.

In the case of Shiell against Carderelli and wife, the decree was as follows:

This cause came on to be heard before me in connection with the case of Caroline M. Shiell v. John T. Sloan, jr., and John T. Seibels, upon pleadings substantially the same, and an agreed statement of facts. In this case I am forced to the conclusion that the sale to the defendant, Felix Carderelli, was but carrying out the purposes of the proceedings in the case of William Shiell and John A. Shiell v. Elizabeth Shiell et al.; and, therefore, for the reasons stated in the decree in the case of Caroline M. Shiell v. John T. Sloan, jr., and John T. Seibels, it is ordered and adjudged, that plaintiff's complaint be dismissed, and that the defendants have the costs of this action.

The plaintiff appealed in both cases upon the exceptions stated in the opinion of this court.

Mr. W. A. Clark, for appellant, contended that the sale of these lots were not sought for the purpose of enabling the complainants to satisfy the charge imposed upon the devise, but for the purpose of selling one portion of the lot for the development and improvement of the other, with a possible ulterior object of enabling the devisees the more conveniently to meet their obligations to their mother. A manifest object of the proceedings was to bar the rights of the contingent remaindermen. The proceedings show no purpose on the part of Elizabeth Shiell to enforce the payment of her annuity as a paramount lien; and that alone could divest plaintiff's right of dower. 1 Scrib. Dow., 528, 529, 533; 2 Halst.,

*154

392; 18 Ohio, 567; 1 Id., 99; 1 Dutch., *47. The devisees might privately have sold these lots for the purpose of meeting their obligations to their mother; and yet it would be admitted that by such a sale dower would not have been divested. The second sale was for the purpose of meeting payments which in the first decree were made chargeable upon the life-tenants and the building by them erected. Dower being a legal right cannot be divested upon mere equitable principles growing out of proceedings to which the demandant was not a party.

Mr. W. H. Lyles, contra.

Dower depends upon the husband's seizin, and being a derivative estate, cannot rise higher than its source. 1 Hill. 200; Chev. Eq., 37; 2 Hill Ch., 250. The decrees under which the sales were made chiefly considered the rights of Elizabeth Shiell. Again, the right of dower was subject to the right of the joint-tenant and the contingent remaindermen to have sale made for partition or change of investment. To such proceeding this plaintiff was not, and could not have been, a party; but her estate was in privity with her husband and therefore bound by the decrees. 12 S. C., 481; 6 Rich., 266.

Mr. Clark, in reply cited 1 Scrib. Dow., 326, 327; Gen. Stat., § 1801; 2 Strob., 69.

February 16, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. These were actions brought by the plaintiff, Caroline M. Shiell, the widow of the late John A. Shiell, for dower in different parcels of land in the city of Columbia, and being by the same demandant, in the same right, against defendants who made similar defences, were heard together.

It appeared that Adam Edgar, late of the city of Columbia, departed this life in 1852, leaving a will, by which, among other things, he devised certain lots in the city therein described to William Shiell and John A. Shiell, sons of his niece, Betsey Shiell, "subject nevertheless to the following annuities, say five hundred dollars per annum, to be paid by them to their mother, *Betsey Shiell, each and every year during her natural life; and also that their said mother be furnished with a comfortable house to live in. Should she remove from her present abode, it is my wish that she shall occupy the house and outbuilding at the corner of Lady and Sumter streets. But should the said William Shiell and John Shiell die leaving no child or children, then and in such case I give, devise, and bequeath the houses and lots described in this item unto Adam Edgar Hardy and Margaret E. Hardy," &c.

*155

William and John A. Shiell as devisees took possession of the lots, as well as other property devised and bequeathed to them. When Columbia was burned, during the late war, all the buildings on the lots were destroyed by fire, and the lots thereby made valueless to the devisees, who, in order to enable them to pay the taxes and the annuity of $500 to their mother, and to furnish her a comfortable house for her to live in, as required by the will, made application to the court to sell a portion of the said real estate, "the proceeds of sale to be applied towards the erection of such stores and buildings on the corner of Richardson and Lady streets, as might be advisable, by a referee appointed by the court." This proceeding was instituted in 1869, entitled William Shiell and John A. Shiell v. Elizabeth Shiell et al., under which an order of the court was obtained to sell a certain portion of the lands devised. At the sale by the sheriff, the subdivisions known as lots Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 were purchased at full market price by Mary B. Denny, who paid the purchase money and received from the sheriff a deed for the same pursuant to the decree. She sold, and by mesne conveyance those lands came into the possession of John T. Sloan, jr., and John T. Seibels, and for dower in this parcel the action named first in the title was instituted against the said defendants.

The proceeds of this sale were expended, under the direction of the court, in erecting valuable buildings on the other part of the lands devised; but there was still a balance due the builders, which was assigned to the Citizens' Savings Bank, and by John Fisher, trustee thereof in bankruptcy, judgment was recovered upon it for $1,710, besides interest. In order to pay this judgment, another application of similar character was made to the *court in the proceeding entitled John Shiell v. Elizabeth Shiell et al., for the sale of two other small lots, Nos. 5 and 6. The referee recommended that the lots be sold, saying: "Said lots are of no profit and are comparatively unimproved, but if sold would probably produce a sufficient fund to satisfy the amount still due and unpaid on the building aforesaid." An order was passed directing the sale, and at the sheriff's sale, Felix Carderelli became the purchaser, paid the purchase money, and received titles. He afterwards conveyed one of the lots to Emma M. Carderelli; and for dower in those lots the action named second in the title was instituted against the said defendants.

*156

William Shiell died in 1873, intestate, unmarried, and without issue; and John A. Shiell died in 1875, intestate, leaving as his heirs at law one child, William G. Shiell, and a widow, Caroline A. Shiell, the plaintiff, with whom he had intermarried after the death of Adam Edgar. The portion of the lands devised whereon the improvements were erected was occupied by the brothers as long as they lived, and, after the death of John A., by his widow and child, until May, 1882, when it was sold as the property of John A., under a judgment obtained against him in his life-time, and purchased by William G. Shiell. The defendants admitted the marriage and possession, but denied unqualified seizin in the husband, John A. Shiell, during the coverture. They insisted that the lands were devised subject to the charge, and the portions purchased by the defendants respectively having been sold by order of the court to satisfy the charge, the plaintiff therefore was not entitled to dower in those parcels.

The cause was heard by Judge Hudson, without a jury. He held with the defendants and dismissed the complaints. The plaintiff appeals upon the following grounds: "1. Because his honor erred in holding that the object of the proceedings in the case of William Shiell and John Shiell v. Elizabeth Shiell et al., and the sale thereunder, was to provide the means for meeting the annuity to Elizabeth Shiell and providing her with a dwelling-house as directed by the will; and that the purchasers at the sale under the decree in said cause took the lots purchased by them divested of plaintiff's inchoate right of dower. 2. Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in holding that the plain-*tiff's demand could not be allowed upon equitable principles, inasmuch as the lot in question brought its full market value, and the proceeds went directly to enhance the value of the remainder of the lot, thereby largely increasing the value of plaintiff's right of dower in that portion; and having derived the benefit, she should also bear the burden. 3. Because his honor erred in holding (in the second case) that the sale to the defendant, Felix Carderelli, was but carrying out the purposes of the proceedings in the case of William Shiell and John A. Shiell v. Elizabeth Shiell et al."

*157

There is nothing in the view urged that the plaintiff is not entitled to dower in the interest of her husband, John A. Shiell, for the reason that he was joint tenant with his brother William in the devise of the land. Reed v. Kennedy, 2 Strob., 69; 1 Scribner on Dower, 327.

It appears, however, from the will of Adam Edgar, that the devise to William and John A. Shiell was subject to a charge of five hundred dollars per annum to be paid by them to their mother, Betsey Shiell, each and every year during her natural life, and also to provide a comfortable house for her to reside in. This devise so charged vested before the defendant intermarried with John A. Shiell, and therefore her right of dower attached subject to that charge. Her right, coming through the marriage, could not be in a greater estate than that which the husband owned at the time of the marriage, and consequently the sale of the lands in satisfaction of that charge would defeat that right. Crafts v. Crafts, 2 McCord, 54; Mey v. Mey, Rich. Eq. Cas., 378; Jones v. Miller, 17 S. C., 380; Tibbetts v. Langley Man. Co., 12 S. C., 466; Davidson & Simpson v. Admiral Graves, Baron Vandersmissen, et al., Riley's Eq., 246. In the case last cited, Judge O'Neall states the doctrine in terms which clearly include this case. He says: "Notwithstanding we think she is entitled to dower, we do not think she takes it discharged from the encumbrances existing actually or constructively at the time of the marriage. Her rights arising from the marriage cannot be in a greater estate than the estate which her husband then owned. His estate in the land was encumbered at the time of the marriage with Vandersmissen's mortgage, Hasell's mort*gage, and with the value of her stock, which has been considered and allowed as a charge on the land at the time of the marriage. His real estate, therefore, of which she was dowable was its value after the payment of these then existing encumbrances," &c.

*158

But it is insisted that, although the lots were sold under orders of the court, they were not sold to provide the means for meeting the annuity to Elizabeth Shiell and furnishing her with a dwelling house as directed by the will. This was a question of fact, to be determined by a proper construction of the legal proceedings and the orders of sale made therein. Upon this subject the Circuit judge says: "It is, however, urged by the plaintiff that the sale under the decree in the cause was not for the purpose of paying off the annuity to Elizabeth Shiell, but for the improvements of the remaining portions of the lot, for the benefit of the complainants. I am, however, forced to the conclusion that the object of the proceedings and sale was to provide the means for meeting the annuity to Elizabeth Shiell and providing her with a dwelling house as directed by the will, and that the purchasers at the sale under the decree in said cause took the lots purchased by them, divested of plaintiff's inchoate right of dower therein," &c. We cannot say that this was error.

It may be true that the erection of the building enured incidentally to the benefit of the sons, in furnishing them as well as their mother a home, but we cannot doubt that the main object was to furnish a home for the mother and to raise the money to pay her annuity. It is quite certain that such sale was necessary to enable the devisees to perform their duty to their mother in reference to the charge. It is true that Mrs. Shiell did not herself file the bill to charge her annuity upon the lands. It was filed by her sons, the devisees, whose duty it was to raise the money to satisfy the charge, but Mrs. Shiell was made a party defendant, and all the parties being before the court, the same object could be accomplished in that way. We are not at liberty to assume, as suggested, that she waived her rights under her uncle's will. On the contrary, she joined in the prayer of the bill, and prayed affirmative relief, stating that "her annuity was due and unpaid since the year 1864."

It is true also, that the bill contains the statement, that the *complainants "were unable to make perfect titles to the said lots, inasmuch as they were limited over to Adam Edgar Hardy and Margaret Hardy in the event of both the devisees dying without child or children," &c.; but upon that subject nothing was said either in the prayer of the bill or the orders of court, and we cannot assume merely from the statement in the bill that the main object of the proceedings was to bar the rights of the remaindermen. If that were one of the purposes, it only arose out of the question of sale, which, for the purposes indicated, was clearly the main object of the proceedings.

*159

We also concur with the Circuit judge, that the second sale to the defendant Carderelli was only carrying out the purposes of the proceedings in the original case of William Shiell and John A. Shiell v. Elizabeth Shiell, et al. That sale was made for the express purpose of paying the balance still due for the erection of the building previously authorized.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court, in the case of Caroline M. Shiell v. John T. Sloan, jr., and John T. Seibels, and also in the case of Caroline M. Shiell v. Felix Carderelli and Emma Carderelli, be affirmed.

22 S. C. 159

JORDAN v. LANG.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Trial ⇐295.]
The meaning of one portion of a charge determined by comparison with another.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 703 717; Dec. Dig. ⇐295.]

[2. Waters and Water Courses ⇐137.]
The use of running water for irrigating purposes for twenty years establishes a prescription, although the same amount was not actually used during every year of that period.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 149; Dec. Dig. ⇐137.]

[3. Appeal and Error ⇐1066.]
Alleged error in a hypothetical charge not considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Dec. Dig. ⇐1066.]

[4. Trial ⇐256.]
An omission to charge a proposition not requested, not considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 628 641; Dec. Dig. ⇐256.]

[5. Waters and Water Courses ⇐139.]
An adverse use of water for twenty years against successive owners of the servient soil, is sufficient to establish a prescription.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. ⇐139.]

[6. Adverse Possession ⇐47.]
Ineffectual protests short of the assertion of a legal right can have no effect in preventing the presumption of a grant from adverse use, but rather tends to strengthen the character of the use as adverse.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 234; Dec. Dig. ⇐47.]

[7. Waters and Water Courses ⇐78.]
The owner of a dominant tenement has the right to divert and use so much water as he has by his labor added to the quantity in the running stream.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 69; Dec. Dig. ⇐78.]

*160

*Before Hudson, J., Kershaw, February, 1883.

This was an action by Valentine S. Jordan against Thomas W. Lang, commenced in 1882. The facts of the case appear in the opinion of this court.

At the trial the plaintiff submitted the following requests to charge:

I. That a riparian proprietor has the right to have a stream which passes into and through his land, to flow in a volume not materially diminished in quantity.

II. That plaintiff has the right to use the water of Jumping Gully Creek for purposes of irrigation, and that while defendant has the same right, he must return the water to its channel in a sufficient quantity for the use of plaintiff.

III. That Gillis Ditch is the natural channel of Jumping Gully Creek, the water having run in that channel for so long a time, and that the defendant should prove that there had been another channel, and that he or his privies in estate had made Gillis Ditch an artificial channel.

IV. That if the waters of Jumping Gully had run in Gillis Ditch for twenty years, that ditch thereby became a natural channel, and plaintiff has the right to have it to flow in that channel.

V. That to establish adverse use, the defendant must prove that during twenty years, he, or those under whom he claims, have used all the water of Jumping Gully Creek as they pleased; that they have so used it continuously every year; that such use prevented a like use by the plaintiff during all that time; and that such use was acquiesced in by the plaintiff all that time.

VI. That the jury may consider all protests against the use of the water by defendant, by the plaintiff, or other riparian proprietors, or any acts from which there may be inferred that he did not claim an adverse right, as rebutting that claim.

In answer to plaintiff's requests to charge, his honor said:

Request 1.—Correct.

Request 2.—I charge you that.

Request 3.—This is submitted to jury as a question of fact.

*161

*Request 4.—This depends on circumstances. If its running depends on the annual labor of Lang, the case would be altered.

Request 5.—I cannot charge you this, for it depends on circumstances. It is not necessary for defendant to prove that he used all the water, but only so much as he or they desired, or their wants required.

Request 6.—The jury must consider all the evidence, and give to it such force as they may deem it entitled to, but protests of the plaintiff against the defendant's use of the water for purposes of irrigation, if the use was persisted in in spite of these protests, is rather a circumstance going to show adverse use than to show the contrary.

The presiding judge charged that the proprietor of land through which a natural water course runs has the right to have the water of the stream flow into his land, so that he may use it for domestic purposes, irrigation, or in any other way he may need it. So that if the jury believed that the defendant diverted the waters of Jumping Gully Creek, running in what is called Gillis Ditch, and thereby caused the plaintiff to lose his rice crops, as he claimed, the plaintiff should have a verdict, unless the defendant had established a right to the use of the water by prescription or some other way. That defendant set up, in defence, the right to the water by adverse use for twenty years, and if he proved this to their satisfaction, plaintiff could not recover. Defendant claimed that he, and those under whom he claims, had for twenty years used the waters for irrigating rice. Such use must have been open, notorious, and without the acquiescence of plaintiff and those under whom he claims title. Any use of the water of the stream, by defendant and those under whom he claims title, by which they diverted from the stream any water which they could not return to it when it left their land, was injurious to plaintiff and therefore adverse and an unreasonable use of the water by defendant.

To establish such adverse use it was not necessary that defendant should prove that he, and those under whom he claimed title, had each year used all the water or any definite quantity of the waters of the creek, or in any definite manner; but it was sufficient if he proved that they had, during any year prior to the *one complained of, used all the water, or as much as was used that year, or could have used it through their gates if they wished, and they had, during the time, used such quantity of the water as they desired or their wants required; in other words, that they used and had vents of sufficient capacity to use all the water as they pleased for irrigation during the twenty years. It was not necessary to prove that the water was thus used continuously every year by them; but it was sufficient to prove that they were in the habit of using the water, and if they failed to use the water at any time, because their dams were out of order and needed repairs, or because their business did not require it, or they did not wish to use the water, such temporary break in the use did not defeat the prescription or interrupt the adverse use. Such use need not have been against the plaintiff during the whole twenty years, but it is sufficient if it was against those under whom plaintiff claims title for a portion of the time, provided they were of age and in a condition to assert their rights.

*162

The jury may consider all the evidence and give to it such force as they may consider it entitled to, but the protests of the plaintiff against the defendant's use of the water, if the use was persisted in in spite of those protests, is rather a circumstance going to show adverse use than the contrary. If the plaintiff had every day in the year gone to Lang and said: "Mr. Lang, I protest against the use you are making of the water of the creek, and forbid you so using it," but did not take steps to interrupt the use by some legal means, the continued use by defendant, in spite of these protests, only strengthens the adverse use. The same is true of the submission of the question of riparian rights to arbitration. The offer to submit, the arbitrators never having acted, and the fact that defendant persisted in the use of the water in spite of such offer to submit to arbitration, is a circumstance going to strengthen the adverse use, because the defendant's willingness to submit to arbitration might have been due to his consciousness of his right.

If the jury believe from the evidence that water passing through Gillis Ditch was created, or brought into use, by the annual labor of Lang and those under whom he claims, and but for the labor and expense of Lang and those under whom he *claims, it could not have been utilized, that would tend to give him the right to the use of the water, and if he does not disturb the natural flow, but increases it, he would have the right to such increase, as by annual purchase, and Jordan would not have the right to complain.

*163

The jury rendered a verdict for defendant, and plaintiff appealed.

Messrs. J. T. Hay and W. H. Lyles, for appellant.

Messrs. J. D. Kennedy and J. R. Abney, contra.

February 16, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action brought in 1882 against the defendant for diverting the water of Jumping Gully Creek, which, as the plaintiff alleged, he had the right to use and to have the same flow through his land in the natural and usual manner. The defendant's land lies above that of the plaintiff, and he admitted that in the dry year of 1881 he had used all the water as to which complaint was made in irrigating his rice fields, but insisted, first, that the water was not drawn from the natural stream of Jumping Gully Creek, but from an artificial channel known as "Gillis Ditch," which his ancestors, at least thirty years ago, had dug and banked and kept repaired through his land, in order to divert most of the water of the creek from its natural channel for their own use; that the plaintiff's land was not located on the creek proper, but below that of the defendant, and somewhere near the lower terminus of this artificial channel, and therefore plaintiff had no right to complain of defendant's use of water, which he and those under whom he claims had at great expense provided for themselves. And, second, if it should be determined that the plaintiff has any rights of the nature claimed in the water running in Gillis Ditch, then that the defendant had a prescriptive right to the use of the water for purposes of irrigation, arising from the use of the same by himself and those under whom he claims for more than thirty years.

The case came on for trial before Judge

*164

Hudson and a jury. *The plaintiff made requests to charge, some of which were charged as presented, some with modifications, and others were declined. Under the charge the jury found for the defendant and the plaintiff appeals. As to the first defence the judge charged that a riparian proprietor has the right to have a stream which passes through his land flow in a volume not materially diminished in quantity, and left it to the jury to say whether Gillis Ditch was the natural channel of Jumping Gully Creek, remarking that if the waters of Jumping Gully Creek had run in Gillis Ditch for more than twenty years, the ditch thereby became the natural channel, unless it was made to run there by the annual labor of Lang, the defendant. If they should find that the ditch was in fact Jumping Gully Creek, then the plaintiff had the right to use the water for the purposes of irrigation, and that while defendant had the same right it was incumbent on him to return the water to its channel in a quantity sufficient for the use of the plaintiff. As to the second defence, the prescriptive right to the use of the water claimed by the defendant, the character of the charge will be considered in the examination of the exceptions to it, which will be considered in their order.

The first exception charges that his honor erred in instructing the jury that such use of any of the water of Jumping Gully Creek by the defendant, so that he could not return it to the creek after it had been used, was an unreasonable use of said water, and as such adverse to plaintiff.

We are not quite sure that we clearly apprehend what is the meaning of this exception, but as we understand it, the alleged error consists in charging that the failure to return any of the water, even the one-thousandth part of the flow of the stream, was an unreasonable use of the water, and as such adverse to plaintiff. If this be the point made, we think it very manifest that the judge meant adverse quoad hoc, and nothing more. He says not returning "was an unreasonable use of said water, and (to that extent) was adverse." As matter of fact none of the water drawn from the ditch by the defendant was ever returned. It seems that the Langs, in digging Gillis Ditch to carry the water of the creek, located it on higher ground than the lowlands cultivated in rice, upon which the water was used, so that *when the water was drawn off it could never be returned, but passed in the opposite direction and fell into another (big) ditch. The defendant had the right to irrigate his fields and is not chargeable with what water was absorbed or evaporated, and none of the remainder was returned. We must consider all the parts of the charge as a whole, and we find that the judge adopted the second request to charge "that the plaintiff had the right to use the water of Jumping Gully Creek for the purpose of irrigation, and that while the defendant had the same right, he must return the water to its channel in a sufficient quantity for the use of the plaintiff."

*165

The second exception charges that "the judge erred in instructing the jury that the defendant, to establish adverse use as against the plaintiff, need not prove that he used any definite amount of water, or in any definite manner, but only that he and those under whom he claimed, used so much as he or they desired, or their wants required, during the twenty years." Under this charge the jury must have found that the defendant and those under whom he claimed used so much water as they required for twenty years—we suppose every year for that time. We think that was enough to establish the prescription without showing how much was used each year. Doubtless more was needed in one year than another, and there would always be difficulty in gauging the precise amount. In such cases the prescription is held to apply to the capacity rather than actual user. Cowell v. Thayer, 5 Metc., 258.

It seems to us that the easement to use water for the purpose of irrigation is somewhat analogous to that of backing water for mill privileges. In such cases the principle is thus stated by Chief Justice Shaw in the case above cited: "Upon the whole we think the true rule is this, that when one has acquired a prescriptive right to a constant mill privilege by keeping up and using a dam more than twenty years, which dam, in its usual operation, would raise the water to a given height, and has used it at his own pleasure at that height, without any claim of right on the part of any other person, to have it drawn, or kept drawn, for any part of the year, or upon any definite occasion, he has a right to retain it at the same height although from the former leaky con*dition of the dam, the rude construction of the machinery, or the lavish use and waste of the stream, the water has not in fact been constantly or usually kept up to that height. If, therefore, he repairs the dam without so changing it as to raise the water higher than the old dam when tight and in repair would raise it, or uses it in a different mode, and thereby keeps up the water more constantly than before, it is not a new use of the stream for which an adjacent owner can claim damages, but a use conformable to his prescriptive right," &c.

*166

The third exception is that his honor "erred in instructing the jury that the defendant, to establish adverse use, need not prove that he and those under whom he claims used the water of the creek continuously every year for twenty years, but it was sufficient for him to prove that he or they were in the habit of using the water, and if they failed so to use it any year on account of any accident, such as the breaking of the dam, or because their business did not require it, or they did not wish so to use it, that such break in the use did not defeat the prescription." This charge was entirely hypothetical, as it does not appear that there were any facts in the case tending to show that there was any neglect of, or accident to, the dam for a single year, or that there was any intention to abandon the use of the water. It was a question of intention. Parkins v. Dunham, 3 Strobh., 224.

The fourth exception relates to an alleged omission to charge upon a point not made in the requests, and therefore need not be considered.

The fifth exception complains that it was "error to instruct the jury that the adverse use did not have to be proved against the plaintiff during the twenty years; but if proved for twenty years against the plaintiff and those under whom he claims, it was sufficient to establish the prescription." The plaintiff did not acquire his title until 1864, nor commence regularly to cultivate rice (for which the water was desired) before 1879; so that unless the use of the defendant and those under whom he holds affected Whittaker, the grantor of plaintiff, there could be no easement as against the plaintiff or any recent purchaser. But the use in the manner and for the time required affected the land itself. "If there has been the use of an easement for twenty years unex*plained, it will be presumed to be under a claim of right and adverse, and be sufficient to establish a title by prescription, and to authorize the presumption of a grant, unless contradicted or explained," &c. Chalk v. McAlily, 11 Rich., 153; Angel, 214; Washburn, 157, 160; and the burden of proof is on the party resisting the claim after use for twenty years is proved. Washburn, 135, 136.

*167

The sixth exception complains that it was error to instruct the jury "that the protests of plaintiff against the use of the water by the defendant and the fact that controversies had arisen between the proprietors of the lands along the stream as to the use of the water, and the plaintiff and defendant and other proprietors had agreed to submit their rights to arbitration if the use was persisted in, have a tendency to show adverse use rather than the contrary; while it is contended that the facts shown should have been submitted to the jury as tending to show a non-acquiescence by the plaintiff in such use, and thereby rebutting the presumption of a grant," &c.

It appears that the complaint of McRae was not that the water which he had the right to use had been taken from him, but that his corn lands had been overflowed with too much water, and that the protests of the plaintiff were not probably made before he commenced cultivating rice in 1879, which was after the necessary use for twenty years had expired.

But if not, we do not see that the judge was in error. While the cases are not in accord upon the subject, it seems to us that the weight of authority is in favor of the proposition as announced by the judge, that ineffectual protests short of the assertion of a legal right can have no effect in preventing the presumption of a grant from adverse use, but rather tends to strengthen the character of the use as adverse. The question is fully considered in the case of Lehigh Valley R. R. Co. v. McFarlan, 43 N. J., 616, where it is said: "Protests and remonstrances by the owner of the servient tenement against the use of the easement rather add to the strength of the claim of a prescriptive right; for a holding in defiance of such expostulations is demonstrative proof that the enjoyment is under a claim of right hostile and adverse; and if they be not accompanied by *acts amounting to a disturbance of the right in a legal sense, they are no interruptions or obstructions of the enjoyment." Again, "If such protests and denials, unaccompanied by an act which in law amounts to a disturbance and is actionable as such, be permitted to put the right in abeyance, the policy of the law will be defeated, and prescriptive rights be placed upon the most unstable of foundations." Ibid, 629.

*168

The seventh and last exception complains that the "judge erred in instructing the jury that if it was proved that the quantity of water in the channel of Jumping Gully Creek was increased by the annual labor of defendant and those under whom he claimed, that the defendant might claim the right to use such water as by annual purchase, without further instructing them that such use must be limited to the quantity so increased, and that such annual purchase did not authorize the use of the entire creek." It seems that the only matter here objected to was an omission to charge expressly the limitation "as to the quantity so increased." As to this point there was no request to charge, and therefore the omission, if it was one, could not be the subject of exception as error. But it seems to us that the judge did make the limitation suggested in the charge itself admitted to have been given. He instructed the jury that if it was shown "that the quantity of water in the channel was increased by the annual labor of the defendant, he might claim the right to use such water as by annual purchase," &c.; "such water," that is to say the quantity of water which had been so added by labor, &c. The peculiarity of this case is that the Langs dug Gillis Ditch and kept the same in running order, and yet we have been under the necessity of applying to it some of the doctrines which properly belong only to natural streams. We cannot say that it was error of law to hold that the defendant had the right to use the water which he and his family caused to flow out of its natural into this artificial channel at least within the period of twenty years.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. *169

*CHILDS v. ALEXANDER.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Assignments ⟸121.]

The Code of Procedure has not made things legally assignable which were not so before, but has only adopted in all the courts the practice formerly existing in the Court of Equity; and therefore it is only where an assignment, however evidenced, makes the assignee the real party in interest that such assignee must sue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. §§ 200–205; Dec. Dig. ⟸121.]

[2. Mortgages ⟸417.]

Where A. and B. purchase a bond and mortgage and then take in their own names a second mortgage on the same land to secure the same debt, and afterwards A. dies, B. alone may maintain an action of foreclosure whether the money used by A. was her own or that of an estate of which she was executrix.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1236; Dec. Dig. ⟸417.]

[3. Executors and Administrators ⟸129.]

But where, under an order from B.'s administrator, the bonds and mortgages were delivered to C., as administrator de bonis non of the estate of B.'s testator, C., as such administrator, may in equity maintain an action of foreclosure, joining B. as a party defendant, he having declined to unite with C. as plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 533–536; Dec. Dig. ⟸129.]

[4. Evidence ⟸459.]

A party may show that notes and mortgages taken in her individual name in reality represented funds of an estate of which she was executrix.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1908; Dec. Dig. ⟸459.]

[5. Banks and Banking ⟸270.]

Interest alleged to be usurious having been paid to a national bank, the defence of usury cannot afterwards, in action by the assignee of such bank, be interposed as a defence pro tanto, i. e., to the extent of the usurious interest so paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. § 1031; Dec. Dig. ⟸270.]

[6. Mortgages ⟸415.]

An outstanding claim of dower pending in suit is no ground for abatement of price in action brought by the vendor to foreclose the purchase money mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Lessly v. Bowie, 27 S. C. 197, 200, 3 S. E. 199; Moss v. Jefferies, 32 S. C. 199, 10 S. E. 939; Bethune v. McDonald, 35 S. C. 94, 14 S. E. 674; Computing Scales Co. v. Long, 66 S. C. 382, 44 S. E. 963, 65 L. R. A. 294; Coleman v. Whittle, 79 S. C. 213, 216, 60 S. E. 523, 128 Am. St. Rep. 841; Brown v. Thompson, 81 S. C. 382, 62 S. E. 440; Godfrey v. E. P. Burton Lumber Co., 88 S. C. 138, 70 S. E. 396.

For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1221; Dec. Dig. ⟸415.]

[7. Judicial Sales ⟸4.]

In counties where the office of master does not exist, the court may order a sale for foreclosure to be made by the sheriff.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Fort v. Assmann, 38 S. C. 257, 16 S. E. 887.

For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. § 16; Dec. Dig. ⟸4.]

[8. Assignments ⟸121.]

[Under the Code, the assignee of a contract may sue on it in his own name.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. § 201; Dec. Dig. ⟸121.]

[9. Assignments ⟸129.]

[Under the Code, which has abolished the distinctions between law and equity, an assignee of a part of a contract may join with the assignor in suing on it.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. § 219; Dec. Dig. ⟸129.]

Before Fraser, J., Chester, October, 1883.

This was an action for the foreclosure of two mortgages given by the same defendant on the same land to secure the same indebtedness. The action was commenced in February, 1883.

The cause was referred to A. G. Brice, Esq., as referee, who, after a statement of the facts to be found in the opinion of this court, reported as follows:

The first issue raised is as to the right of the plaintiff, as administrator de bonis non of R. A. Springs, to maintain this action. It is claimed by defendant, Alexander, that as his mortgage is made to S. Jane Conner, and signed by her under seal, the loan must have been out of her individual funds, and and *would be estopped from denying that the mortgage was her individual property. I thought admissible and received evidence to show that Mrs. Conner made the investment, and took the mortgage in trust for the estate of her testator. From the testimony of G. J. Patterson, who was Mrs. Conner's attorney, and acted for her in making the investment, and collecting a payment thereon, and from the fourth annual return of Mrs. Conner, as executrix, it appears that the $1,572 invested by her in the purchase of the Alexander note, was money belonging to the estate of her testator, and that the note and mortgage of Alexander were treated by her as an investment of the undistributed assets of said estate. And the mortgage and other papers in this case seem to have been delivered to the plaintiff as assets of the estate of R. A. Springs, by agreement with, and order of, the administrator of Mrs. Conner.

*170

My conclusion is that the note and mortgage belong to the undistributed assets of the estate of R. A. Springs, and must have been received and held by Mrs. Conner as executrix for said estate. But the plaintiff is the guardian of his wife, who is the daughter and residuary legatee of Mrs. Conner, and by the agreement of the plaintiff with F. A.

Conner, the administrator with the will annexed of Mrs. Conner, the note and mortgage herein, if they had been part of the individual estate of Mrs. Conner, have been delivered to plaintiff, and are held by him as a portion of her residuary estate, bequeathed to his wife and ward, so that in any event he holds the legal title in trust.

Giles J. Patterson, a joint mortgagee with Mrs. Conner in the mortgage made to them by Alexander, refused to join in the action as plaintiff; he was properly made a defendant, and the mortgage can be thus foreclosed and his interest in the mortgaged premises barred in this action.

The third issue raised is that the administrator of Geo. W. Melton is a necessary party to this action. This altogether depends upon the terms of the assignments from Melton to Clark and from Clark to Patterson. These assignments are absolute and unqualified, though they were made as an indemnity, and according to the rules laid down in Pomeroy's Remedies the administrator of Melton would not be a necessary party in this *action. It would only add to the costs of the case to bring him in as a party. The record in this action will show that Alexander's bond and mortgage to Melton have been fully exhausted under his assignment, and that the latter's administrator could not have any interest in it, which will be full protection to the defendant.

*171

The rate at which the notes of Melton and Alexander were discounted in the Carolina National was fifteen per cent. per annum: the defendant alleges that this rate was usurious, and that the whole amount of interest so paid on these notes and their renewals can be offset or recouped in this action, and thus deducted from the plaintiff's claim.

[Here follows a quotation from the national banking act, citation of numerous authorities upon the subject of usury in discount by national banks, and the conclusion reached that the defence cannot prevail.]

The last issue raised is as to the right of the defendant to set off in this action the dower claimed by Mrs. Heald as breach of the covenant of warranty in Melton's deed to him for the mortgaged premises. Whenever dower is recovered against the defendant, there will be a plain breach of Melton's covenant of warranty to him, and this breach can be set up as an offset or counter-claim pro tanto in an action by the assignees, upon defendant's bond, given for the purchase money of the land. But the direct cause of action in this case is, not upon the bond for the purchase money, but upon Alexander's note, purchased from the bank, and his mortgage to Mrs. Conner and Patterson. For some purposes it might be regarded that Alexander had paid his bond and mortgage to Melton for the purchase money the time he made the new mortgage to Mrs. Conner and released the endorsers upon his note, and it would not have affected the rights of the parties to this action if that bond and mortgage had been then cancelled.

I therefore find as matters of fact:

1st. That the note and mortgage sued on are the property of the estate of R. A. Springs, deceased, and of the defendant, G. J. Patterson.

2d. That the defendant, G. J. Patterson, refused to join in this action as a plaintiff.

*172

*3d. That the rate of interest at which the Melton and Alexander notes were discounted at the Carolina National Bank was fifteen per cent. per annum.

4th. That the deed from Melton to the defendant, Alexander, for the mortgaged premises, contained the usual covenant of warranty, and that the bond of Alexander to Melton spoken of herein, was given for part of the purchase price of said premises.

5th. That one Mrs. Heald is now prosecuting an action for dower in a part of the mortgage premises.

And as matters of law:

1st. That the plaintiff, as administrator de bonis non, with the will annexed of R. A. Springs, can maintain this action.

2d. That G. J. Patterson, being an unwilling plaintiff, was properly made a party defendant.

3d. That the administrator of Geo. W. Melton is not a necessary party to this action.

4th. That though the interest paid by Geo. W. Melton and defendant, Alexander, to the Carolina National Bank upon their notes was illegal and usurious, it is now barred by the lapse of more than two years from the payment thereof, and cannot be recovered back, or offset in this action.

5th. That the claim of dower made by Mrs. Heald is not an offset or counter-claim to this action.

6th. That the amount due and unpaid on the note and mortgage of defendant, Alexander, at this date, is three thousand and seven hundred and forty-five and 18-100 dollars ($3.745.18), of which twenty-four hundred and fifty-three and 10-100 dollars ($2,-453.10) is the property of the plaintiff, and the balance, twelve hundred and ninety-two and 8-100 dollars ($1,292.08), is the property of the defendant, Giles J. Patterson, and that the plaintiff and Giles J. Patterson are entitled to recover the respective amounts as aforesaid in this action.

To this report the defendant, Alexander, filed the following exceptions:

1. Because the referee admitted in evidence the fourth annual return of Mrs. Sarah J. Conner as executrix of R. A. Springs in order to contradict the recital of the mortgage made by C. H. Alexander to Giles J. Patterson and S. Jane Conner by showing *that said note and mortgage was in part the property of the estate of R. A. Springs, and not of Mrs. S. Jane Conner, and because he admitted the testimony of Giles J. Patterson for the same purpose.

*173

2. Because the referee erred in finding as matter of law and fact, that the legal title to the note and mortgage of Alexander was in L. D. Childs, the plaintiff, as administrator de bonis non, with the will annexed, of the estate of R. A. Springs, in contradiction of the mortgage signed by Mrs. S. Jane Conner and G. J. Patterson.

3. Because the referee did not find that the legal title to said note and mortgage was in F. A. Conner, as administrator, with the will annexed, of Mrs. S. Jane Conner.

4. Because if said referee did not find that said note and mortgage was the property of the estate of Mrs. S. Jane Conner, that he did not then find that said note and mortgage had passed to her daughter, Mary Elizabeth Springs (now Childs, wife of the plaintiff), under the residuary clause of the will of Mrs. Conner.

5. Because referee found that the plaintiff in this action, as administrator of Springs, could maintain the action.

6. Because he found that if the plaintiff had not the legal title to the note and mortgage, as administrator of Springs, yet as guardian of his wife, Mary Elizabeth Childs, the residuary legatee, he was entitled to recover in his present form of action.

7. Because the referee erred in finding that Giles J. Patterson could be a party defendant in this action to foreclose the mortgage of C. H. Alexander to George W. Melton, of May 17, 1876, as the said bond and mortgage were assigned to Giles J. Patterson alone, and he is the only person entitled to prosecute the action as party plaintiff.

8. Because Giles J. Patterson not having answered the complaint, or claimed any affirmative relief in this action, has no right to recover in these proceedings.

9. Because the original note of George W. Melton discounted at the Carolina National Bank was $5,068.75—discounted for thirty days at 15 per cent., and the net proceeds of which being five thousand dollars, and the interest reserved being $68.75, the referee erred in not finding that the transaction was usurious *under the national bank law, and the taint of usury affected all the notes given in renewal of and substitution for the original note, and this defendant was entitled to recoup all of the illegal interest either renewed or paid to said bank.

*174

10. That the referee erred in holding as matter of law, that under the national bank law, this defendant is barred from a recoupment of the usurious interest reserved by the Carolina National Bank from the amount of the defendant's bond and mortgage, because two years and more have elapsed since the usurious contract of lending was made.

11. Because the referee erred in not allowing the defendant to set up as a defence to the recovery in this action on the bond and mortgage of May 17, 1876, made by C. H. Alexander to George W. Melton, by him assigned to W. A. Clark, and by him assigned to G. J. Patterson, that the defendant holds a warranty title from George W. Melton to a house and lot in the town of Chester, covered by both mortgages sought to be foreclosed, and that an action has been commenced in the Probate Court against the defendant by Anna Heald for her dower in said house and lot, and that he erred in not allowing the defendant to set off against said bond for the purchase money of said lot in part, any recovery which may be had against him by said Mrs. Heald in said Probate Court.

The plaintiff also excepted to the referee's report, upon the ground that the referee erred in reporting and finding that a national bank in this state during the years 1876 and 1877 could not lawfully charge or receive a higher rate of interest than 7 per cent. per annum, even when the contract for specific interest of a higher rate was reduced to writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith.

The Circuit decree upon these exceptions was as follows:

This case was heard by me at the term of the Court of Common Pleas held for Chester County in October, 1883. The case came up on a report of A. G. Brice, special referee, and exceptions filed by plaintiff and the defendant Alexander, the co-defendant Patterson not having answered the complaint.

The exceptions of the defendant Alexander will be considered first, and in the order in which they are stated. The exceptions *really are not taken to the findings of facts by the referee, but to the legal effects of the facts set out in the report. The facts are so fully set out that it is not important to re-state them here.

*175

Exception 1. It appears to me to be clearly competent to show, by the acts and declarations of Mrs. Conner, that a bond, note, or mortgage held by her in her life-time, and payable to her individually in whole or in part, was in fact, as to so much thereof as was so held, an investment of funds belonging to the estate of R. A. Springs, of whose will she was executrix; or, that having been originally an investment of her own funds, they were set apart by her as an investment for the estate. This exception is overruled.

Exceptions 2 and 3. Even if Mrs Conner had been the owner of these claims at her death in her own right, and not as executrix, it was entirely competent for her executor, F. A. Conner, to turn them over on a settlement to the plaintiff as administrator de bonis non cum test. annexo of R. A. Springs, in payment for funds held by her in her life-time for that estate. This transfer would be a sufficient title for plaintiff in this action. These exceptions are overruled.

Exception 4. If these claims had ever been the property of Mrs. Conner, and had been given in her will to her daughter, Mrs. Childs, the title of the latter would not be complete until there is an assent to the legacy by the executor, of which there is no proof. This exception is overruled.

Exception 5. This exception has been disposed of above, and is overruled.

Exception 6. This exception would have been well taken if plaintiff had no other valid title on which to stand, as neither Mrs. Childs nor the plaintiff, as her guardian, has shown any title to the property, except as she may be interested in it as legatee.

Exceptions 7 and 8. I regard it as clearly established by the evidence in the case, that the mortgage of Alexander to Geo. W. Melton was assigned to W. A. Clark, as collateral security to himself and others, as endorsers on the original note, and that the same was transferred by W. A. Clark to Patterson for the purpose of securing himself and Mrs. Conner, who had taken up the original note, the note having been transferred to them by the *bank; the bond and mortgage held as security passed with it, as a matter of course, unless there was some agreement to the contrary; the only proper way, therefore, when Patterson refused to become a party plaintiff, was to make him a defendant, as has been done here, and the court is bound to adjudge to him all the rights which are established in his favor, even if he fails to answer. These exceptions are overruled.

*176

Exceptions 9 and 10. The usurious interest complained of in these exceptions has already been paid to the bank, and the defendant, Alexander, now proposes to set up the amount as pro tanto a defence against the note in the hands of the assignees of the bank, and in an action to which the bank is not a party. I regard this question as definitely settled in the recent case of Driesback v. Nat. Bank, and Stark v. Nat. Bank, 104 U. S., 52. The Supreme Court of the United States in these cases says "this cannot be done." These exceptions are overruled.

Exception 11. It is claimed that there ought to be an abatement on the claims in consequence of a suit for dower now pending in favor of a Mrs. Heald, the wife of one who had been seized of the mortgaged premises, before Melton bought and conveyed to Alexander. The authorities referred to by counsel do not sustain his position. In Polk v. Sumter, 2 Strob., 81, the action was for specific performance, and in Jeter v. Glenn, 9 Rich., 381, and Lewis v. Lewis, 5 Rich., 12, there had been an eviction, before suit brought on the warranty. In Whitworth v. Stuckey, 1 Rich. Eq., 409, Chancellor Harper says: "The law courts, it is said, will not grant an abatement of price, in such case, in a suit for the purchase money. I have no doubt that the decisions of the law courts were perfectly correct, but with proper deference, I think the dicta of some of the judges, that relief will be afforded in equity are founded on a mistaken view. Relief is to be afforded in no court, because there is no grievance."

It is to be remembered, however, that there are, in this case, two mortgages of the same land—one given originally to Melton, who warranted the title to Alexander, and one given by Alexander subsequently on the same land, and to secure the same debt in the hands of Mrs. Conner, and the defendant Patterson, who had no more to do with

*177

Melton's warranty than with the warran*ty of any other land Alexander may have owned, and which in the same way he may have mortgaged to secure this debt. This exception, therefore, is overruled; having held that the interest paid to the bank on these notes cannot be set up as a defence in this action, it is not necessary to consider whether it was or was not usurious under the act of Congress.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the report of the referee be confirmed, so far as it affects the rights of the plaintiff and the defendant Patterson, to recover under the mortgages in this case. It is further ordered and adjudged, that the mortgaged premises described in the complaint in this action, or so much as may be sufficient to pay the amount reported to be due, with interest thereon, and the sum of ——— dollars, costs, and the expenses of sale, be sold by the sheriff of Chester County, after due advertisement, on sales day in February next, etc.

To this decree defendant Alexander excepted upon the same grounds substantially as were taken in his exceptions to the referee's report, with the additional exception that "his honor erred in ordering the land sold by the sheriff of Chester County, and not by the clerk of the court for said county."

Mr. S. P. Hamilton, for appellant.

Mr. T. C. Gaston, contra.

February 24, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The facts of this case, so far as is necessary to the proper understanding of the judgment herein, are as follows: George W. Melton, in May, 1876, discounted his note in the Carolina National Bank of Columbia, for the sum of $5,068.75, receiving a net amount of $5,000, the interest for thirty days from date, at fifteen per cent., amounting to $68.-75, having been added to and embraced in the note. The note was payable to J. E. Curtis & Co., and was by them endorsed, with the defendant, Alexander, Robison & Atkinson, I. L. Gunhouse, and W. A. Clark as second, third, fourth, and fifth endorsers. This note was afterwards renewed by Melton at thirty days. At the time of the discount, Melton pledged as *collateral a bond and mortgage on C. H. Alexander for $5,-000, executed by Alexander on the purchase from Melton of a tract of land situate in Chester County and a house and lot in the town of Chester, which property was covered by said mortgage.

*178

Melton died in July, 1876, before his renewal note fell due. On January 3, 1877, W. A. Clark, one of the endorsers on Melton's note and the attorney of the bank, received from Alexander on the Alexander bond, held as collateral as above stated, the sum of $2,149, which, after being credited thereon, was applied to the Melton note, first to the accrued interest and discount amounting to $423.28, and the balance, $1,725.70, to the principal, leaving a balance thereon of $3,274.30. This last note was taken up or renewed by Alexander on March 29, 1877, at sixty days, with interest at 15 per cent., the discount amounting to $77.75, which was paid in cash. This was again renewed on May 3, 1877, maturing July 5 thereafter, on which day it was again renewed at sixty days for $3,274.70, maturing October 6, at 15 per cent., the discount amounting to $126.-85, paid in cash.

Several payments were then made by Alexander, when finally it was transferred on November 3, 1877, to G. J. Patterson, upon his paying to the bank the balance then due, i. e., $2,400. This payment was made by Patterson, as it appears, out of funds belonging partly to himself and partly to Mrs. S. J. Conner, wife of F. Conner, in the proportion of $828 to $1,572. The note was delivered by the bank to Patterson, for himself and Mrs. Conner, as executrix of her former husband, Richard Springs; but there was no written assignment endorsed or made. Some days after this transfer to Patterson—i. e., on November 10, 1877—Alexander recognized the transfer, and to secure payment of the note to Mrs. Conner and Patterson, executed to them a mortgage of the tract of land and house and lot embraced in the prior mortgage to Melton, mentioned above, in which it was stated that Mrs. Conner and Patterson had purchased the bank note in the proportion of $828 by Patterson and $1,-572 by Mrs. Conner; that Clark had transferred and assigned to Patterson, for himself and Mrs. Conner, the bond and mortgage of Alexander to Melton, held by the bank as collateral, in consideration of which the endorsers had been released, and that it was agreed *between the parties that payment of the principal of said bank note now held by Patterson and Mrs. Conner should be postponed until November 3, 1879, with interest at 12 per cent. from the day of the purchase, to be paid annually. This mortgage containing these recitals was executed by Alexander and was signed "S. J. Conner, by Patterson & Gaston, attorneys," and by Giles J. Patterson, all under seal. On the bond and mortgage of Alexander to Melton several endorsements appeared, one from Melton assigning them to W. A. Clark, and others signed by Clark, the first acknowledging that he held them as collateral to the bank note of Melton, one crediting the payments made by Alexander, and a third assigning the papers to Patterson as collateral to the note purchased by Patterson from the bank.

*179

Some time after this transaction, Mrs. Conner died testate, and her husband administered with the will annexed. At the time of her death she was executrix of her former husband, Richard A. Springs. She left surviving her a daughter by her first husband, who some time before her death had intermarried with the plaintiff, Lysander D. Childs. Upon the death of Mrs. Conner, Childs administered with the will annexed on the estate of the said Springs. Some controversy arising between F. Conner and Childs as to the assets of the two estates which they respectively represented, it was finally agreed between them that the papers in the hands of Patterson & Gaston, attorneys for Mrs. Conner in her life-time, should be turned over to Childs; or at least Conner gave to Childs an order on these attorneys for all notes, bonds, and mortgages, and other choses in action, money or other assets belonging either to the estate of R. A. Springs or to that of Mrs. Conner, under which order the note and two mortgages now in suit, with other assets, were delivered to Childs, who soon thereafter instituted the action below, in his name.

In the complaint it is stated that Patterson having refused to unite as plaintiff, was therefore made a defendant. It was also stated that the interest of S. J. Conner in the bond and mortgage sued on had been duly assigned, transferred, and delivered to the plaintiff, Childs, as administrator, and that he was the legal and real owner thereof. It was further stated that the plaintiff and Giles J. Patterson were the owners and holders of *the bond and mortgage which had been held by W. A. Clark, as collateral to the Melton note, and which had been assigned by Clark to Patterson, and the plaintiff had demanded judgment against the defendant, that both mortgages be foreclosed, that the premises be sold and the proceeds be applied to the payment of the note and costs, and in case said proceeds proved insufficient, then that execution issue in favor of the plaintiff and the said Patterson against the said C. H. Alexander for the balance. Patterson failed to answer.

*180

The case was referred to A. G. Brice, special referee, whose report was excepted to by both sides. At the trial, testimony was offered by the plaintiff to prove that the funds of Mrs. Conner used by Patterson in the purchase of the note sued on belonged to the estate of her former husband, Richard A. Springs, and that the purchase was an investment by her as executrix of said estate. This testimony was objected to by the defendant as contradicting the recitals in the mortgage of Alexander to Mrs. Conner and Patterson, which, as we have stated, had been signed by all of the parties.

The defendant relied upon the following defences: 1st. That Lysander D. Childs, as administrator de bonis non of Richard A. Springs, had no legal title to either of the bonds and mortgages mentioned in the pleadings, but that Patterson was the legal owner, holding as trustee of an express trust for the benefit of Mrs. Conner during her life, and after her death for her daughter, Mrs. Childs, her legatee, and that he alone could sue. 2d. That the note sued on, as well as the original note from which it sprang, was usurious, and that C. H. Alexander had been sued for dower in the house and lot purchased from Melton, which suit was then pending; and he demanded (1) that the complaint be dismissed, but failing in this, that then John J. McLure, administrator of Melton, should be made a party; (2) that the amount of the usurious interest in the notes be ascertained and deducted from the recovery; and (3) that the defendant be allowed the right to set off any recovery that may be decreed against him by the Probate Court in the pending dower suit, and for such other and further relief as shall be meet.

Upon hearing the report of the referee, with the exceptions *thereto, the Circuit judge held that the action as brought with Childs as plaintiff and Patterson as defendant could be maintained. He further held that the testimony introduced by plaintiff as to the investment by Mrs. Conner of estate funds was competent, and upon the merits he ruled that whether the notes were usurious or not, yet the alleged usurious interest having been paid to the bank, could not now be set up against the assignee of the bank; relying on Driesbach v. National Bank and Stark v. National Bank, 104 U. S., 52 [26 L. Ed. 658]. He also ruled that the pending dower suit could not be interposed; and he ordered and adjudged that the report of the referee, so far as it affected the rights of the plaintiff Childs and the defendant Patterson, be confirmed; that the mortgaged premises be sold by the sheriff, the proceeds to be applied, after payment of costs, to the claims of the plaintiff and the defendant Patterson, according to the amounts found due them respectively, the balance, if any, to be paid to the defendant Alexander. The appeal assigns error to these rulings and holdings, with the additional ground that his honor erred in ordering the land to be sold by the sheriff instead of the clerk.

*181

Did the plaintiff have the right to maintain the action as brought? is the first question At common law actions on contracts could be brought only by the person having the legal title thereto, and as a contract at common law, was regarded as a mere right to go to law, and as that law forbade the sale of a mere right to sue, it followed that no one but the party with whom the contract was made could enforce it by action; and therefore in general, upon all contracts, whether express or implied, whether by parol, or under seal, or of record, the action, if action was necessary, had to be brought in the name of the original payee or obligee, whether the contract has been assigned or not. True, in negotiable paper payable to order or bearer, an apparent exception was made allowing the action to be brought in the name of the endorsee or bearer; this, however, was allowed, not so much as an exception, but rather in accordance with the original rule, because when the note in its terms was made payable to order or bearer, whoever became endorsee or bearer, became at the same time the promisee, and consequently the legal owner. But notwithstanding this common law rule which was invariably *enforced in the Courts of Common Pleas, yet the practice in equity was always different, and the rule prevailed there that the assignee, who was regarded as the real party in interest, could sue in his own name. And by special act in certain contracts the action might be brought in the name of the assignee or assignor as the parties might elect, even in the Common Pleas.

*182

Thus stood the law in our state when the code was adopted in which it was provided (with certain exceptions) that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest. What was the intention of this provision? It was certainly not the intent that in all the cases where the real and beneficial interest was in one and the legal title in another, that the action must, or even could, be brought in the name of the real party in interest. Because if such was the imperative requirement in every such case, as Mr. Bliss says, great inconvenience would often arise, and representative and express trusts might be practically destroyed. For example, as he further says: "An administrator has less interest in collecting the assets than a creditor or distributee, yet he must bring the action; and there are many other cases where if the beneficiary, who is the real party in interest, could bring the action in his own name, he might, against the will of the trustee, and contrary to the objects of the trust, be able to control the property and destroy the trust."

So that the code, in our opinion, when it provided and enacted in general terms that "every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest," except as otherwise provided therein (§ 132), was intended to apply principally to the cases of assignments of contract, or rather to rights of action capable of assignment, and in that way to meet the difficulty which existed at common law, where, as we have seen, the assignee, although after assignment to him he was in truth the real and only party in interest, yet could not sue in his own name. In other words, this section of the code was intended to adopt in all the courts the practice which formally prevailed in the Court of Equity on this subject. The code, however, has not gone to the extent of making things legally assignable which were not so before, but it simply declares that when a transfer or an assignment has been made, which in equity has the effect of making *the assignee the real party in interest, that then such assignee must sue. Whether such an assignment has been made or not in a special case is always a question of fact, which may be evidenced by a written endorsement or assignment on the paper, or it may be shown by other competent testimony. It may be made, too, on a separate paper, by a verbal sale, or by manual delivery.

*183

Now apply these principles to the facts of this case with reference to the note of C. H. Alexander, purchased by Patterson, and the mortgage subsequently executed by Alexander to Mrs. Conner and Patterson to secure the same. There was no written assignment of the note by the bank to any one. It appears, however, from the testimony that it was purchased by funds which belonged respectively to Mrs. Conner and Patterson, and that it was delivered to Patterson for himself and Mrs. Conner, thereby making Patterson and Mrs. Conner the real parties in interest, and therefore under the code entitled to sue in their own names; and they were named as the obligee and promisee in the mortgage of Alexander to them. Had the action then been commenced in the lifetime of Mrs. Conner, unless brought in the name of the two, it would have been defective and demurrable, except that if either one refused to unite as plaintiff, the party refusing might have been made a defendant under the code.

But Mrs. Conner died before suit brought; what was then the interest of the parties? Under the old practice and authorities there can be no doubt that upon the death of Mrs. Conner the whole interest survived and became vested in Patterson, who, at common law, could alone have been recognized as entitled to recover, with a responsibility thrown upon him to settle with the representatives of the deceased. Such being the case, the representative character of neither Childs nor F. Conner would give either of them the right to unite in the suit with Patterson; because, supposing that the funds invested by Mrs. Conner in the note and mortgage to have belonged to her personally, or as executrix of Richard A. Springs, her death severed her connection and left Patterson as survivor, the holder of these papers.

Childs, however, does not claim by virtue of his representative character. True, he sues as administrator of Richard Springs, *but he claims by assignment to him as such administrator of the interest of Mrs. Conner. Has he shown such an assignment? The evidence on that subject is, that the bank note, with the mortgage, were delivered to him as administrator de bonis non of Richard Springs, by Patterson & Gaston, attorneys of Mrs. Conner, under an order from F. A. Conner, administrator of Mrs. Conner. After this delivery the action was commenced, Childs alleging in his complaint that he is the owner of the interest of Mrs. Conner and of the interest of Richard Springs, the same having been duly assigned and transferred to him as administrator de bonis non; and Patterson in his testimony admits the right of Childs as claimed. This seems to be sufficient evidence of the assignments, but then it is an assignment of only a part of the note and mortgage, i. e., Mrs. Conner's portion.

*184

Under this state of facts, a question arises, what is the effect of a partial assignment of a contract, note, or mortgage, as to the right of action in the parties interested? Can the contract be split in this way so as to make the debtor liable to two or more actions and against his consent? We think not, nor could, under the old practice, the partial assignee, so to speak, have joined in the suit with the assignor, and this principle is still adhered to in some of the states, even where the code has been adopted. Cable v. St. Louis Marine Railway & Dock Co., 21 Mo., 133. But in equity such an assignee was regarded as having an equitable interest, which, under the equity practice, could be enforced in the courts of equity, the assignor and debtor both being made parties, just as, before the code authorized the real party in interest in assignments of an entire contract to sue at law, equity had allowed such assignee to sue in equity. We see no reason, then, why under the code, since all distinction between law and equity as to the mode of procedure has been abolished, a partial assignee may not join with the assignor, in pursuit of his partial interest, as well as to sue alone when the whole contract has been transferred to him, especially as one of the objects of the code, in establishing but one mode of procedure, was to bring into operation the equity practice as far as practicable in all courts and actions.

This seems to be the law in some of the states where the code *has been adopted, notably in Indiana and California (Lapping v. Duffy, 47 Ind., 51; Grain v. Aldrich, 38 Cal., 514; Bliss, Code Pl., § 65), and we can see no legal objection to it, and it is applicable as well to the Alexander-Melton mortgage embraced in the suit, as to the other papers, all of them having been delivered by Patterson to Childs under the same circumstances.

*185

Under this view of the case it is unnecessary to discuss the competency of the testimony excepted to, as whether the funds invested by Mrs. Conner belonged to the estate of her husband or to herself, makes no difference. But even if this testimony was material, there can be no reason growing out of the doctrine of estoppel, or any established rule of evidence, why such testimony should be excluded.

Next, as to the usurious interest. The Circuit judge declined to discuss this question, holding as he did, under the cases referred to, 104 U. S. Reports, that the interest alleged to be usurious having already been paid to the bank, the defence of usury could not now be set up against an assignee of the bank. The cases relied on by the Circuit judge seem to be clear and definite on this point; it is needless therefore to prolong this opinion by a discussion of the question of the fact of usury.

Finally, an abatement is claimed on account of the pending suit for dower before eviction. We need not do more in reference to this than to cite the case of Whitworth v. Stuckey (1 Rich. Eq., 409), where Chancellor Harper, in delivering the opinion of the court in a similar defence before eviction, said: "The law courts will not grant an abatement of price in such case, in a suit for the purchase money. I have no doubt," says he, "that the decision of the law courts was perfectly correct, but with proper deference, I think the dicta of some of the judges that such relief will be afforded in equity are founded on a mistaken view. Relief is to be afforded in no court, because there is no grievance."

The last exception assigns error to the sale of the premises ordered to be made by the sheriff, the appellant contending that the clerk should make the sale. In the General Statutes, chapter entitled "County Sheriff," the following sections are found: "Sec. 691. All judicial sales shall be made by the sheriff, unless otherwise provided by law," &c.

*186

"Sec. 692. In all sales by said *sheriff under the order of Courts of Common Pleas, or under the order of the Courts of Probate, the fees of said sheriff shall be the same as now fixed by law for sales under executions issuing from Courts of Common Pleas." The phrase in the above section "judicial sales" certainly meant other sales than those by execution, because many of the foregoing sections in this chapter in prescribing the duties of the sheriff, had already provided for sales by execution, and these two sections, if they stood alone, in the absence of any other act providing otherwise, would be construed to mean that all sales made by direct order of the court (and in that sense judicial), would be made by the sheriff.

In the code, however, are found other sections, which certainly leave the question in considerable doubt, if not producing absolute uncertainty. Section 307 of the code provides, "that in all sales under order of the court, where the title is to be made by the clerk of the court, such sales shall be made by the clerk; all other judicial sales shall be made by the sheriff." And "in those counties where the office of master exists, the master shall make all sales ordered by the court in cases granting equitable relief, conformable to the practice of the Circuit Courts or to the practice of the Courts of Equity of this State before said courts were abolished." Now, section 691 of the General Statutes, supra, providing as it does that all judicial sales shall be made by the sheriff, unless otherwise provided by law, evidently intended and supposed that in such sales (judicial) the legislature might make other provisions; but until this was done the sheriff should sell.

Section 307 of the code, supra, has made other provision, but to what extent has it changed the previous act? Section 691 is the difficulty. It says first, that in all sales ordered by the court, where title is to be made by the clerk of the Circuit Court, the clerk shall make the sale. Second, that all other judicial sales shall be made by the sheriff, as now provided by law. And third, that in counties where masters exist, the master shall make all sales ordered by the court, in granting equitable relief. The change made, then, consists in requiring the clerk to sell where the clerk is to make the titles, and the master to sell where a sale is ordered by the court in a case granting equitable relief. In all other judicial sales, the sheriff is to sell as now provided by law, *i. e., as provided in section 691, General Statutes, supra. The question of the sale by the master is not involved here, as there was no master in Chester County, but the difficulty arises upon the change above which declares that the clerk shall make the sale where he is to make the titles.

*187

When is the clerk to make titles? We know of no distinct class of cases in which by positive law the clerk is required to execute the titles. If there was such a law, and it covered a case of this kind, a sale under foreclosure proceedings, then it would be clear that the order of the judge directing the sheriff to sell would be error, but in the absence of such a law it would seem as if the sheriff was bound to sell under section 691 of the General Statutes, as that section expressly declares that in all judicial sales, unless otherwise provided by law, the sheriff should sell. We suppose it would be competent for a Circuit judge to order titles to be made by the clerk, in any sale made under a Circuit decree, and in such case the clerk should make the sale under section 307 of the code, supra; but in the absence of such order as to titles, and of any law defining when the clerk shall make titles, as matter of law, it would seem that the sheriff is the proper officer to make the sales in counties where the office of master does not exist. The Circuit judge did not direct the clerk to make titles below. The best that we can make, therefore, of the sections of the acts applicable to the question discussed is that there was no legal error in his ordering the sale to be made by the sheriff.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 187

BAUSKETT v. KEITT.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Trial ⟸295.]

In considering alleged errors in a charge, the charge must be considered as a whole, and not in detached portions.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Wallace v. Columbia & G. R. Co., 37 S. C. 343, 16 S. E. 35; Madden v. Port Royal & W. C. Ry. Co., 41 S. C. 452, 19 S. E. 951, 20 S. E. 65.

For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 703–717; Dec. Dig. ⟸295.]

[2. Wills ⟸290.]

Where a will is traced to the possession of testator, but cannot be found after his death, there arises a presumption of destruction by him; this, however, is a presumption of fact, rebuttable by evidence. If the depositories of the deceased pass into the custody of the heirs at law, *and his papers are first examined by them, this does not, as matter of law, rebut the presumption, but is a circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining this question of fact.

*188

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 663; Dec. Dig. ⟸290.]

[3. Trial ⟸236.]

Petitioners to establish an alleged lost will cannot assign error to the judge in charging that the fact that the persons most interested in the destruction of a will were the first and only persons to examine the depositories and papers of the deceased, was a strong circumstance to rebut the presumption of cancellation by testator, but that whether sufficient evidence or not was a matter for the determination of the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 531–533; Dec. Dig. ⟸236.]

[4. Trial ⟸194.]

The Circuit judge could not, without invading the province of the jury, charge "that where there are no corroborating circumstances, the presumption that the loss of the will is due to the act of the testator, rather than to other causes, belongs to the lowest order of proof, and has no other effect than that of obligating the party who denies it to establish his case by some affirmative evidence."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 413, 436, 439–441, 446–454, 456–466; Dec. Dig. ⟸194.]

[5. Evidence ⟸60.]

The law will presume a destruction of a will by the testator (an innocent act) rather than by the heirs simply because of their opportunity of so doing, as this would be a criminal act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 81; Dec. Dig. ⟸60.]

[6. Trial ⟸296.]

An error in a charge resulting from a misapprehension of the request is no ground for a new trial, the matter requested having been afterwards fully and clearly charged by the judge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705–713, 715, 716, 718; Dec. Dig. ⟸296.]

[7. Wills ⟸331.]

Petitioners alleged that a lost will was witnessed by A, B, and C. A and B testified that it was so witnessed, but C testified that he had never signed such will as a witness. Held, that the judge properly refused to charge the jury "that if they should come to the conclusion that the paper propounded is substantially the last will executed by deceased in the presence of A, B, and another witness who was not C, their finding should be for petitioners, unless they find that said will was subsequently revoked or destroyed."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 782–784, 786, 787; Dec. Dig. ⟸331.]

[8. Wills ⟸297.]

Declarations of the testator are admissible to prove the destruction by him of his will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 696; Dec. Dig. ⟸297.]

[9. Wills ⟸331.]

There was no error in refusing to charge "that if the jury find that a duly executed will of the deceased was in his possession after he was physically unable to destroy it, the presumption that such will, if not found at his death, was destroyed by him, is rebutted."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 783; Dec. Dig. ⟸331.]

[10. Trial ⟸194.]

Where two witnesses testified that an alleged lost will had been executed in the presence of themselves and another witness, all of whom had signed as witnesses, and such other witness denied it, the judge could not charge that the will was sufficiently proved, but he properly left this matter to the jury to be determined by them.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Kaufman v. Caughman, 49 S. C. 164, 27 S. E. 16, 61 Am. St. Rep. 808.

For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 413, 436, 439–441, 446–454, 456–466; Dec. Dig. ⟸194.]

[11. Evidence ⟸183.]

The contents of a letter from plaintiff to deceased could not be proved in behalf of plaintiff by parol testimony, there being no proof of loss and no notice to the representatives of the deceased to produce it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 605–637; Dec. Dig. ⟸183.]

[12. Witnesses ⟸321.]

A witness, C, called by plaintiff, testified that deceased had entrusted him with a message to plaintiff, which he had delivered, and what that *message was. Plaintiff then offered himself to prove that the message so delivered was of a different tenor, and also another witness to prove C's statement that the message was other than that testified to. Held, that plaintiff's object being to discredit his own witness, the testimony offered was incompetent.

*189

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Johnson, 43 S. C. 126, 127, 20 S. E. 988; Pooler v. Smith, 73 S. C. 108, 52 S. E. 967; State v. McKay, 89 S. C. 236, 71 S. E. 858.

For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 1094; Dec. Dig. ⟸321.]

[13. Appeal and Error ⟸273.]

An exception not considered because too general in its terms.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1590, 1606, 1620–1623, 1625–1630, 1764; Dec. Dig. ⟸273.]

14. Findings of fact concurred in by Circuit judge and jury, and by Circuit judge and Probate judge approved.

[This case is also cited in Ex parte Jackson, 67 S. C. 60, 45 S. E. 132, without specific application.]

Before Hudson, J., Newberry, November, 1883.

This was a petition in the Probate Court for Newberry County, filed by John Bauskett and Elizabeth Reid, devisees and legatees under an alleged lost will of Thomas B. Wadlington, deceased, praying that said will might be established and admitted to proof in solemn form. Thomas W. Keitt and Joseph L. Keitt, as administrators of said deceased, and they, together with their sister, Harriet A. Keitt, as distributees under the statute were the parties defendant. A copy of the alleged lost will, furnished by the draftsman, was set out in the petition. The case is fully stated in the opinion of this court.

Messrs. Moorman & Simkins, L. F. Youmans, and Johnstone & Cromer, for appellants.

Messrs. Suber & Caldwell, contra.

March 2, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was a proceeding, originally commenced in the Court of Probate for Newberry County, for the purpose of setting up an alleged lost will of one Thomas B. Wadlington, deceased, and having the same admitted to probate in solemn form. The petition set out a copy of what was alleged to be such lost will, which purported to have been executed in April, 1873, in the presence of R. V. Gist, Caroline Sondley, and Richard C. Sondley as subscribing witnesses. The judge of probate seemed to be of opinion that such a will was at one time executed, but found that the same had been revoked by the testator, and he therefore declined to admit the paper propounded as the will of Wadlington to probate.

*190

*From this decree the plaintiffs appealed to the Court of Common Pleas, and at the trial moved for and obtained an order to amend their petition by striking out the name of Caroline Sondley and inserting in lieu thereof the name of John R. Sondley as one of the witnesses to the alleged lost will. The Circuit judge ordered that the following question of fact be referred to a jury for determination, viz.: "Did Thomas B. Wadlington, late of the County of Newberry, die leaving of full force and effect a last will and testament of the same purport and like effect as the will alleged by plaintiffs to be lost, mislaid, or destroyed, and sought by them in these proceedings to be established and admitted to probate?" In response to the question submitted to them, the jury found, "No."

The Circuit judge then rendered his decree, fully concurring in the finding of the jury, saying that the evidence did not, in the first place, establish the due execution of the paper propounded as the will of Wadlington; and, in the second place, that the paper, whether duly executed or not, was traced to the possession of Wadlington, and its not being found after his death raised the presumption that he had revoked it, which the evidence offered for that purpose was not sufficient to rebut. He therefore dismissed the appeal and affirmed the judgment of the Court of Probate. From this judgment the plaintiffs appeal to this court upon various exceptions, which will be considered seriatim.

1. "Because the judge erred in charging and refusing to charge the jury as follows: (1) In refusing to charge that if the will has been traced into the possession of Wadlington, and at his death could not be found by his heirs at law, who alone had the custody of his depositories and examined his papers, the presumption that the testator destroyed the will, with the intention of revoking it, is not a presumption of law, but a presumption of fact, and rebuttable; and in charging the jury directly that the fact that if the will was traced into Wadlington's possession and could not be found at his death by his heirs at law, who alone had the custody of his depositories and examined his papers, was not sufficient to rebut the presumption of revocation by the testator." Upon this request, the Circuit judge instructed the jury as follows: "This alone will not be sufficient to rebut the pre*sumption of its revocation by testator. It is but a circumstance to be considered by the jury. If the heirs had custody before death, it would be sufficient to rebut." In this we think there was no error.

*191

In considering alleged errors in a charge, it is manifestly the duty of this court to consider the charge as a whole, and not in detached portions merely. As is said by Mr. Justice Story, in Maguiac v. Thompson, 7 Peters, 390 [8 L. Ed. 709], affirmed in Spring Co. v. Edgar, 99 U. S., 659 [25 L. Ed. 487]: "In examining the charge for the purpose of ascertaining its correctness in point of law, the whole scope and bearing of it must be taken together. It is wholly inadmissible to take up single and detached passages and to decide upon them without attending to the context, or without incorporating such qualifications and explanations as naturally follow from the language of other parts of the charge. In short, we are to construe the whole as it must have been understood, both by the court and the jury, at the time when it was delivered." See also remarks of Simpson, C. J., to the same effect in Lynn v. Thomson, 17 S. C., 138. Now, when we examine the whole charge of the Circuit judge in this case, it is quite manifest that, as to the point immediately under consideration, he instructed the jury that where a will is traced to the possession of a testator, and it cannot be found after his death, a presumption arises that he had revoked it by destroying it; that this, however, would be a presumption of fact, and therefore capable of being rebutted by other evidence, and that it would be for the jury to say, from all the evidence, whether such presumption had been rebutted.

It is clear, therefore, that he could not have instructed the jury that the fact that the will could not be found by the heirs at law, who alone had the custody of the alleged testator's depositories and examined his papers, was sufficient to rebut such presumption, but, on the contrary, that he should have instructed them as he did that this was a circumstance to be considered by them in determining whether the presumption was rebutted. Otherwise, he would have been invading the province of the jury and assuming to determine the weight and effect of the evidence. In Durant v. Ashmore, 2

*192

Rich., 184, the rule is laid down, as *fully sustained by the authorities, that a presumption of revocation arises from the fact that a will, which has been traced to the possession of a testator, cannot be found at his death; but that this is a presumption of fact which may be rebutted by other evidence showing its existence, and of course, therefore, it is a question for the jury, and not for the judge, to determine what evidence will rebut such presumption. See also Betts v. Jackson, 6 Wend., 173.

The second subdivision of exception I. is as follows: "In refusing to charge that the loss, destruction, or suppression of a will does not require direct or positive proof; it may be, and often is, inferred with great certainty from attendant circumstances; and among the circumstances furnishing strong presumption of such being the case is that the depositories of the deceased testator, before they could be searched by any independent person, were accessible to, and investigated by, the only persons interested in the loss, suppression, or destruction of the will, if it existed; and in charging, upon the request so to charge, this is a fact tending to rebut such presumption." The language of the Circuit judge, in response to this request, is not fully set forth in the exception, but was as follows: "This is a fact tending to rebut such presumption. Such a case as is set forth in this request would tend to rebut (and would be a strong circumstance to rebut) the presumption of destruction by the testator. But I cannot say such evidence is sufficient to rebut that presumption; that is a matter for the jury to pass upon." We do not see what more the appellants could ask. If, however, the point of this exception is that the judge failed to notice the first branch of the request that the destruction of a will need not be proved by direct and positive evidence, but may be inferred from attendant circumstances, we think the objection is fully met by the whole tenor of the charge upon this point by which it was clearly left to the jury to say, from all the facts and circumstances developed by the evidence, whether the presumption of revocation arising from the failure to find the will was rebutted.

The third subdivision of this exception is as follows: "In refusing the charge that where there are no corroborating circumstances, the presumption that the loss of the will is due to the *act of the testator, rather than to other causes, belongs to the lowest order of proof, and has no other effect than that of obligating the party who denies it to establish his case by some affirmative evidence." Such a charge as this could not have been given without invading the province of the jury, by assuming to determine the strength or the weight of the evidence, which is clearly the prerogative of the jury; and the Circuit judge having left it to the jury to say whether the facts and circumstances adduced in evidence were sufficient to rebut the presumption that the testator had himself revoked his will, arising from the failure to find it at his death, did all that appellants could properly require of him.

*193

In this case there was no allegation or evidence tending to show that the will had been destroyed by accident, but the whole case of the plaintiffs depended upon their being able to show that the will was destroyed by the heirs at law because it was to their interest so to do. This would have been a criminal act on their part, and to establish it there must be evidence satisfactory to the tribunal (in this case the jury) entrusted with the trial of the issue. Indeed, the very ground upon which the rule is based, that where a will is traced to the possession of the testator, and it cannot be found after his death, the presumption is that the testator himself revoked it, is, that the law will presume that an innocent, rather than a criminal, act has been done. Hence, in such a case, the law will presume that the will was destroyed by the testator, which would be an innocent act, rather than that it was destroyed by the heirs at law, even though they might have an interest so to do, and might, by reason of their close relations to the testator, have the best of opportunities of so doing; because, if they did it, their act would be a criminal one, which the law will not presume, but will require to be established by satisfactory evidence. See Knapp v. Knapp, 10 N. Y., 276.

The fourth subdivision of this exception is as follows: "In refusing to charge that one credible witness is sufficient to prove the contents of a lost, suppressed, or destroyed will, and he need not be a subscribing witness." Inasmuch as there was no controversy whatever as to the contents of the alleged will which *the appellants were seeking to set up, it would seem to be of small consequence what the Circuit judge may have said to the jury upon this subject. While it is true that the Circuit judge, in response to this request, did say, "Not if the subscribing witnesses are alive and within the jurisdiction of the court and present testifying," this remark was manifestly made under a misapprehension of the request, and intended to apply to the execution of the will, which was a matter in controversy, and not with reference to proof of its contents, which was not a matter in controversy, and could not possibly have misled the jury, for in his general charge to the jury he distinctly instructed them "that one credible witness would be sufficient to establish, by parol, the contents of a lost or destroyed will; but that in this case there was no contest on that point, the contents of the alleged will having been testified to by competent witnesses, who were not contradicted." We do not think it possible, therefore, that the qualification of the request could have had the effect of misleading the jury, as they were, in effect, told that the contents of the will were established, and that there was no controversy on that point.

*194

The fifth subdivision is as follows: "In refusing to charge that if the jury should come to the conclusion that the paper propounded is substantially the last will and testament executed by Thomas B. Wadlington, in the presence of R. V. Gist and R. C. Sondley, and another witness, who was not John R. Sondley, their finding should be for the petitioners on the issue submitted to them, unless they find that said will was subsequently revoked, obliterated, cancelled, or destroyed." The response to this request was in these words: "The jury cannot conjecture, in face of testimony of plaintiffs to the contrary, that a third unknown person must have witnessed the execution." When it is remembered that a verdict of a jury must always be based upon some testimony adduced in the case, or upon some inference properly deducible from the testimony offered, we see no ground for the error imputed to the Circuit judge.

The only witnesses examined as to the execution of the will were R. V. Gist, R. C. Sondley, and John R. Sondley; the two former of whom both testified positively that they, together with *John R. Sondley, were the attesting witnesses, while the latter positively denied that he had ever witnessed a will for Wadlington or any one else, and that the other two witnesses were mistaken in saying that he had. It will be observed that Gist and R. C. Sondley do not say simply that they with another attested the will, and that they believed John R. Sondley was the other witness, but, on the contrary, they say positively that John R. Sondley was the third witness. It will also be observed that John R. Sondley does not speak doubtfully; he does not say that he has no recollection of ever having attested, or that he does not believe that he signed the will as a witness, but says positively that he never did. It is quite clear, therefore, that the testimony of these witnesses not only furnished no evidence whatever that R. V. Gist, R. C. Sondley, and some unknown third person were the subscribing witnesses, but, on the contrary, positively disproved the fact that an unknown third person was one of the witnesses. If, therefore, the jury had been instructed as requested by the plaintiffs, they would have been instructed that they could find a verdict not only without any testimony whatever to support it, but directly in the teeth of the testimony adduced by the plaintiffs themselves. Nor will it do to say that the testimony of Silas Johnstone would have been sufficient to warrant such an instruction to the jury, for, aside from the fact that his testimony was very doubtful and uncertain, he named Gist and two of the Sondleys as witnesses, and as the only two Sondleys that we hear of, besides Richard, are Caroline and John R., and as the plaintiffs concede that Caroline was not a subscribing witness, his testimony comes at last to the same as that of Gist and Richard C. Sondley.

*195

The case of Watkins v. Watkins, 13 Rich., 66, differs very materially from this case. In that case the will was executed in the ordinary's office, while five persons named were present, and the undisputed testimony was that three of the five attested the will, the only difficulty being to designate with certainty which one of the five was the third witness. None of the five denied signing as a witness, though two of them said they had no recollection of the transaction. The Court said: "It is immaterial that some of them may remember nothing of the transaction (Fil*son v. Filson, 3 Strob., 288), although it is material to know who were the subscribing witnesses, that their competency may be judged of properly; but when all the five present at the execution are produced and found competent, it is not very important which three of the five attested." In that case the testimony might well warrant a verdict that the will was executed in the presence of three competent witnesses, because, while it failed to designate with certainty which three of the five subscribed as witnesses, it did show that three of five named persons, all of whom were competent, did sign as witnesses. Indeed, this case seems to be opposed to the doctrine contended for by appellants, for if, as it is said, "it is material to know who were the subscribing witnesses, that their competency may be judged of properly," the request could not properly have been granted, for it involved the idea that the jury might find that the third witness was some unknown person whose competency could not, of course, be judged of properly.

*196

The sixth subdivision is as follows: "In refusing to charge that the declarations of the testator cannot be admitted to prove the destruction of his will." In this there was no error. Durant v. Ashmore, 2 Rich., 184. See, also, remarks of Walworth, Ch., in Betts v. Jackson, 6 Wend., 173. And see Reeves v. Booth, 2 Mill Con. R., 334 [12 Am. Dec. 679].

The seventh subdivision of this exception is in the following language: "In refusing to charge that if the jury find that a duly executed will of Thomas B. Wadlington was in his possession after he was physically unable to destroy it, the presumption that such will, if not found at his death, was destroyed by him, is rebutted." In response to this request, the judge said to the jury: "I cannot say what is, or what is not, sufficient proof. I can only say that it would be a fact to be weighed by the jury." In this there was no error; for, besides the fact that the request called upon the judge to invade the province of the jury and determine the effect of certain evidence upon an issue of fact which they were called upon to try, the request ignored the possibility that the testator might, though physically unable to destroy his will, direct its destruction by some one else.

The second exception is as follows: "In charging that where *the will is not produced, and two witnesses swear that they and a third witness, naming him, saw the testator sign an instrument, in form a will, which he then and there stated to be his will, in the presence of themselves and said third witness, and that they and said third witness subscribed as witnesses in the presence of the testator and of each other, and said third witness swears that he did not sign such instrument as a witness, said instrument was not sufficiently proved as a will, even though the jury believed the first two witnesses." On examining the general charge of the Circuit judge, it will be found that he did not instruct the jury as complained of in this exception. On the contrary, his language was that "in the case of a will alleged to have been lost, mislaid, or destroyed, while it is necessary that three persons should have witnessed the same in the presence of the testator and of each other, and while it was the duty of those propounding the will for probate to present and examine all three of the alleged witnesses (if of sound mind and accessible to the court), yet that if one of the alleged witnesses should deny his attestation, the other two would be sufficient to establish his attestation, if the jury should believe those two in preference to the third one denying. But that it is a matter for the jury to determine whether they will believe the testimony of the two, or that of the third one."

*197

It is true that in response to the first request of the plaintiffs, the Circuit judge did use certain language, which, if taken by itself, and not in connection with the context and the whole tenor of the charge (which, as we have seen above, it is altogether inadmissible to do), might afford some warrant for this exception. The plaintiffs' first request to charge was in these words: "That where two credible witnesses swear that they saw testator sign an instrument, in form a will, which he then and there stated to be his will, in presence of themselves and another credible witness, and that they and said other witness subscribed as witnesses, in the presence of the testator and of each other, and said other witness has no recollection of the transaction, said instrument is sufficiently proved as a will, and should be admitted to probate if there is sufficient proof of the contents, and revocation of the instrument has not been proved." In response to this request, the *judge said: "If the will were produced and the handwriting of the third were proved, then the proposition would be sound; but not so where the will is not produced, and the third man swears he did not sign it. Should the third man, in the last case, only swear that he has no recollection of signing, the jury may, if they believe the first two witnesses, regard the will sufficiently proved. It would be a question of fact for the jury."

*198

Now when this language is construed with reference to the context, and when it is regarded as in response to the proposition contained in the request, and especially when it is considered in connection with the language of the general charge, we see no inconsistency and no error. The request was to charge that, in the case supposed, the instrument would be "sufficiently proved as a will." This the judge could not do without invading the province of the jury, for it was for them to say whether the proof was sufficient. And when, as in the case stated in the response to the request, the third witness denied signing, it would be for the jury to say whether they believed the two witnesses or the third. The real proposition which the judge characterized as unsound, was that he should instruct the jury that in the case of a lost will, where two witnesses testify that it was duly executed in their presence, and that of a third who denied signing as a witness, it was "sufficiently proved as a will." This would be, manifestly, an unsound proposition, unless it was qualified, as the judge did qualify it in his general charge, by instructing the jury that in such a case it would be for them to determine whether they would believe the two witnesses who testified to the attestation of the paper propounded as a will by three witnesses, or the third who denied that he had so attested, and that if they believe the two in preference to the third, then the will would be sufficiently proved.

The third exception is as follows: "Because the presiding judge, as to the testimony, erred as follows: (1) In refusing to allow a witness for the petitioners to state the contents of a letter from Bauskett to Wadlington, which Wadlington read to him at the same time of a conversation between them, detailed by the witness." There can be no doubt that the letter itself would furnish the best evidence of its contents, and in the absence of *any evidence of its loss, or of any notice to the other side to produce it, parol evidence of its contents was clearly inadmissible to show the contents of the letter.

*199

The second and third subdivisions of this exception, resting upon the same principles, may be considered together. Their language is as follows: (2) "In refusing to allow the petitioner, John Bauskett, to testify as to what the message was which had been delivered to him by one Clamp, as the message entrusted to Clamp by Wadlington, on his death-bed, to be conveyed to Bauskett, Clamp having already testified that a message was so entrusted to him by Wadlington, and that he had delivered it, and having also given his statement of the same; and in refusing to allow Bauskett to testify that the message delivered to him by Clamp was different from that detailed by Clamp on the stand. (3) In refusing to allow another witness offered by the petitioners to testify what Clamp had stated to him was the message so received and delivered by him as being different from the message testified to by Clamp." Inasmuch as Clamp was offered as a witness by the plaintiffs themselves, it is quite clear that it was not competent for them to offer any evidence tending to impeach his credibility, either by testimony as to his general character, or that he had made statements inconsistent with those made by him on the stand. See Perry v. Massey, 1 Bail., 32, as construed in Farr v. Thompson, Cheves, 44; Bank v. Shier, 4 Rich., 240. It is quite clear that the object here was to discredit Clamp, the plaintiffs' own witness, which could not be done.

The fourth subdivision of this exception is as follows: "In refusing to allow the petitioners to testify about transactions and communications with Wadlington during his life." As a matter of fact one of the petitioners, Bauskett, was not prohibited from testifying as to transactions or communications with Wadlington, for although an objection to his so testifying was sustained on his examination in chief, yet when he was examined in reply, the Circuit judge held that the door was opened to such testimony by the course of the cross-examination, and the witness was permitted to testify as to communications between himself and the deceased. As to the other petitioner, Eliz. Reid, she was clearly incompetent to testify to any transactions or communications *between her and the deceased, under section 400 of the Code of 1882.

*200

The fourth and last exception is as follows: "Because the presiding judge erred: (1) In finding that the evidence did not establish the due execution of the instrument as a will. (2) In finding that, if duly executed, the will was revoked by the testator. (3) In dismissing the appeal from the Probate Court." The last of these subdivisions is, as has often been held, too general in its terms to require any notice at the hands of this court, and the other two subdivisions raise questions of fact. While there may be some room for difference of opinion as to the execution of the will, there certainly is not such manifest error as would warrant this court in disturbing the finding of the court below. But even if there were, the finding on the question of revocation, in which we fully concur, would be quite sufficient to sustain the judgment appealed from. We do not think there was evidence sufficient to rebut the presumption of revocation arising from the failure to find the will, which had been traced to the possession of the alleged testator; certainly none to fix upon the heirs at law, or any one of them, the imputation that they had destroyed the will.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

22 S. C. 200

WERTS v. SPEARMAN.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Equity ⇐326.]

An administrator, who was also a creditor, filed his bill for the sale of the lands of his intestate in aid of assets. A son of deceased, a defendant to the action, by his answer claimed the land under an unrecorded deed from his father. Held, that plaintiff might, at the trial, attack this deed for fraud, although no charges of fraud were preferred in the bill.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Spoon v. Smith, 36 S. C. 592, 15 S. E. 800.

For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 648; Dec. Dig. ⇐326.]

[2. Fraudulent Conveyances ⇐139.]

A conveyance in consideration of a pre-existing debt, the vendor retaining possession, and such possession not satisfactorily explained, is fraudulent as to creditors.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Archer v. Long, 32 S. C. 186, 11 S. E. 86; DuRant v. DuRant, 36 S. C. 58, 14 S. E. 929.

For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 441; Dec. Dig. ⇐139.]

[3. Fraudulent Conveyances ⇐312.]

But there being no actual fraud in the case, the vendee was permitted to establish the indebtedness of the intestate, the consideration in part *of the conveyance; and also to receive from the proceeds of the sale of such land the value of other property, which was also a part of the consideration, said property having been sold by intestate and applied to his debts.

*201

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 963–965, 967; Dec. Dig. ⇐312.]

[4. Appeal and Error ⇐1009.]

Findings of fact by the Circuit judge approved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3974; Dec. Dig. ⇐1009.]

[5. Evidence ⇐106.]

Where charges of actual fraud are made against a defendant in a civil action, resting in great part upon circumstances, the defendant may introduce testimony as to his general character.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Smith v. Lafar, 67 S. C. 495, 46 S. E. 332.

For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 178; Dec. Dig. ⇐106.]

Before Kershaw, J., Newberry, July, 1883.

The case is fully stated in the Circuit decree, which was as follows:

This case was commenced under the old system of pleadings, by a bill in equity, by the plaintiff as administrator of the estate of Graves Spearman, deceased, alleging among other things, the insufficiency of personal assets to pay the debts of the deceased; that he himself held a note against his intestate under seal, which he set forth as an exhibit to the bill, upon which a considerable sum remained due, and that there were other debts; and there was a necessity for the sale of the real estate of the intestate to pay debts: that G. W. L. Spearman was in possession of a tract of land described in the bill, whereof the said intestate was owner at the time of his death; and that he had also possessed himself of personal property of the deceased. The bill prayed that the said G. W. L. Spearman be required to account for the personal property, and that the land be sold and the proceeds applied, so far as needed, to the payment of the debts of deceased. Graves Spearman was the father of G. W. L. Spearman, of Nancy Werts, wife of Jonathan Werts, and of the plaintiff, and the grandfather of the defendants.

No defence was made to the bill, except by G. W. L. Spearman, who answered, denying the possession of the personal property, except a few articles of little value, and admitted that he was in possession of the land, but denied that it was the land of the intestate at his death, but that it was the absolute property of him, the said G. W. L. Spearman. He also admits that the estate of the said intestate was insufficient to pay the debts of his estate.

*202

*The cause came to trial at November term, 1879, upon the law side of the Court of Common Pleas upon an issue submitted to a jury. There was no written statement of the issue, but his honor, the presiding judge, directed the jury that their verdict should be "either for the defendant, G. W. L. Spearman," or "that Graves Spearman died seized and possessed of the land, and that it is subject to the payment of the debts and distribution among the heirs at law of Graves Spearman." There was much testimony heard at the trial before the jury, and their verdict was "that Graves Spearman died seized and possessed of the 423 acres of land, and that it was liable for his debts, and to distribution among his heirs at law."

A motion for a new trial was thereupon made for the defendant, G. W. L. Spearman, and refused, and an order was signed by the presiding judge, reciting and confirming the verdict, directing that it be referred to the master to take the accounts of the administrator, and to determine and report upon all the issues of law and fact herein undisposed of, and calling in the creditors of Graves Spearman to establish their demands, and enjoining suits against the administrator in the meantime. This order was made at chambers. An appeal was thereupon taken by the defendant, G. W. L. Spearman, to the Supreme Court, upon various grounds. The case was returned to this court for a hearing on the merits, it being considered that the hearing upon which the said order was made could not be had at chambers. 16 S. C., 618.

At the present hearing, much additional testimony was introduced, and the whole case was ably and fully argued by learned counsel on either side. Numerous questions, both of law and fact, were discussed, but only such will be stated here as I consider necessary to sustain this conclusion. On the 10th day of April, 1866, the deceased, Graves Spearman, conveyed, by deed duly executed and delivered to G. W. L. Spearman, the tract of land described in the complaint, the consideration recited being $4,230. This land constituted all of the real estate of Graves Spearman, except twenty-five acres, whereon he resided. He was largely indebted at that time to the plaintiff, on the note set up in the bill, and to others. On the same day, G. W.

*203

L. Spear*man conveyed, by his deed duly executed and delivered to Graves Spearman, 279 acres of land, the consideration recited being $3,060. It is not denied that the latter conveyance was the consideration in part of the former. These 279 acres of land were made up of two parcels. The first, 212 acres, was conveyed by Graves Spearman to G. W. L. Spearman 28th December, 1859, when Graves was a man of large means and owing few debts, and they of small amount. Of this land, G. W. L. Spearman had been in possession from the date of the conveyance of the same to him. In a list of advancements made by Graves Spearman to G. W. L. Spearman, the value of this land is put down at $2,968. The list bears date December 20, 1849, and embraces a number of negroes given off by Graves Spearman to his children, G. W. L. Spearman, N. C. Werts, and Drucilla Werts. After giving off these slaves, he had upwards of forty remaining, worth at that time, at the value stated in the list of advancements, an average of between $900 and $1,000 each. Some of the witnesses said they were worth that. The advancement list was in the writing of Graves Spearman, and in a book kept by him. G. W. L. Spearman says he bought this land from his father. The deed conveying the same to him recited the consideration to be $2,968. This deed had but one witness; still, if it was made for a valuable consideration, it would be a good conveyance in equity, or if even for a good consideration. Story Eq. Jur., §§ 166, 165; 1 Foubl. Eq., ch. 1, § 7, notes.

This tract (279 acres) of land was subsequently conveyed by Graves Spearman to one Travis Hill, in settlement of a debt which he owed him, amounting to much more than the consideration named in the deed of G. W. L. Spearman conveying the same to him, and more than the consideration named in the deed for the tract of land (423 acres) conveyed by Graves to G. W. L. Spearman.

The other tract of land which, with the 212 acres, composed the tract of 279 acres, was derived by G. W. L. Spearman from one T. J. Taylor by purchase in 1858 (November 1st) for $1,000, the deed conveying 113 40-100 acres. At the time of this purchase there was a mortgage upon this land, held by one Adams (as I understood at the hearing), which, to the extent of $500, *was paid by Graves Spearman. In the list of advancements put down to G. W. L. Spearman, he is charged with the payment to B. Adams of $500. I assume that to be the same sum paid by Graves on the Taylor land. If so, as he entered it among the advancements, he intended it as a gift to G. W. L. Spearman, and being in circumstances at that time to make a valid gift, it must be so considered. The portion of the Taylor land so conveyed, with the 212 acres, was sixty-seven acres, making up the 279 acres conveyed by G. W. L. to Graves Spearman as part of the consideration of the deed for the 423 acre tract. To this extent, therefore, there was a valuable consideration passed from G. W. L. to Graves Spearman for the land in question.

*204

G. W. L. Spearman sold the remainder of the Taylor land to Gen. A. C. Garlington, and lent the proceeds, $900, to Graves Spearman, taking his note for it. This, he testifies, constituted the remainder of the consideration for the land; that he gave up the note to his father when the papers were executed between them. There was in evidence a deed from Graves to G. W. L. Spearman and G. H. Werts, dated January 12, 1867, conveying to them twenty-five acres of land (the homestead) and personal property, valued at $132. The consideration of this deed was nominally $2,000. George H. Werts testified that Graves Spearman owed him $1,000; that Graves proposed to him and G. W. L. Spearman to convey to them his home place and his household and kitchen furniture in payment of their notes; that they finally agreed to take it, and credit their respective notes with the amount of $1,000 each. They then united in executing a lease to the home place to Graves for his lifetime, at an annual rent of one dollar, which lease was produced and put in evidence.

G. W. L. Spearman testified that he worked with his father from 1846 to Christmas, 1866, and attended to his business, for which he claimed a sum over $3,800. It was claimed that after deducting the value of the 212 acre tract of land conveyed to him by his father, for the consideration expressed in the deed ($2,968), his father still owed him over $800, and that he held his father's note for that amount. He testified that he paid for the 423 acres of land by his deed for the 279 acres, and by his note against his father for $815, and immediately thereafter mentions his father's *indebtedness to him for services. From this it may be assumed that he meant that the note for $815, given in part payment for the land conveyed to him (423 acres) was given in settlement between him and his father for the difference between the value of the 212 acres and his services. This is not consistent with the fact that in the account for advancements kept by his father in 1859, he is charged with the value of the land, $2,968, and with the further fact that he is charged in the same account with $500 paid to Adams. I regret to say that there are other inconsistencies.

*205

G. W. L. Spearman, in his testimony at the hearing before me, said: "Father owed me $900. I offered this money to Taylor on the land, and he would not have it, and I let father have it and he gave me his note for it. * * * The day father conveyed the twenty-five acres of land, the $956.30 note was given up to father. I have not seen it since, except that I saw it when looking over the papers after his death. * * * The $900 I let father have I got from Gen. Garlington. * * * The $900 was paid to Travis Hill on father's note, and father gave me his note. The debt to Travis Hill was compromised by land."

It will be noticed that he says he got the money from Garlington. Garlington's deed was dated February, 1867. He says, further, that his father gave him a note for it, and that he gave up the note the day his father conveyed to him the twenty-five acres. The deed bore date in January, 1867, while Geo. H. Werts testified that the arrangement for that purchase was completed in the latter part of February or the first of March, and the credits were dated back to the date of the deed. By that time the sale had been made to Garlington, and G. W. L. Spearman might have had his father's note for the money received by him from Garlington and lent to his father. There is no testimony to the contrary concerning this alleged loan, and Spearman mentions circumstances in connection with the subject which seem to make it probable that the transaction did take place, and which might have been disproved if not true. I think the evidence warrants the conclusion that G. W. L. Spearman did hold the note of Graves at that time to the amount stated by him, and that the *same was given up in payment for the twenty-five acres, the home place.

*206

I conclude also that at the time of the conveyance of the 423 acres, G. W. L. Spearman held a note against his father, amounting at that time, with interest, to eleven hundred and seventy dollars ($1,170), which was given up as part of the consideration for that land. I deduce this from the same testimony of G. W. L. Spearman, that he had such a note, uncontradicted by any other witness. He is corroborated also by the statement of Geo. H. Werts, who says that G. W. L. Spearman claimed in the presence of Graves at one time that the latter owed him a thousand dollars before the land was sold to Garlington, and therefore not referring to the note given for that money. True, he says this was in October, 1866, but he may have been mistaken in the time, as he gave no reason for remembering the date.

In April, 1866, Graves Spearman resided at the home place, and continued to reside there until the time of his death, in April, 1867. There was some cleared land upon the 423 acre tract, but no buildings at the time of the transfer. About Christmas, 1866, G. W. L. Spearman went into possession of the land conveyed to him, except fifty acres of it, which remained in the possession of Graves, under a lease from G. W. L. Spearman to him, bearing date April 18, 1866, at an annual rent of one dollar. G. W. L. Spearman improved the land, erected buildings, and cleared fifteen or twenty acres of it, and has continued in the use and possession of it to the present time. The values set upon the lands conveyed by Graves to G. W. L. Spearman, and by the latter to the former, in the deeds respectively, do not appear to have been over or under stated. One witness estimated the land conveyed by the latter to be worth as much as the other.

The declarations of Graves Spearman, made both before and after the transactions, were admitted by the presiding judge at the first trial. As they are in evidence, I shall not exclude them. They are sufficient to cast suspicion upon the transaction, but not conclusive of fraud on the part of G. W. L. Spearman. The statement of the witnesses in regard thereto are not always consistent with other facts. Their evidence in other points is contradicted by G. W. L. Spearman, and they are all interested in *the case, with one exception, and his statement is not conclusive. G. W. L. Spearman proved a most excellent character by a number of witnesses, some of them known to me as of the highest character and intelligence. There was objection made to the introduction of this testimony, and an exception taken when it was admitted. The testimony was admitted upon the principle announced in Dawkins v. Gault, 5 Rich., 153, that "where an actual fraud is charged, perpetrated with a fraudulent intent, and the proof of the charge consists of circumstances, then good character, as in a case of crime, might be resorted to as a circumstance to prove innocence." The question here, in so far as it involves a charge of actual fraud upon the part of G. W. L. Spearman, appeared to me to be of that character, and for that reason, and upon that point only, the evidence was admitted and considered. There are cases elsewhere to the contrary, but I consider the rule as reasonable, and resting upon authority which I am bound to respect. Numerous objections to testimony were made by defendants' attorney, but as they were put in writing and were not discussed at the trial, they will not be further noticed here.

*207

One circumstance upon which great stress was laid, as tending to fix actual fraud upon G. W. L. Spearman, was the mutilation of a book of Graves Spearman by the former, in which certain accounts were kept. It was supposed that it was done to suppress evidence. I am satisfied that the account given by G. W. L. Spearman of that transaction was correct. By comparison, I am satisfied that the leaves cut out by him are the same produced by him at the hearing, and which he had put together as a blank book for his own use, and contained no entries of Graves Spearman. The other leaves cut or torn from the book I have no doubt were used, as G. W. L. Spearman testified, for writing paper during the war, when that article was obtained with great difficulty.

There are two leading questions of law to be disposed of:

First. It is insisted that the plaintiff had no right to bring an action to avoid his intestate's deed, and many authorities were cited to support the proposition. The ground taken was that a grantor cannot avoid his own deed, and as an administrator succeeds to the intestate's title, he cannot aver against the deed of his intestate. This proposition of law is eminently sound, but in this *case the plaintiff was not only an administrator of the grantor, but also a creditor, and sued in both capacities. He had a right to come into equity, because he had no remedy at law, since he could not sue himself. Any other creditor but himself would have been compelled to exhaust his legal remedy before coming into this court, but he having no such remedy, had a right to come into this court directly. A very late case having been decided upon this precise point, and in a case parallel to this, precludes the necessity of any discussion here. In Winsmith v. Winsmith (15 S. C., 611), an action was brought by an administratrix to sell land in aid of assets, and creditors were called in. Held: "That the administratrix, being herself a creditor, could, as creditor, object to the validity of a voluntary bond and mortgage given by her intestate when presented for proof." I conclude, therefore, that plaintiff had the right to contest the deed of Graves Spearman. The action was such as an administrator could rightfully maintain, being an ordinary bill to sell lands in aid of personal assets, and for an account of personal property in possession of a distributee and heir. The defendant at the trial set up the deed, and the plaintiff undertook to show that it was void as against creditors. Under the authorities cited I think he could do this.

*208

The next question is, Was the deed of Graves Spearman to G. W. L. Spearman, conveying 423 acres of land on the 10th April, 1866, void as against creditors? I conclude that it was. It was made at a time when the grantor was in embarrassed circumstances, resulting in the insolvency of his estate. It was made, in part, in consideration of a pre-existing debt due by the grantor to the grantee. The grantor remained in possession of a portion of the land under a lease made for a nominal consideration. The deed of conveyance was not placed upon record. The grantor conveyed away all of his property, mostly to his children, even his homestead and household furniture, retaining possession under a lease for a merely nominal consideration, none of these conveyances being recorded. As I understand the law in South Carolina to be, a conveyance of land made under such circumstances cannot stand as against the claims of existing credi*tors, and being void as to one class, is void also as to all other creditors.

*209

The cases upon this subject have been so often and so fully discussed here and elsewhere, that I do not purpose to do more than refer to the authorities. The English and American cases are collated and discussed by Ch. Kent (2 Com., 515, et seq.) with the ability for which that great jurist was so highly distinguished, and also in the American edition of Smith's Leading Cases (vol. 1, p. 1), under Frazier's Case. The notes of the editors state the law in this state succinctly and correctly.

[Here the judge cited and quoted largely from Smith v. Henry, 1 Hill, 16; Maples v. Maples, Rice Eq., 310; Anderson v. Fuller, McMull. Eq., 27 (36 Am. Dec. 290).]

From these authorities, it is properly said that in South Carolina the rule is established "that where a pre-existing debt is the consideration of a conveyance, or a part of the consideration, retention of possession and use, without a new agreement to that effect, on adequate consideration, is a fraud in law." 1 Sm. Lead. Cas., 63. The cases establishing this doctrine were subscribed to by all the judges of the Court of Errors who heard the case of Cox v. McBee, 1 Speers, 204. "If there be a new contract of hiring on sufficient consideration, it will rebut the presumption of fraud; * * * but retention of possession after an absolute sale for a price paid is not conclusively fraudulent, but only prima facie evidence of fraud, and capable of explanation." Sm. Lead. Cas., supra, and cases therein cited. No case since Anderson v. Fuller has changed the rule as applicable to cases where an antecedent debt constituted part of the consideration. This case falls distinctly within the inhibition of the rule as stated, and the other circumstances attending the transaction materially strengthen the legal presumption that the conveyance in question was fraudulent, and consequently void as against creditors.

Having reached this conclusion, the question arises, Is G. W. L. Spearman to be allowed the value of the actual considerations paid by him? As I have not found actual fraud against him, and as the land transferred to Graves was applied to the satisfaction of a debt due by him for more than double the value of the *land, I think, upon the principles adopted in Anderson v. Fuller, that G. W. L. Spearman should be repaid the value of that land. He will be allowed nothing for his improvements, but will not be made to account for rents, or use and occupation. As to the note of Graves cancelled in the trade for that land, it will be reinstated as a debt against the estate of Graves Spearman, according to the character of the note, to the amount of eleven hundred and seventy dollars ($1,170), but without interest. This amount is the difference between the values of the two tracts of land exchanged between Graves and G. W. L. Spearman, and must have been the amount due on the note at that time. A reference will be necessary to determine whether it was a sealed note or otherwise.

*210

The question regarding the personal property having been withdrawn from my consideration by consent of counsel, this decree may here be closed.

It is ordered and decreed, that it be referred to the master to take testimony and report whether the note of Graves Spearman, which constituted part of the consideration for the conveyance of the 423-acre tract of land to G. W. L. Spearman, was a sealed note or otherwise, and that the same be established as a debt against the estate of Graves Spearman to the amount of eleven hundred and seventy dollars ($1,170), according to the class of claims to which it shall be determined to belong; that the tract of land described in the complaint, containing four hundred and twenty-three acres, as set out in the deed from Graves Spearman to G. W. L. Spearman, dated April 10, 1866, be sold by the master, as of the estate of Graves Spearman, on the first Monday in November next, or some other convenient sales-day thereafter, to the highest bidder for cash; that he pay from the proceeds of sale, first, the costs of these proceedings and the costs of sale; next, that he pay to G. W. L. Spearman the sum of three thousand and sixty dollars, being the value of the land transferred by him to Graves Spearman in exchange for the aforesaid tract of 423 acres; next, that he pay the debts established, or that may be established, in this cause against the estate of Graves Spearman, according to their legal rights and priorities; and, lastly should anything remain, that he pay the same to the *heirs at law of Graves Spearman, according to their several rights and interests therein.

*211

The plaintiff, G. H. Werts, and the creditors of the said Graves Spearman, appealed from this decree on the following grounds:

I. Because his honor erred in not finding that the evidence established a clear case of actual fraud on creditors in the deed from Graves Spearman to G. W. L. Spearman for the 423 acres of land, and that it was so intended both by the alienor and alienee.

II. Because his honor erred in allowing G. W. L. Spearman, out of the proceeds of the sale ordered in the decree, the sum of $3,060, being the consideration expressed in the deed for the 279 acres from him to Graves Spearman, at all, and much more so in giving him a preference over creditors whose claims have been established in this case.

III. Because his honor erred in directing that the note alleged to have been cancelled in the transaction be reinstated as a debt against the estate of Graves Spearman.

IV. Because the verdict of the jury was fully sustained by the evidence and by the opinion of the judge who heard the case when it was tried before the jury.

V. Because his honor erred in allowing evidence to be introduced to prove the general character of defendant.

VI. Because his honor erred in finding as a fact that G. W. L. Spearman did not mutilate the book in which Graves Spearman kept an account of his transactions and particulars with his children, when it was proved by four reliable witnesses, two of whom are in no way interested in this case, that they saw him do it.

VII. Because his honor erred in finding as a fact that the deed for the 423 acres from Graves Spearman to G. W. L. Spearman was duly executed and delivered.

VIII. Because his honor erred in finding as a fact that it is not denied that the conveyance of the 279 acres was the consideration in part of the 423 acres, when the contrary is true.

IX. Because his honor erred in holding that the $500 paid by G. Spearman for G. W.

*212

L. Spearman to Adams on his mort*gage on the Taylor tract was a gift, simply because it was found entered at the bottom of a list of property given by G. Spearman to G. W. L. Spearman, when he found that the land $2,968, which was also entered at bottom of said list, was not a gift but a purchase.

X. Because his honor erred in finding as a fact that G. W. L. Spearman sold the remainder of the Taylor land to A. C. Garlington, and loaned the proceeds ($900) to G. Spearman, which constituted the remainder of the consideration for the land, when the evidence shows that this could not have been so, for Garlington only gave $596.25 for said land, and paid for it and took a deed near a year after the alleged transfer of the 423 acres to G. W. L. Spearman.

XI. Because his honor erred in disbelieving the six witnesses sworn on the part of the plaintiff, when they testify to what they actually saw and heard, and when there was no attempt to impeach their character for truthfulness, and when they were sustained by papers produced and the circumstances developed in the case.

XII. Because his honor erred in finding that G. W. L. Spearman had another note besides the $956.30 note, and that he is uncontradicted in this by any other witness, when the declarations of himself and G. Spearman, proved by some four witnesses, show that the said G. Spearman only owed him about $1,000 on settlement.

XIII. Because his honor erred in not charging G. W. L. Spearman with rents on the 423 acres of land in controversy.

The defendant, G. W. L. Spearman, appealed on the following grounds:

I. Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in not finding as a matter of fact that the said G. W. L. Spearman purchased the tract of 423 acres, here in dispute, from his father, Graves Spearman, for a valuable and sufficient consideration.

II. Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in not finding as a matter of fact that the said G. W. L. Spearman purchased the said tract of land in good faith, without knowledge of any intention on the part of the said Graves Spearman to de*fraud, hinder, or delay his creditors, and without reason to suspect any such intention.

*213

III. Because his honor erred in not finding as matter of fact that the said G. W. L. Spearman let the fifty acres of land to Graves Spearman, after the acquisition of the 423 acres, as a mere gratuity, and that its reservation for the use of Graves Spearman was not any part of the consideration of the transfer of the 423 acres from Graves to G. W. L. Spearman.

IV. Because his honor erred in not excluding all declarations of Graves Spearman made after the execution of his deed to G. W. L. Spearman as incompetent to impeach or explain that deed.

V. Because his honor erred in not finding as a conclusion of law, that the said G. W. L. Spearman, by such said purchase and the conveyance of the said land herein, acquired a valid and sufficient title to the said land, and that the said land is not liable to the claim of creditors of the said Graves Spearman.

VI. Because his honor erred in not dismissing the bill, and requiring the plaintiff to pay the costs of the action.

VII. Because his honor erred in not dismissing the bill, inasmuch as it alleged that Graves Spearman died seized and possessed of the 423 acres of land, whereas it was established beyond dispute that he, in 1866, conveyed the same to the defendant, G. W. L. Spearman, who was in possession at the death of Graves Spearman.

VIII. Because his honor erred in not dismissing the bill, inasmuch as it does not allege any conveyance which it claims ought to be set aside, nor embrace any charge of fraud against creditors or others, which ought or could operate as a reason for setting aside the conveyance attempted on the trial to be set aside, and which his honor by his decree undertakes to set aside.

Others, defendants, appealed upon substantially the same grounds as the creditors.

Messrs. L. J. Jones and Geo. S. Mower, for plaintiff and creditors.

Messrs. Y. J. Pope and Suber & Caldwell, contra.

*214

*March 9, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Graves Spearman, late of Newberry County, died in 1869 intestate. George H. Werts (respondent), a son-in-law of the deceased, administered on the estate, and in February, 1870, he instituted the proceeding below, in which he alleged that he was a creditor of the estate; that the personal property in his hands as administrator was insufficient to pay the debts; that the defendant, G. W. L. Spearman, a son of the deceased, was in possession of a portion of the personalty, and that the deceased died seized and possessed of a certain tract of land of 423 acres, more or less, and prayed an accounting from G. W. L. Spearman as to the personalty alleged to be in his hands, and the sale of the aforesaid land in aid of the personalty, and that creditors be called in. No defence was interposed by any of the parties except G. W. L. Spearman, who answered, denying his accountability for any personal property, and also asserting title in himself of the tract of land in question.

The case came to trial at the November term of Common Pleas for Newberry County in 1879, when an issue as to the title to the land was submitted to a jury. The plaintiff introduced a deed to Graves Spearman, the intestate, from the then Commissioner in Equity for said county, dated in 1828. He also proved that the estate was indebted to him in a large amount by seal note, dated March 22, 1863. The defendant relied upon an unrecorded deed from Graves Spearman to himself, dated April 10, 1866, the consideration being $4,230, which according to the evidence, was paid by the said G. W. L. Spearman to Graves in the conveyance by the former to the latter of a certain other tract of land containing 279 acres, valued at $3,060, the balance being paid by a note held by G. W. L. Spearman on his father, which was delivered up and cancelled. The 279-acre tract it appeared was made up out of a tract of land of 212 acres previously obtained by G. W. L. Spearman from his father and a portion of a tract which he, G. W. L., had bought from one Taylor.

There was some evidence that the 212-acre tract had been given to the said G. W. L. by his father as an advancement several *years back. It further appeared that the said G. W. L. occupied the land, but did not live upon it; that he cultivated it sometimes with his own hands and sometimes with his father's and his own together. It was further in evidence that some days after the purchase, i. e., April 18, 1866, he had leased fifty acres of the land to his father for life at a consideration of one dollar per annum, with the privilege of getting all necessary timber, fuel, &c., from any of his lands. At the time the 212-acre tract was transferred by Graves to his son, he, Graves, was a man of considerable estate. At the time of the last transaction, however, in 1866, he was much embarrassed, and it was admitted that at his death his personal assets were insufficient to pay his debts. It further appeared that Graves in his life-time, after he had obtained the 279-acre tract from his son in the transfer of the lands mentioned, had conveyed said tract to one Francis Hill in settlement of a large debt, amounting to much more than the consideration mentioned in the deed conveying said land to him.

*215

The jury found that Graves Spearman died seized and possessed of the 423-acre tract, and that it was liable for his debts and distribution among his heirs at law. A motion was then made for a new trial on the minutes of the judge, which, after argument, was refused, and upon appeal taken to this court the case was remanded to the Circuit Court for a new trial. 16 S. C., 618. The cause came on again for a second trial before his honor, Judge Kershaw, at the July term of the court, 1883. Upon this trial the testimony offered at the former trial was heard by consent, including certain declarations of Graves Spearman, made both before and after the land transaction above, with other and additional evidence.

The two leading questions of law discussed and decided in the decree of his honor, Judge Kershaw, are: First. Whether the plaintiff, being administrator of the intestate, could contest the intestate's deed of the 423 acres to the defendant. Second. Whether said deed was void as to creditors. As to the first question his honor ruled that the plaintiff being a creditor as well as administrator, and having no remedy at law, could maintain the action, contesting said deed, citing Winsmith v. Winsmith, 15 S. C., 611. As to the second, finding as matter of fact that the deed *from the father to the son was executed when the father was in embarrassed circumstances, resulting in the insolvency of the estate; that it was made in part in consideration of a pre-existing debt; that the grantor remained in possession of a portion of the land under a lease for a nominal consideration; that the deed was never recorded; and that the grantor remained in possession of all his property conveyed to his other children under leases from them—he adjudged the said deed to be void as against creditors, but without "actual fraud" in G. W. L.; and inasmuch as the land transferred by G. W. L. to his father was applied by the father to the satisfaction of a large debt due by him to Hill, he further adjudged and decreed that the said G. W. L. should be refunded the value of said land, without improvements, and not to account for rents and profits; and also that the said G. W. L. should be allowed to set up against the estate the note which he had delivered up in the land trade according to its rank, and to the amount of $1,170. And he ordered the land to be sold, the proceeds after the payment of the costs to be applied, first, to the payment to G. W. L. Spearman of the sum of $3,060, the value of the land transferred by him to his father in exchange for the 423-acre tract; next, to the payment of the debts established, or that may be established, against the estate according to their legal rank; and, lastly, should anything remain, to be paid to the heirs at law, according to their rights.

*216

The appeal of the defendant does not question the ruling of the Circuit judge as to the right of the plaintiff to contest the deed of his intestate as a general proposition. That question, therefore, is not before us. The eighth exception, however, denies his right to do so in this action, as the bill was not framed for that purpose, there being no charge of fraud therein nor any demand that said deed should be vacated and set aside. Should the bill have been dismissed on this ground, is the question raised in this exception. In Lowry v. Pinson (2 Bail., 324 [23 Am. Dec. 140]) the plaintiff was allowed without question to attack and defeat for fraud the deed of defendant interposed at the trial, and yet there was no allegation of fraud in the declaration nor claim that defendant's deed should be declared void. The action was the ordinary action for trespass to try titles, the plaintiff claiming as *purchaser at sheriff's sale, and the defendant under a prior deed from the judgment debtor. So, too, in Thomas & Ashby v. Jeter & Abney, 1 Hill, 380; Smith v. Culbertson, 9 Rich., 106, and in many other cases.

*217

In fact, the practice in the law courts of contesting deeds in this way for fraud is of old standing, and has been frequently pursued in the past. The action below, it is true, was not in form an action to try titles, yet it assumed that form at the trial, by the defendant asserting title in himself to the land in dispute. The plaintiff, as administrator and creditor, claimed that it was necessary to sell the real estate of his intestate in aid of the personalty to pay debts, and he alleged that the intestate died seized and possessed of the land in question. The defendant appeared and claimed the land himself, by virtue of a deed from the deceased, thus raising the question of title, and therefore putting the validity of his deed in issue himself. Under these circumstances, and by analogy to the cases above referred to, ought not the plaintiff to have been allowed to assail the deed at the trial, when for the first time it had perhaps been presented or known to exist; especially in a case like this, where the plaintiff, because of the fact that he was the administrator of his deceased debtor, had no means of reducing his debt to judgment, and of exhausting the estate by execution and return of nulla bona? Unless this could be done, in cases like the present, then the principle that there can be no legal right without a remedy to enforce it should be exploded.

Besides, in Ragsdale v. Holmes (1 S. C., 96) it was held that creditors of an estate could seek the application of the assets to their claims, by means of a creditors' bill, before reducing them to judgment and without exhausting their legal remedies. That necessity, it was said in that case, existed inter vivos, "for the reason that the estate of the living debtor does not become assets for the payment of debts until the exhaustion of the legal remedies is complete, whereas the estate of a deceased debtor, or so much thereof as may be required for the payment of his debts, becomes assets from his decease."

The next question involves the correctness of the Circuit decree as to the validity of defendant's deed. The Circuit judge, *though finding no "actual fraud" in the defendant, yet declared this deed void for legal fraud under the cases of Smith v. Henry, 1 Hill, 16, and Maples v. Maples, Rice Eq. 310, and the other cases referred to in the decree, on the ground that where property is transferred by a debtor to his creditors in payment of a pre-existing debt, either in whole or in part, the debtor still retaining possession, the transaction is per se fraudulent. True, he says that the other circumstances attending the transaction strengthened the legal presumption, and upon these two principles he adjudged the deed fraudulent.

*218

We think he gave rather too much weight to Smith v. Henry, especially in the light of subsequent cases, which, though not distinctly overruling that case, have modified and explained the principle, which seems to have been applied there by the authority of Chancellor Harper himself, who pronounced the opinion in Smith v. Henry. In Jones & Briggs v. Blake and wife (2 Hill Eq., 636) it was held, Chancellor Harper delivering the opinion, that where the debtor retained possession by virtue of a contract of hiring, made after the sale and independent thereof, this relieved the transaction of the per se fraudulent feature, as laid down in Smith v. Henry. The same doctrine was held in Pringle v. Rhame, 10 Rich., 75 [67 Am. Dec. 569], which was also a case of hiring, and in the recent case of Pregnall & Brother v. Miller & Kelly, 21 S. C., 385 [53 Am. Rep. 684]. Considering the principle upon which these two cases were based, this court held that it could not be confined in its application to a case of hiring alone, but that it extended to all cases where possession was retained, leaving such possession an open question in every case, with the burden, however, of explaining it satisfactorily upon the party attempting to sustain the deed, and in the absence of such satisfactory explanation, to have the effect as held in Smith v. Henry.

Now, in this case we have found no testimony explaining the possession retained here. The conveyance was made upon the consideration of a pre-existing debt, in part at least. The possession of a portion of the land was retained upon a nominal consideration, and this was to continue for the life of the grantor. With these facts unexplained, we think the decree of his honor may be sustained even in accordance with Pringle v.

*219

Rhame and *Pregnall & Brother v. Miller & Kelly, supra. The Circuit judge distinctly found no actual fraud on the part of G. W. L., and on that account he adjudged that the defendant should be refunded the value of the 279 acres transferred to his father in the exchange of lands, and also that he should be allowed to set up against the estate his note which was delivered up and cancelled in that trade also. McMeekin v. Edmonds, 1 Hill Eq., 294 [26 Am. Dec. 203], sustains this.

Under the rules which control this court as to the findings of fact in equity causes, we cannot interfere with such findings below, as we are unable to say that the manifest weight of the testimony is against these findings.

Lastly, the plaintiff excepted to the admission of testimony as to character of the defendant, G. W. L. No doubt, as a general rule in civil cases, such testimony is incompetent, but there are cases even on the civil side where such evidence has been received, under a principle which makes it competent in similar cases. Mr. Greenleaf, than whom there is no higher authority on evidence, says: "In civil cases, such evidence [speaking of general character] is not admitted, unless the nature of the action involves the general character of the party, or goes directly to affect it;" referring to several cases in the notes. Green. Evid., § 54. And further, he said: "Generally in actions of tort, wherever the defendant is charged with fraud from mere circumstances, evidence of his general good character is admissible to repel it." And Judge O'Neall, in Dawkins v. Gault (5 Rich., 153), though the case did not turn on it, recognizes this principle, and referring to Greenleaf, and also to Smets v. Plunket (1 Strob., 372), said: "Where an actual fraud is charged, perpetrated with a fraudulent intent, and the proof of the charge consists of circumstances, then good character, as in a case of crime, might be resorted to." The Circuit judge says the "case below was of that character;" charges of actual fraud were made against the defendant, and in a great part resting on circumstances; "and upon that point only the evidence was admitted and considered." We do not think this was error.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. *220

*RAILROAD COMMISSIONERS v. RAILROAD COMPANY.

(April Term, 1884.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐169.]

This court can make no original decision upon a point not ruled upon below.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Dargan v. West, 27 S. C. 157, 3 S. E. 68; State v. Turner, 36 S. C. 541, 15 S. E. 602.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1034; Dec. Dig. ⇐169.]

[2. Courts ⇐39.]

Whether the statutes gave to the Railroad Commissioners the right to regulate charges to points outside of this state, is a question of jurisdiction which may be raised at any time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 152–156; Dec. Dig. ⇐39.]

[3. Carriers ⇐12.]

The general railroad law of this state was intended to confer upon the Railroad Commissioners the right to regulate freight upon all railroads where any part thereof was within this state, and to all stations on those roads, including stations outside of the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 7–11, 15–20; Dec. Dig. ⇐12.]

[4. Commerce ⇐8.]

The power to regulate commerce among the states is given exclusively to Congress; the transportation of freight, or of the subject of commerce, is a constituent part of commerce itself; the transportation of passengers or merchandise through a state, or from one state to another, is commerce among the states, and exclusively within the control of Congress; but, as a general rule, each state may control, as a matter of domestic concern, all the railroads and other things, proper subjects of public control, which are located entirely within the borders of the state, although such regulating control may affect incidentally general inter-state commerce, with which the subject may connect.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hall v. South Carolina R. Co., 25 S. C. 567, 568; Lowe v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 63 S. C. 250, 41 S. E. 297, 90 Am. St. Rep. 678.

For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. ⇐8.]

[5. Commerce ⇐33.]

Transportation of merchandise through a state, or from one state to another, although the carriage may be continuous, is inter-state commerce, and beyond the control of the state, even where Congress has taken no action upon the subject.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. §§ 26, 81; Dec. Dig. ⇐33.]

[6. Commerce ⇐61.]

Any regulation of freights for the transportation from Columbia in this state to points in the State of North Carolina, by the statutes of this state, is beyond the power of the state, because of its being an invasion of the power exclusively vested in Congress by the constitution of the United States.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Sternberger v. Cape Fear & Y. V. R. R. Co., 29 S. C. 513, 7 S. E. 836, 2 L. R. A. 105.

For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. § 82; Dec. Dig ⇐61.]

Before Kershaw, J., Richland, May, 1884.

The decision of the Circuit judge was as follows:

This is an appeal from the decision of the Railroad Commissioners under the recent amendments of the general railroad law, heard May 24, 1884. There are serious questions as to the jurisdiction of the judge to whom is committed the hearing of these appeals which suggest themselves, but as no objection has been made to the hearing upon that ground, I will proceed to determine the matters submitted upon their merits. This decision is required to be filed within ten days after the hearing; and as the *cases referred to and the statutes to be considered are so numerous that they could scarcely all of them be carefully read in the time at my disposal, but little more than a bare decision can be expected, without the support of that mature consideration which questions of such magnitude and importance ought to receive.

*221

This first appeal is from the decision of the Commissioners against a charge made by appellants in their rates of freight on merchandise shipped by their road from Columbia, South Carolina, to various points in North Carolina on the Chester & Lenoir Railroad, being one of the roads consolidated with and controlled by the appellants' company. Several grounds are urged by the appellants against the authority of the Commissioners to require them to amend their rates in conformity with the decision of the Commissioners. I shall notice, first, the objection that this decision is an invasion of the domain of inter-state commerce, a subject exclusively within the control of Congress, under the constitution of the United States, article 1, § 8.

As this is a question affecting the constitution of the United States, if we can find that it has been settled by the decisions of the federal courts, they would be of controlling authority and binding upon the courts of this state. It has been established by decisions in those courts that "the transportation of merchandise from a place in one state to a place in another is commerce among the states," and "to fix or limit the charges for such transportation is to regulate commerce," and "a statute fixing or limiting such charges for transportation from places in one state to places in another state is a regulation of commerce among the states," and "the power to regulate such commerce is vested by the constitution in Congress," and "this power of Congress is exclusive, at least in all cases where the subjects over which the power is exercised are in their nature material, or admit of one uniform system or plan of regulation." This is an extract from the summary of what is laid down as settled in the federal courts, by McCrary, J., in one of the most recent cases on the subject, Kæiser v. Illinois Central R. R. Co., 18 Fed. Rep., 153. To sustain this summary, he cites Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall., 35 [18 L. Ed. 745]; Passenger Cases, 7 How., 283 [12 L. Ed. 702]; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1 [6 L. Ed. 23]; Case of State Freight Tax, 15 Wall., 232 [21 L. Ed. 146];

*222

Welton v. Missouri, *91 U. S., 279 [23 L. Ed. 347]; Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S., 497 [24 L. Ed. 547]; Railroad Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 469 [24 L. Ed. 527]; Pensacola Tel. Co. v. W. U. Tel. Co., 96 U. S., 9 [24 L. Ed. 708], &c.

In Hall v. DeCuir, Chief Justice Waite says: "There can be no doubt but that exclusive power has been conferred upon Congress in respect to the regulation of commerce among the several states." In Railroad Co. v. Husen, Mr. Justice Strong, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Whatever may be the power of a state over commerce that is completely internal, it can no more prohibit or regulate that which is inter-state than it can that which is with foreign nations. Power over one is given by the constitution of the United States to Congress, in the same words in which it is given over the other, and in both cases it is necessarily exclusive." In the same opinion it is said: "Transportation is essential to commerce, or rather it is commerce itself; and every obstacle to it or burden laid upon it by legislative authority is regulation." In the case of the State Freight Tax, it was held that "the transportation of freights, or the subject of commerce, is a constituent part of commerce itself. * * * That transportation of passengers or merchandise through a state, or from one state to another, is commerce among the states, and exclusively within the regulating control of Congress."

If these propositions of law be correct, it follows that any regulation of freights for the transportation of merchandise from Columbia in this state to points in the State of North Carolina by the statutes of this state, would be beyond the power of the state, because of its being an invasion of the powers exclusively vested in Congress by the Constitution of the United States, and hence would not be binding upon the appellants in this case. As these decisions have been pronounced by the highest judicial authority of the United States, in courts of the last resort, and affect a question of the limits imposed upon state legislation by the constitution of the United States, they are binding upon me.

But does the statute under which the Commissioners are acting here undertake to regulate or limit the rates of freight beyond the limits of the state? I think it does not. It is entitled "An act to provide a general railroad law for the management and regulation of railroads in this state," &c. [Here the learned judge *quotes the language of the General Statutes, as found in sections 1440, 1441, 1442, 1443, and 1446.] I can find nothing in the sections quoted (which are those affecting the subject now under consideration) which necessarily requires to be construed as an attempt on the part of the state to do more than establish regulations of commerce by railroads within the limits of this state, which it has the clear and unquestioned right to do. I therefore hold that the act does not authorize the Commissioners to regulate freights upon merchandise committed to railroads for transportation from a point in this state to a point beyond the limits of the state.

*223

The argument of the learned attorney general to the contrary of this is based to a large extent upon the similarity of these provisions to those in the act of Illinois on the same subject, and the construction of that act by the courts of that state. But it is quite as fair to assume that the legislature of this state was moved to employ the language they did by a knowledge of the cases in the United States Court, which held that they had no power to legislate upon this subject so as to affect commerce beyond the limits of this state.

The case of Peik v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 94 U. S., 164 [24 L. Ed. 97], also relied upon by the attorney general, is a very peculiar case, and can hardly be authority upon the general subject, because of the very unusual circumstances there existing. The decision is placed distinctly upon the peculiar contractual effect of the consolidated charters, and so far as the feature of inter-state commerce is concerned, it is considered by Chief Justice Waite that the regulation in question was one confined to "state commerce, or such inter-state commerce as directly affects the people." He says: "Until Congress acts in reference to the relation of this company to inter-state commerce, it is certainly within the power of Wisconsin to regulate its fares, &c., so far as they are of domestic concern."

In relation to this case, I will add a few remarks from the decision of Judge Hill, in the Circuit Court, Southern District of Mississippi, in the case of the Illinois Central Railroad Company v. John M. Stone and others, Commissioners [20 Fed. 468]. Speaking of Peik v. Chicago, he says: "The last case, at first view, would seem to *sustain the position assumed by counsel. But it cannot fairly be supposed that the court intended to declare that inter-state commerce might be regulated by the states until Congress chose to regulate it, for the same court has often said that inaction by Congress in this respect is no warrant for state interference. * * * It was a peculiar case. A corporation of Illinois was, by the consent of that state, merged into a corporation of the State of Wisconsin, and in express terms was thereafter to be governed by the laws of Wisconsin, and the constitution of Wisconsin authorized the legislation complained of, and the corporation had become a domestic corporation of Wisconsin, although its line of road extended into the State of Illinois."

*224

The "Granger cases" are also relied on by the counsel for the Commissioners, but they do not appear to have been considered as settling the doctrines which they are cited to sustain. In a very instructive case in the Circuit Court for the Middle District of Tennessee, those cases have been commented upon by Judge Hammond at some length and with much force. He concludes thus: "The decisions amount, we think, only to this, where a warehouseman or common carrier is engaged in the storage of goods or their carriage within a state, and exclusively within it, the rates of charges for such business are subject to legislative control by the state, and the fact that such legislation may indirectly and remotely affect commerce between the states, does not invalidate it." That case was heard before Judges Baxter, Hammond, and Key, and decides inter alia that the power of the states to regulate railroad rates by such direct action, is limited to domestic transportation, "which means that carried on exclusively within the boundaries of the state."

Possibly a state may bind corporations engaged in inter-state commerce to schedules of rates agreed upon by them, but this is binding only by force of the contract of the carrier so bound. Louisville & N. R. R. Co. v. Railroad Commissioners of Tennessee, 19 Fed. Rep., 679.

That such a restriction upon the states in regard to commerce among the states is reasonable and necessary, is further made apparent by considering that if the one state has a right to prescribe the rate of freight at one end of the line, the other would *have the same right, on its side, to prescribe another and a different rate for the same transportation, and conflicts most absurd and disastrous to commerce might ensue in consequence. This feature is referred to and pointed out in many of the cases as vindicating the necessity of the restriction, and that it must be, in its nature, exclusive of state legislation.

*225

Another argument insisted on by the appellant is that the charter of this railroad is a contract, and that by the terms of the charter the railroad is allowed to carry freights at a rate not exceeding fifty cents per hundred pounds, and twenty cents per cubic foot, which rates are not exceeded in the charges sought now to be reduced by the Commissioners. Nor do they exceed the rates allowed by the charter of the Kings Mountain Railroad Company. This company was protected as to the 41st section of the act of 1841, subjecting all chartered companies to legislative control, by the 32d section of its charter, which expressly declares that it shall in no wise be subject to its provisions (11 Stat., 408). The act to produce conformity in the charters granted to the Charlotte & South Carolina Railroad Company by the States of North and South Carolina declares that the charter theretofore granted to said company "shall continue of force, except in so far as it may be repugnant to the provisions of this act" (11 Stat., 542, § 33). By section 30 of the same act it is declared that "the said company shall be entitled only to such powers and privileges as shall be granted to it by the legislature incorporating it, * * * and shall be subject to all the restrictions and liabilities which may be imposed on it by either of the legislatures by the act of incorporation, so that its powers and disabilities may be similar in each of the states, unless the provisions of this section be repugnant to the clause of the former charter exempting the company from the operations of the act of 1841." I do not discover any such repugnancy in the act. But it may be that some such repugnancy may have arisen under this (the 30th) section in consequence of the provisions of the act of North Carolina in regard to this company. That act is not before me, nor at present accessible.

It is insisted, however, by the counsel for the railroad that the effect of section 33 is to continue in force the chartered exemp*tion from the act of 1841, section 41. By the act consolidating the Charlotte & South Carolina Railroad Company with the Columbia & Augusta Railroad Company, creating the Charlotte, Columbia & Augusta Railroad Company, it is declared that said company shall possess all the rights, powers, privileges, immunities, and franchises conferred upon said companies by the several acts heretofore passed and now of force incorporating said companies, and amending the charters thereof. 14 Stat., 232.

*226

It is further insisted that these immunities have never been waived by the company or withdrawn by their acceptance of any amendment or modification of the charter, and therefore it is claimed that the legislature can make no law interfering with rates of freight charged by said company so long as they are not in excess of the limit fixed in the charter. I do not agree with this proposition. If the company had been authorized to transport passengers and property, and to receive compensation therefor without any restrictions as to amount, the company would have been confined in their charges to reasonable rates, and unless restrained by the charter, the legislature would have had power to declare what were reasonable rates.

In this charter there was a provision which qualified the general power conferred to receive compensation and establish rates of freights and fares, and declared that these should not exceed the limit prescribed. In other words, instead of a general grant of the right to make such charges without limit, and afterwards by another act declaring what should be a reasonable rate, the reasonable rate is fixed by the charter. If a general grant in the charter of the right to make these charges without any specified limit, leaves the state at liberty to interfere and say what shall be the rate, how can the state powers over the subject be less where the grant of the power is not unlimited, but qualified and limited? If the latter is to be construed a contract limiting the power of the state, why not the former? Yet it is well established that the legislature may establish reasonable limits to such charges when there is a general grant of the power, and upon like principles I am of the opinion that when at the time a maximum is fixed by the charter, which is then deemed reasonable, but which by the change of circumstances becomes unreasonable *subsequently, the state may prescribe another and different maximum in order to conform to the progress of commerce and the public necessities. The object of the proviso in the charter in relation to charges for freight and passengers was not to control or limit the power of the legislature, but to limit the company. The principle is that "a state may limit the amount of charges by railroad companies for fare or freights, unless restrained by some contract in the charter," and I find no such contract here. The authorities on this subject are all collected in the case of Ruggles v. Illinois, 108 U. S., 531 [2 Sup. Ct. 832, 27 L. Ed. 812], to which I refer.

*227

There are other objections made by the company to the exercise of this power of control by the state of the railroads as violating the state constitution in several particulars. These the limited time at my disposal will not allow me to discuss severally, and I must content myself by saying that in my opinion they are probably answered by what has already been said, so far as the present question is concerned. If they have not, they would not affect the result of this appeal.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the finding by the Railroad Commissioners in the matter of the items of charges by the said railroad company for the transportation of fertilizers from Columbia, S. C., to the stations on the Chester & Lenoir Railroad, bearing date the 10th day of April, 1884, from which this appeal was taken, be reversed, and the said appeal sustained.

From this decision the Railroad Commissioners appealed, upon the grounds stated in the opinion of this court.

The Attorney General, for appellants, contended that the Railroad Commissioners were required by law to supervise freight charges on railroads to points without the state and to require the railroad companies to make their charges conform to the law, citing the several statutes of this state since 1878, and also the case of People v. Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific R. R. Co., 104 Ill., 476, construing similar legislation in Illinois. He further contended that such legislation was not in conflict with the constitution of the United States, citing 6 Cr., 87; 12 Wheat., 270; 99 U. S., 718; 94 Id., 114, 155, 175, 179, 180; 95 Id., 497; *104 Ill., 476. In support of the position that respondent is not protected by its charter from this legislation, the attorney general cited the statutes of incorporation and amendments. Gen. Stat., §§ 1361, 1416; 11 Stat., 168, § 41; 95 U. S., 318; 108 Id., 531.

*228

Mr. J. H. Rion, contra, cited, inter alia, 105 U. S., 464; 95 Id., 469, 487; 94 Id., 163; 18 Fed. Rep., 12, 154; 20 Id., 470; 19 Id., 680; 45 Iowa, 338; 6 Am. and Eng. R. R. Cas., 305; Rorer Inter-State Laws, 311–313; Pom. Inter-State Com., 382, 383, 387, 391; U. S. Rev. Stat., § 5258, and the preamble to the act contained in that section, as originally passed.

April 28, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. In obedience to the provisions of the general railroad law of the state from section 1413 to 1561, General Statutes, the president of "The Charlotte, Columbia & Augusta Railroad Company" submitted to the Railroad Commissioners a freight tariff, in which was set down rates on the transportation of fertilizers between Columbia, South Carolina, and Crowder's Creek, and other stations in the State of North Carolina, on the Chester & Lenoir Railroad, which was operated by the defendant corporation. The Commissioners objected to the freights for transporting the fertilizers aforesaid, and, after giving opportunity as required for the defendant corporation to be heard, rendered the following decision: "That the items of charges in the said schedule hereinbefore set forth are in violation of the law (General Statutes, § 1442) forbidding any railroad company to charge or collect for the transportation of freight over its railroad, the branches thereof, and any road or roads which said company has the right, license, or permission to use, operate, or control, wholly, or in part, within this state, a greater amount than shall at the same time be charged or collected by it for the transportation of a like quantity of freight of the same class transported over any portion of said road of equal distance, and are in excess of the rates fixed and approved by the said Railroad Commissioners on January 18,

*229

1884, a copy of which *is herewith filed as exhibit 'B,' and that notice of the said proposed changes in the schedule so adopted and approved was not given thirty days before the day it was to go into effect, such proposed changes not having been agreed to by the said Railroad Commissioners, as required by the General Statutes, section 1451, a."

From this decision the defendant corporation appealed to Judge Kershaw, "resident judge" of the Fifth Circuit, who, after hearing argument, held that the general railroad act of this state does not authorize the Railroad Commissioners to regulate freights upon merchandise committed to railroads for transportation from a point in this state to a point beyond the limits of the state. And also that if it did so, "such attempted regulation would be beyond the power of the state, because of its being an invasion of the power exclusively vested in Congress by the constitution of the United States," and dismissed the appeal.

From this judgment the Commissioners appeal to this court upon the following exceptions:

I. "Because his honor held 'That any regulation of freights for the transportation of merchandise from Columbia, in this state, to points in the State of North Carolina, by the statute of this state, would be beyond the power of the state, because of its being an invasion of the power exclusively vested in Congress by the constitution of the United States, and hence would not be binding upon the appellants (the C., C. & A. R. R. Company) in this case.' Whereas, it is respectfully submitted, his honor should have held that the general railroad act (under the provisions of which the finding of the Railroad Commissioners appealed from was made) operates upon every company in this state engaged in the transportation of property by railroad, and extends and applies to every railroad which said company has a right, license, or permission to use, operate, or control. That therefore the regulation of such company is a matter of domestic concern. It is employed in state as well as inter-state commerce, and until Congress acts, the state must be permitted to adopt such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the promotion of the general welfare of the people within its own jurisdiction, *even though in so doing those without may be incidentally affected. (Chicago R. R. Co. v. Iowa, 94 U. S., 163 [24 L. Ed. 94]).

*230

II. "Because his honor having found that the Chester & Lenoir Railroad is one of the roads consolidated under an act of the State of South Carolina with and controlled by the appellant, a corporation of said state, should have held that 'thus the State of South Carolina is permitted to legislate for the consolidated company in this state precisely the same as it would for its own original companies if no consolidation had taken place,' and that therefore the law of South Carolina regulating the charges of the C., C. & A. Railroad for transportation undertaken by it to points upon the Chester & Lenoir Railroad applies to state commerce or such inter-state commerce as directly affects the people of South Carolina; until Congress acts in reference to the relations of this company to inter-state commerce, it is certainly within the powers of South Carolina to regulate its fares, &c., so far as they are of domestic concern. With the people of South Carolina this company has domestic relations. Incidentally these may reach beyond the state, but certainly until Congress undertakes to legislate for those who are without the state, South Carolina may provide for those within, even though it may indirectly affect those without. (Peik v. Chicago Railroad Co., 94 U. S., 177 [24 L. Ed. 97.])

III. "Because, it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in following the decisions of some of the Circuit Courts of the United States, inconsistent with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in relation to the question involved in the appeal of the right of the state to regulate its railroad companies.

IV. "Because his honor held that the 'general railroad act does not authorize the Railroad Commissioners to regulate freights upon merchandise committed to railroads for transportation from a point in this state to a point beyond the limits of the state.' Whereas, it is respectfully submitted, this point was not made in the grounds of appeal from the finding of the Railroad Commissioners, and his honor erred in deciding it; because sections 1451 a and 1451 b of the General Statutes expressly require all railroad companies in this state to submit to the Railroad

*231

Commis*sioners for their scrutiny and revision copies of the schedules of all through rates and joint rates with other roads as soon as adopted; and the said Railroad Commissioners are required to examine the same and determine whether they are in any particular a violation of any of the provisions of the law intended to prevent discrimination, and to secure to all persons just and reasonable rates of charges for transportation of passengers or freight of any description; and it is from the findings of the said Commissioners under these sections that the appeal heard by his honor is taken; but his honor, in quoting all the sections of the general railroad act which he considers affect the subject under consideration, omits to allude to these sections. And his honor also omits to quote section 1445, General Statutes, which declares that 'each and all of the provisions of the act shall apply to all property, and the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, storage, or carriage of the same on one actually or substantially continuous carriage, or as part of such continuous carriage, * * * and the compensation thereof, whether such property be carried wholly on one railroad or partly on several railroads; and whether such services are performed or compensation paid by or to one person alone, or in connection with another or other persons.

V. "Because, it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in not deciding as requested to do by the respondents, that the state has the right to regulate the freights to be charged by all companies in this state, chartered by this state or consolidated under the laws of this state with companies chartered by other states, notwithstanding any exemption from legislative control, which might be claimed by such companies under the original charters; such consolidation having worked a dissolution of the original charters, and such exemption from legislative control having ceased when amendments to the original charters were made and accepted. Shields v. Ohio, 95 U. S., 319 [24 L. Ed. 357]; Hoge v. R. R. Co., 99 U. S., 348 [25 L. Ed. 303]."

As to the fifth exception for not deciding as to the general right of the state to supervise and regulate freights on railroads within the state, we cannot make an original decision. We are limited to the correction of errors, and when there has been no *ruling below there can be no question of error before us. Besides, we may say that the judge did substantially decide the point made, and from that decision there was no appeal. The judge held as follows: "It is further insisted that these immunities (exemption from legislation under the 41st section of the act of 1841) have never been waived by the company or withdrawn by their acceptance of any amendment or modification of the charter, and therefore it is claimed that the legislature can make no law interfering with rates of freight charged by said company so long as they are not in excess of the limit fixed in the charter. I do not agree with this proposition. If the company had been authorized to transport passengers and property, and to receive compensation therefor without any restriction as to amount, the company would have been confined in their charges to reasonable rates, and unless restricted by the charter the legislature would have had power to declare what were reasonable rates. * * * The object of the proviso in the charter in relation to charges for freight and passengers was not to control or limit the power of the legislature, but to limit the company. The principle is that a state may limit the amount of charges by railroad companies for fare or freights, unless restrained by some contract in the charter, and I find no such contract here. The authorities are all collected in the case of Ruggles v. Illinois, 108 U. S., 531 [2 Sup. Ct. 832, 27 L. Ed. 812]," &c.

*232

The fourth exception complains that the judge decided that the railroad law "does not authorize the Commissioners to regulate freights upon merchandise committed to railroads for transportation from a point in this state to a point beyond the limits of the state, where the point was not made in the grounds of appeal from the finding of the Railroad Commissioners, and therefore it was error." Whether the general railroad law gave the Railroad Commissioners the right which they exercised, was a question of jurisdiction which could be raised at any time whether made or not by the parties. See Waller v. Cresswell, 4 S. C., 353.

Did the Circuit judge err in holding that the law under which the Commissioners acted does not undertake to regulate the rates of freight beyond the limits of the state, and that in attempting to do so the Commissioners acted beyond the authority conferred *upon them? The question involves the construction of the railroad law of the state, and especially as to the powers and duties imposed upon the Commissioners. The railroad law is composed of many sections which have lately been much amended, and it could hardly be expected that so many complex provisions made at different times upon a subject so difficult should be entirely consistent with each other in every particular. But taking all the different parts together, and considering them as a whole with reference to the manifest object and intent, we cannot doubt that the jurisdiction exercised was given and intended to be given to the Railroad Commissioners.

*233

It is of course assumed in the outset that the general assembly of the state legislates only for the territory embraced within the boundaries of the state, and that generally its acts have not the force of law beyond those boundaries. It is true, as stated, that the railroad law is properly entitled "an act to provide a general railroad law for the management and regulation of railroads in this state." It is also true that several of the sections speak expressly of railroads in this state; but it must be observed that neither the title of the act nor any of the sections limit the provisions of the law to railroads exclusively within this state—having both termini and doing all its business within this state. To give the law this construction would exclude entirely from its operation all railroads which happen to have a terminus, or operate another road which has a terminus, beyond the limits of the state. This would defeat the very object of the act and make discriminations instead of preventing them, and we are sure was not the intention of the legislature. It is not to be doubted that the legislature intended justice and equity, and that the remedies sought to be enforced by the law were as much applicable to railroads running through the state and across its border as to those located exclusively within the state. We do not see that a railroad chartered by the state, and running for a distance on the soil of the state, is any the less a "railroad in the state," because it may have a terminus in another state.

The correctness of this view is demonstrated by the provisions of the last important amendment to the law, that of 1883 (18 Stat., 487), which, among other things, enacts "that it shall be *unlawful for any such person, &c., to charge, collect, or receive at any point upon its railroad a higher rate of toll," &c.; and then provides "that the provisions of this section and the two preceding sections shall extend and apply to any railroad, the branches, and any road or roads which any such person or persons so engaged as aforesaid, has the right, license, or permission to use, operate, or control, wholly, or in part, within this state." These two provisions, taken together, constitute an express authority and direction that the requirements of the law "should extend and apply" to railroads "in part within this state" and at any point on such road, which necessarily includes stations without as well as those within the state. See the opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois in the case of The People of the State of Illinois v. The Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Ry. Co., 104 Ill., 476.

*234

It is suggested, however, that while it may be true that the provisions of the law do apply, and were intended to apply, to a railroad within this state which happens to have a terminus beyond its limits, yet it was intended to apply only to that portion of the business of the road, which might be done between stations on the road located in the state. There is no such limit or qualification in the provisions of the act. Some of the states under similar circumstances (for example, Georgia) have inserted such limitation, but our act has none. The provisions are sweeping and general—"all through rates and joint rates with other roads," &c. It seems to us that the general embraces every particular—that the whole includes all its parts. We cannot assume that the legislature made general provisions without limitation or qualification, and appointed Commissioners to enforce them, with the unexpressed reservation that the Commissioners themselves should make a distinction in the duties imposed—enforcing one class and omitting to enforce another, only for the reason that in their judgment the latter were unconstitutional and void.

The object of the law manifestly was to secure a uniform system of rates to be charged by companies doing business in the state for all transportation undertaken by them, and this object would certainly not be promoted if the relief proposed did not extend to *any part of the transportation, not even that within the state, of all property destined for delivery beyond the limits of the state. We do not think that the words "within this state," as used in the railroad act, can by any fair construction be held to limit the provisions of the act against discriminations to charges for transportation wholly within the state, or that the Commissioners could have shown a warrant in the law for refusing to enforce its provisions as to articles transported from the state and delivered beyond its limits.

*235

Assuming, then, that the Railroad Commissioners did not transcend their jurisdiction; that some of the provisions of the railroad law do apply to transportation undertaken and conducted by companies doing business in South Carolina, even when the place of delivery may be beyond the limits of the state, then the question arises whether it was beyond the power of the state to insert those provisions in the law. Judge Kershaw held that any regulation of freights for the transportation of merchandise from Columbia, in this state, to points in the State of North Carolina by the statutes of this state, would be beyond the power of the state, because of their being an invasion of the power to regulate commerce among the states, which is vested exclusively in Congress by the constitution of the United States. Was this error?

The question is one of importance, and in some aspects not free from difficulty arising not from the provisions of the constitution itself, which is short and plain, but principally from a seeming conflict in the decided cases as to what is a regulation of commerce between the states, and connected therewith as to the matters upon which a state may act, although inter-state commerce may be thereby incidentally affected. Section 8, art. I., of the constitution of the United States declares that "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the states." In considering the proper interpretation of this provision, we may, for the sake of brevity, assume several points to be settled beyond controversy. We may take as settled that the power to regulate commerce among the states is given exclusively to Congress. In The City of New York v. Miln, 11 Peters, 102 [9 L. Ed. 648], Mr. Justice Story said: "The power given to *Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the states has been exclusive from the nature and objects of the power and the necessary implications growing out of its exercise. Full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power and leaves no residuum; and the grant of the whole to one is incompatible with a grant to another of a part," &c.

*236

In Groves v. Slaughter, 15 Peters, 449 [10 L. Ed. 800], Mr. Justice Baldwin said: "That the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the states is exclusive of any interference by the states, has been, in my opinion, conclusively settled by the solemn opinions of this court in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 186 [6 L. Ed. 23], and in Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 438 [6 L. Ed. 678]. If these decisions are not to be taken as the established construction of this clause of the constitution, I know of none which are not yet open to doubt; nor can there be any adjudication of this court, which must be considered as authoritative upon any question, if these are not to be so on this," &c. These positive judicial declarations from the highest court in the United States must suffice, without attempting to cite the multitude of cases upon the exact point.

It may be taken as settled that "the transportation of freight or of the subject of commerce is a constituent part of commerce itself; and that the transportation of passengers or merchandise through a state, or from one state to another, is commerce among the states, and exclusively within the control of Congress." (See the case of the State Freight Tax, 15 Wall., 281 [21 L. Ed. 146].) "Whenever the subjects in regard to which a power to regulate commerce is asserted are in their nature national, or admit of one uniform system or plan of regulation, they are exclusively within the regulating control of Congress."

It may, as we think, also be taken as settled that, as a general rule, each state may control, as a matter of "domestic concern," all the railroads and other things—proper subjects of public control—which are located entirely within the borders of the state, although such regulating control may affect incidentally general inter-state commerce, with which the subject may connect. This proposition is well illustrated by the somewhat famous case of Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S., 135 [24 L. Ed. 77]. In that case an immense grain elevator or warehouse was erected to facilitate the storing *and shipment of grain at the city of Chicago between the railroad and the lake, and although located within the State of Illinois, it stood in the very gateway of commerce, affecting eight or ten states. The State of Illinois passed a law to regulate public warehouses, inspection charges, &c., and the Supreme Court of the United States sustained the constitutionality of the law.

*237

In delivering the judgment of the court, Chief Justice Waite said: "It was very properly said in the case of the 'State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts' (15 Wall., 293 [21 L. Ed. 164]) that it is not everything that affects commerce that amounts to a regulation of it within the meaning of the constitution. The warehouses of these plaintiffs in error are situated, and their business carried on exclusively, within the limits of the State of Illinois. They are used as instruments by those engaged in state as well as those engaged in inter-state commerce, but they are no more necessarily a part of commerce itself than the dray or the cart by which, but for them, grain would be transported from one railroad station to another. Incidentally they may become connected with inter-state commerce, but not necessarily so. Their regulation is a thing of domestic concern, and, certainly until Congress acts in reference to their inter-state relations, the state may exercise all the powers of government on them, even though in so doing it may indirectly operate upon commerce outside of its immediate jurisdiction," &c.

It seems, however, that there are some exceptions to this rule—cases in which it has been held that a state may not make such regulations, even where the subject is exclusively within the limits of the state and in that sense might be considered a matter of "domestic concern." The case of Hall v. DeCuir (95 U. S., 497 [24 L. Ed. 547]) is one of them. In that case the State of Louisiana passed a law, requiring those engaged in the transportation of passengers to give all persons travelling in that state equal rights and privileges, without distinction of race or color; and the Supreme Court held that the act was unconstitutional, as an attempted regulation of inter-state commerce. Chief Justice Waite, after referring to what had been held in Munn v. Illinois, supra, said: "The line which separates the powers of the states from this exclusive power of Congress is not always distinctly marked, and *oftentimes it is not easy to determine on which side a particular case belongs. Judges not unfrequently differ in their reasons for a decision in which they concur. Under such circumstances, it would be a useless task to undertake to fix an arbitrary rule by which the line may in all cases be located. It is far better to leave a matter of such delicacy to be settled in each case upon a view of the particular rights involved. But we think it may safely be said that state legislation, which seeks to impose a direct burden upon inter-state commerce, or to interfere directly with its freedom, does encroach upon the exclusive power of Congress. The statute now under consideration, in our opinion, occupies that position. It does not act upon the business through the local instruments to be employed after coming within the state, but directly upon the business as it comes into the state from without or goes out from within," &c. And see the judgment of Chief Justice Marshall, in the famous case of Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 1 [6 L. Ed. 23]), as to the constitutionality of a law of New York granting to Livingston & Fulton the exclusive navigation of all the waters within the jurisdiction of that state.

*238

But in the view that the doctrine of Munn v. Illinois is general and extends to railroads; that a state may exercise regulating control within her borders, although such action may incidentally affect commerce beyond, it is insisted that the converse of that proposition should hold good, viz., that the state may not exercise such regulating control where it reaches beyond the state line, and in the sense contemplated cannot be fairly said to be "a matter of domestic concern," and its effect upon commerce is not merely incidental, but direct. Seeing that the most difficult application of a rule, resting upon what may be a matter of "domestic concern," must be in reference to through transportation on railroads which cross the borders of one state into another, the embarrassment arising from the carriage being continuous, part in one state and part in another, and therefore part domestic and part foreign—we have looked carefully through the cases to see whether the courts have held that in such case a state may control the freights on that part of the transportation which lies beyond the state line as an incident or integral part of that which is within, and may be said to be "domestic." We have found *several cases which hold, more or less distinctly, that there is not such identity in the different parts of a continuous carriage from one state into another as to make them necessarily subject to the same control in regard to the question as to what is and what is not a regulation of commerce in the sense of the constitution. We will select only the following cases:

*239

Case of the State Freight Tax, 15 Wall., 277 [21 L. Ed. 146]. In this case, in delivering the judgment of the court, Mr. Justice Strong said: "The state may tax its internal commerce, but if an act to tax inter-state or foreign commerce is unconstitutional, it is not cured by including in its provisions subjects within the domain of the state. Nor is a rule prescribed for carriage of goods through, out of, or into a state any the less a regulation of transportation because the same rule may be applied to carriage which is wholly internal. Doubtless a state may regulate its internal commerce as it pleases. If a state chooses to exact conditions for allowing the passage or carriage of persons or freight through it into another state, the nature of the exaction is not changed by adding to it similar conditions for allowing transportation wholly within the state." This case has often been cited with approval by the Supreme Court of the United States, without an intimation of dissent from its rulings.[1] Very recently several of the Circuit Courts of the United States have applied its principles and doctrines to cases precisely similar to the one before us. It may be true that these cases have not yet reached the Supreme Court of the United States and been finally decided there, but we think they are commended to notice as the last judicial utterances upon the subject, and for the learning and ability displayed.

In Pacific Coast Steamship Co. v. Board of Railroad Commissioners, 18 Fed. Rep. 10 (November, 1883), Judge Field held that "the State Board of Railroad Commissioners has no power to regulate or interfere with the transport of persons or merchandise by a steamship company, between ports within the state, if they be in transit to or from other states, or when in navigating *the ocean the vessel goes beyond a marine league from the shore. This power has been conferred upon Congress and is exclusive," &c.

*240

In Kæiser v. Illinois Cent. R. R. Co. (Circuit Court, Iowa), Fed. Rep. (November, 1883), Judge McCrary held that "this power of Congress is exclusive. It follows that the act of the General Assembly of Iowa providing for a tariff of maximum charges for the transportation of freight and passengers by railroads, in so far as it relates to through shipments over inter-state lines, is unconstitutional." (See numerous authorities quoted.)

In Illinois Cent. R. R. Co. v. Stone et al., Fed. Rep. (July 8, 1884), Judge Hill held that "a state legislative act to fix and regulate the charges of transportation of any road, save such as is strictly and entirely within the borders of that state, is a law to regulate commerce and against the constitution of the United States." This case, as stated by the Circuit judge, explains that of Peik v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 94 U. S. 175 [24 L. Ed. 97].

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Railroad Commissioners of Tennessee, Fed. Rep. (February 29, 1884), the court held, among other things, that "the power of the states to regulate railroad rates by direct action is limited to domestic transportation, which means that carried on exclusively within the boundaries of a state, and transportation can be domestic only when it begins and ends within those boundaries; and this definition cannot, for the purpose of enlarging state authority, be held to include so much of a transportation on a continuous shipment between two or more states as will cover the distance travelled within the limits of any one of those states; for this construction would utterly destroy the exclusive power of Congress over the inter-state transportation, abrogate the constitutional provision, and enable the states to restrict, obstruct, or impair that freedom of commerce between the states which it was the object of the provision to permanently secure. It can only include the transportation carried on upon roads lying wholly within the state, or else it may be to shipments beginning and ending in the state, without reference to the character of the road in that regard. This is the utmost reach of the state power," &c.

There is one case which seems to be in conflict with this array *of authority. It is one of those generally known as "the Granger Cases," Peik v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 94 U. S., 178 [24 L. Ed. 97]. As the Circuit judge states, this seems to be "a very peculiar case." As we understand it, the Northwestern Railway Company, a corporation of the State of Illinois, was consolidated with certain roads in the State of Wisconsin, upon certain stipulations that the Wisconsin law should govern the consolidated company; that is, making the Illinois company, so far as it could be done, a company of the State of Wisconsin. This state (Wisconsin) passed a law to regulate rates on her railroads. The creditors of the Illinois company challenged the right of the State of Wisconsin to regulate fares in Illinois, and it was held that as they had chosen to come in under the Wisconsin law they "must take the consequences." This was clearly the main question in the case. It is true that, among others, the point was made, that the Wisconsin act, so far as it related to the Illinois portion of the consolidated road, was an effort to regulate commerce among the states, but the point seems not to have been fully argued.

[1] See opinion of Supreme Court of the United States, filed April 13, 1885, Gloucester Ferry Company v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S., 196 [5 Sup. Ct. 826, 29 L. Ed. 158].—Reporter.

*241

In delivering the judgment of the court, Chief Justice Waite said: "As to the effect of the statute as a regulation of internal commerce, the law is confined to state commerce, or such inter-state commerce as directly affects the people of Wisconsin. Until Congress acts in reference to the relations of this company to inter-state commerce, it is certainly within the power of Wisconsin to regulate its fares, &c., so far as they are of domestic concern. With the people of Wisconsin this company has domestic relations. Incidentally, these may reach beyond the state, but certainly until Congress undertakes to legislate for those who are without the state, Wisconsin may provide for those within, even though it may incidentally affect those without," &c.

It seems that for the purposes of government, the Illinois road was considered as pushed back into the State of Wisconsin, and stood precisely as if it were within the physical boundaries of that state, and in this light, fares on the Illinois road were matter of "domestic concern" to Wisconsin. This would seem to be indicated by the phrase "domestic concern." When that expression was first used in the case of Munn v. Illinois, supra, in reference to the grain elevator at Chicago, it was plainly to convey the idea *of being within, as contradistinguished from that of being without the state. To use the expression in any wider sense, as affording the test of state jurisdiction, would, it seems to us, throw open the whole subject, and leave it to the legislature to decide in each case as to what is, and what is not, sufficient to constitute a matter of "domestic concern" to the state. But if we are mistaken in our understanding of this case, we cannot think that it overthrows the weight of authority which holds "that transportation of passengers or merchandise through a state, or from one state to another, is inter-state commerce."

*242

We think we are not allowed to give controlling influence to the fact that Congress has not exercised the jurisdiction conferred upon it. In several of the cases allusion is made to the fact that "Congress has not acted," and that induced the inquiry whether there was any law upon the subject; but we find none. In a certain class of cases, local in character, such as harbors, bays, &c., state legislation is permitted until Congress acts, and nothing more. As we have shown, the jurisdiction is exclusive, and that would seem to be inconsistent with the view that nonaction on the part of Congress confers it on the states. As was said in the case of Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S., 691 [26 L. Ed. 238]: "Commerce with foreign countries and among the states, strictly considered, consists of intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. For the regulation of commerce as thus defined, there can be only one system of rules applicable alike to the whole country, and the authority which can act for the whole country can alone adopt such a system. Action upon it by separate states is not, therefore, permissible. Language affirming the exclusiveness of the great power over commerce, as thus defined, may not be inaccurate, when it would be so if applied to legislation upon subjects which are merely auxiliary to commerce," &c. (It appears that efforts are now being made in Congress to pass a law upon the subject.)

We are fully aware of all the presumptions in favor of the constitutionality of an act of the legislature, and we feel sensibly the great and delicate responsibility imposed upon us; but reluctant *as we may be, we are constrained by our sense of duty to concur with Judge Kershaw in holding "that any regulation of freights for the transportation from Columbia in this state to points in the State of North Carolina, by the statutes of this state, is beyond the power of the state, because of its being an invasion of the power exclusively vested in Congress by the constitution of the United States."

*243

The judgment of this court is that the judgment below be affirmed.[2]

[2] This ends the cases of April Term, 1884. The last eleven of these cases were heard at the adjourned April Term, in November.

22 S. C. 243

DARBY v. STRIBLING. MURPHY v. SAME. WILEY v. SAME.

(November Term, 1884.)

[Guardian and Ward ⇐33.]

A guardian holding a note belonging to the estates of his wards given for the purchase money of a negro slave consented in 1872 to take judgment against the makers of the note, then perfectly solvent, for one-third of the amount due, because of an agreement then prevailing among the lawyers at that bar, induced by the rulings of their presiding judge. In 1871 the Supreme Court had twice decided that such debts were collectible. Held, that the guardian was liable to account to his wards for the full amount of the note.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Darby v. Stribling, 24 S. C. 423.

For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. § 147; Dec. Dig. ⇐33.]

Before Wallace, J., Abbeville, February, 1883.

In this case the Hon. I. D. Witherspoon, judge of the Sixth Circuit, sat in the place of Mr. Justice McGowan, disqualified.

The opinion states the case. The master gave the following reasons for his findings:

In the case before us the guardian very wisely did not collect this note in Confederate money. Immediately, and for several years after the war, there was great uncertainty whether negro debts could be collected at all. Indeed, Judge Orr, as I have said, had held that they could not be. He dismissed many cases be*cause the parties would not accept judgment for one-third of the amount. This, I take it, gave rise to the rule adopted by this bar in such cases. As Mr. Lee says in his testimony, this was considered the best that could be done in the cases, and was generally acted upon here. It is true that judgment was not taken in this case till more than a year after the decision in Calhoun v. Calhoun, wherein it was held that negro debts were collectible. But the case was in the hands of the guardian's attorney, and I have no doubt he acted upon his advice. Mr. Lee, who knew Mr. Willard well, says that he was a cautious man, in money matters. The manner in which he administered the estates that came into his hands negatives the idea of any mala fides on his part, for he has paid out more than he received. So that upon a review of the whole case I do not think that his estate should be held liable for the whole amount of the note.

*244

Mr. Samuel C. Cason, for appellant.

Mr. W. H. Parker, contra.

January 19, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice WITHERSPOON. Each of the above entitled actions involves the same questions and were heard together. On June 9, 1857, James C. Willard was appointed guardian of the plaintiffs, E. J. Darby, M. A. Murphy, and N. J. Wiley, respectively, whose maiden name was Magrath. Willard, the guardian, died August 21, 1876, without settling with his said wards. Thomas Thomson became the administrator of Willard, and he died in 1881 without a settlement with said plaintiffs. John V. Stribling, the defendant, is the administrator de bonis non of James C. Willard, the deceased guardian of said plaintiffs. These actions were instituted in September, 1882, for the purpose of requiring the defendant, as administrator de bonis non, to account for the estate of the plaintiffs, E. J. Darby, M. A. Murphy, and N. J. Wiley, that came into the hands of their deceased guardian, James C. Willard.

It appears that the estate of the said plaintiffs in the hands of *their said guardian consisted of $900, the proceeds of the sale of a negro woman, sold on credit under order of court in 1860. Thomas Leroy was the purchaser of said negro and executed his note for the purchase money, with James P. Leroy and J. H. Britt as sureties. On November 16, 1872, the deceased guardian obtained judgment in the Common Pleas for Abbeville County against the sureties on said note for $306.84, the note having been reduced to a little more than one third of the amount thereof, according to a custom then prevailing in said county, with the approval of the then presiding judge and the members of the Abbeville bar, with reference to the collection of such notes. The defendant alleges in his answer that before receiving the amount on the judgment aforesaid, the deceased guardian had paid out for the respective plaintiffs more than he received for them on said judgment, and prays that plaintiffs' complaint be dismissed with costs.

*245

It was referred to the master for Abbeville County to state the accounts of the deceased guardian and report thereon. The master reports that the deceased guardian paid out for plaintiffs more than he received for them respectively upon the judgment aforesaid. The master concludes that the estate of the deceased guardian is not responsible for the whole amount of the note, as the guardian took judgment on the note in accordance with a rule then generally acted upon at the Abbeville bar. The master therefore recommends that plaintiff's complaint in each of the above actions be dismissed with costs.

Upon hearing the testimony, the master's report, and plaintiffs' exceptions thereto, Judge Wallace sustained plaintiffs' exceptions and adjudged that the estate of the deceased guardian was liable to the respective plaintiffs for the whole amount of the note upon which the judgment was obtained, it appearing from the testimony that the note was amply secured, and that it was sealed with the consent of, or certainly without objection from, the guardian. The findings of law and fact by the master were overruled by the Circuit judge, and the report recommitted to the master to state the accounts of the deceased guardian in accordance with the Circuit decree. The defendant appeals from the decree of the Circuit Court; and the only question involved in *the appeal is as to the liability of the estate of the deceased guardian for the whole amount of the note upon which the judgment was obtained.

*246

This court will always protect a guardian or other trustee acting in good faith and with proper diligence and care for the interests of the ward, or other cestui que trust. The law, however, requires a guardian to exercise the same diligence and care for the benefit of his ward, that a prudent man would do in the management of his own affairs, and the court will not allow a guardian to escape responsibility from mere tender consideration of his misfortune.

The amount of the judgment taken by the guardian represents but a fraction more than one-third of the amount of the note, without reference to the accrued interest for some seventeen years. There can be no doubt that at the time the judgment was taken the note was amply secured. Whilst there was doubt and uncertainty for several years after the war about the collection of notes of this character, yet all such doubts were solved and removed by the decision of this court, filed April 3, 1871, in the case of Calhoun v. Calhoun, 2 S. C., 291, as well as by the decision in Brewster v. Williams, 2 S. C., 455, filed July 6, 1871. The judgment obtained November 16, 1872, and acquiesced in by the deceased guardian, is in direct conflict with these decisions, one of which was filed seventeen months prior to said judgment. Under these circumstances the act of the deceased guardian cannot be considered prudent, nor can we conclude that the guardian has exercised proper care and diligence in protecting the rights and interests of his wards.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed in each of the above entitled cases.

---

22 S. C. *247

*WHALEY v. KEITT.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⟸1018.]

A finding of fact by a referee, concurred in by the Circuit Judge, based upon direct testimony involving the accuracy and credibility of witnesses, affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4006; Dec. Dig. ⟸1018.]

[2. Landlord and Tenant ⟸322.]

Under a contract between G. and A., under which A. was to superintend a plantation of G., and was to receive the "net cotton after all expenses were paid," G. furnishing all the supplies, the provision crops were not applicable to the payment of the expenses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1353, 1354, 1357; Dec. Dig. ⟸322.]

[3. Limitation of Actions ⟸41.]

The cotton made upon the plantation not being sufficient to pay the expenses, and A. having paid a note for supplies out of the proceeds of the cotton crop, and then brought action against G. to recover such payment (G. being the principal on such note, and A. the surety), G.'s defence was not in the nature of a counterclaim, nor was the statute of limitations applicable thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 214, 215; Dec. Dig. ⟸41.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Orangeburg, October, 1883.

This case is fully stated in the Circuit decree, which was as follows:

It appears that Jacob G. Keitt placed his son, John A. Keitt, in charge of his Whetstone plantation, in the county aforesaid, for the year 1867, including stock, &c. There is no written evidence as to the terms upon which the farming operations were to be conducted. It appears that for supplies furnished the plantation that year, John A. Keitt and Jacob G. Keitt gave E. H. Rodgers & Co., of Charleston, a note for $2,237.13. John A. Keitt signed the note first without seal, and Jacob G. Keitt signed with a seal. In January, 1868, forty-eight bales of cotton, the entire cotton crop of the Whetstone plantation for that year, was shipped to the payees, E. H. Rodgers & Co., and the proceeds, $1,994.24, credited on the note aforesaid, leaving due thereon, October 1, 1868, the sum of $530.35, which was paid in full by the father, Jacob G. Keitt.

John A. Keitt died intestate in August, 1867, during the year of the farming operations on the Whetstone plantation, and the defendant, Peter M. Houser, administered on his estate, and brought suit against E. H. Rodgers & Co. for the cotton money, and recovered a verdict for $3,087.13, including costs. In the meantime, Twitty and other creditors of John A. Keitt insti*tuted proceedings in the Probate Court for Orangeburg County to marshal the assets of the estate of John A. Keitt. Rodgers & Co., who had been compelled to refund the cotton money, under call for creditors, proved the note aforesaid as a specialty debt of the estate of John A. Keitt for the whole amount, less the $530.38 paid by Jacob G. Keitt, and received their pro rata of $1,331.66 from the estate of John A. Keitt. In November, 1879, Jacob G. Keitt died intestate, and the plaintiff, Lawrence M. Whaley, became his administrator, and was sued by Houser as administrator of John A. Keitt, to recover back the $1,331.66 paid by the estate of John A. Keitt as surety of Jacob G. Keitt on the note aforesaid. Whaley, as administrator, instituted proceedings to marshal the assets of the estate of Jacob G. Keitt. In this contest between the creditors of the two estates the special master reported in favor of the claim of the estate of John A. Keitt against the estate of Jacob G. Keitt for the $1,331.66 and interest, on the ground that Jacob G. Keitt was the principal and John A. Keitt was surety on the E. H. Rodgers & Co. note, as aforesaid. Whaley, as administrator of Jacob G. Keitt, appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed the finding of the special master, that Jacob G. Keitt was the principal and John A. Keitt was surety on the Rodgers & Co. note.

*248

The Supreme Court, in this cause (April term, 1882), say that the agreement between the parties (father and son, as to farming operations for 1867 on Whetstone plantation), although it lies at the very foundation of this controversy, has not been ascertained in this case, and as this is a contest between the creditors of the two estates, it is necessary to determine what was the business agreement between father and son. The court further say, if John A. Keitt actually cleared nothing by the farming operations, his administrator, as against Jacob G. Keitt, would have no right to retain any portion of the cotton money, and, having recovered it from Rodgers & Co., the administrator of Jacob G. Keitt would be entitled to the benefit of that recovery, and to set off such claim for the cotton money against the claim of Houser, administrator, for the money paid by his intestate, as surety for his father. These questions, the court say, can only be determined by ascertaining the exact agreement between the father and son as to the *farming operations for 1867. The court say that this agreement should be examined as an original question, without being affected in any manner by the verdict in the case against Rodgers & Co.

*249

The above entitled case was remanded by the Supreme Court (April term, 1882) to the Circuit Court, to ascertain what were the terms of the agreement between Jacob G. Keitt and his son, John A. Keitt, as to the farming operations on the Whetstone plantation in the year 1867, and to apply the result according to the principles therein announced. On May 28, 1883, the case was referred by Judge Wallace to C. B. Glover, special master, to take the testimony respecting the terms of the agreement between Jacob G. Keitt and John A. Keitt, as to the farming operations on the Whetstone plantation in the year 1867, and to report the same and his conclusions of fact to this court at its next sitting for adjudication, with liberty to either party to object to the admissibility of testimony on the coming in of the report.

On September 25, 1883, the special master filed his report, in which he finds the agreement as to the farming operations on the Whetstone plantation in 1867 to be as follows: "That Jacob G. Keitt was to find all the supplies necessary to run the plantation. That the plantation was to be superintended by John A. Keitt. That after the laborers had received one-third of the crops for their services, then John A. Keitt was to have the net cotton, after all the expenses were paid." The special master concludes as matter of fact: I. That the Whetstone plantation was planted in the year 1867 by Jacob G. Keitt, who placed his son, John A. Keitt, in charge of the same as superintendent. II. That John A. Keitt was to receive for his services the net cotton remaining after all the expenses of the place were paid. III. That the expenses of the plantation exceeded the whole income derived from the crops, as it appears that when the proceeds from the cotton crop were applied to the Rodgers & Co. note (given for supplies), there remained a balance on that note unpaid, which balance was paid by Jacob G. Keitt. IV. That John A. Keitt died in August, 1867, and as there was no net cotton, after the expenses of the plantation were paid, there was nothing as a matter of fact to go to the estate of John A. Keitt.

The defendant, Peter M. Houser, administrator of John A. *Keitt, excepts to the report of the special master. In the view taken of this case it will be only necessary to consider the first exception in substance as follows: Because the special master erred in finding that the expenses exceeded the whole income derived from the crops raised on the Whetstone plantation in 1867, but should have found that the value of the crops exceeded the amount of expenses, and should have found the amount of such excess.

*250

The referee finds that Jacob G. Keitt planted the land; that he placed his son, John A. Keitt, in charge as superintendent, who was to receive for his services the net cotton after all the expenses of the place were paid. As I understand it, the master finds that according to the terms of the agreement between father and son the measure of the son's compensation for services as superintendent depended upon whether or not there would be any net cotton crop, after paying all the expenses of the place cultivated.

It is very difficult now to ascertain accurately the terms of an oral agreement entered into in 1867, when both parties to the agreement are now deceased. Whilst at first view it might appear to be an unreasonable proposition for any one to agree to accept as compensation for such services the net cotton after paying all the expenses of the plantation, yet such terms may be made to appear more consistent and reasonable when the facts of the case, the circumstances and situation of the parties are considered.

It appears from the testimony that Jacob G. Keitt owned the land, furnished the stock, wagons, tools, seed, and supplies, including fertilizers. A highly intelligent witness, Dr. Wannamaker, testifies that he understood from Jacob G. Keitt that John A. Keitt was to receive two-thirds of the net proceeds of cotton crop, and that he, Jacob G. Keitt, was to receive all the provision crop save what the negroes got, and cotton seed. The witness, Spigener, testifies that Jacob G. Keitt told him he had not given the plantation to his son, but wanted to see what he could do for himself; that if he made anything clear on the crop, it is his. Robinson, the foreman on the place, testifies that Jacob G. Keitt had control of business and gave directions; that he went to the *place once or twice a week, after the crop was set, and sometimes every morning; that when Jacob G. Keitt didn't go to the place, he, Robinson, went to him for directions. Robinson and other laborers on the place testify that they heard John A. Keitt say, that after expenses of place were paid, he was to have the balance of the cotton. The written contract for hire of the laborers was made in the name of John A. Keitt, and witnessed by his father, Jacob G. Keitt. The laborers were to receive one-third of the crop. Some of the laborers testify that they were hired by Jacob G. Keitt.

*251

It appears that the son, John A. Keitt, lived with his father, Jacob G. Keitt, some two miles distant from the Whetstone plantation, and had very limited means. The crop consisted of eighty or eighty-five acres of cotton, seventy-five or eighty acres of corn, and some peas, potatoes, &c., and was cultivated with five mules belonging to Jacob G. Keitt. As the father furnished the land, stock, tools, supplies, and fertilizers, it does not appear improbable that the son in limited means, who lived with his father, would agree to accept for his services as superintendent of the plantation, under the direction of the father, the net cotton, after paying the plantation expenses, including the labor. It is not material, however, to consider the reasonableness of the agreement. As matter of fact, the issue to be determined is, What were the terms of the agreement?

After a careful review of the testimony, I am constrained to concur in the finding of the special master that John A. Keitt agreed to superintend the Whetstone plantation for his father in 1867, and was to receive as compensation for his services the net cotton remaining after all the expenses of the plantation were paid; that the son died in August, 1867, before the crop was made; that the expenses of the plantation exceeded the net cotton, and, as matter of fact, there was nothing due the estate of John A. Keitt under said agreement.

The special master also finds, and states as matter of fact, that the expenses of the plantation exceeded the whole income derived from the crops. Having concluded and found as matter of fact that, under the agreement, the son was to receive as compensation for his services the net cotton remaining after all the *expenses were paid, it was neither material nor necessary for the special master to estimate or state the value of the crop, other than the cotton crop. All of the expenses of the plantation in making a crop, is a very comprehensive term. As the son died during the year, the expenses of the crop were necessarily increased beyond the calculation of the parties. It is in evidence that the father hired extra hands to pick cotton, gathered the grain crop, and prepared the cotton crop for market, after the death of the son.

*252

It would seem that the expenses incident to the death of the son would have to be included, under the agreement, before the net cotton compensating the services of the son could be ascertained. Even if the value of the whole crops should have been estimated and stated by the master, as contended for by defendants, I am inclined to concur with the master in the conclusion that the expenses would exceed the whole income derived from the crop, inasmuch as the proceeds of the cotton failed to pay the debt of Rodgers & Co. for supplies by $530.35, without regard to the other expenses incident to the death of John A. Keitt during the year.

As already stated, it is difficult to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion as to the precise terms of an agreement entered into more than sixteen years ago, when both of the parties to the agreement are dead, yet I must conclude that there is enough in the testimony to sustain and support the findings of fact by the special master.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the exceptions of Peter M. Houser, administrator of John A. Keitt, to the report of C. B. Glover, special master herein, be overruled; the findings of fact by said special master be confirmed, and that the claim of Peter M. Houser, administrator, presented against the estate of Jacob G. Keitt, be disallowed.

Defendant appealed upon seventeen exceptions, but the points thereby raised are sufficiently indicated in the opinion of this court.

Messrs. Jas. F. Izlar, Samuel Dibble, and Glover & Glover, for appellant.

*253

*Mr. J. D. Pope, contra.

February 21, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This litigation has been protracted for a number of years. It has a history in its different and changing phases somewhat involved, but for the purposes of the question now before us, it will not be necessary to reproduce it here, as it will be found fully stated in the last opinion in the cause pronounced by this court. See MSS. Dec., No. 1306, [Whaley v. Houser] 18 S. C., 602. It there appears that after disposing of other questions, mainly as to who was the principal and who the surety on a certain note, the contention assumed the form of a struggle between the creditors of John A. Keitt, deceased, and those of Jacob G. Keitt, deceased, as to which estate (both parties being dead) was entitled to the proceeds of the cotton crop made on the Whetstone plantation of Jacob G. Keitt in the year 1867.

Jacob G. Keitt was the father of John A., and even after the war the owner of considerable property, consisting of lands, stock, &c. John A., the son, had little, and being unmarried, lived with his father. It seems that the father, Jacob G., placed the son, John A., on his Whetstone plantation, about two miles from the family homestead, to superintend making a crop in the year 1867, but there was no written contract between them. John A. died in August of that year, and Jacob G. some time afterwards. It happened (explained in former opinion) that the proceeds of the cotton made on Whetstone fell into the hands of Peter M. Houser, administrator of John A., and that estate paid $1,331.66 to E. H. Rodgers & Co. on a note which had been given for supplies for Whetstone, signed by both John A. and Jacob G. Keitt.

It was afterwards decided that Jacob G. was responsible for the Rodgers debt as principal, and Houser, administrator of John A., sued Whaley, administrator of Jacob G., to recover the said $1,331.66 as so much money paid by the estate of the surety for that of the principal. That made it necessary to know whether the proceeds of the cotton crop originally belonged to the father or the son; for if they really belonged to the father, the administrator of the son was suing for money which never belonged to *his intestate, and which, of course, he could not ex equo et bono recover. And that could only be known by ascertaining what was the agreement between the father and the son as to the farming operations in 1867. This was the only question left undecided by the former judgment of this court.

*254

This, and this alone, was referred back. The opinion states as follows: "As the court has decided that Jacob G. Keitt, the father, was the principal in the note for supplies, we think that, acting in the light of that decision, the controversy between the creditors of the father and the son, should be finally decided by the exact terms of the agreement which existed between them as to the farming operations on the Whetstone place in the year 1867. If, according to the agreement, John A., who died during the year, was to receive the whole crop of cotton before the expenses were paid and without regard to them, then his creditors are entitled to the money paid by his estate as surety for his father; but if, on the other hand, he was to receive under the agreement only the 'net cotton,' that which 'was over' after paying expenses, and those expenses, including the note for supplies, were greater than the value of the whole crop, then John A. actually made nothing during the year, and the administrator should recover nothing for the money paid. This question of fact was not specifically ascertained by the referee, or passed upon by the Circuit judge, and therefore upon this point the case must go back to the Circuit Court. The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be set aside and the case remanded, to ascertain what were the terms of the agreement between Jacob G. Keitt and his son, John A., as to the farming operations on the Whetstone plantation in the year 1867, and to apply the result according to the principles herein announced."

Accordingly, the question sent back was referred to Charles B. Glover, Esq., as special referee, who took the testimony and reported that the terms of the agreement between Jacob G. and John A. Keitt were as follows: "Jacob G. Keitt was to find all the supplies necessary to run the plantation; the plantation was to be superintended by John A. Keitt; after the laborers had received one-third of the crop for their services, then John A. Keitt was to have the 'net cotton' after all the expenses were *paid." He finds as conclusions of fact: "1. That the Whetstone plantation was planted in the year 1867 by Jacob G. Keitt, who placed his son, John A., in charge of the same as superintendent. 2. That John A. Keitt was to receive for his services the 'net cotton' remaining after all the expenses of the place were paid. 3. That the expenses of the plantation exceeded the whole income derived from the crops, as it appears that when the proceeds from the cotton crop were applied to the Rodgers note (given for supplies) there remained a balance on that note unpaid, which balance was paid by Jacob G. Keitt. 4. That John A. Keitt died in August, 1867, and as there was no 'net cotton,' after the expenses of the plantation were paid, there was nothing, as a matter of fact, to go to the estate of John A. Keitt," &c.

*255

To this report Peter M. Houser, administrator of John A. Keitt, filed exceptions, and after argument thereon, Judge Witherspoon affirmed the report, overruled the exceptions, and disallowed the claim presented by the administrator of John A. Keitt against the estate of Jacob G. Keitt. From this decree Houser, the administrator of John A. Keitt, appeals upon numerous grounds, which are in the brief and need not be set out here.

Several of the exceptions, in one form or another, complain that it was error to find that the terms of the agreement as to farming was that Jacob G. Keitt placed his son, John A., as superintendent on the Whetstone plantation, who was to receive for his services the "net cotton" after all expenses were paid: and that the expenses of the plantation exceeded the whole income from the crops. Being a chancery case, this court has appellate jurisdiction and may review the evidence; but the question referred was one purely of fact, as to which the special referee took the testimony and made a clear and distinct finding. The Circuit judge concurred with the referee, and in such cases, especially where the finding is based upon direct testimony involving the accuracy or credibility of witnesses, the rule has been uniform that this court will not disturb the finding, unless it is without any testimony to support it. See cases collected in Reporter's Note, 12 S. C., 612. We have read the testimony in this case carefully, and cannot say there is no evidence to support the finding, which must therefore stand as established.

*256

Doubtless all human tri*bunals are imperfect and may err, but from the nature of things it is necessary that there should be an end of controversy.

It was urged that the finding was erroneous because of the inherent unreasonableness of the agreement found. As the Circuit judge correctly states, the question was what was the agreement, not whether it was reasonable or unreasonable. But if it had been otherwise, we fail to see the unreasonableness of an agreement, by which Jacob G. Keitt undertook to furnish land, stock, provisions, &c., paying all expenses, and to give to his son as superintendent all the "net cotton" that might be made; that is, taking upon himself all risks of misfortune and loss, and giving to his son substantially whatever clear profit, if any, might be made. On the contrary, it seems to us that such a contract with a stipulation that the son should have all the cotton, without regard to expenses, while certainly very kind, could hardly be regarded a business transaction.

Another class of exceptions complain that it was error not to include the value of the provision crops in discharging the current expenses. That was not an open question, but was absolutely concluded by the agreement, which, as found, embraced only the cotton. The land belonged to Jacob G. Keitt, and of course the provision crops belonged to him, unless they were included in the agreement in whole or in part. We are not informed why John A. had no interest in the provision crops, but it may have been for the reason that they were not made for market, but to replace those of like kind which had been consumed in making the crop.

Other exceptions complain that the "judge failed to decide that the claim of the plaintiff (Whaley), by way of set-off to the claim of P. M. Houser, administrator, was barred by lapse of time before the claim of Houser, administrator, accrued, although the counsel of Houser, administrator, duly urged the said objection to the plaintiff's claim under the statute of limitations." We are not quite sure that we understand the view intended to be urged by this exception, but we suppose the proposition to be, that this is really the case of a plaintiff pleading the statute of limitations against a counter-claim set up by the defendant. If we are right in this, there are several reasons why that doctrine cannot be made to apply to this case. The defence interposed by the ad*ministrator of Jacob G. Keitt is not in the nature of a counterclaim against the estate of his son, John A. Keitt, for agricultural advances in 1867. Such a claim could not stand for a moment, for the simple reason that he never made any such advances to his son. It now appears that he and not his son, John A., farmed Whetstone in 1867, and of course all the supplies furnished were for himself.

*257

But while the estate of Jacob G. never had any claim against that of John A. for advances, it now appears from the agreement between them that the cotton made on the place that year belonged to Jacob G. for the purpose of assisting him in discharging the expenses. It follows that the money now sued for (being part of the proceeds of that cotton) was properly payable to the said expenses, and having been paid to Rodgers & Co. towards the satisfaction of a note for supplies at Whetstone in 1867 (on which Jacob G. was principal and John A. Keitt surety), was properly paid, and the administrator of John A. Keitt is not entitled to recover it from the estate of Jacob G. Keitt. The claim must fail, for the conclusive reason that the money never belonged to the estate of John A. Keitt, and being properly paid for the relief of the estate of Jacob G. Keitt, to which it belonged, it cannot be said that it was paid out of the estate of John A. as surety for Jacob G. Keitt.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 257

LATIMER v. LATIMER.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Judgment ⇐415.]

A judgment, regular in form and rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, is in its nature final and conclusive; but one man cannot be bound by the unauthorized act of another, and, therefore, a judgment recovered by an attorney without the authority or knowledge of the plaintiff may, upon the proof of such fact, be set aside as void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 781; Dec. Dig. ⇐415.]

[2. Judgment ⇐951.]

But in an action by the party in whose name the judgment was obtained, against the same defendant for the same recovery, the presumption is in favor of the first attorney's authority, and the plaintiff must prove with satisfactory clearness that she did not authorize or have knowledge of the former action.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Sanders v. Price, 56 S. C. 4, 33 S. E. 731; McCullough v. Hicks, 63 S. C. 547, 41 S. E. 761.

For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1809; Dec. Dig. ⟸951.]

*258

[3. Appeal and Error ⟸1012.]

*The burden of proof being with plaintiff, this court concurred with the Circuit judge, that plaintiff had not clearly and satisfactorily proved the allegations of her complaint, such finding of fact not being manifestly against the weight of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Lipscomb v. Seegers, 22 S. C. 410.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3990; Dec. Dig. ⟸1012.]

[This case is also cited in Suber v. Chandler, 28 S. C. 385, 6 S. E. 155, without specific application.]

Before Hudson, J., Abbeville, February, 1883.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree, omitting its statement, was as follows:

The question upon which the case hinges is whether the plaintiff had knowledge of the action in the Probate Court, and whether that suit was with her consent and by her authority instituted. The defendant contends that she is bound thereby, whether she had knowledge thereof and sanctioned the same or not; that the remedy is over against the attorney E. B. Gary, Esq., and W. C. Latimer, her son.

To sustain this position, he cites as a leading case, Denton v. Noyes, 6 Johns., 297, opinion by Chancellor Kent. I have read the case carefully, and am far more impressed by the dissenting opinion of Judge Van Ness, in which is manifested a stronger view of common sense and a sense of justice than is displayed in the opinion of the court. The doctrine of this court is overthrown by subsequent decisions of the courts of the states of the Union, and by the Supreme Court of the United States, and Judge Van Ness's dissenting opinion is now the law in the United States. Shelton v. Tiffin, 6 How., 163 [12 L. Ed. 387]; Freem. Judg., § 499, and cases there cited. These cases adopt the doctrine of Lord Mansfield, laid down in Robson v. Eaton, 1 T. R., 62, and it is on this latter case that the plaintiff relies. The law of this last case I adopt as my guide in the present.

Therefore, if Mrs. Amanda M. Latimer is sustained by the proof, she must have judgment. But the burden is on her to prove clearly and satisfactorily that the action for dower was begun, prosecuted, and concluded wholly without her knowledge, consent or sanction. Has she done this? Betwixt her and her son, W. C. Latimer, there is on this point an issue of veracity, which is painful. All parties are unknown to me, and I have the additional embarrassment of not having seen them and heard them testify, the testimony having been taken by the master and sent *up to this court without comment or finding of fact by him, such being the direction in a previous order of this court.

*259

The defendant is nephew of the plaintiff by marriage; the party charged with the fraudulent institution of the suit and receipt of money is her son and is cousin to the defendant, J. S. Latimer. The attorney, Eugene B. Gary, Esq., is well known throughout this and other counties, and is of unimpeachable character. She once resided in Abbeville, but at the time of the alleged fraud resided no further distant than at Johnston's in Edgefield. W. C. Latimer resided in Allendale. That J. S. Latimer confided in the genuineness of the suit, and that the learned attorney thought he was acting for Mrs. Latimer and by her authority, there can be not a shadow of a doubt. Shortly before the institution of that suit, Mrs. Latimer was in correspondence with J. S. Latimer about the recovery of this dower, and one, at least, of her letters might be construed into a threat to seek all the law would allow her. If her son was acting without his mother's knowledge, it was certainly a bold and daring step, as the chances were very decided that she and her other son, who was with her, would find it out. The chances were decidedly in favor of a discovery by her.

It would be very tedious to review all the testimony in this decree. I deem it only necessary to say that I have examined it carefully, and counsel have ably discussed it before me, and my conclusion is, that the plaintiff has not clearly and satisfactorily proved the allegations of her complaint. The direct and positive testimony of W. C. Latimer, and the many circumstances corroborating it, are of such weight as that the proof on the part of the plaintiff does not clearly outweigh them.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the recovery in the Court of Probate is a bar to this suit, and that hence the complaint be dismissed, each party to pay his and her own costs respectively; the tenant, Southerland, not to be mulcted in any costs.

Messrs. B. W. Bettis, jr., and S. C. Cason, for appellant.

Messrs. Wells & Orr, contra.

*260

*February 21, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action brought by the plaintiff as the widow of Micajah B. Latimer, deceased, for dower in a tract of land now owned by the defendant. The land had been aliened by the deceased husband in his life time, but the plaintiff had not relinquished her dower. The pleadings are not in the brief, but the Circuit judge says: "The plaintiff alleges that, on July 26, 1880, the plaintiff's son, W. C. Latimer, representing himself as her agent, employed Eugene B. Gary, Esq., an attorney at law of the Abbeville bar, to institute in the name of the plaintiff an action in the Court of Probate of said county against the defendant, James S. Latimer, to recover dower in this land; the result of which action was a judgment for $716.95, the assessment in lieu of dower. This sum of money, with the costs of action, was paid by the defendant, James S. Latimer, to the sheriff of Abbeville, who had levied upon the said land under the execution issued upon the judgment aforesaid. The sheriff paid the same to E. B. Gary, Esq., attorney as aforesaid, who paid the same to W. C. Latimer. All these proceedings, she alleges, were had without her consent, authority, or knowledge, and she prays the court to set the same aside as being a fraud upon her rights, and to award to her dower in the land, as if no such proceedings had been had. In his answer, the defendant, J. S. Latimer, admits the intermarriage of the plaintiff with M. B. Latimer, his assignor, during coverture, his alienation thereof without a renunciation of dower therein by plaintiff, and that she did have this estate in the said tract of land. But he insists that the proceedings in the Court of Probate, set forth in the plaintiff's complaint, were instituted in her name, with her knowledge, and by her authority; and this recovery he pleads in bar of the plaintiff's demand."

It was referred to the master to take the testimony, which, consisting for the most part of written correspondence, and answers to interrogatives filed, is all in the brief, and need not be stated. The cause was heard by Judge Hudson. The defendant insisted on two defences: First, that the proceedings in the Probate Court, being entirely formal, and instituted in the name of the plaintiff by a regular practising attorney, were, as a matter of law, binding *upon the plaintiff, whether she authorized or had knowledge of the same or not; and second, that, as matter of fact, the proceedings in the Probate Court were instituted in the name and with the knowledge, approbation, and consent of the plaintiff, and, therefore, were binding upon her.

*261

The judge held with the plaintiff on the question of the plea in bar, that the plaintiff was not bound by the probate proceedings unless she authorized the same, or, having knowledge thereof, acquiesced therein. But upon the question of fact, he held with the defendant, that the plaintiff, having made the allegation that the proceedings were without her authority, consent, or knowledge, was bound to prove the same clearly and satisfactorily; and upon a review of the testimony, he decided that she had failed to do so, concluding as follows: "It would be very tedious to review all the testimony in this decree. I deem it only necessary to say that I have examined it carefully, and counsel have ably discussed it before me, and my conclusion is that the plaintiff has not clearly and satisfactorily proved the allegations of her complaint. The direct and positive testimony of W. C. Latimer, and the many circumstances corroborating it, are of such weight as that the proof on the part of the plaintiff does not clearly outweigh them. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the recovery in the Court of Probate is a bar to this suit, and that the complaint be dismissed," &c.

From this decree the plaintiff appeals: "I. Because his honor erred in holding that the suit in the Probate Court, set forth in the pleadings, is a bar to the present action, for the reason that the plaintiff had failed to show 'clearly' and 'satisfactorily' that she did not authorize the said suit in the Probate Court. II. Because his honor erred in not finding that the said suit in the Probate Court was unauthorized by the plaintiff, and that she was entitled to recover in this action. III. Because his honor seemed to have been governed, not by the preponderance of the testimony, but by the fact as stated by him, that the testimony on the part of the plaintiff did not clearly outweigh that for the defendant."

The decree was for the defendant, but to meet the possible view, that the ground on which it was rested might not be sustained, he asked the court to consider the other defence of former *recovery, which was overruled below. It is certainly the general rule, that a judgment, regular in form and rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, is in its nature final and conclusive; but to this rule there are well established exceptions. Is it one of these, where an attorney, regularly admitted to practice and in good standing at the bar, is deceived into bringing an action without authority of the plaintiff? It is certainly correct in principle to maintain that one man cannot be bound by the act of another without authority to do so. But it seems to have been considered that there was something peculiar and exceptional in the case of an attorney, regularly licensed to do such business, when he in the name of another puts into operation the machinery of a court, and thereby obtains its judgment enforceable at law; for the old rule upon the subject was that "when an attorney takes on himself to appear, the court looks no further, but proceeds as if the attorney had sufficient authority, and leaves the party to his action against him." The mere fact of the appearance of the attorney was deemed enough for the opposite party and the court. This may have been for the reason that warrants of attorney were then required to be filed.

*262

But it is not the law or practice with us to require such warrants. They have never been in use in our courts. "The general integrity of gentlemen of the profession furnishes a security against their taking upon themselves to defend or prosecute a cause without authority of the party; and when we add to this the difficulty of concealing such a practice, and the accountability in the event of detection, I cannot perceive why they were ever thought necessary otherwise than as a protection to the counsel himself." Hellman v. McWhennie, 3 Rich., 364; Allen v. Green, 1 Bail., 448. We think, however, it is a good rule for attorneys to take warrants of attorney in important cases, and especially when the business is transacted with one claiming to be agent, although the authority of the attorney will be presumed, in the absence of any proof to the contrary. "A record which has such appearance will bind the party until it is proved that the attorney acted without authority." Hill v. Mendenhall, 21 Wall., 453 [22 L. Ed. 616]. The cases are not in entire accord upon the subject, but we concur with the Circuit judge that the weight of authority main*tains the view, that a judgment recovered by an attorney without the authority or knowledge of the plaintiff may, upon the proof of such fact, be set aside as void. Robson v. Eaton, 1 T. R., 62; Bailey v. Boyce, 5 Rich. Eq., 188; Shelton v. Tiffin, 6 How., 163 [12 L. Ed. 387]; Freem. Judg., § 499, and authorities.

*263

Then as to the exceptions of the plaintiff, that the judge erred in finding that the plaintiff had failed to show "clearly and satisfactorily" that she did not authorize the suit in the Probate Court. This was a question of fact, and the practice of the court is well established, that the finding of the court below will not be disturbed unless it is manifestly against the weight of the evidence. It is urged, however, that in considering that question the judge committed error in putting the onus probandi on the plaintiff, thereby requiring her to prove a negative, and in finding that her testimony did not "clearly" out-weigh that for the defendant.

There is a general rule of evidence that a party will not be required to prove a negative; but that is not inconsistent with another rule of logic and universal recognition, that he who affirms must prove, and therefore the plaintiff who alleges must make out his case. "The obligation of proving every fact lies upon the party who substantially asserts the affirmation of the issue." 1 Greenl. Evid., § 74. Here the plaintiff alleges that she did not authorize or have knowledge of the probate proceedings. That was the affirmative issue she made, and although expressed in negative form, she was bound to prove it before she could have a recovery. "To the general rule that the burden of proof is on the party holding the affirmative, there are some exceptions in which the proposition, though negative in its terms, must be proved by the party who states it. One class of these exceptions will be found to include those cases in which the plaintiff grounds his right of action upon a negative allegation, and where, of course, the establishment of the negative is an essential element in his case; as for example, in an action for having prosecuted the plaintiff maliciously, or without probable cause," &c. 1 Greenl. Evid., 78.

There was a presumption that the attorney was employed by the plaintiff to sue in the Probate Court, and in such a case, especially the above principle applies. Wherever the law pre*sumes in favor of the affirmative, it lies on the party who denies the fact to prove it, although it may be a negative. For instance, on a note the law presumes consideration, and if the defendant denies that there is consideration, he must prove it. 2 Wait Prac., 109; 1 Stark. Evid.; Williams v. East India Co., 3 East, 192; Monk v. Butler, 1 Roll., 83. In the last case cited, being a suit for tithes, the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff had not read the 39 articles, and the court put the defendant to prove it though a negative, "for in this case the law will presume that the parson had read the articles, and when the law presumes the affirmative, then the negative has to be proved." We do not think it was error in the judge to require the plaintiff to prove with satisfactory "clearness" the allegation upon which her whole case rested.

*264

In the view that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to make out her case, we have looked carefully through the testimony, and cannot say that the finding of the judge was manifestly against the weight of the evidence. There is direct conflict between the testimony of the plaintiff and her son William, and it cannot be necessary to advert to all the details of that painful discrepancy. It will be enough to say in general terms, that, as it impresses us, most, or at least several, of the facts and circumstances of the case tend to corroborate the testimony of William, that his mother at least knew of the proceeding in the Probate Court and allowed it to proceed. Mother and son had recently lived together at Johnston, in Edgefield, and had talked over the matter of the dower. She says that William there asked her for permission to have the action brought for her, which she refused. The correspondence with the defendant was opened by her, saying in her last letter of May 17, 1880: "I thought you would be anxious for the matter to be settled. It is certainly my right that it should be, and my circumstances demand it. * * * I claim all that the law allows me. * * * It is the only means I have to look to: * * * my circumstances require an immediate settlement," &c.

There seems to have been no answer, and at this stage her son William, who had then removed to Allendale, Barnwell County, took up the business and wrote to Mr. Gary, employing him to *institute suit "for his mother." Nothing more was heard from Mrs. Latimer pending the suit or until April, 1881 (after the suit was ended and a silence for nearly a year), when she renewed the correspondence with the defendant about her dower. Considering her pressing needs, as declared by herself, it is difficult to understand this long silence, except upon the supposition that she knew of the proceedings and was waiting the event in silence, until she heard that her son, who was conducting the litigation for her, had appropriated the whole proceeds of the action.

*265

This view is entirely consistent with the remarkable chasm in the correspondence, and explains what otherwise would have been on the part of the son an unparalleled act not only of audacity but of folly. Indeed, it was urged that the testimony of William was discredited by his letters, showing conscious guilt and apprehensions of arrest and disgrace. But upon a careful reading of his letters it will be found that his cries for mercy were all for taking and appropriating the contents of his mother's letter. Neither in his letter nor in his testimony does he any where intimate that he was not authorized to have the action brought for his mother or express apprehensions of danger or disgrace for anything except the appropriation of the money enclosed in the letter to his mother.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 265

COVAR v. SALLAT.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐724.]

An exception alleging error in overruling the exceptions to a referee's report, and an exception in general terms containing no distinct legal proposition, not considered because in conflict with the requirements of Rule V.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Levi v. Blackwell, 35 S. C. 544, 15 S. E. 243; State v. Seabrook, 42 S. C. 78, 20 S. E. 58.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2907; Dec. Dig. ⇐724.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⇐1022.]

Findings of fact by referee, concurred in by the Circuit judge, not disturbed, especially as the judgment was not based thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4015–4018; Dec. Dig. ⇐1022.]

[3. Costs ⇐13.]

Costs in equity causes are at the discretion of the Circuit judge, and his ruling will rarely be disturbed.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Cooke v. Poole, 26 S. C. 324, 2 S. E. 609; Dendy v. Waite, 36 S. C. 575, 15 S. E. 712.

For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 21; Dec. Dig. ⇐13.]

*266

[4. Appeal and Error ⇐832.]

*Petition for rehearing granted, certain exceptions, misplaced and not properly entitled, having been overlooked.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3215; Dec. Dig. ⇐832.]

[5. Appeal and Error ⇐819.]

Where an appeal was suspended so that appellant might move on Circuit for a new trial upon one of the issues involved, the result of which was to be certified to this court, until such certificate is furnished the appeal cannot be heard on its merits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3200; Dec. Dig. ⇐819.]

Before Aldrich, J., Aiken, September, 1883.

The opinion sufficiently states the case. The decree of the Circuit judge was as follows:

The complaint was filed for the foreclosure of a mortgage, and referred to Mr. James Aldrich to hear and determine the issues of law and fact. Proceedings were had in the Ordinary's Court to sell the lots described in the pleadings for partition and to pay outstanding debts. On March 2, 1868, the land was sold and the defendant became the purchaser of the lots, made the cash payment, and gave his bond and mortgage to secure the same. The lots sold for $355. There was a credit on the bond which reduced it to $285.20, and the referee finds that the defendant paid $432 of debts. In June, 1872, a suit was commenced in Edgefield, in the name of Turner, ex-judge of probate, to foreclose this identical mortgage.

The referee finds as facts: 1. That the bond and mortgage are satisfied. 2. That there was another case pending between the same parties, for the same cause of action, in Edgefield County. His conclusions of law are: 1. That the bond and mortgage are satisfied, and plaintiff has no cause of action. 2. That the action in Edgefield is a bar to this action.

It is not my purpose, nor is it necessary, to travel over the wide range of argument indulged in by the counsel who represent the plaintiffs. The findings of fact by the referee, like the verdict of a jury, will generally control the court, unless the same be unsupported by the evidence, or against the weight of the evidence. In this case, the referee is a leading member of the bar, highly trusted and esteemed for his learning and probity. He had the witnesses before him, and is the best judge of the confidence to be placed in their statements. After a careful examination of all the evidence, he has come to the deliberate con*clusion that the bond has been paid and the mortgage satisfied. He is also satisfied that there is an action pending in Edgefield, which is a bar to this action. The plaintiffs cannot complain of this finding, for they introduced the testimony which led the referee to this conclusion.

*267

Great stress is laid on the fact that the officer, Durisoe, to whom this bond and mortgage was given, was out of office, and had no right to make the settlement, the records and papers of his office by law being required to be transferred to his successor. But it is worthy of consideration that this transaction took place soon after the corrupt government of 1868 went into operation; that there was great doubt in the minds of officeholders what was the best course to pursue in regard to the bonds and mortgages in their custody, and which they held for the benefit of widows, orphans, and other persons entitled to the proceeds of sales made by them in the discharge of their official duties. Turner, the successor of Durisoe, was a man of very unsavory character, and, it may be, he held the valuable securities in his possession until he would be protected, by an order of court, in paying them over. Be that as it may, however, he made the sale, the defendant gave to him the bond and mortgage, and it was very natural for him to make the settlement with the man who held the custody of the securities.

There is another consideration which doubtless had its weight with the referee. This sale was made in 1868. The action to foreclose was not brought for several years after. The parties for whose benefit the action is brought stood by, saw this purchaser improve the property, sell off a portion of it to innocent purchasers for value, and, so far as the court can see, never uttered a word or made the first assertion of property. I do not see or appreciate the superior equity claimed for them. The object of this court is to do exact justice. The defendant, according to the findings, has paid out a considerable sum of money, more than he contracted to pay for the lots, has made a settlement with the man who had his papers, who promised to send them to him, and now it is argued, you must lose the property as well as the money.

*268

*The exceptions are overruled and the report of the referee confirmed. Let the complaint be dismissed with costs.

[For subsequent opinion, see 24 S. E. 136, 137.]

Messrs. Bonham & Devore, P. A. Emanuel, for appellant.

No counsel contra.

February 27, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This action was brought originally by Lycurgus Charlton, as judge of probate for Edgefield County, to foreclose the mortgage mentioned in the complaint, and for judgment upon the residue of the bond, secured by said mortgage. This bond and mortgage had been executed by the defendant, Sallat, in 1868, to W. F. Durisoe, the then ordinary for Edgefield, in the purchase of certain lots of land situate in Hamburg, sold by the said ordinary as the property of one Gray, deceased.

Before the trial Charlton was succeeded by L. P. Covar, as probate judge, and the defendants, Laurence and Williams, having purchased portions of the land, the complaint was amended by substituting Covar as plaintiff, and making Laurence and Williams defendants with Sallat. These defendants all answered, Sallat separately, and the other two together. The defence set up was the same in both answers, i. e., that the bond had been paid, and that the plaintiff, Covar, judge of probate, was not the lawful owner and holder of the bond and mortgage, and therefore could not maintain the action. Laurence and Williams also claimed that Sallat was the owner of a separate tract of land from them, of value sufficient to pay the bond, if not already paid, which should first be exhausted.

The case was tried by James Aldrich, Esq., to whom, as referee, the issues of law and fact had been referred by order of the court. At the close of the testimony on both sides, the referee allowed the answers to be amended, so as to conform to the evidence submitted by the plaintiff, as follows: "That the plaintiff cannot maintain this action, because an action is pending upon the same cause of action set forth in the complaint in the Court of Common Pleas for Edgefield county, between the prede*cessor of the plaintiff, as probate judge, and the defendant." It may be stated here, that at the time the land was sold to Sallat in 1868, Hamburg was in Edgefield County; since then Aiken has been laid off, embracing Hamburg, hence the action below was brought in Aiken County.

*269

The referee, after full hearing, found and reported as matters of fact: "1. That the bond and mortgage are satisfied. 2. That there was another case pending between the same parties, and for the same cause of action in Edgefield County." And as conclusions of law: "1. That the bond and mortgage being satisfied, the plaintiff has no cause of action. 2. That the action in Edgefield is a bar to this action." Wherefore he ordered and adjudged that the complaint be dismissed, and that the plaintiff pay the costs. To this report the plaintiff filed exceptions and gave notice of an appeal, with further notice that he would at the next term of the Court of Common Pleas for Aiken, move to set aside the report, or have the same modified, and for such relief as may be proper.

In the mean time Covar having ceased to be probate judge, his honor, Judge A. P. Aldrich, before whom the report and exceptions came on for hearing on the 16th September, 1882, passed an order that "W. F. Roath, his successor, be made a party to this action as plaintiff; and that the said Roath, as probate judge, be empowered to act as plaintiff, and that the action stand revived, and is hereby continued." This order was preceded by a statement, that as Covar became entitled to the control of said bond and mortgage, as successor to Durisoe, so Roath, as the successor of Covar, had become entitled to the custody and ownership thereof; and in order that the appeal of Covar should be heard, and otherwise that justice should be done, therefore the order was passed.

On the hearing, Judge Aldrich overruled the exceptions, confirmed the report of the referee, and dismissed the complaint with costs. The plaintiff has appealed upon the grounds following: "1. That his honor erred in overruling the exceptions to the report of the referee, James Aldrich, Esq. 2. That his honor erred in his conclusions of fact, wherein he says that the parties for whose benefit the action is brought, have been guilty *of laches in permitting the mortgagor to improve and sell off the same without asserting their rights. The defendant, according to the findings, has paid out a considerable sum of money, more than he contracted to pay for the lots, has made a settlement with the man who had his papers, who promised to send them to him, and now it is argued, you must lose the property as well as the money. 3. That his honor has erred in discharging the complaint, with costs, inasmuch as the plaintiff has honestly striven to do his duty; and to be deprived of the funds with which to perform it, and subjecting him to costs, under the circumstances will deter any officer from performing his duties. 4. That the plaintiff appeals from his honor's decree in this case, inasmuch as it is void, for W. F. Roath was substituted as plaintiff in the place of Covar, and such a judgment is void for uncertainty, for Covar is dead as to this action, and no judgment could be rendered against him. 5. The plaintiff excepts to each and every conclusion of law and fact herein, because contrary to law and the evidence."

*270

Rule V., of this court, concludes as follows: "Exception to decree. An exception for the purpose of an appeal must contain a statement of the proposition of the law or fact which it is desired to review, and a mere reference to an exception taken to the report of the master or a referee, or to the decree of a judge of probate, will not be sufficient, and an exception so taken will not be considered." Exceptions in the words, that the verdict or decree is contrary to the law and the evidence, or that his honor erred throughout his whole charge, thereby causing the jury to bring in a verdict contrary to the law and the evidence, are too general and indefinite, charging no specific error, and will not be considered. State v. Branham, 13 S. C., 389; Norton v. Livingston, 14 Id., 177. All exceptions should distinctly state the error complained of. Blake v. DeLiesseline, 4 McCord, 496; Shand's Manual, 53.

The first exception of appellant is in direct conflict with the latter part of rule V., above—in fact of the entire rule—as it contains no proposition of law or fact for review, and it merely refers to exceptions taken to the master's report in gross, eight *in number.[1] Exception 5 is also in violation of the above rule, in that it contains no distinct legal proposition, which appellant seeks to have reviewed. At the same time it is obnoxious to the rulings in the cases referred to, supra, because too general and indefinite, and charging no specific error.

*271

Exception 2 imputes error to some of the findings of fact of his honor. We cannot say that this exception is well taken under the rule well established here in such matters, that the findings of fact by the Circuit Judge, especially when he has concurred with the referee, will not be disturbed unless such finding is patently unsustained. Besides, it is manifest from reading the decree, that the findings of fact referred to had but little influence in producing the judgment. That was founded upon other considerations, and these facts seemed to have been alluded to by the judge as merely supplemental.

Exception 3 is in reference to the costs. Under the fee bill costs in equity causes is a matter for the judge pronouncing the decree, and this court rarely disturbs his order in that respect. Code, § 323.

We do not know that we fully understand the 4th exception. It claims that the decree is void for uncertainty, giving as a reason that Roath having been substituted for Covar as plaintiff, and Covar being "dead as to this action," no judgment can be entered up against him. We do not see the uncertainty complained of by the appellant in the decree. It is certainly quite plain in its conclusion, where the judge announces the result of his findings of law and fact by overruling the exceptions, confirming the report, and dismissing the complaint with costs. The defendant has not complained of any uncertainty as to the party from whom he is to get his costs. The decree is in his favor, and if he is willing to abide it in the shape in which it has been left, why should the plaintiff seek to protect him?

We have declined, with some reluctance, to consider the questions sought to be raised in exceptions 1 and 5 under our rule and the cases referred to above, but the strict observance of the requirements of that rule, and of the principles laid down in the decisions above by the profession, would contribute greatly *not only to the satisfactory discharge of its duties by this court, but to the interests of litigants, in having their rights fully and thoroughly considered and adjudicated. And inasmuch as most of the questions attempted to be raised by reference to the exceptions to the referee's report are questions of fact, which, under the rule governing this court as to such questions, we could hardly disturb, we have thought that this would be a good case in which to call to the attention of the profession the necessity of observing said rule V. of this court.

[1] See order for rehearing at the foot of this opinion, next page.

*272

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

The appellant filed a petition for rehearing upon the ground that the exceptions to the referee's report had been added in detail to his first exception by special permission of this court.

April 28, 1885. The following order was passed

PER CURIAM. We have examined the petition for a rehearing in this case, and finding that it is true, as alleged, that the court did overlook some of the exceptions which the appellant had been allowed to add, by way of amendment to those originally filed, we think a prima facie case for a rehearing has been made.

It is proper, however, to explain how it happened that the oversight occurred. At November term, 1883, when the case was first called for argument, the appellant desired the court to suspend the appeal, so far as it related to the question of payment of the bond sued upon, and proceed to hear and determine the appeal so far as it related to the question whether the present action was barred by a former pending suit. This the court declined to do, but did grant an order, on January 26, 1883, continuing the case and suspending the appeal, with leave to the appellant to apply to the Circuit Court for a new trial of the question of payment of the bond on the ground of after-discovered evidence. The case was then continued from term to term until December 11, 1884.

In the meantime, however, the counsel for appellant had obtained leave to amend the exceptions originally filed so as to conform to the requirements of rule V. of this court, but the *counsel failed to put the order granting such leave in writing, and there being no record of the same, and the amended exceptions having been appended to the argument of appellant's counsel, without any reference to such amendment being noted at that portion of the brief, where they would most naturally be expected to be found, such amendments were overlooked when the court came to consider the case after the argument.

*273

We desire also to add that when the case was argued at the last term the court lost sight of the fact that, nearly two years before, an order had been passed suspending the appeal and granting leave to the appellant to apply to the Circuit Court for a new trial of the issue of payment, on the ground of after-discovered evidence, and requiring that the result of such application should be certified to this court; and the counsel did not bring to the attention of the court the fact that such an order had been granted, as should have been done, inasmuch as if this fact had been brought to the attention of the court, it is manifest, from the ruling of the court when the original application to suspend the appeal as to one point in the case was made, the appeal could not then have been heard. The order of January 26, 1883, hereinbefore referred to, having expressly required that the result of the application to the Circuit Court should be certified to this court, and no such certificate having yet been filed in this court, the case is not yet in a condition to be heard on its merits It is true that a certified copy of Judge Kershaw's order granting a new trial of the issue of payment has been filed in this court, but whether such new trial has been had and if so what was the result this court is not yet informed, either by certificate from the Circuit Court, as required by the order of January 26, 1883, or otherwise.

It is therefore ordered that the petition for rehearing be set down for argument on the first day assigned for the hearing of cases from the Second Circuit at the next term of this court.

---

22 S. C. *274

*ANDREWS v. LOEB.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Wills ⇐547.]

In 1826 a lot of land was devised to L., the wife, for life, and upon her decease to be sold and the proceeds divided between A. and S., the children, their heirs and assigns, but in the event of either A. or S. dying, leaving no issue living at the time of L.'s death, the whole of said property was to go to the survivor, his or her heirs or assigns for ever; and executors were appointed. It was also declared that the "estate bequeathed to S. is for her and the heirs of her body, to them and their assigns for ever." A. conveyed his interest to S., and afterwards L. died and also A., unmarried. Held, that S. had a good title in fee simple to this land.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Robinson v. Ostendorff, 38 S. C. 74, 16 S. E. 371; Vaughan v. Bridges, 61 S. C. 162, 39 S. E. 347.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1179; Dec. Dig. ⇐547.]

[2. Wills ⇐610.]

What S. took under this will was personalty, and words which, as to land, would create a fee-conditional, create an absolute estate in personalty.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Woods v. Reeves, 23 S. C. 387; Walker v. Killian, 62 S. C. 487, 40 S. E. 887; Mattison v. Stone, 90 S. C. 149, 72 S. E. 991.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1379-1385; Dec. Dig. ⟸610.]

[3. Wills ⟸866.]

There being no disposition by will of the fee, it descended to testator's heirs at law, who were his widow and these, their children. S. was therefore now the sole heir, and the words "heirs of her body" in this will have no relation to the fee thus descended, but only to her interest in the proceeds of the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 2200–2203; Dec. Dig. ⟸866.]

[This case is also cited in Vaughan v. Bridges, 61 S. C. 162, 39 S. E. 347, as to facts.]

Before Fraser, J., Charleston, November, 1884.

This was a controversy without action between Sarah Ann Andrews and Lee Loeb. The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. J. N. Nathans, for appellant.

Messrs. Lord & Hyde, contra.

March 2, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This is a controversy without action, and it involves but a single question, i. e., whether the plaintiff can convey to the defendant a fee simple title to one-half of certain premises, situate in Charleston, which defendant had contracted to purchase from said plaintiff. It is admitted that as to the other half the plaintiff can make good title.

The lot in question formerly belonged to one Moses Andrews, the father of the plaintiff, who, by his will, dated in 1826, gave and devised said lot to his wife, Louisa Andrews, for life, "and upon her decease the same to be sold and the proceeds thereof to *be equally divided between my two children, Augustus O. Andrews and Sarah Ann Andrews, share and share alike, their heirs and assigns, but in the event of either of my children dying, leaving no issue living at the time of the decease of my said wife, Louisa, the whole of said property to go to the survivor, his or her heirs or assigns forever," appointing his wife Louisa and one David Kittleband, executrix and executor. At the bottom of the will, and noted in the attestation clause, the following language was inserted: "It is understood that the property and estate hereby bequeathed to my daughter is to her and the heirs of her body, to them and their assigns forever." In November, 1847, Augustus O. Andrews conveyed his interest to his sister, the plaintiff, and he died in 1880. The widow, Mrs. Louisa Andrews, died in 1879. The plaintiff has never married.

*275

Upon these facts his honor, Judge Fraser, to whom the controversy was submitted, decreed that the plaintiff could convey the land in fee simple to the defendant; he therefore ordered and adjudged that upon a proper deed conveying the interest in question by the plaintiff being tendered, that defendant do carry out his contract of purchase according to the terms agreed upon. This decree was based upon the following reasoning as expressed in the decree: "The will under which the plaintiff claims gives positive directions that the land shall be sold and the proceeds divided. What she took under the will, therefore, was personalty, and the words added to the will which would have given only a fee conditional in land, gave her an absolute estate in personalty, i. e., in the proceeds of the land. The subsequent election to take the land instead of the money, operates to give her a good title in fee to the land. This election cannot in my view operate to transfer to the land, with a view of limiting the estate, words which, as to personalty, create an absolute estate. It was in effect a purchase of an absolute estate with the proceeds which were absolutely hers. It is therefore adjudged that the plaintiff can convey to the defendant in fee simple the one-half of said premises devised to her in the will of her father."

We adopt the reasoning of the Circuit judge and concur in his conclusion. This conclusion might also be sustained upon another ground if necessary. At the death of Moses Andrews, *inasmuch as he devised only a life estate to his widow, without disposing of the fee in terms to any one, the fee descended to his heirs. These were his widow and his two children, who inherited one-third each. That is, the fee descended to them in that proportion, awaiting a sale as directed by the will, upon the termination of the life estate. The widow died in 1879, upon which event the fee vested in the two children. Augustus died in 1880, leaving his sister, the plaintiff as his heir, who then became vested with the entire fee, or rather with the fee in the entire premises, to which fee the words in the will, "heirs of her body," have no relation, as those words apply only to her interest in the proceeds after sale, which, as the Circuit judge has held, was personalty. There has been no sale under the will, and, consequently, the fee has not been divested from the heir.

*276

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

22 S. C. 276

STEELE v. EXUM.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Venue ⟸26.]

Where none of the parties to an action reside in this state, the county designated in the complaint is the proper county for the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. §§ 39, 40; Dec. Dig. ⟸26.]

[2. Venue ⟸46.]

Where the defendants, residing in this state but not in the county where the action is brought, in their answer to a complaint for services rendered, deny on this ground the jurisdiction of the court, the Circuit judge may, on plaintiffs' motion, change the place of trial to the proper county under the authority of section 147, subdivision 1, of the code.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ware v. Henderson, 25 S. C. 387; Geiser Mfg. Co. v. Sanders, 26 S. C. 71, 72, 1 S. E. 159; Bell v. Fludd, 28 S. C. 316, 5 S. E. 810; Ex parte Ware Furniture Co., 49 S. C. 30, 27 S. E. 9; Nixon & Danforth v. Piedmont Mut. Ins. Co., 74 S. C. 440, 54 S. E. 657; Silcox & Co. v. Jones, 80 S. C. 488, 61 S. E. 948; All v. Williams, 87 S. C. 102, 68 S. E. 1041, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 837.

For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. § 68; Dec. Dig. ⟸46.]

Before Wallace, J., Williamsburg, March, 1884.

The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. T. M. Mordecai, for appellant.

Mr. H. J. Haynsworth, contra.

March 2, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The action below was brought in Williamsburg County, by the administrators of the estate of *S. W. Maurice, for services. The defendant, Bardin, was served in Charleston County, where he resided at the time of said service and also at the commencement of this suit, and since. Exum, who resided in Orangeburg County, was never served. Bardin answered denying the jurisdiction of the court at Williamsburg, on the ground that both of the defendants resided outside of Williamsburg County, the county designated in the complaint as the place of trial. At the call of the case on the docket, his honor, Judge Wallace, on motion of plaintiffs' attorney, passed an order changing the place of trial from the County of Williamsburg to the County of Charleston, and directing all subsequent proceedings in the action to be had in the county last mentioned. The defendant, Bardin, appealed, on the ground that the court at Williamsburg had no jurisdiction over the persons of the defendants, as neither of them resided in Williamsburg County.

*277

The code, sections 144, 145, and 146 (1882), divides actions into four classes with reference to the place of trial—the first depending upon the location of the subject-matter of the action, the second upon the cause of action, the third upon the county in which one or more of the defendants resides, and the fourth upon the fact that none of the parties reside in the state; in which last class the plaintiff has the right to designate in his complaint the county for trial, subject to the power of the court to change the place, as provided in a subsequent section. In each of these classes of cases, then, actions therein may be said to have a proper county as the place of trial, to be determined by the conditions mentioned in the sections above; and where a mistake is made by the plaintiff in suing in a county not the "proper" one, his action becomes subject to the subsequent section 147, which will be considered hereafter. It must be observed here, however, in reference to the last class mentioned above, i. e., where none of the parties reside in the state, inasmuch as in such case the plaintiff has the right to designate the county, there can be no mistake, and therefore there can be no improper county, so to speak, as the law fixes no county except the one designated by the plaintiff.

Next to the sections referred to above follows section 147, in *which it is provided that "the court may change the place of trial in the following cases: 1. Where the county designated for that purpose in the complaint is not the proper county. 2. Where there is reason to believe an impartial trial cannot be had. 3. Where the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice would be promoted by the change." This section is an independent and separate section, the last in the chapter, and, as we understand it, controls the preceding sections so far as it is applicable thereto. For the reasons given, however, above, the first subdivision in this section (i. e., where a change of place may be made because the county designated in the complaint is not the proper county) can have no application to the fourth class of actions mentioned, i. e., where none of the parties reside in the state, because, as we have seen, when the plaintiff designates in such a case the county, it is the proper county, and therefore there can be no such thing in such case as an improper county, which is the only contingency upon which the court could change the place of trial under this subdivision. The other two subdivisions apply to all four of the classes, and this with the other two apply to the three first classes.

*278

The case under consideration belongs to the third class, where the defendants reside in different counties from that in which the action is brought. It is apparent, therefore, that the action was not brought in the proper county, and it is equally apparent, for this reason, that it is a case where the court has been invested with power to change the place to the proper county by section 147, subdivision 1.

It is said, however, that this cannot be done here, because the court at Williamsburg had no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. It may be true, no doubt it is, that so far as the trial of the cause upon its merits is concerned, that court had no jurisdiction, as under the code, supra, the defendants residing in other counties, the trial could not be had in Williamsburg, but did it not nevertheless have jurisdiction as to changing the place of trial? If not, what is the meaning of section 147, wherein this power is expressly given to the courts in just such cases? If the exercise of this power can be denied and defeated on the ground that the court had no general jurisdiction of the case as *a whole, then the first subdivision of section 147 had as well be expunged.

*279

If it was necessary for the court to get jurisdiction of the whole case before it could entertain such a motion, then the court could hear it upon its merits, and there would be no necessity for such motion, but it is only because the court cannot have such complete jurisdiction that the power in question has been conferred; and it would be strange that when the occasion arises for the exercise of this power to change the place of trial expressly provided for, because the court has no jurisdiction to try the case itself, that this underlying want of jurisdiction would divest the power. This cannot be the true construction of these sections. There may be full jurisdiction or a limited jurisdiction in courts, determined by the law which confers it. In cases of the kind before the court, we think that section 147 has conferred upon the courts of this state jurisdiction to the extent of changing the place of trial in cases falling under the sections referred to.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

22 S. C. 279

PELZER, RODGERS & CO. v. STEADMAN.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Trial ⇐136.]

The construction of a written paper is a question of law for the court, and not a question of fact.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Cheatham v. Morrison, 37 S. C. 193, 15 S. E. 924; Senterfeit v. Sealey, 71 S. C. 271, 51 S. E. 142.

For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 318, 320, 321, 323–327; Dec. Dig. ⇐136.]

[2. Principal and Surety ⇐59.]

A surety is a favorite of the law with certain established rights which must be observed by the creditor, but a written contract cannot be construed in one way as against the principal debtor, and in another as against the surety.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ex parte Powell, 74 S. C. 197, 54 S. E. 236; Exchange Bank v. McMillan, 76 S. C. 568, 569, 57 S. E. 630.

For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. § 103; Dec. Dig. ⇐59.]

[3. Principal and Surety ⇐66.]

Therefore, where a husband contracted for an advance of $2,000, which he agreed to repay on a day named, and also to ship to this creditor all cotton controlled by him during the year, to be sold on commissions, and the wife mortgaged her separate property to secure the performance of this agreement, the creditor, in the absence of directions from the principal debtor, might apply the proceeds of cotton so shipped (which proceeds exceeded $2,000), first to the credit of other indebtedness of the principal debtor, and then for a balance remaining due on the account for advances, the creditor could foreclose the mortgage given by the wife as surety.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Rouss v. King, 69 S. C. 173, 174, 48 S. E. 220.

For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. §§ 108–110, 112; Dec. Dig. ⇐66.]

*280

[4. Payment ⇐39.]

*Where a creditor has three accounts for three different periods of time open upon his books against the same person, for one of which he holds the mortgage of a surety, he may apply to either of these three accounts unappropriated payments made by the principal debtor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. § 111; Dec. Dig. ⇐39.]

[5. Payment ⇐24.]

Where a sealed note is taken for the aggregate amount of three several accounts, the law, in the absence of testimony, will imply satisfaction, but such implication may be rebutted by testimony, as in this case.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ex parte Middleton, 42 S. C. 181, 20 S. E. 34.

For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. ⇐24.]

[6. Pleading ⇐349.]

A plea of usury being admitted, judgment should be rendered for the principal of the debt, without interest or costs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1067–1069; Dec. Dig. ⇐349.]

[This case is also cited in Exchange Bank v. McDill, 56 S. C. 565, 35 S. E. 260, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Barnwell, March, 1884.

This was an action to recover a debt and to foreclose the following mortgage, which was executed February 1, 1881:

To all persons whom these persons may concern, I, Alice A. Steadman, of the county and state aforesaid, greeting:

Whereas Pelzer, Rodgers & Co., of the city of Charleston, in said state, have agreed to made advances to my husband, G. E. Steadman, doing business at Blackville, in said county, during the current year, to the amount of two thousand dollars upon the condition that the security hereinafter given should be provided for the payment of the amount that shall be so advanced, with interest from the date of the advances at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, and also commissions thereon at the rate of five per cent., as compensation to said Pelzer, Rodgers & Co. for their services in making said advances; the whole to be due and payable on the first day of November next. And whereas I am willing to assist the said G. E.

Steadman in procuring said advances for the furtherance of his business by a pledge of my separate property.

Now, know ye, that I, the said A. A. Steadman, in consideration of the advances agreed to be made by the said Pelzer, Rodgers & Co. to the said G. E. Steadman, as aforesaid, and for the better securing the amount that shall be so advanced, with interest and commissions as aforesaid, and in further consideration of the sum of five dollars to me in hand paid at and before the sealing and delivery of these presents by the said Pelzer, Rodgers & Co. (the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged), have granted, bargained, sold and released, and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell, and release to the said Pelzer, Rodgers & Co. [then follows description of the premises mortgaged, with habendum and warranty clauses]. Provided always nevertheless, and it is the true intent and meaning of the parties to these presents, that if the said G. E. Steadman shall well and truly *pay, or cause to be paid, unto the said Pelzer, Rodgers & Co. the said sum of two thousand dollars, to be advanced to him as aforesaid, with interest and commissions thereon as aforesaid, on the first day of November next, and shall further fulfil and perform his engagement with said firm (part of the consideration for said advances) to ship them as factors for sale on commission all the cotton he may control in his business during the current year, then this deed of bargain and sale shall cease, determine, and be utterly null and void; otherwise to remain in full force and virtue.

*281

Other matters necessary to a full understanding of the case are stated in the opinion of this court. The Circuit decree, omitting so much as is restated in the opinion, was as follows:

There can be no doubt that the amount of advances to be made and to be secured by the mortgage is limited by the contract to $2,000 and interest during the year. It is equally clear that the time for payment is definitely fixed on the 1st November, 1881, after which advances could not be made upon the security of the mortgage. It was conceded upon argument that G. E. Steadman had shipped plaintiffs all of the cotton controlled by him during the year 1881. This condition of the mortgage having been fully complied with, plaintiffs can only look further to the mortgage as a security for the advances and interest provided for. Plaintiffs yield to defendants' plea of usury, the penalty for which by statute is a forfeiture of all interest and payment of costs.

There are three parties to the contract. The plaintiffs who agree to make the advances, the defendant, G. E. Steadman, the principal debtor, to whom the advances were made, and the defendant, Alice A. Steadman, who gives plaintiffs a mortgage of her separate property to secure payment of advances to be made to the principal debtor, etc. Payment, therefore, by the principal debtor discharges the collateral liability of the surety. The cases of Witte v. Wolfe, Williams & Co. v. Vance & Moseley, and Hunter v. Wardlaw & Edwards [6 S. C. 74], cited by counsel, were cases between creditor and principal debtor, and the rights and liabilities of sureties or guarantors were not involved. Two objects appear to have been contemplated by the parties in this case, and both were to be secured by the mortgage. I. Advances to the principal debtor to a limited amount, and payable at a definite *time. II. The shipment of cotton by the principal debtor to the plaintiffs, as factors for sale on commission.

*282

It being admitted that the cotton has been shipped to plaintiffs, the liability of the surety for the shipment of cotton must be held to be discharged. It remains to be determined whether or not the liability of the surety for advances to the principal debtor has been discharged by payments made by the principal debtor up to November 1st, 1881. It does not appear that the surety, at the time that she executed the mortgage, knew of the antecedent liability of her husband. It may be that, with this knowledge, she would have refused to pledge her separate property. It may be that plaintiffs then relied upon the cotton secured to be shipped as sufficient to pay the secured advances, any past balance, as well as any additional credit that they might extend to the principal debtor. If such was the expectation it has not been realized in consequence of the short crop of 1881, and not from any fault of the surety. If the contract was intended to secure balances due or balances to become due by the principal debtor, it should have been so expressed, as in the case of Witte v. Wolfe, 16 S. C., 256.

Whilst the mortgage does not refer to the means to be employed by the principal debtor in paying for the advances, and whilst the two engagements in the mortgage appear to be distinct in terms, yet the mortgage that secures the advances also provides the means by which the principal debtor can pay for the advances. It is fair and reasonable to suppose that this fact was an inducement for the surety to pledge her separate property, especially when considered in connection with the further fact that the surety had taken the precaution to impose a limit both as to amount and the time for payment of the advances.

I must therefore conclude, under all the circumstances, that it was the intention of the parties that the advances should be made by plaintiffs to the principal debtor from February 1, 1881, to November 1, 1881, and that the payments made by the principal debtor during that period were to be applied first to the advances to the extent of $2,000 and interest secured by the mortgage.

*283

*It appears that plaintiffs advanced to G. E. Steadman, from 1st February to 1st November, 1881.....	$4,006 69
That G. E. Steadman is credited with payments made during same period	2,728 55
	$1,278 14

In this view of the case it is not necessary to consider the effect of the note for $3,432.-55, executed by defendant, G. E. Steadman, June 30, 1882, to plaintiffs or the credit endorsed thereon as to the liability of the surety. Nor is it material to consider the right of application of partial payments which cannot apply in this case. The factor's lien cannot prevail in this case to the prejudice of the surety, it being held that, under the contract, the shipments were first applicable to payments of advances and interest.

It does not appear from the accounts or the testimony that a greater rate of interest than seven per cent. per annum has been charged or embraced in the note executed by the defendant, G. E. Steadman, to plaintiffs. This note embraces indebtedness prior to the execution of the mortgage by the surety. It was intended to represent the balance of the liability by G. E. Steadman to plaintiffs. After deducting the $1,714.63 credited on the note there remains a balance of $1,-826.70, with interest from the 14th April, 1882, due by the defendant, G. E. Steadman, to plaintiffs.

As Matter of Fact. I. I find that G. E. Steadman has paid plaintiffs the amount of advances and interest and shipped plaintiffs the cotton secured by the mortgage of the defendant, Alice A. Steadman. II. That the defendant, G. E. Steadman, is individually indebted to plaintiffs in the sum of $1,826.70 with interest from April 14th, 1882.

As Matter of Law. I. I find that the defendant, Alice A. Steadman, is not liable to plaintiffs upon the mortgage executed February 1, 1882, and delivered to plaintiffs, and as the conditions of said mortgage have been fulfilled, said mortgage, by its terms, is void and of no effect, and should be delivered to the said Alice A. Steadman to be cancelled.

*284

II. That plaintiffs' com*plaint should be dismissed as to the defendant, Alice A. Steadman, with costs. III. That plaintiffs are entitled to judgment against the defendant, G. E. Steadman, individually, for the sum of $1,826.70 with interest from the 14th April, 1882.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiffs' complaint be dismissed with costs as to the defendant, Alice A. Steadman, and that plaintiffs do, within thirty days from the filing and notice of this decree, deliver to the defendant, Alice A. Steadman, the mortgage referred to in the complaint, to be cancelled by the clerk of the court, who is hereby authorized and directed to mark said mortgage satisfied. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that plaintiffs have judgment with leave to issue execution against the defendant, G. E. Steadman, for the sum of eighteen hundred and twenty-six dollars and seventy cents with interest thereon from the 14th April, 1882, with costs as to said G. E. Steadman.

The exceptions raise only the points stated and considered in the opinion of this court.

Messrs. John J. Maher and Henderson Bros., for appellant.

Messrs. H. M. Thompson and L. T. Izlar, contra.

March 2, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In February, 1881, Pelzer, Rodgers & Co., factors in Charleston, agreed verbally to make advances to G. E. Steadman during that year, in money or supplies, to the amount of $2,000, with interest from the dates of the advances at seven per cent. per annum, and also commissions at five per cent. Steadman was a merchant at Blackville, S. C., dealing in cotton; and it was stipulated in the agreement, as a part of the consideration thereof, that Steadman should send to the factors, for sale on commission, all the cotton he might control in his business during the current year. This agreement was made upon the understanding that Mrs. Alice A. Steadman, the wife of G. E. Steadman, to secure the performance of his portion of the agreement, should execute a mortgage of her separate estate to the factors. Accordingly, in February, 1881, Mrs. Stead*man executed to the plaintiffs the mortgage mentioned in the complaint, covering certain real estate in Barnwell County, in which mortgage, after reciting the agreement between the plaintiffs and Steadman, and expressing her willingness to assist him, she duly conveyed the property to the plaintiffs, with condition that the deed should be void if Steadman should pay, or cause to be paid, to plaintiffs, said sum of $2,000, on November 1, 1881, and should further fulfil his said engagement to ship to said factors, for sale on commission, all the cotton he might control in his business during the current year.

*285

At the date of this mortgage it appears that Steadman was indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $946.95, balance on the accounts of the previous year; but whether Mrs. Steadman knew of this, is not stated. The plaintiffs advanced to Steadman, during the year $2,758.31, subject to a credit of $475.37; so that at the close of the business year, July 1, 1881, the accounts stood $946.-95+$2,758.31=$3,705.26—$475.37=$3,229.89, to which interest was added to November 1, 1881, at which date total amount was $3,432.35, for which Steadman gave his note under seal, payable on November 1, 1881. This note embraced the $946.95 of the previous year, also advances under the agreement, $2,000, and additional advances $758.31, and interest from July 1, to November 1, 1881, less the credit of $475.37. On the note appeared a credit $1,714.65, dated April 14, 1882, which was a balance in favor of Steadman on transactions between July 1, 1881, and December, 1881.

Under these circumstances the action below was brought against G. E. Steadman and Alice, his wife, to recover against him individually the amount due for advances, and to foreclose the mortgage given by her. The defendant, Alice, answered, claiming that her husband had shipped to the plaintiffs all of the cotton under his control during the year, to an amount considerably in excess of the two thousand dollars, interest and commissions agreed upon, and therefore the mortgage was discharged. She further alleged that the agreement was usurious, as more than seven per cent. had been stipulated for on the advances. The defendant, Geo. E. Steadman, adopted the answer of his wife. *The case was heard by Judge Witherspoon upon testimony reported by the master.

*286

It was conceded that Steadman had complied with his contract to ship all the cotton under his control, and that the proceeds of this cotton amounted to considerably more than the $2,000, secured by the mortgage. Nor was there any difference between the parties as to the amount remaining unpaid of the $2,000 secured by the mortgage, if the proceeds of the cotton should be applied first to the portions of the account, other than that. The vital question in the case, therefore, to Mrs. Steadman was how should this cotton money be applied; if to the mortgage, then her defence was sufficient and successful, but if to the entire account, then there was a balance due by her. There was nothing in the testimony showing that Steadman, the debtor, gave any directions as to the application of the proceeds of the cotton. He sent it forward under the agreement; it was sold by the factors, and the proceeds applied by them. It was contended, however, on the part of the defendants, that the agreement, when construed with reference to the rights of Mrs. Steadman, as surety or guarantor, required the application of the proceeds of the cotton to the advances secured by her mortgage. On the other hand the plaintiffs claimed that there was no appropriation growing out of the terms or intent of these papers, of these proceeds, but that they were left open and to be applied in conformity with the principles of law governing such cases, which being applied, entitled the plaintiffs to a large decree, i. e., the sum of $1,594.52, all interest being excluded under the plea of the admitted usury; Steadman having failed to direct the application of the cotton, either when it was consigned or afterwards, and the plaintiffs having applied it first to the unsecured portion of the account.

His honor, Judge Witherspoon, concluding under all the circumstances, that it was the intention of the parties that the advances were to be made from February 1, to November 1, 1881, and that the payments made during that period, by the principal debtor, were to be applied first to the extent of the $2,000 and interest secured by the mortgage, and it appearing that Steadman was credited with payments during the same *period more than enough to extinguish the $2,000, found as matter of fact, that the mortgage was satisfied. He found also, as matter of fact, that Steadman was still due the plaintiffs individually the sum of $1,826.70. He therefore adjudged and decreed that the complaint be dismissed with costs as to the defendant, Alice Steadman, but that plaintiffs have judgment against G. E. Steadman for the sum of $1,826.70 with interest from April 14, 1882, and costs.

*287

The appeal of the plaintiffs involves the finding of fact of his honor that the mortgage was satisfied, based upon the intent of the parties that the proceeds of the cotton should be applied to the $2,000. The defendant appeals from the finding of fact that he was indebted to plaintiffs in the sum of $1,826.70, and he also alleges error in that his honor decreed judgment against him individually for any amount in this action when it was upon a special agreement set forth in the complaint, which had been complied with, and therefore the outside indebtedness was not involved and should not have been adjudicated. Further, the defendant under the principle that a judgment may be sustained on appeal upon other grounds than those upon which it was based by the judge has urged that the debt of defendant was satisfied by the sealed note given by him in full of the account in June, 1881, and therefore the mortgage given to secure said account was extinguished, as held by the judge. And he also contended that the whole account was extinguished, and therefore there was no foundation for that portion of the decree which allowed judgment against Steadman.

This court has frequently declared that it will not disturb the findings of fact of the Circuit judge resting upon testimony, unless it is manifestly against the weight of the evidence; and if the finding here involved in the plaintiffs' appeal was a finding as the result of evidence introduced and directed to a question of fact, the rule referred to would apply. But it is manifest that this is not the case. The judge evidently reached his conclusion, not through the fact of payment proved by witnesses, but through the construction placed by him on the terms of the mortgage, showing, as he concluded, the intent of the parties; which required in his opinion the application of the proceeds of the cot*ton to the $2,000 advance. Now the construction of a paper in litigation between parties is not a question of fact for the jury, but is always a question of law for the court. So that the finding of fact of the judge, as it is styled, on this subject, was really a finding of law, or at least the result of a finding of law: and therefore it is before us as any other question of law, untrammeled by the rule referred to above.

*288

It is practically conceded by his honor below that if this case was not complicated with the presence of Mrs. Alice A. Steadman, the surety, and if it was simply a case between creditor and debtor, under the law as laid down in Williams & Co. v. Vance & Moseley, 9 S. C. 344 [30 Am. Rep. 26], and Bell v. Bell, 20 S. C. 46, and other cases, there would be no difficulty whatever, as the facts would clearly entitle the plaintiffs to recover through a decree of foreclosure. But a distinction is attempted to be drawn between a case of that kind and this, because of the suretyship in this of Mrs. Steadman. Does that difference negative the application to this case of the principle which it is admitted would apply to the first? It is true the law requires on behalf of the surety fair dealing between the creditor and debtor. It was said in Tinsley v. Kirby, 17 S. C., 1, that in determining the liability of a surety it must not be forgotten that "he is a favorite of the law, and has the right to stand on the strict terms of his obligation when such terms are ascertained." Hence there can be no extension of time, not a moment, nor can there be the slightest change or alteration made in the contract without the knowledge and consent of the surety. Hence, too, all securities and collaterals deposited by the debtor with the creditor on account of the debt, must be held for the protection of the surety; but we have found no case or principle which requires that the contract shall be construed in one way as against the principal and in another as against the surety.

Now what was the contract of Steadman? It appears in the recitals of the mortgage, and it was simply to pay the amount to be advanced, $2,000, by November 1, 1881, thereafter, with interest and commissions, and to ship to the plaintiffs all the cotton under his control during that current year, to be sold on commission. Mrs. Steadman's mortgage was intended to secure *the performance of this contract on the part of her husband. In other words, she bound her land to the twofold promise of Steadman, i. e., that he would pay the $2,000, interests and commissions, by November 1, 1881; and also that he would ship all cotton to the plaintiffs, not for the payment of the $2,000, not as additional and collateral security thereto, but to be sold on commission. The plaintiffs were satisfied with the mortgage of real estate as a security for the $2,000, and the stipulation as to the shipment of the cotton was evidently in furtherance and support of their business as factors, selling cotton and other produce on commission. And if, as we have said, the contest here was between Steadman and the plaintiffs alone, there could not be a difference of opinion as to the construction of this contract, and no one would contend that either by the terms or the spirit of said contract could Steadman legally claim that the proceeds of the cotton should be applied to the $2,000 advance in preference to his other indebtedness to plaintiffs, if any. Under the law he might direct such application, but in the absence of such direction he could not claim it as a matter of legal right growing out of the terms of the agreement.

*289

Such being the proper construction of the agreement as between the original parties, where then is the equity of the surety? And by the term equity, let it be understood that we do not mean the unfortunate condition in which Mrs. Steadman has placed herself, at the solicitation perhaps of her husband—a hard case for her, no doubt, as she is likely to lose her home—but we mean that equity which flows from established equitable principles, and which the courts can administer. We would not have been displeased to have found such an equity in the case, as we know how easy and natural it is for a wife to pledge her all in behalf of a failing husband, oftentimes without examination or reflection; but after carefully reviewing the whole case, we must say that we have not found it. According to our opinion, the contract or agreement must be construed to mean the same thing with the surety as with the principal. It is an entirety, and cannot bear a double signification. As we construe it, there was no appropriation of the cotton to the advance of the $2,000 secured by the mortgage.

*290

Hence in plaintiffs' failing to thus *apply it, it cannot be said that they have changed, altered, or modified the contract, or that they have diverted to other purposes securities or collaterals deposited or pledged by the debtor for its enforcement, to the injury of the surety, or that they have violated any other recognized equity of the surety. As to the application of partial payments by a creditor, in the absence of directions from the debtor, we need only to refer to the recent case of Bell v. Bell, 20 S. C., 46.

This brings us to the question raised by the defendant, that the sealed note given by him June 30, 1881, and due November 1, extinguished the entire account, including that for the advance of $2,000, and therefore the mortgage was satisfied. The law upon that subject, as found laid down in the recent case of Chalmers v. Turnipseed, 21 S. C., 126, after discussing the previous cases, is as follows: Where an equal or an inferior security is taken, a question of fact is raised as to the intent of the parties, with the burden of proof on the debtor to show that it was intended as payment, if he so claims; whereas when a higher security is taken, in the absence of testimony to the contrary the law will imply satisfaction. Chalmers v. Turnipseed, supra, and the cases there cited.

In the case before the court, it seems that a sealed note was taken, which was a higher security than the open account, and in the absence of testimony would imply satisfaction; but Steadman himself, in his testimony on the cross-examination, said more than once that this note was given to close the account. To use his own language, at one place he said: "gave them a paper to close the account, but whether it was a sealed note or not cannot remember." Now, does this come up to the law of Gardner v. Hust, 2 Rich., 608, cited in Chalmers v. Turnipseed, where it is said "that in general the taking of a higher security is an extinguishment of the same, provided the higher security is accepted as satisfaction; and if not so accepted, then it is merely additional or cumulative security for the same debt"? With the evidence of the defendant, Steadman, before us, we think that the note was neither intended to extinguish the account nor was it accepted as payment and in satisfaction thereof, but was in*tended, as Steadman says, merely to "close it" and to acknowledge its correctness, and must be regarded as cumulative security.

*291

The second objection of defendant, which applies to the judgment against him individually, might and perhaps would be fatal had we sustained above the decree of his honor, the Circuit judge, as to the satisfaction of the mortgage; because then there would have been nothing left in the complaint upon which such a judgment could have been based, inasmuch as the complaint assumes that the credits of Steadman had been properly applied to the other account in excess of the $2,000. The plaintiffs, therefore, sued only for the amount remaining unpaid on the $2,000 advance secured by the mortgage, assuming that the balance of the account has been paid. We have reached the conclusion different from the Circuit judge that the $2,000 had not been extinguished, and it being a subsisting debt of Steadman, as well as secured by the mortgage of Mrs. Steadman, the plaintiffs are entitled to an individual decree against Steadman and also a foreclosure of the mortgage.

The usury is admitted, therefore all interest should be eliminated. This the plaintiffs have offered to do, by remitting all of the decree in excess of $1,594.52, which seems to be the principal of the amount really due, without interest. For this amount, we think the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment against G. E. Steadman without costs, and that the mortgage should be foreclosed for that amount.

It is the judgment of this court that the plaintiffs should have judgment against G. E. Steadman for $1,594.52, and also a judgment of foreclosure against Mrs. Alice A. Steadman for the same amount; the payment of one being the satisfaction of both, all without costs; and to this extent the judgment below is modified. Let the case be remanded to be carried out in accordance with the above.

---

22 S. C. *292

*BIRD & CO. v. CALVERT.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Corporations ⇐272.]

Where suit was brought against a corporation and its individual members, all of whom (except one) answered admitting liability, an order of reference and subsequent proceedings thereunder will not be set aside as to the corporation and these non-resisting defendants at the instance of the one excepted stockholder, whose time for answering had not expired when such order was taken, and who had not then answered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. ⇐272.]

2. In action by a creditor in the Court of Equity to subject property beyond the reach of legal process to the payment of his demand, are judgment and execution unsatisfied the only sufficient evidence to prove insolvency, and so give jurisdiction to the court?

[3. Corporations ⇐252.]

Under a charter which provides that every stockholder shall be individually liable to the creditors to the extent of five per cent. upon his stock subscribed, the liability of the stockholders individually is primary, and may be enforced by action before judgment had against the corporation and return of nulla bona.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in National Bank of Newberry v. Kinard, 28 S. C. 112, 5 S. E. 464; Compton v. Patterson, 28 S. C. 154, 5 S. E. 470; Flenniken v. Marshall, 43 S. C. 82, 20 S. E. 788, 28 L. R. A. 402; Parker v. Carolina Savings Bank, 53 S. C. 590, 31 S. E. 673, 69 Am. St. Rep. 888.

For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1017; Dec. Dig. ⇐252.]

Before Hudson, J., Charleston, June, 1884.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. McCrady, Sons & Bacot, for appellant.

Messrs. Smythe & Lee, contra.

March 3, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The defendant, Wm. H. Calvert, was a member of the company incorporated in 1881, under the style and name of "The Merchants' and Planters' Transportation Company," the charter of which provided that each stockholder, besides his stock proper, shall be jointly and severally liable to the creditors thereof "in an amount not exceeding five per cent. of the par value of the share or shares held by him," &c.

The plaintiffs, claiming to be creditors of the corporation in the sum of $74.91, instituted this action in behalf of themselves and all other creditors of the corporation. The complaint alleged that the steamer "Clarendon," which belonged to the company, "had been sold at a price inadequate to satisfy the debts, and *that they had no property whatever and were utterly insolvent." A list of the stockholders was attached, with the number of the shares of each, among whom was the defendant, W. H. Calvert, represented as having subscribed two shares—two hundred dollars, one hundred of which was still due and unpaid. Alleging that their debt was payable, and the action brought within the times respectively required by the charter, the plaintiffs prayed judgment as follows: First, against the corporation for the amount of the debt; second, against the stockholder, W. H. Calvert, for one hundred dollars, the unpaid portion of his original subscription; third, against each of the stockholders for five per cent. upon the value of the shares held by the corporators respectively; and fourth, for the appointment of a receiver, general relief, &c.

*293

The company and all its stockholders were summoned, and the corporation as such and most of its members (excepting Calvert) answered, admitting the allegations of the complaint, and the individual liability of each stockholder to pay five per cent. upon the amount of his stock, according to the terms of the charter. On March 11, 1884, Judge Kershaw referred the matter to Master Sass, with instructions to collect the five per cent. from all the stockholders who had answered, and, after paying the costs and a reasonable counsel fee to plaintiffs' attorney, to hold the remainder of the fund for the payment of the debts, with leave to call in the creditors, hold references, and report any special matter. After this, on March 14, Calvert's attorney gave notice of an appearance, and further time to answer being extended to him, he filed his answer on April 10, denying that he was in default in paying his original subscription, which, as he alleged, was only one share, one hundred dollars, and had been paid in full. He further insisted that, as the plaintiffs had not before commencing action obtained judgment against the corporation and exhausted their legal remedies, they had no right to invoke the equitable jurisdiction of the court to enforce the collection of the five per cent. against individual stockholders, and that all the orders previously passed were without authority, and the complaint should be dismissed as to all parties for want of jurisdiction.

*294

*On June 20, Master Sass filed his report under Judge Kershaw's order, stating that the stockholders (except Calvert) had paid the assessment upon their stock, that he had taxed the costs, fixed the fee, &c., and recommending that the remainder of the fund should be paid pro rata to the creditors. This report was confirmed by Judge Hudson, who ordered the money paid out as recommended, but at the same time reserved all the rights of Calvert, who was heard the next day upon his answer. The judge referred the issues of fact raised by the answer to the master, and overruled his plea to the jurisdiction, assigning as his reasons: "1. Because the answer of the defendant, W. H. Calvert, through indulgence of plaintiffs' counsel, has been filed at a late day, and at a time when it would be inequitable to interfere with the process of winding up the affairs of the corporation begun by this court. Had the defence been interposed at the outset, and had the other stockholders joined him therein, the grounds of defence would have deserved serious consideration, and might possibly have been fatal to the complaint, although I do not hold that the action might not have been sustained. 2. The allegation of utter insolvency is positively made in the complaint, and as unqualifiedly admitted by the defendant company, and by every stockholder who has answered except W. H. Calvert, and he does not deny it, but merely declines to admit it. 3. Because this clear evidence of insolvency is sufficient to justify this court in appointing a receiver of the assets of the corporation. This has been practically done by Judge Kershaw in the order directing the master to perform certain offices usually devolved on a receiver. Under these circumstances, and after this court has, at the instance of all save Mr. Calvert, assumed jurisdiction and entered upon the administration of the affairs of the corporation, it would be trifling with important rights and interests to dismiss the complaint at the instance of a single stockholder, who does not pretend that the insolvency could here be more clearly established had a judgment been first recovered against the company and an effort made to enforce it."

From this order Calvert appeals upon the following grounds: "1. Because the order of reference of March 11, 1884, should not have been granted, and should now be set aside, inasmuch as *it was taken before the expiration of the twenty days allowed by law to answer or demur, and without notice to the defendant, appellant, and without his consent then or since, and also all subsequent proceedings under said order of reference, including the master's report and the order of June 19, 1884, confirming the same. 2. Because in the order of June 20, 1884, his honor, Judge Hudson, erred in overruling the plea to the jurisdiction set up by the defendant, appellant, in his answer, and in sustaining the jurisdiction of the court over the action, certainly as to this defendant, appellant."

*295

Under the code, different causes of action may be united in the same complaint. The plaintiffs sued the corporation, and at the same time charging that the artificial entity known as the corporation owned no property and was utterly insolvent, asked further relief against the individual stockholders under the charter. The corporation as such was regularly made a party by service upon its officers, and answered admitting the debt, and therefore the judgment against it was regular and bound all the members as corporators, whether they individually answered or not. The question as to further liability for the five per cent. on stock was personal, which each stockholder could raise or not for himself as he saw fit. When most of the stockholders admitted the utter insolvency of the corporation and their liability for the assessment, and actually paid it under orders of the court, we do not think those orders should be set aside only for the reason that one of their number had not then answered, and afterwards answered, objecting to the jurisdiction of the court. Upon that subject he had the right to speak for himself, but not to make issues for others, who had the same right to speak for themselves. The court certainly had jurisdiction to render judgment against the corporation and all those stockholders who admitted the insolvency and their liability, and the orders made as to them must stand.

It is urged, however, that as to the five per cent. claimed by the creditors to be assessed on himself, Calvert's plea to the jurisdiction should have been sustained on the ground, as we understand it, that the proceeding to enforce its payment was in the nature of a proceeding in equity, a creditor's bill, which will not *be entertained, except in cases where there is no adequate remedy at law, and that was not properly shown here. That is to say, that this case belongs to that class where some voidable obstacle obstructs legal process, removable only by equity, affording a remedy in aid of the law and secondary in its character, which supplementary aid will be withheld inter vivos until all legal means have been exhausted, and this fact can only be made to appear by proof of a judgment recovered and a return of nulla bona on the execution. In such cases it is not quite certain that proof of a judgment and unsatisfied execution will be inexorably required under all circumstances. They are undoubtedly the usual, and perhaps most satisfactory, evidence of the important fact of insolvency; but at last they are only evidence, and some cases of high authority hold that it is possible to prove insolvency by other satisfactory evidence. In this case insolvency was both alleged and proved, indeed admitted by the officers and most of the stockholders, and as a fact denied by none. Pettus v. Smith, 4 Rich. Eq., 197; Terry v. Tubman, 92 U. S., 160 [23 L. Ed. 537]; Case v. Beauregard, 101 U. S., 690 [25 L. Ed. 1004].

*296

But be that as it may, it seems to us clear that this is not a case belonging to the class above described, in which the aid of equity is requested to remove some obstacle in the way of legal process, and the performance of certain primary duties is required as an indispensable prerequisite to the exercise of such jurisdiction. On the contrary, there is here no obstacle in the way of enforcing an obligation which is purely statutory, a contract created by the accepted charter of the company, which is the law of the case, not only as to the measure of liability, but also as to the conditions of its enforcement. By the common law no liability attached to the stockholders of an incorporated company beyond their subscriptions to the capital stock. Creditors had no rights except against the artificial existence known as the corporation and its corporate property. But its property, including unpaid subscriptions, was held as a trust fund for creditors, who could, by showing that the corporation was insolvent, obtain the appointment of a receiver and enforce the payment of subscriptions. Code, § 265; Clinkscales v. Pendleton Man. Co., 9 S. C., 324.

The constitution of 1868 authorized an enlargement of the *liabilities of stockholders. Article XII., section 5, provides that "All general laws and special acts passed pursuant to this section shall make provision therein for fixing the personal liability of stockholders under proper limitations." The third section of the charter of this company, passed in 1881 (17 Stat., 587), provides that each stockholder shall be individually liable for five per cent. upon his stock subscribed, and, differing in that regard from a number of other charters, attached no condition as to having a judgment and the return of nulla bona on the execution before the liability can be enforced. The terms are: "Sec. 3. Each stockholder in the said corporation shall be jointly and severally liable to the creditors thereof in an amount, besides the value of his share or shares therein, not exceeding five per cent. of the par value of the share or shares held by him, at the time the demand of the creditor was made; provided that such demand shall have been payable within one year; provided, also, that proceedings to hold such stockholders liable therefor shall be commenced within two years after such debt may have become due, and whilst he remains a stockholder therein, or within two years after he shall have ceased to be such stockholder," &c.

*297

Without entering at length into the argument, it strikes us that this provision creates no liability secondary in its nature. It will be observed that regulations are made as to the time within which "proceedings to hold such stockholders liable" must be commenced; but nothing whatever is said as to any difference between stock and assessment, or, as to the latter, the necessity of having a prior judgment and execution. The individual liability of the stockholders is made as direct and unconditional for the five per cent. as for the subscribed stock itself. The words are, each stockholder shall be liable "in an amount, besides the value of his share or shares therein, not exceeding five per cent.," &c. The obligation in one sense may possibly be termed collateral, but we cannot see that in any sense it is secondary, and enforceable only after judgment and a return of nulla bona on the execution against the corporation. See Thomp. Liab. Stock., §§ 34. 292, 321; Johnston v. S. W. R. R. Bank, 3 Storb. Eq., 273; Terry v. Martin, 10 S. C., 263; Sullivan v.

*298

Sullivan *Man. Co., 14 Id., 494, and 20 S. C., 79; Bank v. Bivingsville Cotton Man. Co., 10 Rich., 100.

The case last cited, of the Bivingsville Manufacturing Company, was an action against the stockholders, and no prior judgment had been obtained against the corporation, and the court, construing the provisions of the charter, said: "Their primary liability on contracts made by the corporation is in their character as partners, and no obligation is imposed by the act on creditors to exhaust the assets of the corporation, nor is there any condition which requires them to pursue it to insolvency before they shall commence their actions against them as general partners. In this respect the act differs from the statutory provisions of other states, which make the absolute liability of individual stockholders for debts due by the company depend upon its dissolution, or upon the return of an execution against the corporation unsatisfied. Bank of Poughkeepsie v. Ibbotson, 24 Wend., 473; Moss v. Oakley, 2 Hill (N. Y.), 265." See, also, Terry v. Tubman, supra.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 298

STATE v. HUCKIE.

(November Term, 1884.)

[Criminal Law ⇐645.]

Where the defendants in a criminal prosecution offer no evidence, they are entitled to the reply in argument; but where jointly indicted, and any one of them introduces evidence, the state is entitled to the reply.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1508; Dec. Dig. ⇐645.]

Before Hudson, J., Berkeley, June, 1884.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Lee & Bowen, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Jervey, contra.

March 3, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The appellant

*299

Prince Huckie, and *one Paris Bailey, were jointly indicted for burglary and larceny, but were represented by different counsel. After the state had closed its case, Huckie declined to offer testimony in defence, but his co-defendant Bailey called one witness. The counsel for Huckie claimed the right to reply in argument, which was denied him by Judge Hudson. The jury found a verdict of "guilty" as to both, but with a recommendation to mercy as to the appellant. Huckie moved in arrest of judgment, and for a new trial as to himself; but both these motions being refused, he appeals to this court, upon the single ground "that the judge erred in refusing to allow his attorney to make the reply or closing argument in the case, no testimony having been offered in his behalf."

This is not a matter of error as to express law, but of practice. The rule of court cited (Circuit Court Rules, 59) does not reach and provide for the point, for that rule really relates to the burden of proof, and the character of the issue, as giving the right to the defendant in certain cases, to open and close both in the evidence and argument. Its terms are: "And on all motions or special matters either springing out of a cause or otherwise, the actor or party submitting the same to the court, shall, in like manner, begin and close; and so shall the defendant, where he admits the plaintiff's cause by the pleadings, and takes upon himself the burden of proof, have the like privilege." This rule, with slight modification, has been in existence in this state ever since 1796 (see Miller's Compilation), but it does not cover this case. There has been here no admission of the plaintiff's cause, or assumption of the burden of proof by the defendant.

We have looked through all the rules adopted at different times by the courts of this state, and we have not been able to find one which in express terms gave the defendant the right to reply, where there was no change in the character of the issue by admission, simply on the ground that the defendant offered no evidence. It seems, however, that, resting upon the common law, such has been the practice. In the case of Hagood v. Cathcart (Rice, 262), the defendant simply called back the plaintiff's witness, after the plaintiff had closed his case, and it was held "that the general rule as to the reply, is, if the defendant adduce *any evidence, the plaintiff's counsel is entitled, as of right, to the reply." 3 Chit. Gen. Prac., 900; 1 Moody & Malkin, 86 (22 E. C. L. R., 259). And it seems that this has been the practice in criminal as well as civil proceedings. See the case of State v. Brisbane, in which it was held, that "in all public prosecutions on the part of the state, where defendant or prisoner calls no witnesses, his counsel is entitled to the last word or the privilege of concluding the arguments to the jury, notwithstanding the former practice to the contrary." 2 Bay, 451. This case has a note appended in these words: "This rule has been invariably observed in all the criminal courts throughout the state, as well as in the courts of common pleas ever since the above determination; so that it may now be considered as a standing rule of practice in our criminal courts of judicature."

*300

But while this is the case, it appears that if any evidence is offered in defence, the general right of reply will not be transferred from the state to the defendant. Even where the defendant offered no evidence strictly in defence, but his witnesses were heard on a cross indictment between the same parties, the court held "that in ordinary cases, where the defendant offered no evidence, his counsel was entitled to the reply, but where cross indictments were taken up and heard together, and defendant's witnesses were examined in the indictment which he preferred, that the state was entitled to the reply." State v. Chreitsburgh et al., 4 McCord, 30. It follows that if appellant had been the only party charged, and he had offered no evidence, his counsel would have been entitled to the reply in argument.

Does it alter the case, when two or more are indicted for the same offence, and one of the number offers evidence? We think it does. A prosecution against several jointly for the same offence is an entirety, but one proceeding, without regard to the number of persons who may be charged. The calling of witnesses by one of the defendants, was offering evidence in the cause. The defendants did not have the right, if they had desired, to sever in the trial. State v. Littlejohn, 1 Bay, 316; State v. Wise & Johnson, 7 Rich., 412. This inability to sever in their defence, however, did not interfere with the right of each individually to claim the number of challenges allowed by law. *As was said in the case of Wise & Johnson, supra: "The right of challenge must and will be preserved unimpaired; hence it must be permitted to each for himself. The foundation for the privileges is stated by Mr. Justice Blackstone (4 Com., 353), and hence it will be seen that the right to challenge does not draw after it the right of selection, but merely of exclusion." It has been held that this court cannot declare error in the refusal of the Circuit judge to permit more than one counsel for defendants to cross-examine a witness for the state, although the several defendants were represented by different counsel. State v. Sims, 16 S. C., 487. For the same reasons we cannot declare error in the refusal of the Circuit judge to allow the counsel of one of two defendants, the general reply in argument, the other defendant jointly indicted having examined witnesses in defence.

*301

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 301

STATE v. COFIELD.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Intoxicating Liquors ⇐132.]

The provision in section 1731, General Statutes, declaring the sale of spirituous or intoxicating liquors without a license to be unlawful, applies to the incorporated cities, towns, and villages of this state as well as to the country.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 141; Dec. Dig. ⇐132.]

[2. Criminal Law ⇐1; Statutes ⇐184.]

No act is criminal unless inhibited by law or declared to be unlawful, and all penal statutes must be strictly construed; but where the selling of liquor without license is clearly prohibited under penalties, the context, the surroundings, and the evil intended to be remedied may be considered for the purpose of ascertaining the territorial limits intended to be affected.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1, 2; Dec. Dig. ⇐1; Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 262; Dec. Dig. ⇐184.]

Before Aldrich, J., Union, June, 1884.

The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. I. G. McKissick, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Duncan, contra.

*302

*March 5, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The defendant, Jack Cofield, was convicted at June term of the Court of General Sessions for Union County of retailing intoxicating liquors within the corporate limits of the town of Union without a license. He has appealed on the ground that the presiding judge charged the jury that it was unlawful to sell intoxicating liquors inside of incorporate towns.

The state relies on section 1731 of General Statutes. That section is as follows: "No license for the sale of spirituous or intoxicating liquors shall be granted in South Carolina outside of the incorporated cities, towns, and villages of this state, and it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to sell such liquors without a license." The appellant contends that when this section is construed under the rules applicable to the construction of criminal statutes it makes the sale of such liquors without a license unlawful outside of incorporate towns and cities only, and that there is no law forbidding such sale without a license within the limits of incorporate towns and cities, the offence of which he was convicted.

The question is new and is by no means free from doubt, when looking alone to the language of the act. It may be stated as a proposition which has no exception that no act can be said to be criminal unless some law of force, either written or unwritten, common or statute, has either inhibited it in terms or declared it unlawful. Has the section in question declared the sale of intoxicating liquors inside of incorporate towns without a license unlawful? The section has two parts. The first provides that no license shall be granted outside of such towns. This is a limitation upon the powers of the officials invested with the authority to grant licenses. The second declares it to be unlawful to retail spirituous liquors without a license. If these two parts stood separate and apart from each other, and in different sections, there would be no doubt in reference to the construction because, being independent enactments, each would have general application. But being in the same section, and constituting the entire section, the latter following the first, and separated therefrom only by a semicolon, there is some reason for saying that they refer to *one and the same subject matter, i. e., the retail of such liquors outside of said towns and villages; the one declaring that no license shall be granted within a certain boundary and the other that to sell therein, notwithstanding no license can be granted, shall be unlawful.

*303

The object of construction is to reach the intent of the matter under consideration whether it be an act of the general assembly, a deed, contract, or other paper, and the same rules apply, except, as we are admonished, in criminal laws the rules must be strictly applied and the law strictly construed. In such laws there is no room for an enlarged or liberal interpretation under the influences of what is termed the spirit or intendment of the law as in civil matters; on the contrary, the letter must govern.

Now the difficulty here, though it is a criminal act under consideration, does not arise from any doubtful signification of the words of the act; they are plain and simple and do not require any liberal or enlarged interpretation to ascertain their meaning. "It shall be unlawful to sell spirituous liquors without a license." Nothing could be plainer than this, each word used for a well defined meaning, and he "that runs may read," &c., &c. But the matter in doubt is the territorial limit within which this unlawful sale is prohibited. How far does it extend? Does it extend simply to the country outside of the towns, or does it embrace the whole state including the towns? The rule requiring a strict and literal interpretation of the words used so as to ascertain the offence does not aid us nor hamper us here, but we may look at the context, the surroundings, the evil intended to be remedied, and the end to be accomplished, and we may advance the remedy to meet the evil.

Now when we look at the two following sections of this act, section 1732 and 1733, in connection with 1731, we find the general assembly legislating to suppress the sale of spirituous liquors, without license, and to this end section 1731 first provides that no license shall be granted outside of the incorporated towns and villages. Then sections 1732 and 1733 provide a mode of granting licenses in said towns and villages, and the latter part of section 1731 declares generally that it shall be unlawful for any person to sell without a license so to do. This could not *have been intended to apply to the outside territory alone for the reason, first, the evil intended to be remedied went much further than this territory; and, secondly, if this had been the purpose, there would have been no necessity or propriety in using the words "without a license," as any sale within such territory would of necessity have been without a license, the first part of the section having already provided that no license should or could be granted therein.

*304

But sections 1732 and 1733, providing a mode of obtaining licenses in incorporate towns and villages, and thereby legalizing sales made therein with license, there was great propriety in using the words "without a license" in the portion of the act which pointed to the sale as unlawful and criminal whether inside or outside of the towns, the illegality being the fact of no license and not the place where the sale took place. So that construing the whole act together, not with reference to the offence denounced, for that is plain enough, i. e., "selling without license," but the territory within which it was to be of force, we must conclude that it was to have general application.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 304

DULANY & CO. v. ELFORD & DARGAN.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇦884; Costs ⇦114.]

Four days' notice should be given of a motion requiring security for costs, but where granted without notice and complied with, no delay being occasioned, there is no ground for a new trial. Doubted, whether an order requiring security for costs is appealable, unless it results in a termination of the action by nonsuit.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Johnson v. Cobb, 29 S. C. 378, 7 S. E. 601; Avery & Son v. Wilson, 47 S. C. 97, 25 S. E. 286.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3612; Dec. Dig. ⇦884; Costs, Cent. Dig. § 470; Dec. Dig. ⇦114.]

[2. Trial ⇦139.]

There being some evidence tending to show that defendant was a member of a debtor partnership, the Circuit judge erred in granting a nonsuit as to such defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 338; Dec. Dig. ⟸139.]

[3. Partnership ⟸218.]

What constitutes a partnership is a question of law, and should be charged by the judge to the jury, leaving it for the jury to say whether there is sufficient evidence to establish the facts so charged by the judge to be necessary to the existence of a partnership.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 427; Dec. Dig. ⟸218.]

[4. Partnership ⟸219.]

Where all of the partners are served, there is no law which authorizes *a verdict to be rendered against the effects of a firm. In such case, section 157 of the code does not apply.

*305

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Pope Mfg. Co. v. Charleston Cycle Co., 55 S. C. 529, 534, 33 S. E. 787.

For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 429–440, 442–445; Dec. Dig. ⟸219.]

[5. Appeal and Error ⟸172.]

A question not presented to the Circuit judge, nor decided by him, cannot properly be brought before this court for consideration.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Dargan v. West, 27 S. C. 157, 3 S. E. 68; State v. Turner, 36 S. C. 541, 15 S. E. 602.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1070; Dec. Dig. ⟸172.]

[6. Partnership ⟸216.]

In ordinary action against a partnership, the question of the liability of one of the defendants for an amount of money withdrawn from the firm, not being raised by the pleadings, cannot be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 409, 412, 416–418; Dec. Dig. ⟸216.]

[This case is also cited in Pope Mfg. Co. v. Charleston Cycle Co., 55 S. C. 537, 33 S. E. 787, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Fraser, J., Greenville, July, 1884.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Perry & Heyward, for appellants.

Security for costs cannot be demanded except upon due notice served before the commencement of the term. 1 McCord, 552; 13 S. C., 44.

The evidence was sufficient to make Mrs. Elford liable, and it was not a case for nonsuit. 19 S. C., 23, 32; 21 Id., 93; 18 Id., 537; 3 Kent, *27, *37, and *57, and citations; 16 Johns., *40; 4 B. & Ald., 663; 2 H. Bl., 247; 4 Rich., 314; 1 Bail., 146; Doug., 371; Gen. Stat. (1872), 318; Gen. Stat. (1882), §§ 1288, 1289; 1 Myl. & K., 582; Coll. Part., §§ 6, 125, and citations.

Plaintiffs have a right to judgment against the "effects of the firm of Elford & Dargan." Code, § 157.

Mr. J. L. Orr, contra.

March 5, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiffs brought this action on two notes, bearing date April 12, 1883, signed "Elford & Dargan," and in the complaint it is alleged that the defendants were copartners under that name and style. Dargan made default, but the other defendant, Mrs. Caroline Elford, put in an answer denying that she had ever been a member of the firm of Elford & Dargan, which firm, she alleged, was dissolved in October, 1875, by the death of G. E. Elford, who, it seems, was her husband.

When the case was first reached, on sounding the calendar, *the attorney of Mrs. Elford moved that the plaintiffs, being non-residents, be required to put in security for costs, which motion was objected to by plaintiffs' attorney upon the ground that no notice had been given of such a motion, and that it came too late. On the same day, being July 14, written notice was served that, on the call of the case for trial, an order requiring security for costs would be moved for. The Circuit judge ruled that a plaintiff, being a non-resident, might be required to furnish security for costs at any time, and on the same day (July 14) passed an order requiring the plaintiffs to put in security for costs, on or before the first day of September next, or be nonsuited. The required security was furnished on July 15, and the case was tried in regular order on July 17.

*306

Dargan testified that the notes in suit were signed by him, in the firm name of Elford & Dargan; that G. E. Elford, who, with himself, originally constituted the firm of Elford & Dargan, died in October, 1875, at which time said firm was indebted to the amount of one thousand dollars; that the concern was never closed up, and was never free from debt; that he heard Mrs. Elford say she was willing for her interest to remain in the firm; that he paid Mrs. Elford out of the firm, in money and other articles, from $165 to $175 a year, and that on June 30, 1883, one McPherson bought the interest of Mrs. Elford for $2,000, out of which the witness applied $500 to the payment of the debts due by Elford & Dargan, and paid over the balance to Mrs. Elford, taking her receipt in these words: "Greenville, S. C., June 30th, 1883. Received of W. J. Dargan fifteen hundred dollars, consideration in full for my interest in the firm of Elford & Dargan. Witness my hand and seal this the 30th day of June, 1883. C. Elford. [Seal.] Witness: B. Bostick." On his cross-examination, this witness testified that the accounts for which the notes sued on were given were contracted after the death of G. E. Elford; that the interest of G. E. Elford in the stock of goods at his death was $2,287, his share being three-fifths and that of the witness being two-fifths; could not say what his interest was worth. It also appeared that G. E. Elford left a will, of which C. G. Wells, Esq., was the executor, and that, as the event has proved. Mrs. Elford was his sole legatee.

*307

*On the close of the testimony for the plaintiffs, the Circuit judge granted an order, on the motion of defendants' attorney, for a non-suit as to the defendant, Caroline Elford, upon the ground "that it has not been shown that the defendant, Caroline Elford, was ever a member of the firm of Elford & Dargan, either at the date of the notes sued on or at any other time." The plaintiff's attorney then moved to take a verdict against Dargan "and the effects of the firm of Elford & Dargan," which motion was refused, the Circuit judge holding that as there was no answer put in by Dargan, it was not clear that the plaintiffs were entitled to take any verdict at all, but a judgment by default would be the proper course, and that the jury could not render a verdict against the "effects" of any one whether a party or not; the plaintiffs, however, were allowed to take a verdict against "W. James Dargan, doing business under the name of Elford & Dargan."

The plaintiffs appeal upon the following grounds: "1. That his honor erred in ruling that plaintiffs could be required, upon the call of the case upon the calendar to furnish security for costs, although no previous notice of a motion for such security had been served by the defendants. II. That the evidence was amply sufficient to make Mrs. Elford liable upon the notes proven, and his honor erred in refusing to allow it to go to the jury. III. That his honor erred in refusing to allow judgment to be entered against the effects of the firm of Elford & Dargan. IV. That it is submitted that in any event the amount paid to Mrs. Elford by the defendant Dargan, being part of the assets of Elford & Dargan, is liable for the debts of Elford & Dargan."

The point of the first ground of appeal seems to be the failure to give due notice of the motion. Section 413 of the code seems to require at least four days notice of such a motion, except in the case mentioned in section 403, but as the plaintiffs were not prejudiced by the granting of the order, inasmuch as no delay was occasioned thereby, we do not think this would furnish a sufficient ground for a new trial. Indeed, under the case of McMillan v. McCall, 2 S. C., 390, it may be doubted whether an order requiring security for costs is reviewable on appeal, unless it results in a termination of the action by a non-suit. *Although rule X. of the circuit court, providing for security for costs, does not require notice, yet we think that no such order should be granted without notice.

*308

The second ground raises the question as to the propriety of the order of non-suit. The rule is well settled by recent decisions of this court, referred to in the argument, that a non-suit can only be granted where there is an entire absence of any evidence tending to establish the plaintiff's case, or some material part thereof. In this case the sole issue was whether the defendant, Mrs. Elford, was a partner in the firm of Elford & Dargan, and the only question for us to determine is not whether the evidence offered was sufficient to establish the affirmative of that issue, but whether there was any evidence tending that way. If there was, then there was error in granting the non-suit; but if there was no such evidence, then the order of non-suit was properly granted.

We cannot say that there was an entire absence of any such evidence. There was testimony to the effect that Mrs. Elford had said that she was willing for her interest to remain in the firm; that she received yearly from Dargan payments out of the firm, and in the receipt set out above she acknowledges the receipt of the sum of money there mentioned "in full for my interest in the firm of Elford & Dargan." These circumstances certainly did tend to show that she being the sole legatee of her deceased husband, and as such entitled to his interest in that firm, had agreed to continue the same arrangement which had previously existed between Dargan and her deceased husband. Whether this evidence was sufficient to establish that fact, it is not for us, or for the Circuit judge, to determine, but was a question solely for the jury, and we think should have been submitted to them.

It is true that the question as to what constitutes a partnership is a question, not of fact, but of law, and therefore where an issue of that kind is raised, it is the duty of the judge to explain to the jury what will constitute a partnership, and then leave it to the jury to say whether the testimony adduced is sufficient to establish the facts necessary to the existence of a partnership. The case of Pleasants v. Fant, 22 Wall., 116 [22 L. Ed.

*309

780], is not applicable, for *that case proceeds upon the idea that the judge has the authority to determine the sufficiency of the evidence, whereas, in this state, that is a question for the jury, as has often been held.

As to the third ground of appeal, we agree with the Circuit judge that we know of no law which would authorize the rendering of such a verdict or judgment. Section 157 of the code, by its express terms, applies only to those cases in which only one of two partners has been served with the summons, and affords no authority for the position of appellants.

The fourth ground of appeal raises a question not presented to, or decided by, the Circuit judge, and is therefore not properly before us. We may say, however, that we do not see how such a question could be raised under the pleadings in this case, and we do not understand that there was any application to amend the pleadings so as to bring up such a question.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of non-suit granted by the Circuit Court, as to the defendant, Mrs. Caroline Elford, be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial as to her

---

22 S. C. 309

HOSFORD v. WYNN.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Execution ⟸265.]

Land assigned to a widow as homestead and dower out of her husband's estate was levied and sold by the sheriff for the payment of her individual debt antedating the constitution of 1868. Held, that the purchaser took so much of said land as was assigned for dower, and also the fee in so much of the remainder as descended to the widow, burdened, however, with the homestead exemption so assigned.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Bradford v. Buchanan, 39 S. C. 245, 17 S. E. 501.

For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 759; Dec. Dig. ⟸265.]

[2. Homestead ⟸90.]

A claim of homestead by a widow as against her husband's debts and out of his estate, cannot be defeated by any debt due by her individually.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 135; Dec. Dig. ⟸90.]

[3. Homestead ⟸141.]

Under a sheriff's deed to land all the leviable interest of the judgment debtor passes, and the debtor cannot dispute such a deed; but a right of homestead, even after assignment, is a mere right to occupy, and is not subject to levy and sale.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ross v. Bradford, 28 S. C. 72, 5 S. E. 84; Glover v. Glover, 45 S. C. 54, 22 S. E. 739; Ex parte Worley, 49 S. C. 54, 26 S. E. 949; Kennedy v. Kennedy, 74 S. C. 545, 54 S. E. 773.

For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 267; Dec. Dig. ⟸141.]

[4. Appeal and Error ⟸1146.]

In a case at law this court cannot modify a judgment of the court below; it can only reverse or affirm.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Salley v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 79 S. C. 389, 60 S. E. 938.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4480; Dec. Dig. ⟸1146.]

[This case is also cited in Jeffries v. Allen, 29 S. C. 508, 7 S. E. 828, without specific application, and in Glover v. Glover, 45 S. C. 55, 22 S. E. 739, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Aldrich, J., Richland, November, 1883.

*310

*Action by Andrew J. Hosford against Martha C. Wynn for the recovery of real property, commenced in March, 1883. The opinion states the case.

[For subsequent opinion, see 26 S. C. 130, 1 S. E. 497].

Mr. John Bauskett, for appellant.

Messrs. Bachman & Youmans, contra.

March 9, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. It is stated in the case herein that in November, 1872, the defendant, appellant, Martha C. Wynn, had the land in dispute assigned to her as her homestead and dower out of her deceased husband's property, and that she has been in possession thereof ever since. At the time of this assignment there was a judgment against her, obtained May 11, 1871, on a note given by her, Mary Wynn, and Margaret Wynn, dated November 20, 1867. The husband of the defendant Martha had died anterior to the date of this note. The land was sold under the above judgment some time in 1882, and was bought by the plaintiff, the titles from the sheriff to the plaintiff being executed June 5, 1882.

Under these circumstances the action below was brought for the recovery of the land. The plaintiff relied upon the sheriff's deeds, the execution of which was admitted. The defendant claimed that she was in possession of the lands as a homestead, which had been duly set apart and assigned to her out of the estate of her deceased husband under the law which allowed homestead to the widow and children of a deceased debtor, and that the sale of the sheriff under a debt of hers, though antedating the constitution, could not disturb her. His honor, the Circuit judge, held otherwise, and ruled that inasmuch as the debt under which the sale was made was executed in 1867, prior to the constitution, a homestead could not be claimed against it. Under this charge the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff. The appeal questions the correctness of the judge's ruling.

It is well established that a debtor cannot claim a homestead out of his own property against his own debts antedating the constitution (Gunn v. Barry), and if such were the facts here, *there would be no difficulty; but those are not the facts of this case. The defendant is not claiming the homestead out of her own estate as against her own debts, but she claims as the widow of her husband, deceased, out of his estate and assigned to her as against his debts. It may be remarked here that her right to this homestead has not been questioned, although her husband died before the adoption of the constitution. For the purposes of this case, therefore, we must assume that she is legally in possession as homesteadee, with all the rights that appertain to such possession. Now the question is, can a homestead thus assigned to her out of her husband's lands, as against his debts, stand as against her own, which antedate the constitution, or can a judgment obtained against her on such a debt sell the property and divest her of the homestead, as was held in substance by the Circuit judge? It must be remembered that neither of these questions is decided by Gunn v. Barry (15 Wall., 610 [21 L. Ed. 212]) and the other cases following that, because those cases have determined nothing more than that a debtor cannot claim a homestead out of his property as against his debts contracted before the homestead exemption was provided for. Nor does the fact that a creditor obtaining a judgment on such a debt can sell the property of his debtor in defiance of the claim of homestead decide them either, because in that case there is no homestead, nor can there be.

*311

Here, however, the homestead has been allowed, and as we assume legally assigned, and the note of the defendant antedating the constitution as it does, could not have prevented the assignment had it been presented to the court which ordered it. Because she was not claiming the homestead as a debtor entitled thereto as against her own debts, but she was claiming it because of the indebtedness of her husband and as against his debts; she was claiming it in fact as his homestead, which had descended to her under the act by his death. An old debt of his would have defeated the claim and the assignment, but no such debt of hers could have done so had it been presented. If this be sound reasoning, and it must be so, the Circuit judge was in error in charging that defendant could not claim the homestead in question against the debt in question, because, if that debt could not have prevented the original assignment of the homestead to her, *there can be no reason in the fact that it has since been reduced to judgment, that it should now defeat and divest the homestead after it has been assigned.

*312

The next question is, can the judgment be sustained on the ground that the homestead (which as we have seen was legally assigned to the defendant) was sold by the sheriff and conveyed to the plaintiff under the sheriff's deeds, and is she estopped from denying this? It is true that the deed of the sheriff made in conformity with a sale under execution is the deed of the execution debtor (McKnight v. Gordon [13 Rich. Eq. 222, 94 Am. Dec. 164]), and every thing or interest of said debtor that can be and has been sold in such sale passes under the deed, and the debtor cannot afterwards either deny or oppose said deed; but was the defendant's homestead sold? The execution under which the sale was made is not before us, nor are the deeds of the sheriff, and we do not know their precise terms; we suppose, however, that whatever interest the defendant had in the lands was levied and sold, and that the deed conveyed all her right, interest, and title therein. Nothing, however, could be sold and conveyed that was not leviable, because the levy must precede the sale.

Now the defendant had no right, interest, or title in these lands by virtue of her homestead; she had nothing more than the right to occupy, a mere usufruct. The title to the lands was in the heirs at law of her husband, and though she had the right to use so much thereof as her homestead covered for life, if she chose so to do, yet as we have decided in such cases this did not constitute an estate in her either for life, for years, or of any other kind. The homestead does not change titles or create new estates, it simply takes property as it finds it, and, carving out a portion, exempts it for the time being from levy and sale, and marking it "homestead" puts the debtor or his widow and children, as the case may be, in possession with the right to hold against all comers. It is a mere protected possession and therefore was not such an interest as could pass to the plaintiff by virtue of the sheriff's deed. Was it such an interest as could have been levied upon by the sheriff, even supposing that he did attempt so to levy upon it here? We think not for the reasons already given, i. e., because it is nothing but a possession, an *usufruct. It certainly could not be sold by the sheriff, because in the very act of selling it would be destroyed, it would turn to ashes. The only reason that it is a homestead is because the debtor or his widow and children are in possession as such. The moment they abandon it, either voluntarily or by a forced sale, if such sale was possible, it vanishes. We conclude it was not leviable and therefore the defendant was not divested by the sheriff's deeds, as he could neither sell nor convey anything except such as he could levy.

*313

The defendant cannot deny, however, to the plaintiff whatever interest she may have had in these lands at the time of the sale. It is said in the "case" that they were assigned to her as dower and homestead. How much was dower and how much was covered by homestead, is not stated, but whatever portion is embraced in the dower has passed to the plaintiff, and as to that portion he is entitled to both title and possession. The deed of the sheriff has also conveyed to him the fee in the entire lands quoad hoc the defendant; this fee, however, is burdened with the possession of the defendant of so much of the land as has been set apart as the homestead. The jury did not determine how much nor what particular portion had been assigned as dower, nor what has been assigned as homestead. Under the charge they simply found for the plaintiff. If they had gone further and found that plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the dower portion, then a proper judgment could have been entered entitling him to such possession, leaving the remainder subject to the homestead, which would have settled the case in accordance with the rights of the parties, as we understand it.

If it was in our power, we would modify the judgment as suggested so as to save the expense and trouble of another trial, but this is a law case and in such case we have no power to modify; we can only affirm or reverse and remand for a new trial, if necessary.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

---

22 S. C. *314

*McMAHAN v. DAWKINS.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Action ⟸46.]

A legal and an equitable cause of action may be embraced in one complaint, but must be separately tried, each according to its distinctive mode.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Du Pont v. Du Bos, 33 S. C. 396, 397, 11 S. E. 1073; Heyward v. Farmers' Min. Co., 42 S. C. 145, 19 S. E. 963, 20 S. E. 64, 28 L. R. A. 42, 46 Am. St. Rep. 702; Sires v. Sires, 43 S. C. 275, 21 S. E. 115; Bank of Charleston v. Dowling, 45 S. C. 683, 23 S. E. 982.

For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. §§ 449, 451–468; Dec. Dig. ⟸46.]

[2. Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸241.]

In action by a judgment creditor in the Court of Equity to set aside a voluntary deed of his debtor, the action must fail unless the plaintiff show that he had exhausted his legal remedies, the highest and best evidence of which is a return of nulla bona on the execution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 720; Dec. Dig. ⟸241.]

[3. Cancellation of Instruments ⟸20.]

But a purchaser at sheriff's sale of the judgment debtor's interest in a tract of land which this debtor had previously conveyed away, may bring action in the law courts for a recovery of the land, and there attack the defendant's deed for fraud, without proof that the judgment creditor had exhausted all other remedies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Cancellation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 28, 31; Dec. Dig. ⟸20.]

[4. Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸31.]

Where an administrator, holding the senior judgment against one of the distributees, purchased the debtor's land at sheriff's sale, and, by direction of all the distributees, receipted for the proceeds and ordered deed made to this debtor in trust for his wife and children, the deed so made is not a fraud upon his (the debtor's) other creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 80; Dec. Dig. ⟸31.]

[5. Appeal and Error ⟸1008.]

Findings of fact by the judge in a law case tried by him without a jury are not reviewable on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3955–3960, 3962–3969; Dec. Dig. ⟸1008.]

Before Fraser, J., Fairfield, September, 1883.

The opinion sufficiently states the case.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

This case was heard by me at the term of Court of Common Pleas for Fairfield County in September, 1883. The case was heard on the pleadings, and testimony taken in open court. * * * This action has been brought to set aside the trust deed to William J. Dawkins for fraud and for the possession of the land.

The note on which the confession of judgment in favor of J. T. Dawkins as administrator was founded was given for purchases at the sale of the personal estate of John Dawkins. The delay in obtaining a judgment on this note and in enforcing the collection of it is not at all unnatural in the condition of the country and the circumstances of this family, William J. Dawkins being the youngest brother. The evidence does not show any unfairness in the sale by the sheriff at which the land was bid off by *J. T. Dawkins, who for several years after the sale, but before the deed by the sheriff, received the rents to the exclusion of William J. Dawkins, and there is no evidence that the children of William J. Dawkins, who are the real beneficiaries under this deed, had any knowledge of these transactions.

*315

I have not discovered in the evidence any actual intent to defraud creditors. The money was bona fide due to the estate of John Dawkins. The administrator proceeded in what seems to me a legitimate way to secure a first lien on the property of William J. Dawkins. When the property fell under their control by the sheriff's sale, the other distributees did what they had a right to do in having it conveyed to the children of William J. Dawkins. They were under no obligation to devote it to his creditors.

It is insisted, however, that even if there was no fraudulent intent, the fact that William J. Dawkins, the judgment debtor, had an interest in the judgment as one of the distributees of John Dawkins to the extent of one-eighth, and that to this extent his own money was a part of the consideration of the deed, and that by this the whole transaction is tainted with fraud and illegal. It will be remembered that the amount credited on this judgment and execution was only $178.40, while the amount remaining due and unpaid was over $900. No part of this $178.40 was payable to him until the full amount of the shares of the others was paid. If it is claimed that J. T. Dawkins held this title for the benefit of William J. Dawkins and other children of John Dawkins, there is nothing before me to show that the land at any time before the trust deed was made was worth any more than the amount bid for it at the sheriff's sale—$205. It is, therefore, mere conjecture that William J. Dawkins paid any portion of this bid, either directly or indirectly.

There are two classes of conveyances considered as fraudulent against creditors: 1st. Those in which there is an intent to defraud. 2d. Those in which there is a want of valuable consideration in whole or in part. The same principles govern, whether the conveyance is made by the debtor or by the sheriff, who sells as his agent. The very strongest case which can be made by the plaintiff in this action, and it is the one most strenuously insisted *on, is that this conveyance by the sheriff is void, because it is in part, at least, voluntary and without valuable consideration.

*316

Instead of having a return of nulla bona to the execution, and then coming into this court, now a court of equity as common pleas, to have the deed set aside for fraud, the plaintiff in this case has been advised to pursue a different course—to have the land sold by the sheriff first and then come into court on this title, demanding that the other deed be set aside for fraud without any return of nulla bona, and that possession of the land should be adjudged to her. If this can be done, then the ministerial officer of this court can proceed to make a good title to land by a sale under the execution, when it is not competent for this court to order a sale until, by a return of nulla bona, it is legally ascertained that it requires the property embraced in the deed to respond to the demands of the creditors, until which time the rights of the grantee are unassailable. Suber v. Chandler, 18 S. C. 529.

There are cases in which parties have recovered judgments in the law courts for lands without it, which they claimed under deeds from the sheriff, in which the defendants failed to sustain a previous deed because it was tainted with fraud. In Jones v. Crawford (1 McMull., 373), the deed was held to be void for actual or active fraud and not bona fide. In Richardson v. Rhodus (14 Rich., 95), the deed was held fraudulent and void because voluntary and without consideration. It is still the common practice to proceed in cases of personal property in all respects as if the fraudulent conveyance had never been made.

The principles laid down in Suber v. Chandler, however, at least in case of voluntary deeds, cannot, in my view, be reconciled with the course pursued by the plaintiff in this case. If this deed should be held to be void because it was voluntary in consequence of William J. Dawkins' interest in the judgment against himself, if the return of nulla bona is necessary in cases of voluntary deeds, there is no good reason why it should not be necessary in cases of deeds not bona fide. It is held in that case that it is not the maturity of the debt or the commission or discovery of the fraud which gives the right of action, but the return of nulla bona.

*317

*In the case before the court there has been no right to commence an action, and I do not see how in this case the sheriff could give her a good title without any action at all. This condition of things may have existed in consequence of the separation of the courts, and that now, as both courts are united, there should be a uniform rule that in all cases of fraudulent sale of land parties should come into this court before any sale and call in creditors, and ask to have the alleged fraudulent deed set aside for their benefit. It may be that the necessities for the return of nulla bona, which is always after judgment, at the option of the creditor, puts the debtor and his grantee too much in his power, and gives the creditor the entire control of the statute of limitations; but I can only follow the cases as I find them, and apply the principles laid down.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the complaint, so far as it seeks to have the deed of trust set aside, and a recovery of the possession of the land, be dismissed.

I have before me no copy of the trust deed, and am not willing to construe it so as to determine what interest William J. Dawkins took at the death of one of his children, or whether any partition can now be made. It is therefore ordered that the case be retained until parties can be heard at the next or some subsequent term of the court, as to the right of plaintiff to have a partition now, and as to how much her interest is under her deed from the sheriff, or William J. Dawkins' interest in the land, being an interest as heir of a deceased child. The parties to whom a portion of this land has been sold cannot be bound by any proceedings in this case until they are made parties. The administrator and other distributees of John Dawkins are neither necessary nor proper parties to this action. All questions of costs reserved for future order of court.

The plaintiff appealed on the following exceptions:

I. Because his honor did not find that the judgment of J. T. Dawkins, as administrator, against William J. Dawkins, was confessed by the defendant, in collusion with the plaintiff, for the purpose of hindering and delaying the creditors of said defendant, and that though the said debt has long since been paid, the said judgment has been kept open for the same purpose.

*318

*II. Because his honor did not find that the purchase by J. Thomas Dawkins at sheriff's sale in 1876 was merely colorable, and was solely for the benefit of the defendant, William J. Dawkins, and that the transfer of his bid and the causing of the deed to be made to the defendant, William J. Dawkins, in trust for his children, were for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of said William J. Dawkins.

III. Because his honor did not find that the consideration for the said transfer of said bid moved in large part from the defendant, William J. Dawkins, and the same was a fraud, as matter of law, upon the creditors of said William J. Dawkins.

IV. Because his honor concluded that even if all of said transactions, or any of them, were had with intent to hinder and delay the creditors of said William J. Dawkins, the plaintiff could not cause the said land to be levied upon and sold under her execution at law.

V. Because his honor did not decree the said deed to be vacated and annulled as fraudulent and void as to the creditors of said William J. Dawkins.

Mr. Wm. H. Lyles, for appellant.

Mr. Jno. S. Reynolds, contra.

March 9, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, appellant, recovered a judgment against the defendant, William J. Dawkins, in 1876, under which the land in dispute was sold in December, 1876. At this sale J. Thomas Dawkins became the purchaser at $205. Of this he paid $26 to the sheriff, we suppose to cover costs, and the balance, $179, he claimed should be credited on a judgment which he held against the said William J., which was allowed by the sheriff. This was a judgment by confession which Thomas J. Dawkins held as administrator of his father, John Dawkins, deceased, and based on a note which the said William J. had given in the purchase of certain property made at the sale of the estate in 1854. The confession was given 1869, and was for $854.22. On this confession was a credit of $185, and when *the balance of J. T. Dawkins' bid at the sale above referred to was allowed by the sheriff to be entered as a credit, i. e., $179, there still remained due thereon over $900.

*319

William J. Dawkins was a son of the intestate, John Dawkins, as was also J. T. Dawkins, and they, with other brothers and sisters, eight in all, including these two, were the distributees. Although the bid of J. T. Dawkins was credited on his judgment, he did not demand or obtain titles from the sheriff. He, however, took control and rented it out from year to year until January, 1880, when, by directions of the said J. T. Dawkins, the sheriff executed titles to the said William J. Dawkins in trust for his children then living, and such as should thereafter be born. This deed was made in this way by the consent and direction of the other distributees of the estate of John Dawkins, deceased, and we suppose was in satisfaction of their portion of the proceeds credited on the judgment held by J. T. Dawkins as administrator as above.

After the execution of this deed the plaintiff, in November, 1882, caused the land to be again sold under the same judgment, and with renewed execution, by which she had previously sold it. At this sale she became the purchaser at $5 and received a conveyance from the sheriff. She then commenced the action below, alleging in her complaint that the deed to W. J. Dawkins in trust for his children was intended to hinder and delay his creditors; that he was insolvent, and had been for years, and that he had no other property out of which the plaintiff could make her debt; that one of his children had died, and that he unjustly retained possession of the land against her conveyance from the sheriff, by virtue of which she was seized in fee and entitled to immediate possession. Wherefore she demanded judgment: 1st. That said pretended deed of the sheriff to said W. J. Dawkins be adjudged void; 2d. For the possession of the land; and, 3d., for such other and further relief as may seem just, with costs.

The case came to trial before his honor, Judge Fraser, who heard it upon the pleadings and evidence adduced, and finding no testimony showing a return of nulla bona on the execution of the plaintiff before she began her suit, which in his opinion was necessary under Suber v. Chandler (18 S. C., 529), he dismissed *the complaint, both so far as it sought to have the deed of trust set aside, and also the recovery of the possession of the land. He, however, retained it until the parties could be heard at the next term of the court, as to the right of the plaintiff to have a partition as to the interest of W. J. Dawkins in the land, as heir of his deceased child, on the ground, we suppose, that this interest, if any, at least passed to the plaintiff under her deed from the sheriff.

*320

The plaintiff has appealed, and she assigns error to the decree of his honor: 1st. Because he did not find the confession of judgment fraudulent, and long since paid. 2d. That he did not find the bid of J. T. Dawkins at sheriff's first sale colorable, and that its transfer, and causing the deed to be made to W. J. Dawkins in trust for his children, were to hinder, delay, and defraud his, W. J. Dawkins', creditors. 3d. Because he did not find that the consideration for said transfer of his bid and the execution of the deed were moved in large part from W. J. D., and was therefore fraudulent as matter of law upon his creditors.

The complaint contains two causes of action, the first to set aside a deed of land for fraud, and the second to recover possession of the land. The one is equitable and the other legal. This, however, is not objectionable under the reformed procedure. In fact, the union of these two actions in the same complaint has been especially recognized as proper pleading; because it not only prevents circuity of action, but affords prompt relief. But when they are thus combined they do not lose their distinctive features and characteristics, nor are the rules heretofore existing as to their trial changed or coalesced. On the contrary, what was equitable before still remains equitable, and what was legal is still legal, and the mode of trial of each is still preserved. These rules required in this case that the first cause of action should be tried by the judge, and the second by the jury, unless a jury trial was waived. We suppose the jury trial was waived, and the whole case, therefore, was properly heard by the judge.

We think the judge was right in holding as to the equity cause that the action could not be maintained in the absence of a nulla bona return on plaintiff's execution before commencing it. Suber v. Chandler, supra. It is a general rule, established and held *in many cases, that in actions by creditors in equity to vacate voluntary deeds and conveyances of their debtors, inter vivos, to entitle them to proceed, they must have first exhausted their legal remedies. That this is the only ground upon which they can come into equity, and while it is not necessary to allege in the complaint a return of nulla bona, yet that is the sufficient evidence of the fact that all legal remedies have been exhausted. It is, too, one of the probative facts which shows the necessity under which the plaintiff is to resort to the property covered by the deed which he seeks to set aside, and it is the foundation for the charge of legal fraud on account of which such deeds are frequently assailed. It must appear, therefore, in the evidence, or the action will fail. It was not proved in this case. The judge could not do otherwise then than dismiss the complaint as to the first cause of action.

*321

But the failure of the first cause of action on this ground did not necessarily demand the dismissal of the second. That was an action at law for the recovery of the land, and the opposing deed of the defendant might have been resisted for fraud on the law side without the evidence of a nulla bona return. It has been the constant practice of the law courts in this state in actions to try titles to allow deeds and other conveyances to be assailed in evidence for fraud without such return. Thomas & Ashby v. Jeter, 1 Hill, 380; Smith v. Culbertson, 9 Rich., 106. It is only required in equity courts, and it is required there because such courts can only take cognizance of such cases when the plaintiff has exhausted his legal remedies, of which fact such return is held to be the best and highest evidence. We do not know that the Circuit judge dismissed the complaint as to the second cause of action simply because there was a failure of evidence to sustain the first as to the nulla bona return. He seems to have heard the whole case, legal and equitable, the evidence for and against, all that the parties had, we suppose, was submitted and heard, and the judge may have dismissed the second cause because the charges of fraud made were not proved, and this part of the case being a case at law, though tried by the judge, the facts are beyond our reach; but if we could consider *them, we would have no hesitation in saying that there is no foundation for these charges.

*322

There is no doubt that the defendant bought the property at the estate sale, for which he gave his note. He had a right to confess the judgment. The plaintiff herself forced the sale of his land, at which J. T. Dawkins purchased it. There was nothing wrong at the sale, no chilling of the bids, no concealment, nor anything out of the way. J. T. Dawkins had the right to have his bid credited on his judgment; in fact, it was his duty to see that the land should not go to others below its market value. He had the right to pay off the distributees in land, if they were willing to receive it in whole or in part of their shares in the personal estate, and those distributees, it seems to us, did a commendable act in surrendering their interest therein by directing the land to be conveyed for the benefit of the children of their unfortunate brother. To denounce such an act of benevolent charity as this fraudulent, and allow a party who purchased the land at $5 to recover it, would be shocking. There is no evidence that any portion of W. J. Dawkins' share in the personal estate went into this land. For aught that appears the administrator still owes him his share therein, and he still owes the administrator over $900 on the judgment. In the face of all this we cannot say that the Circuit judge erred in not holding as matter of law that the transaction was fraudulent, as assigned in exception 3.

The other two exceptions complain that the Circuit judge did not find certain matters of fact. As we have already said, the findings of facts were for him. It may be that on the death of W. J. Dawkins' child he became entitled to an interest in the land as one of the heirs of that child; if so, in all probability the plaintiff's deed would convey that interest; if so, it is her right to recover it, and the decree of the judge provides for this.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

A petition for rehearing was filed March 19, but the same was dismissed by an order passed Per Curiam May 4, 1885.

22 S. C. *323

*MOSELEY v. MILLEDGE HANKINSON. SAME v. EDGAR HANKINSON.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Remainders ⟸4.]

Where property was conveyed in trust for the separate use of a married woman during life, then to be conveyed and delivered to her issue living at the time of her death, the remainder is contingent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Remainders, Cent. Dig. § 2; Dec. Dig. ⟸4.]

[2. Judgment ⟸681.]

Where a tract of land so held was sold by order of the court on the ex parte application of the trustee and the life tenant, none of the issue then in esse and within the reach of the court being made parties, held, that there being no representative of the contingent remaindermen before the court, there was no transfer of the interest in this land, either of the issue in esse at the time of the order or of those subsequently born.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Farr v. Gilreath, 23 S. C. 503; Covar v. Cantelou, 25 S. C. 35, 39, 40; Powers v. Bullwinkle, 33 S. C. 299, 11 S. E. 971; Mole v. Folk, 45 S. C. 268, 22 S. E. 882; Rutledge v. Fishburne, 66 S. C. 160, 44 S. E. 564, 97 Am. St. Rep. 757; Faber v. Faber, 76 S. C. 161, 56 S. E. 677; Bernard v. Bernard, 79 S. C. 367, 60 S. E. 700, 128 Am. St. Rep. 852; Walker v. Des Portes, 92 S. C. 525, 75 S. E. 960.

For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1202; Dec. Dig. ⟸681.]

[3. Trusts ⟸203.]

In the proceeding in court for the sale of this land, the trustee was not a representative of the interests of the contingent remaindermen.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 273–276; Dec. Dig. ⟸203.]

4. Thomas v. Poole, 19 S. C., 323; Ex parte Tunno, Bail. Eq., 395; Ex parte Calmes, 1 Hill Eq., 112, and Ex parte Copeland, Rice Eq., 69, explained and reconciled herewith.

[This case is also cited in Fuller v. Missroon, 35 S. C. 330, 14 S. E. 714, without specific application, in Farr v. Gilbreath, 23 S. C. 514, 515, approved, but distinguished, and in Moore v. Scott, 66 S. C. 283, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 299, 44 S. E. 737, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Wallace, J., Richland, September, 1883.

The opinion of this court fully states the nature of the action and all the facts of the case. The judge charged the jury as follows:

Under the case of Faber v. Police, 10 S. C., 376, I charge you that the plaintiffs had not a vested interest in the land in dispute, but that they were contingent remaindermen. Under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of many of the states, they would be held to be vested remaindermen, but not so in this state. The naked question now is, are the plaintiffs, who were not made parties in the proceedings under which the land was sold, bound by those proceedings? They were contingent remaindermen, and in the case of Thomas v. Poole (19 S. C., 323), a late decision of the Supreme Court of this state, it has been decided that contingent remaindermen are not necessary parties to a proceeding instituted for the sale of land. Under the case of Thomas v. Poole, I charge you that plaintiffs were not necessary parties to the proceedings in question, though some of them were then living; that

*324

Milledge Han*kinson and D. J. Walker, trustees, took a fee simple title, and that these plaintiffs cannot now question his title; and that hence your verdict must be for the defendants in both cases.

The jury found a verdict for the defendants, as instructed by the judge, in both cases, and the plaintiffs appealed upon the following exceptions:

I. Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in charging the jury that the words in the deed of James Moseley and wife to Wm. Fortune, trustee, created contingent remainders in the issue or lineal descendants of Rebecca Moseley, and not vested remainders.

II. Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in charging the jury that the plaintiffs, as well those who were then in esse as those who were afterwards born, were barred by the proceedings in the case of Ex parte James Moseley and wife and Wm. Fortune, and the deed given thereunder to Milledge Hankinson, trustee; whereas it is submitted that they were not parties thereto, and are not bound thereby.

III. Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in directing a verdict for the defendants.

IV. Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in not charging as requested by the plaintiffs, to wit, "that as matter of law the jury must find a verdict for the plaintiffs, because they are not barred by the proceedings in the case of Ex parte James Moseley et al., and their right of action did not accrue until the death of their mother, Rebecca, in 1881, the date of her death as admitted."

[For subsequent opinion, see 25 S. C. 519.]

Messrs. Henderson Bros., for appellants.

Messrs. Croft & Dunlap and H. M. Thompson, contra.

March 16, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. These two cases, depending upon the same principles, were heard and will be considered together. The questions involved in this appeal arise out of the following state of facts:

Rebecca Moseley, the wife of James Mose-ley, and the mother *of the plaintiffs, being entitled, as one of the heirs at law of her father, to a share of his estate, the land which is the subject-matter of controversy in these cases was, with certain personal property, set apart as her share, under proper proceedings for the partition of her father's estate. But she being a married woman at the time, the court ordered that the share so allotted to her be settled on her "for her sole and separate use for life, and on her death, on her issue then living, in equal shares, as in cases of intestacy, and that the said parties execute deeds, to be approved by the commissioner of this court, to proper persons as trustees, for the purpose of effecting the said settlement thereby ordered." In pursuance of this order, a deed was duly executed to Wm. Fortune, on April 3, 1844, conveying to him the said land in trust "for the sole, separate, and exclusive and special use, benefit, and behoof of her, the said Rebecca Moseley, wife of the said James Moseley, for and during the term of her natural life, * * * and upon the death of the said Rebecca Moseley, that he, the said William Fortune, his heirs, executors, or administrators will convey, transfer, assign, and deliver over all and singular the said estate and property, both real and personal, that shall then [be] remaining, unto the issue or lineal descendants of her, the said Rebecca Moseley, which she shall or may have living at the time of her death, in such shares and portions as they, the said issue or lineal descendants, would be entitled to by the laws of this state, now of force, regulating and controlling the distribution of estates of intestates." This deed was approved by the commissioner in equity and duly recorded.

*325

In February, 1845, an ex parte petition was filed in the Court of Equity by James Moseley and wife and Wm. Fortune, as trustee, praying that the trustee might be authorized to sell said land and invest the proceeds in the purchase of slaves, alleging that the land was unproductive, and being woodland yielded no support to the petitioner, Rebecca. This petition was referred to the commissioner to inquire and report upon the facts stated therein, "and also upon the expediency and probable benefit to the said Rebecca Moseley and children to change the property by selling the land and investing the proceeds in negro property." The commissioner having made his report, saying that the evi*dence submitted to him showed that the change of investment proposed would be for the interest of Mrs. Moseley and her children, and recommending that the prayer of the petition be granted, an order was passed on February 12, 1845, confirming the report, and authorizing the trustee, Wm. Fortune, to sell the land and reinvest the proceeds in slaves, to be held by him upon the same trusts as are declared in the deed above mentioned.

*326

The trustee having failed to make this change of investment as authorized, a rule was taken out against him on February 16, 1850, at the instance of James Moseley, requiring him to show cause why he should not be attached for a contempt in not obeying the order of February 12, 1845. In his return to this rule, which is sworn to on February 23, 1850, Wm. Fortune, amongst other things, stated that soon after the passage of said order, he was earnestly requested by Mrs. Moseley not to sell the land and buy slaves, as she was apprehensive that if this was done her husband would run the slaves and sell them, whereas he could not run the land; and disavowing any intention to treat the order of the court with contempt, averred his willingness to comply with the same by forthwith selling the land and in all other respects complying with the terms of said order of February 12, 1845.

On hearing this return, an order was granted, on May 22, 1850, that the rule "be discharged upon the following conditions, to wit: That the said Wm. Fortune do by the first of August next enter into bond and security, to be taken and approved by the commissioner, in the penalty of double the value of said land, conditional for the faithful performance of the trusts described by the order of Chancellor Harper, dated February 12, 1845, that is to say, if he has not hitherto given bond upon being appointed trustee." Whether this trustee ever gave such bond does not appear in the record. On April 15, 1851, the trustee, Wm. Fortune, in pursuance of the order of February 12, 1845, executed a deed for the land in controversy to the defendant, Milledge Hankinson, and Darling J. Walker, as trustees of Mrs. Sarah L. Hankinson, under which the defendants claim. The consideration mentioned in this deed was eleven hundred dollars, which, according to the evidence, was paid to the said *Wm. Fortune, but the same does not seem to have been invested in slaves, as required by the order of February 12, 1845.

*327

Wm. Fortune died some time in 1853, and upon the petition of James Moseley and Rebecca, his wife, one John E. Plunkett was appointed trustee in his stead, and having duly executed his bond to the commissioner in equity, seems to have received the amount of the trust funds in the hands of the former trustee, Wm. Fortune, as would appear by his returns. In 1856 the said Plunkett having failed to make his annual returns, and having left the state, he was removed from office, and N. G. W. Walker was appointed trustee in his place, who likewise gave bond as such. Walker made several returns as trustee, in which he does not charge himself with anything received from his predecessor, and he having died in 1875, no further action appears to have been taken until after the death of Mrs. Rebecca Moseley, which event took place in the fall of 1881, when the present plaintiffs, on April 11, 1882, by proceedings in the Court of Common Pleas procured the appointment of W. J. Moseley as trustee in the place of Wm. Fortune, under the original deed of trust hereinabove mentioned, ignoring the intermediate substitutions mentioned above; and on June 12, 1882, the said W. J. Moseley, as trustee, conveyed the land in question to the plaintiffs, who were then the surviving children of Mrs. Rebecca Moseley, and soon thereafter these actions were commenced to recover possession of the said land.

The Circuit judge instructed the jury that under the original trust deed of April 3, 1844, executed under the order of the court requiring the share of Mrs. Rebecca Moseley in her father's estate to be settled to her sole and separate use for life, with remainder to such of her issue as might then be living, the children of Mrs. Moseley were entitled to contingent and not vested remainders, and that, therefore, they were not necessary parties to the proceedings under which the trustee, William Fortune, sold the land, and that consequently the defendants have valid title to the land in controversy which these plaintiffs cannot question. From the judgments rendered in accordance with such instructions the plaintiffs appeal, and by their appeal raise two questions: 1st. As to the nature of the estate which the children *took under the original trust deed. 2d. Conceding that they were contingent remaindermen, whether their rights, which have now become vested, are concluded by the order of sale in proceedings to which they were not parties.

*328

Upon the first point raised by the appeal, we agree with the Circuit judge that the remainders were contingent and not vested under the authority of the case of Faber v. Police, 10 S. C., 376, cited by him, which has been recognized and affirmed by the very recent case of LeRoy v. City Council of Charleston, 20 S. C., 71.

The second question, however, presents much more difficulty. It appears from the evidence that at the time the petition was filed by James Moseley and wife and the trustee, William Fortune, for the sale of the land, and the reinvestment of the proceeds in slaves, Mrs. Moseley had five children living with her, and within the jurisdiction of the court, all but one of whom (Silvania, who predeceased her mother, leaving no issue) were originally plaintiffs in these actions, though one of them, Mrs. Price, has died since these actions were commenced, and her heirs have been substituted in her place. It also appears that before the deed under which defendants claim was executed, two more children were born to Mrs. Rebecca Moseley, Mary Ann and Sarah, and that the other two plaintiffs, Septima and Susan, were born after the execution of said deed. It seems, then, that at the time the petition for the sale of the land was filed, some of the contingent remaindermen, whose rights have subsequently become vested, were in esse, and could have been made parties, and the real question is whether they were necessary parties. Could their rights be divested unless they were made parties?

The general rule in equity undoubtedly is that all persons who are materially interested in the subject of the suit must be made parties, but it is equally true that this rule is subject to some exceptions; and the practical inquiry is, does this case fall within any of the exceptions? Without undertaking anything like a review of the cases, we think the authorities show that the contingent remaindermen who were in esse, and within the jurisdiction of the court, were necessary parties. In Mitford's Equity Pleadings, *174, it is said: "Contingent limitations and executory *devises to persons not in being may in like manner be bound by a decree against a person claiming a vested estate of inheritance; but a person in being claiming under a limitation by way of executory devise, not subject to any preceding vested estate of inheritance by which it may be defeated, must be made a party to a bill affecting his rights." See, also, Story Eq. Pl., §§ 144–147, and 1 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Prac., 314; Hopkins v. Hopkins, 1 Atk., 590; Giffard v. Hort, 1 Sch. & Lef., 386; Lloyd v. Johnes, 9 Ves., 37; Sherrit v. Brich, 3 Bro. C. C., 229. These authorities establish the doctrine that while as a general rule the contingent remaindermen are necessary parties, yet where they are not in esse at the time, and there is before the court a person entitled to a prior vested estate of inheritance, and perhaps, if there is no prior vested estate of inheritance, then if the person entitled to the prior life estate and the trustees are parties, the court may make a decree that will conclude the rights of such contingent remaindermen; but they do not warrant the idea that contingent remaindermen who are in esse and can be made parties, can be safely dispensed with.

*329

The subject seems to have been first considered in this state in the case of Van Lew v. Parr, 2 Rich. Eq., 321. The question there, was whether a decree for the sale of real estate would bar the rights of contingent remaindermen who were not in esse, and who were not, and, of course, could not be made parties to the proceedings under which the land was sold. But the court hesitated even to decide that question, not deeming it essential to the case then before the court. Subsequently, however, the same question was again presented to the court in the case of Bofil v. Fisher, 3 Rich. Eq., 1 [55 Am. Dec. 627], and there the court did decide that the court had power by its decree for the sale of real estate to bar the rights of contingent remaindermen not in esse, or residing abroad, whose names and places of residence are unknown, and who could not, therefore, be made parties. This, of course, implied that if such remaindermen were in esse, and could be made parties, that then they would be necessary parties. Accordingly in the recent case of Le Roy v. City Council of Charleston, 20 S. C., 71, this court held that in such a case the contingent remaindermen must be made parties in order to bar their rights.

*330

*The case of Thomas v. Poole, 19 S. C., 323, does not, as seems to be supposed, conflict with this view. In that case the object was to set aside a sale made under proceedings in the Court of Probate, and one of the grounds relied upon was, that the children of Mrs. Thomas, who were contingent remaindermen, were not parties to such proceedings. All that the court held was that such a ground was not sufficient. Their rights had not vested and might never vest. Mrs. Thomas was still alive and might survive all of her children. It is true that the court did say that they were contingent remaindermen, and therefore it was unnecessary that they should have been made parties to the proceedings in the Court of Probate, and this remark, detached from the context in which it is found, has been relied upon to show that the court there decided the general proposition that contingent remaindermen are not necessary parties to a proceeding for the sale of real estate in which they have such contingent interest. But when the remark is read with reference to the context, it is perfectly manifest that all that was meant was that so far as the case then before the court was concerned, they were not necessary parties to the proceeding in the Court of Probate in such a way as to require the court to set aside the sale made under such proceedings. And when the language of the court, following that which is relied upon, is considered, it is perfectly clear that the court did not intend to decide, and did not decide, the general proposition that contingent remaindermen were not necessary parties. For the court proceeds to say: "It may be that the action of the court now will not bind them if they should happen to survive, but of this we give no opinion; we only mean to say that until they have vested rights they are premature in asking the assistance of the court by way of protection." This shows, beyond all dispute, that the question whether their rights, when they became vested, would be concluded by a decree in a case to which they were not parties was not passed upon.

The cases of Ex parte Tunno, Bail. Eq., 395; Ex parte Calmes, 1 Hill Eq., 112; and Ex parte Copeland, Rice Eq. 69, relied upon by respondents to show that it had always been the practice of the Court of Equity in this state to entertain appli*cations for the change of investment of trust property upon the ex parte application of the trustee, are in no wise in conflict with the view which we have advanced. In no one of these cases was the question which we are called upon to determine decided or even considered; and in the only one in which the question of parties was even mentioned (Ex parte Tunno) the cestuis que trust were required to be made parties. In fact, these cases were not applications for the sale of trust property at all, but were really applications for the removal of trust funds from this state to a state in which the parties beneficially interested resided, or for leave to invest a sum of money in the hands of a trustee, arising from a residuary bequest, in the purchase of land and slaves to be held by the trustee upon the same trusts as had been declared by the testator with reference to a specific bequest of slaves for the benefit of the cestuis que trust.

*331

It seems to us, therefore, clear that this case does not fall within any of the exceptions to the general rule requiring all persons materially interested in the subject matter of the suit to be made parties, and that as far as the courts of this state have ever gone in dispensing with the presence of contingent remaindermen is, that where such remaindermen are not in esse or reside abroad, and their names and residences are not known, and they cannot therefore be made parties, their presence may be dispensed with and the court may proceed to make a decree which will bar the rights of such contingent remaindermen.

Now in this case, as we have seen, several of the contingent remaindermen whose rights have subsequently become vested were not only in esse at the time the petition for the sale of the land was filed, but were within the jurisdiction of the court and could have been made parties, and that these facts were known to the defendant, Milledge Hankinson, when he, with Darling J. Walker, became the purchasers from the trustee. It follows, therefore, that the rights of these contingent remaindermen are not barred, nor are those of the unborn contingent remaindermen; for, as it was practicable to have made some of the class parties who could have represented the interests of those who could not be made parties, and this was not done, there was no one before the court to represent the interests of the contingent remainder*men when there could have been; and as the exception to the general rule, by which it is allowable to proceed without making contingent remaindermen who are not in esse parties, seems to be based wholly upon considerations of necessity, this case does not fall within the exception, and hence the rights of none of the contingent remaindermen are barred.

*332

It may be said that the trustee who was invested with the fee in the legal estate being before the court he could represent, and did represent, the interests of all the parties, and there is some countenance for this suggestion in a dictum of Chancellor Dargan in Williman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq., at page 490–1; but we think a more correct view is taken by Chancellor Wardlaw in Moore v. Hood, 9 Rich. Eq., at page 325 [70 Am. Dec. 210], where he says: "The rule requiring beneficiaries to be parties where they are interested in the questions for adjudication is applicable although the trustees have the legal title, for trustees are not the real owners of the trust estate, and are rather agents of the beneficiaries for the execution of certain trusts, and it is among their duties to require the real owners to be brought before the court." Any other view, it seems to us, would logically lead to the conclusion that a trustee might convey without any order of the court. The very object of applying to the court is to obtain authority for disposing of the interests of others, and those really entitled to such interests must, if practicable, be made parties to any proceeding by which it is proposed to dispose of their interests.

The judgment of this court is that the judgments of the Circuit Court be reversed in both of the above entitled cases, and that the said cases be remanded to that court for a new trial.

---

22 S. C. 332

WOOLFOLK v. GRANITEVILLE MANUFACTURING CO.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Dismissal and Nonsuit ⟸51.]

Where an issue is ordered out of chancery, the judge presiding at the trial of such issue cannot grant a non-suit, but must try the case and report back the result.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Rynerson v. Allison, 30 S. C. 537, 9 S. E. 656; Strong v. Weir, 47 S. C. 322, 25 S. E. 157; McClenaghan v. McEachers, 47 S. C. 451, 25 S. E. 296; Barnes v. Rodgers, 54 S. C. 123, 31 S. E. 885; Hall v. Boatwright, 58 S. C. 550, 36 S. E. 1001, 79 Am. St. Rep. 864; Garner v. Garner, 72 S. C. 439, 52 S. E. 194; Windham v. Lafferty, 83 S. C. 447, 65 S. E. 526; Broom v. Helms, 83 S. C. 448, 65 S. E. 602.

For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. § 103; Dec. Dig. ⟸51.]

[2. Equity ⟸381.]

If error be committed on the trial of such an issue, the decree based on the verdict would be affected by this error, and subject to exception therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 813–817; Dec. Dig. ⟸381.]

*333

[3. Evidence ⟸182.]

*The rule admitting ancient deeds as evidence upon production and inspection, without further proof of execution, does not apply to copies, however old they may be.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 602; Dec. Dig. ⟸182.]

[4. Vendor and Purchaser ⟸231.]

A deed cannot properly be recorded without proof of its execution, and if recorded without proper probate, the registry does not operate as notice of its existence.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Woods v. Reeves, 23 S. C. 387; Fuller v. Missroon, 35 S. C. 332, 14 S. E. 714; Armstrong v. Austin, 45 S. C. 81, 22 S. E. 763, 29 L. R. A. 772; Watts v. Whetstone, 79 S. C. 362, 60 S. E. 703.

For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 538; Dec. Dig. ⟸231.]

[5. Acknowledgment ⟸17.]

Under the registry laws of force in 1820, a deed executed in South Carolina, and proved before a magistrate in Georgia, was not properly probated, and its record did not operate as notice.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Arthur v. Screven, 39 S. C. 84, 17 S. E. 640.

For other cases, see Acknowledgment, Cent. Dig. § 83; Dec. Dig. ⟸17.]

[6. Partition ⟸63.]

Plaintiffs, claiming a moiety of a tract of land which defendant claimed in severalty, offered to show by an alleged copy-deed, that defendant acquired only a moiety of the land under their chain of title. Held, that the evidence so offered was not collateral to the matter at issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 183–185; Dec. Dig. ⟸63.]

[This case is also cited in Marine Wharf & Storage Co. v. Parsons, 49 S. C. 136, 158, 26 S. E. 945, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Hudson, J., Aiken, September, 1884.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. J. E. Bacon, B. L. Abney, for appellants.

Messrs. Henderson Bros., Sam'l Lord, contra.

March 16, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action for partition of a tract of land now in Aiken, formerly Edgefield, County, containing one thousand acres, upon a part of which the Graniteville Factory and appurtenances now stand, and in which the plaintiffs claim that they are entitled to certain interests as tenants in common. Briefly, they allege that on March 8, 1808, one John C. Allen, the then sheriff of Edgefield, conveyed by deed the tract of land, now sought to be partitioned, to John Woolfolk and Christian F. Breithaupt; and that the said John Woolfolk, having never disposed of his moiety in the said lands, died on May 12, 1861, leaving a number of children him surviving, and that these, together with the heirs of such as predeceased their father, are now entitled by descent to certain shares in the premises, and they are the plaintiffs.

The answer of the defendant denied in the most positive terms that there was any tenancy in common, and claimed that John Woolfolk, in his lifetime and many years before his death, disposed of all his interest in the said lands, and having no interest *at the time of his death, none could pass to his heirs. But, on the contrary, that they were seized and possessed in their own right, in severalty and in fee, of the land sought to be partitioned; that on April 10, 1846, they purchased for valuable consideration, and without notice of plaintiffs' claim, or any encumbrance whatever, from the South Carolina Railroad Company, the land known as the "Hamilton tract," containing 450 acres, and parcel of the aforesaid land sold at sheriff's sale, and believing their title to be perfect, erected thereon the valuable property known as the Graniteville Factory, and that "they have held the said tract of land in open, adverse, exclusive, continuous, and undisturbed possession for more than thirty years; and that the plaintiffs herein are barred from asserting any title or claim to the same by the operation and effect of the statute limiting the period within which such actions may be brought, and by lapse of time, and the presumptions thence arising," &c.

*334

The case was placed on Calendar No. 2, and on motion of plaintiffs' attorney, an issue in the following form was submitted to the jury: "Have the plaintiffs title to a moiety of the land sought to be partitioned, or any part thereof?" Upon the trial of this issue the plaintiffs, after due notice, offered in evidence a certified copy from the register's office at Edgefield (then the proper office) of what purported to be a deed from Christian Breithaupt to Ransom Hamilton, bearing date August 24, 1818, conveying "an undivided moiety of a tract of land commonly called Richardson's Old Mills, lying on Big Horse Creek," &c. Said certified copy represented the probate of the deed to have been made as follows: "Georgia, Richmond County. Came before me A. D. Knight, and made oath that he was present and saw Christian Breithaupt sign, seal, and deliver within deed for the uses within mentioned, and also saw Ralph Thomas subscribe with himself as a witness. (Signed) A. D. Knight. Sworn to before me this September 23, 1820. (Signed) R. Bush, J. P. South Carolina, Edgefield District. Recorded in Book O O, folio 239, and examined this October 2, 1820. M. Mims, C. C. P."

The defendant company objected to the introduction of the deed on the ground that it had never been properly probated, hence the clerk had no right to receive it, and consequently a *certified copy was not evidence. The presiding judge ruled that the copy was not evidence. The plaintiffs then asked that the paper might be admitted to show that such a deed had been in existence; and that also being refused, the plaintiffs' counsel asked leave to enter a non-suit, with leave to move to set it aside in the Supreme Court, which being also refused, the trial of the issue proceeded. The jury found "that the plaintiffs have shown no title to a moiety or any part of the land sought to be partitioned, and on the issue referred to us, we find for the defendant;" and thereupon the presiding judge, sitting as chancellor in the case, affirmed the finding of the jury and dismissed the complaint, and the plaintiffs appeal to this court upon the following grounds:

*335

"1. Because his honor erred in refusing to admit in evidence the certified copy of the deed from C. Breithaupt to Ransom Hamilton, upon the ground that the execution of the said deed having been proved in Georgia, the Clerk of Edgefield District was not authorized to record it, and therefore being a deed not duly recorded, there could be no certified copy of it.

"2. Because his honor erred in refusing to allow the said certified copy in evidence to show that a deed from Breithaupt to Ransom Hamilton had been in existence.

"3. Because, after ruling the said certified copy to be inadmissible, his honor refused to grant the plaintiffs a non-suit with leave to move to have the same set aside, stating that he had neither the power nor the discretion to do so."

We do not understand that the plaintiffs asked leave to discontinue their whole case, but that they might have an order of nonsuit as to the issue ordered, leaving the proceeding in equity still standing. We do not see how the judge could have granted a non-suit as to the issue, which was not an independent action, but "an issue from chancery," ordered at the instance of the plaintiffs themselves, to determine (in a manner they had a right to demand) a question which had arisen in the progress of the cause. We suppose the plaintiffs might have brought an original action at law, or possibly may have obtained an order in their case, that an action of law should be brought; but, probably for some good reason, they chose not to do so. They instituted, on the equity *side of the court, an action for partition, and obtained an order out of chancery for the issue. This being the case, the officer who tried that issue sitting as a law judge, could not grant a non-suit, for that would have been precisely equivalent to revoking the order. He had no right to do that, or refuse to try the issue, or to grant a new trial or non-suit. He had no option but to try the case and report back the result. McEwen v. Mazyck & Bell, 3 Rich., 214; Taylor and wife v. Mayrant, 4 DeSaus., 505; Mayrant v. Miller, 8 Rich., 284; Thomasson v. Kennedy, 3 Rich. Eq., 440.

*336

But while this is so, if a serious error was committed on the trial of the issue, the verdict being incorporated into the final decree, we cannot doubt that a party considering himself aggrieved may except to that decree on the ground of error in the trial of the issue. If such error was committed, it attached to all the subsequent proceedings, and affected the final result. Upon this subject we are not embarrassed, as were the old courts of law and equity, when one tribunal ordered an issue, and another with different modes of procedure tried it. Now both law and equity (though kept separate) are administered by the same tribunal, with the right of appeal to the same appellate court.

This makes it necessary to consider whether the judge who tried the issue committed error of law, in excluding the certified copy of the deed from Breithaupt to Hamilton, on the ground that it had been placed on the books of registry without proper probate. A deed is good between the parties with or without registry, but in all cases it must be proved to have been signed, sealed, and delivered—that is necessary to its existence. The ordinary words of proof are familiar, and they are dispensed with only in one single case—that of "an ancient deed." If there are on the paper itself certain unmistakable indicia that it has been in existence over thirty years, there is a rule of evidence which declares that it proves itself. But this rule only applies when the original deed itself, the ancient paper, is produced. There is no such rule as to copies, no matter how old they may purport to be. Registry of a deed is a matter entirely different from its proof, the principal object being to affect third parties, *through notice, and as secondary thereto, to give certain advantages, such as that of authorizing certified copies to be offered in evidence in particular cases.

*337

The whole system of registry is artificial, and rests on the terms of the statutes; but as a deed must be proved before it can exist for any purpose, all laws upon the subject require some kind of probate, proof of its execution, as an indispensable prerequisite to its going on the record. As to those laws, we think it settled, that the mere copying a paper in the books of registry does not give notice or any of the rights of registry, unless it has been first probated in the form and manner prescribed by law. "The recording of the deed therefore, not being authorized by the act of assembly, gave to it no additional validity, and the record thus made, or the exemplified copy therefrom, is no more evidence of the existence of the deed than would be a copy of such deed certified by a private individual," &c. Budd v. Brooke, 43 Am. Dec., 333; see 1 Whart. Evid., § 115; Kerns v. Swope, 2 Watts, 78; Heister v. Fortner, 2 Binney, 44. We do not consider that the case of Lamar v. Raysor, 7 Rich., 509, is in conflict with this view. In that case the probate actually made did not appear (there was no requirement that it should). Under these circumstances the facts not appearing, the court felt at liberty to presume that all things were done which should have been done, and resting upon this presumption, there was a probate in compliance with the law.

The question then is, was the Breithaupt deed (1818), a copy of which was offered in evidence, admitted to registry without a compliance with the law as to probate? As before stated, the case is different from that of Lamar v. Raysor in this, that the certified copy here shows the actual probate upon which it was admitted to record, and there is, therefore, no room for presumption. The oath was made before one "R. Bush, J. P." It does not appear that the said Bush was an officer under the laws of this state, but it does appear that the affidavit was made in the State of Georgia, probably in the City of Augusta. Our registry law in force at that time (1820) was the act of 1788, which provided that "the acknowledgment of the deed by the grantor before a judge of the Supreme Court, or oath of one witness *before a magistrate out of court, swearing that the deed was duly and legally executed as hereinbefore has been the practice to make proof, shall be sufficient for that purpose," &c. 7 Stat., 247.

*338

This related to a deed executed within the state, for the act of 1788 had provided for the proof of a deed executed out of the state "that when any deed of land * * * within any county in this state shall be executed out of the state, then and in all such cases the justices of the county where such lands lie * * * are authorized to issue their dedimus to any two or more justices," &c. 7 Stat., 244. If the Breithaupt deed was executed in Georgia, there can be no question that the probate, being before one magistrate and not under a dedimus issued from this state, was void. But the caption of the deed is "South Carolina, Edgefield District," and we will assume that it was signed and witnessed in this state. Under these circumstances, could it be well proved out of the state by the affidavit of one of the subscribing witnesses before a magistrate of the State of Georgia? We think not. The words of the act "before a judge of the Supreme Court or a magistrate out of court," manifestly meant officers of this state, commissioned by this state, and acting within this state.

But it is strongly urged that, even if the certified copy of a deed registered without legal probate is not admissible as evidence directly to prove title, yet being a question of competency of evidence, the rule is different when the paper is designed to serve a purpose merely collateral and subsidiary; and this copy, having been offered merely for such purpose, should have been admitted at least to the extent of showing as a matter of fact that such a paper was in existence. We are not sure that, in its application to this case, we understand the distinction indicated. The plaintiffs claimed that, as heirs of one

John Woolfolk, they were tenants in common with the defendant company in a certain tract of land in the possession of the latter. The deed, of which the copy was offered, purported to be a conveyance from Breithaupt (once the joint owner with Woolfolk) of "an undivided moiety" of the land to one Hamilton. We do not think there could be any serious question as to the identity of the lands, and *we do not see the purpose for which the copy was offered, unless it was to show by the terms of the paper that the original tenancy in common continued down to that time (1818), and tended to raise the presumption that the other "moiety" was still at that time the property of their ancestor, Woolfolk, and continued to be so down to the time of his death in 1861, a period of over forty years. Such evidence, however slight, it seems to us was directly upon the issue. But even if the copy deed had been admitted, we do not perceive how it could have helped the plaintiffs as against the defendant company; for never having been legally recorded, it could not have been held that the registry afforded either express or implied notice of its contents so as to affect the company.

*339

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 339

CITY COUNCIL OF CHARLESTON v. RYAN.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐1022.]

Findings of fact by the master, concurred in by the Circuit judge, approved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4015; Dec. Dig. ⇐1022.]

[2. Vendor and Purchaser ⇐239.]

If the satisfaction of a mortgage be fraudulently accomplished, nevertheless the rights of a subsequent purchaser for valuable consideration without notice of such fraud, will be secure against the mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Wheeler v. Alderman, 34 S. C. 540, 13 S. E. 673, 27 Am. St. Rep. 842; Werber v. Cain, 71 S. C. 350, 51 S. E. 123.

For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 583–600; Dec. Dig. ⇐239.]

[3. Mortgages ⇐181.]

Where the mortgagee endorsed his name in blank, under his seal, on the back of the mortgage, and then parted with its possession, and a satisfaction was thereafter written above his signature and duly entered of record, he must bear the consequences of the act made possible through his negligence, and an innocent subsequent purchaser will be protected.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 436; Dec. Dig. ⇐181.]

[4. Jury ⇐28.]

Where the right to jury trial exists, it is waived if all issues of law and fact be referred by consent to the master.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Trenholm v. Morgan, 28 S. C. 277, 5 S. E. 721.

For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 176–196; Dec. Dig. ⇐28.]

[5. Mortgages ⇐313.]

The satisfaction of a mortgage does not require two subscribing witnesses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 909; Dec. Dig. ⇐313.]

[This case is also cited in Blohme v. Lynch, 26 S. C. 301, 2 S. E. 136, as to facts.]

Before Kershaw, J., Charleston, April, 1884.

Master Hanckel thus states the case:

The present case grows out of a previous case. In that case the City Council of Charleston filed their complaint against *Mary A. Ryan, one of the defendants in the present case, to foreclose a mortgage of the property described in the pleadings herein, executed by her to secure her bond to the City Council of Charleston, conditioned for the payment of fifteen hundred dollars; and under proceedings duly had therein, the mortgaged property was ordered to be sold; and at the sale the defendant, Dorothea Blohme, became the purchaser at the price of twenty-five hundred dollars. She refused to comply with the terms of sale. A rule to show cause why she should not comply was served upon her. In her return to this rule she showed for cause, that she was about to comply with the terms of the sale to her when she was informed that a certain mortgage so sold to her, hereinafter more fully described, had been fraudulently satisfied, upon the record of it.

*340

The rule and the return thereto came on to be heard before the honorable B. C. Pressley, presiding judge, and by an order made by him and dated April 22, 1880, it was ordered, that the rule be discharged; and it was further ordered, that Mrs. Dorothea Blohme, the purchaser in that action, be discharged from her said purchase, unless proceedings be instituted with proper parties to test the validity of the title. From this order an appeal was taken by the City Council of Charleston to the Supreme Court of this state, and after being there heard, by a decree, filed April 11, 1881. the decree of the Circuit Court was affirmed. [City of Charleston v. Blohme] 15 S. C., 124 [40 Am. Rep. 690].

The present action is therefore now instituted in pursuance of the requirements of that decree to test the validity of the title to the property in question.

I find the case to be as follows: William B. Ryan, now deceased, being in his life-time seized and possessed of a certain house and lot on the west side of Pitt street, in the city of Charleston, and fully described in the complaint in this case, executed a mortgage of that property, dated December 17, 1866, to Patrick H. Ryan, trustee of Thomas J. Ryan, who was a minor, and the son of the mortgagor, W. B. Ryan, to secure a bond of even date therewith, and conditioned for the payment of the sum of $3,500, and this mortgage was duly recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyance for Charleston County, on January 30, 1869.

*341

*Not long after the execution of that mortgage the trustee, Patrick H. Ryan, died, and thereupon the cestui que trust, Thomas J. Ryan, by his father and next friend, W. B. Ryan, filed his petition in the Court of Equity for Charleston District (now county), praying that Thomas E. Ryan be appointed trustee, and for other relief therein stated. This petition was referred to Master Gray, and on May 26, 1868, he reported, among other things, as follows: "I find also that Patrick H. Ryan, the trustee, departed this life as stated in the petition. From the evidence of Wm. B. Ryan taken, he is in a destitute condition since the war, all his resources having been swept away in that great overthrow; and he is unable to maintain and educate his son. I therefore respectfully recommend the appointment of Thomas E. Ryan as trustee, under the said bond and mortgage, and recommend at the same time that power be given the newly appointed trustee to pledge the aforesaid mortgage for the purpose of borrowing the sum of twelve hundred dollars for his maintenance and education."

Thereupon, on May 26, 1868, the Hon. H. D. Lesesne, chancellor, ordered and decreed as follows: "On the report of Master Gray in this case, and on motion of M. P. O'Connor, solicitor pro pet., it is ordered, that Thomas E. Ryan, be substituted as trustee for Thomas J. Ryan, in the place and stead of Patrick H. Ryan, deceased; and that upon his giving bond with surety, faithfully to account for the estate of the minor that may come into his hands, the bond and mortgage described in the petition be delivered to him. It is further ordered, that the said Thomas E. Ryan, substituted trustee, have leave to pledge said bond and mortgage as a collateral security for any loan or advance of money to the amount of $1,200, that may be necessary to provide for the maintenance and education of said minor, Thomas J. Ryan."

Subsequently and before the filing of the complaint in the present case, the infant cestui que trust, Thomas J. Ryan, died, under age, and the defendant, Mary A. Ryan, has administered upon his estate; and the other defendants, William B. Ryan and Mary L. Ryan, now claim as his distributees under the statute.

I also find as a fact that upon the said bond and mortgage *being delivered to him, Thomas E. Ryan, the substituted trustee, signed his name and affixed his seal on the back of the same, leaving a blank space above such signature and seal; that this was done in the presence of a witness, to wit, M. P. O'Connor, and that the bond and mortgage, with the blank signature and seal, so endorsed thereon, was delivered by the trustee to the mortgagor, William B. Ryan, for the purpose of enabling him to pledge the same as collateral security in borrowing money thereon. I find these to be facts, because the trustee, Thomas E. Ryan, in his testimony in this case, expressly states that he signed a paper of some kind in blank, for the purpose of enabling the mortgagor, W. B. Ryan, to pledge the bond and mortgage, to raise money for the maintenance and education of the cestui que trust, his son. The trustee does indeed testify that the paper so signed by him in blank was not on any part of the mortgage, but was a distinct and separate paper. But the usual and very frequent method of pledging bonds and mortgages as collateral security is to place such a blank signature and seal upon the back, in the presence of a witness or witnesses. From a receipt also, signed by Z. B. Oakes, which is evidence in this case, it appears that this very bond and mortgage was lodged with him as a collateral. It could not have been so pledged, unless some such signature and sealing had been endorsed upon it.

*342

In the satisfaction also which is recorded across the face of the record of mortgage, and which has given rise to this litigation, it is distinctly stated that "the bond for which this mortgage was made as security having been paid," &c. The register of mesne conveyance must therefore have found the signature and seal of the trustee attached to this mortgage, that being the mortgage then in his hands, from some part of which he was recording the satisfaction he found upon it. The faith and credit due to the public records requires that this be assumed as a fact. In addition to this is to be considered that Mr. M. P. O'Connor, the witness and a member of the bar in good standing, upon oath deposes that he witnessed the execution of the above written satisfaction.

And it is to be noticed further that the trustee also testifies that hearing of the satisfaction, he consulted Mr. R. S. Duryea, *a prominent member of the bar, who took him (to the court house, he says, but evidently to the fire-proof building, where the records are kept) and showed him some paper there pasted across the record of the mortgage. The testimony is obscure, but what was shown him was evidently the record of the satisfaction he had heard of and was inquiring about. And yet he took no steps to question the satisfaction until Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Duryea were both dead, and did nothing until after the defendant, Dorothea Blohme, had purchased the property at the sale under the foreclosure of Mrs. Mary A. Ryan's mortgage to the City Council; and then only made an affidavit that he had never signed the satisfaction; and never instituted any proceedings to set aside the satisfaction he so repudiated. It is not unreasonable, therefore, to suppose that at the time of his consultation with Mr. Duryea, he was convinced that the record of satisfaction across the record of the mortgage was the record of a paper, to which his genuine seal and signature was attached, even if the writing over it was not the writing he intended should be there written.

*343

I am therefore satisfied that the trustee, Thomas E. Ryan, is entirely mistaken in his testimony, that the blank paper he signed and delivered to W. B. Ryan, the mortgagor, formed no part of the mortgage deed, and was not in fact on the back of it. On the contrary, I find as a fact that the substituted trustee, Thomas E. Ryan, did sign his name as trustee of Thomas J. Ryan, and affix his seal thereto, on some part of the mortgage in question, leaving a blank space over such signature and seal; and that this was done in the presence of M. P. O'Connor as a witness, and that the copy of that signature and seal which appears in the record of the satisfaction of that mortgage, afterwards to be considered, is the copy of the trustee's genuine signature and seal. I also find as a fact that this bond and this mortgage, with the blank signature and seal of the trustee so attached to it, was delivered by him to the mortgagor, W. B. Ryan, and were in the possession of the latter at the time when the satisfaction next to be mentioned and considered was written above them.

There is, indeed, in evidence the receipt of one Z. B. Oakes, which shows that the bond and mortgage were in his possession *at one time as collateral security for money advanced upon it. But this receipt itself states that they were delivered to Oakes by the mortgagor, W. B. Ryan, to whom it had been delivered by the trustee; and they must have been again returned to the possession of the mortgagor, who had delivered them to Oakes; because if it had remained as a collateral in the possession of Oakes, he would not have allowed a satisfaction to be endorsed upon the mortgage, but would have required an assignment to himself to be written instead; and Oakes has made no claim to such an assignment. It is evident that this loan being paid, he naturally returned the bond and mortgage to W. B. Ryan from whom he had received them.

*344

I also find as a fact that on the blank space above the signature and seal of the trustee on the mortgage there was on September 1, 1870, written by some one (in the view I shall take of the case it is not necessary to decide by whom) a full satisfaction of the mortgage in the following words, to wit:

"State of South Carolina.

"The bond for which this mortgage was made as security having been paid, I declare the within mortgage fully satisfied and discharged.

"Witness my hand and seal this first of September, 1870.

"Thomas E. Ryan, [L. S.]
"Trustee for Thos. J. Ryan.

"In the presence of
"M. P. O'Connor."

And that this satisfaction was proved for record by an affidavit of the witness, M. P. O'Connor, as follows, to wit:

"State of South Carolina.

"Personally appeared, M. P. O'Connor, who deposeth that he saw Thomas E. Ryan sign and seal the foregoing satisfaction, and witnessed the execution thereof.

"M. P. O'Connor.

"Sworn to before me this 2d September, 1870.

"A. P. Sampson, Notary Public."

I also find as a fact that on or about September 1, 1870, Mary A. Ryan, the defendant in the original case of foreclosure and one of the defendants in the case at bar, being seized and possessed of the fee in the house and lot on Pitt street, described in *the complaint, under a deed of conveyance from E. W. M. Mackey, sheriff of Charleston County, dated June 6, 1870, contracted with the City Council of Charleston to borrow what are known as fire loan bonds, to the amount of $1,500, and that in order to secure the payment of this loan the said Mary A. Ryan executed her bond conditioned for the payment to the City Council of Charleston of the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, in fifteen equal successive annual instalments, with interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, payable quarterly in advance.

*345

That, in order to secure the payment of the said bond, the said Mary A. Ryan executed a mortgage, dated September 1, 1870, of the house and lot on Pitt street described in the complaint, and of which she was seized and possessed in fee as above stated. And that the mortgage so executed and dated September 1, 1870, was not proved for record and not recorded until September 9, 1870, at which last date M. P. O'Connor, the attorney of Mrs. Mary A. Ryan, the mortgagor, gave his receipt for an instalment of $1,000 of the said fire loan bonds, the second instalment of $500 being received by him on September 14, 1870.

I also find as a fact that the City Council of Charleston, at the time of their making their loan to the defendant, Mary A. Ryan, did not know, and had no good reason to suspect, that the satisfaction recorded across the face of the record of the mortgage of W. B. Ryan to Patrick H. Ryan, the original trustee of T. J. Ryan, above mentioned, was not written at the time of the signing and sealing of the same by the substituted trustee, Thos. E. Ryan; and that they did not know, and had no good reason to suspect, that such signature and seal had not been originally signed and affixed with a blank space above it; and that they did not know, and had no good reason to suspect, that the satisfaction written above the signature and seal was not such a writing as Thos. E. Ryan, the substituted trustee, intended should be there written. I find these as facts, because the burden of the proof of the contrary was on the substituted trustee, and he has produced no evidence whatever to prove the contrary.

In this connection it has been argued before me, that although the City of Council of Charleston might not have actually known, *yet they had sufficient reason to suspect that something was wrong, and were reasonably put upon inquiry by reason of the fact that in the proceedings in which Thomas E. Ryan was appointed substituted trustee, and which formed a part of the chain of title, it appeared that the mortgagor, W. B. Ryan, was in so destitute a condition that it was necessary to permit the substituted trustee to pledge the mortgage which constituted the trust estate, to raise money for the maintenance and education of the son of the said mortgagor, and that therefore the City Council of Charleston had good reason to believe that the mortgagor could not have paid the bond, or at least had sufficient reason to put them upon inquiry, whether he had really paid the bond, as he appeared to have done by the recorded satisfaction.

*346

I cannot agree with this view of the case. Because, in the first place, there is no evidence whatsoever that the City Council of Charleston had any other reason to be suspicious. We can perhaps see now, with our present knowledge, that the circumstance referred to was in fact calculated to excite the further suspicion of any one who had previously some other reason to be suspicious of wrong in the matter. But we have now all the allegations in the case. The City Council of Charleston knew nothing of all these at that time. In looking at the proceeding referred to, their attention would be naturally chiefly directed to the authority of the substituted trustee to satisfy the mortgage. His power to pledge it, had apparently no significance or importance under the circumstances of the case. It would not naturally be much dwelt upon by one who suspected nothing. And then it must be remembered that the pecuniary condition of all persons is constantly changing, and the destitution of the mortgagor might have been in some way relieved. Friends might have aided him to enable his wife to effect her loan, and besides all this, the defendant, Mary A. Ryan, was the owner of the fee. It was to her interest that the bond should be paid, and the mortgage satisfied. She might have paid her husband's bond. The plaintiffs could not know that she had not the means of doing so. The examination of titles to property is already sufficiently burdensome. It would be unreasonable to require those taking a title to investigate the private pecuniary circumstances of all *parties to the title, and to inquire into the probability of their being able to do what the public records stated they had done.

*347

I therefore find as before stated, that the plaintiffs did not know, and had no good reason to suspect, that the recorded satisfaction of the mortgage in question, by the substituted trustee, was not the record of a bona fide satisfaction.

These being the facts of the case, the next inquiry is, what are the respective rights of the parties, under the state of the facts, and what is the law by which they are to be determined? Let us suppose, in the first place, that the obligor of the bond and the maker of the mortgage had alleged that they were paid and satisfied, and in proof of that fact had produced them as being in his own possession, with the signature and seal of the substituted trustee endorsed in blank upon each of them. Such possession of a bond and mortgage, and seal of the lawful holder, would be rightly interpreted according to circumstances. If found in the possession of a third person, it would naturally be interpreted to mean that an assignment was intended to be written over such signature and seal, whenever it should become necessary (and this in fact is constantly done in a thousand instances); but if found in the possession of the obligor and mortgagor, an equally fair presumption would be that it was evidence of payment of the bond, and that a satisfaction of the mortgage was intended to be written over such signature and seal on that security. And in fact and law the writing of either an assignment to the mortgage or of a satisfaction, would equally operate to satisfy the mortgage.

But the apparent evidence of satisfaction, in the case under consideration, is much stronger than in the case last supposed. What in that case might have been rightfully presumed, appeared by the records of this case to have been actually done. A certificate of the mortgage had in fact been written over the signature and seal in blank, had been duly proved for record by the affidavit of a credible and competent witness, and had been plainly recorded across the face of the record of the mortgage. And this alleged fraud (if fraud it was) had been made possible by the acts of the substituted trustee, Thomas E. Ryan, in endorsing on the mortgage his blank signature and seal in the presence of a witness, and so enabling the person entrusted by him with the *possession of the mortgage, to mislead and deceive, or to permit others to mislead or deceive, the plaintiffs, and to induce them to lend money on the faith of the recorded satisfaction.

*348

The law in such a case seems to me to be very clearly settled by authoritative decisions in this state. In the case of State Bank v. Cox & Co., 11 Rich. Eq., 350 [78 Am. Dec. 458], Chancellor Dargan in his decree on Circuit, says: "There is no doctrine of equity jurisprudence better supported by reason as well as authority than this, that when one of two innocent persons must suffer loss, it must fall on the party who by incaution or misplaced confidence has occasioned it, or placed it in the power of a third party to perpetrate the fraud by which the loss has happened." And upon appeal from this decision this doctrine of the Circuit Court was affirmed, and the appeal was dismissed; the Court of Appeals saying that whoever comes fairly by a security, as Cox did in this case, in the course of business, is entitled to hold it against him who passed it, or enabled another to pass it on him. In that case a power of attorney to transfer the bank stock in question (as is customary in sales of stock) had been endorsed upon the certificate of stock in blank. It was alleged and proved, on the part of the real owner, that the blank power of attorney was so endorsed on the certificate and delivered to the holder of it, only to be delivered by him to her agent in this country, to enable the latter to collect the dividends, and perhaps sell the stock, whenever he should be so directed. The person to whom it was so delivered by her never did deliver to her agent, but pledged it to Cox & Co., to secure his own debt to them. The Court of Appeals held that this blank power of attorney to transfer, enabled the person to whom it was entrusted to claim that the stock was his own property, and by pledging it to Cox & Co., to secure his debt, to deceive the lenders.

The same doctrine was affirmed in substance in the cases of Reynolds v. Witte, 13 S. C., 15 [36 Am. Rep. 678], and in Calais Steamboat Company v. Scudder, 2 Black, 372 [17 L. Ed. 282]. See also 2 Jones Mort., § 967. Indeed, the doctrine of equity jurisprudence, so clearly stated by Chan. Dargan, in the case of State Bank v. Cox & Co., has become a stereotyped maxim of law. The application of this doctrine to the present case is so obvious that I need not dwell *upon it. If there ever was a case in which the incautious and misplaced confidence of one person enabled a third person to perpetrate the fraud which has occasioned the loss, or if sanctioned would occasion the loss, to an innocent lender of money, this is such a case.

*349

It has been argued before me upon the authority of many cases, beginning in this country with the leading case of the United States v. Nelson, 2 Brock., 64 [Fed. Cas. No. 15,862], that the blank space over the signature and seal of the trustee in this case could not be filled by writing a satisfaction, because the satisfaction is under seal, and such a blank cannot be filled in a sealed instrument. But in all the cases cited, this rule of law was admitted to be purely technical, and upheld simply by the weight of gradually accumulating authority. And in the later cases, notably in that of Pence v. Arbuckle, 22 Minn., 417, the strictness of the technical rule is largely relaxed, by invoking the doctrine of estoppel, especially in favor of innocent third parties. In this connection see also Gourdin v. Commander, 6 Rich., 497.

I question also whether a satisfaction of a mortgage can be regarded as technically a sealed instrument, any more than the endorsement of a promissory note would be made a sealed instrument by writing the words "signed and sealed" in the presence of a witness under the endorsement. Proof of payment of the bond would of itself operate as a satisfaction, and the register can be ordered to enter satisfaction upon such proof. And a simple receipt of payment of the bond, or the writing the words, "this mortgage is satisfied," would be a satisfaction. As conclusive, it seems to me, of the question, in the case of the State Bank v. Cox & Co., above cited, the blank power of attorney was under seal, and yet the filling up of the blank was held valid in favor of an innocent holder of the certificate of stock as a pledge. In view, indeed, of the wide-spread custom of holders of bonds and mortgages endorsing their signatures and seals thereon in blank, in the presence of a witness or witnesses, for the purpose of ready assignment, and ultimate satisfaction, many titles would be now jeopardized by now declaring such blank endorsements to be void.

The objection was also urged that the satisfaction in the pres*ent case was signed and sealed in the presence of, and proved by, only one witness. But the mortgage in the body expressly provides that it shall be null and void whenever the debt it is executed to secure is paid; and this in equity, whether the mortgagor is in possession or out of possession. One credible and competent witness is certainly sufficient to prove payment of the bond, and by such proof to make the mortgage null and void, or, in other words, to satisfy it. In fact, in a great number of instances, the satisfaction is acknowledged directly, and by an original writing, across the face of the mortgage itself, in the presence of the register alone.

*350

It was also argued before me that the infant cestui que trust, who was over the age of choice, was not a party to the petition under which Thomas E. Ryan was appointed substituted trustee, and therefore was not bound by his acts. It is sufficient to say to this question that the infant cestui que trust was a party to that petition, which was filed in his name by his next friend, his own father, in accordance with the well established practice of chancery at that time recognized.

It was also submitted in argument that in the order by which the substituted trustee was appointed power was given such trustee to pledge the bond and mortgage, and no power was given to satisfy the mortgage. But it is very evident the substituted trustee had all the ordinary powers of the original trustee. The bond was past due. He had therefore power to receive payment of it, and if he received payment of the bond, he not only had the power, but it was his stringent legal duty, to satisfy the mortgage. The power to pledge was only additional and extraordinary power, which he would not have had without such an order conferring it. It does not deprive him of the ordinary power of a trustee.

There is one view of the case which I think deserves consideration. The original bond and mortgage of W. B. Ryan to the original trustee are lost or destroyed, or not produced. The best evidence we have of their having existed is the record of the mortgage, proved by the affidavit of one of the witnesses in the register's office. The same record in evidence carries on the face of it the record of a satisfaction, duly proved by the affidavit of a *credible and competent witness. The evidence of the satisfaction is prima facie, just the same as the evidence of the mortgage.

*351

Prima facie, therefore, by intendment of law the mortgage is satisfied, and the faith and credit which is due to the public records of the state, which are established by law for the guidance and security of its citizens, requires that they should not be questioned, as against innocent third parties, without unmistakable proof, not only of a fraud, but of one to which the person alleging such fraud has in no way contributed. In this case the allegations of the non-existence of the satisfaction endorsed on the mortgage, or of the forgery of the trustee's signature, cannot be proven, because the original mortgage cannot be produced, and the witness is now dead. And if there was a fraud, the proof of it is obscure, and rests wholly on the testimony of the trustee, who repudiates his recorded satisfaction, and that testimony relates to transactions with the mortgagor, who is dead, and involves the conduct of the defendant, Mary A. Ryan, and of M. P. O'Connor, who was evidently the family solicitor, and who is dead. And if there was a fraud in the matter of the satisfaction, we have seen besides that the trustee contributed to the recording of that satisfaction, by making the fraud not only possible, but easily and readily accomplished.

After full and careful consideration of the whole case, I therefore find as a matter of law, that as between the plaintiff, the City Council of Charleston, and all persons claiming under them, and the defendants, the trustee, and the cestui que trusts, the record of the satisfaction of the mortgage of William B. Ryan to the original trustee, afterwards held by the substituted trustee, is the record of a valid satisfaction of that mortgage. That so far as that mortgage is concerned the title offered by the City Council of Charleston to the defendant, Mrs. Dorothea Blohme, to the property purchased by her, under the foreclosure of the defendant, Mrs. Mary A. Ryan, is a good and valid title. And that therefore the defendant, Mrs. Dorothea Blohme, the purchaser, is bound to comply with the terms of sale in the original case of foreclosure between the City Council of Charleston as plaintiff and Mrs. Mary A. Ryan as defendant above stated.

As incidental matter, I further report that the defendant, Mary *A. Ryan, never renounced her dower on the mortgage of William B. Ryan to Patrick H. Ryan, trustee of T. J. Ryan, above reported. In view of the conclusions I have reached in this case, as above reported, it is unnecessary for me to consider the effect of that fact.

*352

This report came before the Circuit Court upon the following exceptions taken thereto by the defendant, T. E. Ryan, trustee, and by Mrs. Ryan and the minor defendants:

T. E. Ryan's Exceptions.—1. Because the testimony shows that he never did receive satisfaction of the mortgage held by him as trustee, nor that he expressly authorized the entry of satisfaction.

2. Because if, as trustee, he had marked, or caused to be marked, the mortgage as satisfied on record without receiving satisfaction in fact, he would have been guilty of a breach of trust, and any person who accepted such satisfaction with knowledge or notice shares in the breach of trust.

3. Because the testimony shows that he never did receive the satisfaction of the mortgage in fact, but the City Council was in possession of facts sufficient to put it on the inquiry, and thus had notice of this.

4. Because a trustee cannot enter satisfaction on a mortgage without in fact receiving satisfaction; he cannot by deed authorize to satisfy a mortgage without in fact receiving satisfaction therefor, and such authority cannot be presumed against him.

Other Exceptions.—1. Because no interest or estate can pass under a satisfaction signed in blank upon a stolen mortgage such as that given to the trustee of the minor now dead, as stated in the facts of the report.

2. That the alleged satisfaction of the mortgage is no estoppel to the allegation that the bond and mortgage was unpaid when such truth was proven.

3. That the mortgagor, W. B. Ryan, now deceased, was out of possession when the alleged satisfaction was entered, and nothing but a deed from the mortgagee could then release the mortgage; and, secondly, that the alleged satisfaction is not a deed, having been signed in blank.

4. That the mortgagee was in possession of the mortgaged *premises at the time of the alleged satisfaction; and the alleged satisfaction is not a deed, having been signed in blank. That the alleged satisfaction, without other proof, is not a legal satisfaction against proof to the contrary; in this, that it is witnessed by only one witness.

*353

5. That the minor defendants are innocent mortgagees in possession, and cannot be ousted, except, first, by conclusive proof, wherein the burden is always on the plaintiff; or, secondly, by a trial by jury, if it should be necessary to establish title.

6. That the minors, by law, are innocent parties to the wrong which has been done; and as to the City Council, their position, first, is at least doubtful; and, secondly, they were particeps criminis in the wrong—and in either case the loss should fall upon the city.

7. That the power of attorney, signed in blank by the trustee, was exhausted when the mortgage was pledged to Oakes, and it could not be exercised again; and, secondly, such satisfaction as this cannot be signed in blank.

8. Beyond the equity of redemption purchased by Mrs. Ryan at the sheriff's sale, no other estate passed in this land to her so that it could be by her mortgaged to the city, because she testified she knew nothing of this satisfaction; and there is no evidence of its delivery to her, or any pretence connecting her with this fraud.

10. That Mrs. Mary A. Ryan is entitled to dower in the premises in any event.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

This case was heard upon the report of Master Hanckel, and exceptions taken thereto by the defendants. The decision depends upon two questions: 1. Whether the City Council advanced the loan in question to Mary A. Ryan, the defendant, upon the belief that the satisfaction entered upon the mortgages to Thomas E. Ryan was regular and bona fide in all respects. 2. Whether the parties who induced such belief and consequent action of the plaintiff were enabled so to do by the fault, negligence, or other act of the said Thomas E. Ryan, trustee, mortgagee, without contributory negligence or other fault of the plaintiff. Both these points have been determined by the master *adversely to the defendants, and such findings are well sustained by the evidence. The case is brought clearly within the principles of the cases of Bank v. Cox & Co. and Gourdin v. Commander, cited by the master, with others.

*354

I need not consider seriatim all the matters argued before me, because they are all concluded by the principles laid down in these cases and the reasoning upon them of the master. That doctrine of stolen mortgage, invoked by Mary A. Ryan in her first exception, does not apply, because the mortgage was not stolen. It might apply if the satisfaction had been written in blank and the paper on which it was written, after having been safely put away, had been afterwards stolen and filled up, without fault or neglect of the mortgagee; but this is not this case.

I do not find anything in the second exception of Mrs. Ryan that need be discussed, because the facts here, as they appear, entitle the plaintiff to the protection afforded by the principles of equity referred to.

That the mortgagor is out of possession can make no difference here. A deed may be necessary to reconvey the estate when title has passed out of the mortgagor; but a satisfaction of a mortgage, by the authority of the mortgagee, would in equity release all the interest of the mortgagee, and the principles cited require that effect be given to this entry of satisfaction as if it had been actually intended by the mortgagee after payment of the debt, so far as the title of the purchaser of the premises in the present case is concerned.

The doctrine of the execution of uses under the statute does not apply here. The statute does not transfer the mortgage to the cestui que trust, and that would be necessary to divest the trustee mortgagee of the right to collect the debt and satisfy the mortgage. Nothing less would serve the purpose of defeating the equities of the plaintiff.

It is also contended that this is to be treated as the entry of an agent who has already exhausted his powers by a previous exercise of them. This would not avail the defendant unless it had been shown that the plaintiff had some means of knowing of the previous exercise of authority by the agent, of which there is nothing here.

*355

*The eighth exception of Mrs. Ryan seems to proceed upon the supposition that Mrs. Ryan's consent was in some way necessary to make the satisfaction valid; that if she did not so consent, it would not operate to enlarge her estate so that she could make a mortgage that would extend beyond her equity of redemption. To this I cannot agree. The mortgagee had the power to satisfy the mortgage without her, and when that was done, she was seized in fee, and the new mortgage attached to that estate.

The fourth exception of Mrs. Ryan insists that this was not a legal satisfaction, because it was against proof to the contrary, in that it was witnessed by only one witness. I agree with the master that one witness was sufficient, and adopt his reasoning on that point.

The master is undoubtedly right in leaving the question of Mrs. Ryan's dower out of this case. The existence of the claim in its present condition would not discharge the purchaser here.

The exceptions taken by Thomas E. Ryan, the trustee, may be disposed of by what has been said, with the additional remark that they could only apply to the case of a party dealing with the entry of satisfaction who was in possession of facts sufficient to put him on the inquiry; and that is not this case

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the defendant, Dorothea Blohme, the purchaser, do comply with the terms of sale in the original case of foreclosure between the City Council of Charleston as plaintiff and Mary A. Ryan as defendant. Also ordered and adjudged, that the costs of this case be paid out of the proceeds of said sale.

Mrs. Ryan and the minors gave notice of appeal upon the following exceptions: 1. Because the minors should have been granted a trial by jury of their title to the land. 2. Because the law declares their innocence and the facts declare the negligence of the city. 3. Because the power of the agent to fill the blank was exhausted after the hypothecation to Oakes. 4. Because the satisfaction was insufficient, having only one witness; especially when the mortgagor was out of possession. 5. Because the minors being mortgagees in possession, and vested with the fee under the statute of uses and trusts, nothing but a legal *deed can divest them of title. 6. Because there was no delivery of the satisfaction to Mrs. Ryan, because the same was a forgery, and because the mortgage was stolen.

*356

Mr. Wm. M. Thomas, for appellants.
Mr. G. D. Bryan, contra.

March 16, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. [Omitting his statement of the case.]

The correctness of the conclusion reached below is so satisfactorily shown by the reasoning employed and the authorities cited by Master Hanckel, confirmed and endorsed as they are by the Circuit judge, that but little is left for us to add. There can be no doubt that at the time of the issue of the fire loan bonds which constituted the consideration of the bond and mortgage under which the lot in question was sold, the records, which was the proper source for the lender to go to to obtain such information, showed that the mortgage to the trustee, which is now claimed to be a prior lien, was fully satisfied and discharged by the mortgagee, or rather by one who stood in his place. This entry of satisfaction may or may not have been fraudulently done; but, even conceding that it was fraudulent, we do not see how it could affect the rights of the City Council unless they had notice of such fraud. The fact that they had such notice is negatived by the findings of the master, which are not only fully concurred in by the Circuit judge, but are likewise sustained by the evidence, and therefore, according to the well-settled rule, we are bound to conclude that the City Council had no such notice.

And when to this is added the further finding of fact, equally well sustained by the evidence, that the means of making such fraudulent entry of satisfaction (if indeed it was so) was afforded by the negligence of Thomas E. Ryan, the mortgagee, there cannot be a doubt about the result; under the wise and well-settled principle of equity "that where one of two innocent parties must suffer loss, it must fall on the party who, by incautious and misplaced confidence, has occasioned it or placed it in the power of a third party to perpetrate the fraud by which the loss *has happened." Thomas E. Ryan, being the legal owner and holder of the bond and mortgage, was the proper person to receive payment and enter satisfaction; and when he endorsed his name, under his seal, on the back of the mortgage, as the master finds that he did do, he placed it in the power of any person into whose hands the mortgage might fall to write above his name an acknowledgment of payment and a discharge of the mortgage, as was in fact done. There cannot be a doubt, therefore, as to whose negligence caused the loss.

*357

But, as we have said, the case has been so fully considered and so satisfactorily disposed of that it is not necessary for us to enter into any further discussion of it, but will confine ourselves to a brief consideration of the several grounds of appeal. The first ground clearly cannot be sustained, inasmuch as it appears that the issues of law and fact were, by consent, referred to the master; and this would amount to a waiver of the right to a jury trial, if indeed such a right could ever have been claimed. The second ground raises mere questions of fact which have been disposed of by what we have already said. The third ground cannot be sustained: First, because it does not appear, and in fact the contrary does appear, that the blank above the mortgagee's name was ever filled but once; second, because the act of the mortgagee, in endorsing his name upon the mortgage and parting with the possession of it, afforded the opportunity and the means of perpetrating the very fraud which appellants allege has been committed; and whether so intended by the mortgagee or not can make no difference.

The fourth ground rests upon the proposition that a satisfaction of a mortgage must be executed in the presence of two subscribing witnesses. The statute in reference to the satisfaction of mortgages, as found in the General Statutes of 1872, p. 427-8, the law which was in force at the time of this transaction, does not require two witnesses, and we see no ground upon which the proposition contended for can be maintained. The fifth ground rests upon the assumption of fact that the minor mortgagees were in possession at the time the entry of satisfaction was made, but the evidence shows the contrary to be the fact: and we are utterly at a loss to conceive what the statute of uses *has to do with the question. At the time the entry of satisfaction was made, the cestui que trust, Thomas J. Ryan, was alive, and the minor defendants had no interest whatever in the mortgage. The sixth ground also rests upon assumptions of fact not sustained by the evidence, and cannot therefore be maintained.

*358

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 358

SPROUSE v. LITTLEJOHN.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⊂⊃706.]

An order of the Circuit judge on appeal from a trial justice, directing a new trial in the court below, cannot be declared erroneous where this court is not informed of the grounds upon which the order was granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2944; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃706.]

[2. Gifts ⊂⊃48.]

A gift of personal property is not complete without delivery; but where declarations of the donor to the effect that he had given are received in evidence as competent, it should be left to the jury to determine whether the gift has been proved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gifts, Cent. Dig. § 91; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃48.]

Before Pressley, J., Spartanburg, October, 1884.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. Stanyarne Wilson, for appellant.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, contra.

March 17, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This action was originally brought in a trial justice court for Spartanburg County for damages for the taking and detaining by W. G. Bryant, the defendant's intestate, of a cow, the alleged property of Texana Sprouse, of whom the plaintiff is guardian ad litem. The case was heard in the trial justice court by a jury duly impannelled and a verdict rendered for the plaintiff for $76.50, whereupon the defendant appealed to the Circuit Court. Upon the hearing of this appeal his honor, Judge Pressley, ordered and adjudged that the appeal be sustained, and that the case be sent back for a *new trial, with instructions to the court below, "that in order to presume a gift of a chattel there must be some proof of its delivery to the donee, and the subsequent declarations of the donor that he has given the chattel, are not sufficient of themselves to prove such gift."

*359

From this order the plaintiff has appealed to this court on the grounds: "1. That his honor erred in holding that in order to presume a gift of a chattel there must be some proof of its delivery to the donee, and the subsequent declarations of the donor that he has given the chattel, are not of themselves sufficient to prove such gift. 2. That upon the evidence the appeal should have been dismissed and judgment rendered for plaintiff."

It does not appear in the order of the Circuit judge granting the new trial, nor in the exceptions of the appellant by which the case is before us, upon what grounds this order was made. Nor is there any statement in the case from which said grounds may be inferred. We are at a loss, therefore, to know what errors of law we are called upon to correct as to the granting of the new trial. The appellant in his first exception objects to the proposition of law as to the effect of declarations of a donor which the judge sent down as instructions to the trial justice in the new trial which he had just ordered, and in his second and last exception he simply alleges in a general statement that the appeal below should have been dismissed and judgment rendered for the plaintiff upon the evidence. Such an exception we have often held is too general and cannot be considered. Besides, we have no power in a case at law to consider the facts with a view to correct errors, if any, therein. We see nothing in the "Case" which leads us to the conclusion that the Circuit judge ordered the new trial on the ground that the trial justice in his charge to his jury laid down the law different from the instructions which he sent down. On the contrary, the trial justice in his report of the case in which his charge is found does not seem to have said anything as to the effect of the donor's declarations, but he left the whole question of gift to the jury as a matter of fact.

Having no information, then, as to the ground upon which the new trial was ordered, we cannot say that there has been legal error committed in granting it, but the correctness of the instruc*tions accompanying the order is distinctly questioned and is before us, and it is the only question which is properly before us. There can be no doubt that to constitute a complete gift of a chattel there must be a delivery—some act which indicates a relinquishment of possession and dominion on the part of the donor in behalf of the donee. That, however, is not the question here, but the question is, will the subsequent declarations of the donor, saying that he had given the chattel, amount in themselves when competent to sufficient proof that this delivery had taken place, or must there be other evidence showing such delivery? The only cases that we have been able to find bearing upon this question are the two cited in appellant's argument, Mc-

*360

Kane v. Bonner, 1 Bail., 115; and Caldwell v. Wilson, 2 Speers, 79. And neither of these decides the precise question.

In the first case Johnson, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, did say: "That cases do sometimes arise, in which proof of the gift is made up of repeated declarations of the donor running through several years," or such declarations are brought in, by the party claiming under it, in support of doubtful evidence of the gift. In these and in such cases, such declarations are admissible in reply to such evidence, and this was the question in the case, i. e., whether declarations of the donor subsequent to the gift, that he had not given, were admissible, and they were held admissible in reply to declarations that he had given.

In the second case the Circuit judge charged: "That a delivery was a transfer of possession, either by actual tradition from hand to hand, or by an expression of the donor's relinquishment, that the donee should take when the chattel was present, and in a situation to be taken by either party; that there could be no gift without a delivery; that in a case like this, where the defendant claims under the alleged donor, a gift may be proved by the acknowledgments of the donor, if the jury be satisfied that it was attended with all necessary formalities." Upon appeal the court said, in few words, that upon this question "it was satisfied with the instructions given to the jury."

We do not think that the instructions sent down in the case at bar were entirely correct, because they were calculated to mislead. It is true that delivery must be proved, but this is a ques*tion of fact for the jury, and inasmuch as there can be no complete and legal gift without delivery, the very use of the term "gift," or "I have given," may sometimes be intended to include the delivery, and where therefore such declarations have been used by the donor, and they are admitted by the court as competent, we think it ought to be left to the jury to say whether the gift has been proved, including the delivery, and it ought not to be laid down as a rule of law to govern the jury, that such declarations in themselves are insufficient to prove the gift.

*361

For the reasons already given we have not been able to see clearly the grounds upon which the new trial was granted, and consequently we have not considered the question of the legality of that order, and no error having been pointed out, of course we cannot disturb the order, in so far as the new trial is granted, but the instructions accompanying the order, to which the appellant has excepted, we think contained error as above.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court, in so far as the instructions sent down to govern the new trial are concerned, should be reversed, and it is so adjudged.

---

22 S. C. 361

DUREN v. SINCLAIR.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Evidence ⊂⊃370.]

The necessary oath and notice being given, a certified copy of a recorded power of attorney, under which a deed was executed, may be offered in evidence without other proof of the execution of the original.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Crocker, 49 S. C. 247, 27 S. E. 49.

For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1575; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃370.]

[2. Evidence ⊂⊃183.]

The record book of the register of mesne conveyance is not admissible in evidence to prove a deed, not even as color of title, no oath of loss having been made nor notice given of intent to introduce.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Stone v. Fitts, 38 S. C. 397, 17 S. E. 136; State v. Crocker, 49 S. C. 248, 27 S. E. 49.

For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 605–637; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃183.]

[3. Adverse Possession ⊂⊃48.]

Occasional acts of trespass by others, even though claiming under color of title, and an action of trespass during the period, would not necessarily prevent the ripening of an adverse possession into title.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Love v. Turner, 78 S. C. 519, 59 S. E. 529.

For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 236; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃48.]

[4. Adverse Possession ⊂⊃46.]

Adverse possession must be peaceable, without force and violence, notorious and visible, and founded upon a claim of ownership; but it will not be broken by every trespass or claim by another inconsistent with a recognition of such adverse holding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 232–254; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃46.]

[This case is also cited in Duren v. Kee, 26 S. C. 221, 222, 2 S. E. 4, and Sparkman v. Jones, 81 S. C. 456, 62 S. E. 870, without specific application.]

Before Fraser, J., Lancaster, October, 1883.

*362

*This is a continuation of the case of Duren v. Strait, 16 S. C., 465, George Sinclair having been appointed administrator in place of S. L. Strait, executor, removed from office. It was an action to recover the value of certain timber alleged to have been cut and carried from plaintiff's land by John Sinclair, defendant's testator.

The points of evidence raised are sufficiently stated in the opinion. The judge refused to charge the jury that any acts of ownership by others than the plaintiff over the land claimed under color of title within the statutory period or any action for trespass thereon against him within such period will prevent his possession from ripening into title; but charged that for a possession to be peaceable in the contemplation of law it must be without force or violence, and might be peaceable even if during the statutory period there were occasional acts of trespass by others, even if they were claiming under some color of title, or even if actions of trespass were brought in consequence of the adverse possession of the party who claimed the benefit of it.

The jury found a verdict for plaintiff and from the judgment entered thereon defendant appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because the presiding judge, it is respectfully submitted, erred in holding that a certified copy of the record of the power of attorney alleged to have been executed in 1858 by one William Robinson to Wylie R. Duren could, upon notice, be introduced as part of the chain of title without any proof whatever of the execution of the said paper by the said Robinson.

2. Because the presiding judge, it is respectfully submitted, erred in holding that the record of the deed by Abden Alexander, sheriff, to Alexander Craig could not be introduced by the defendant as a copy of the original which was more than thirty years old, upon proof of loss of original, &c., but on the contrary held that only a certified copy of such record could be introduced under the act and after notice.

3. Because the presiding judge erred, it is respectfully submitted, in holding that the said record of the deed by Abden Alexander, sheriff, to Alexander Craig could not be introduced as color of title for the defendant upon proof of claim under the original and loss of the same.

*363

*4. Because the presiding judge erred, it is respectfully submitted, in refusing to charge the jury that any acts of ownership by others than the plaintiff over the land claimed under color of title, within the statutory period, or any action for trespass thereon against him within such period, would prevent his possession from ripening into title.

5. Because the presiding judge erred, it is respectfully submitted, in charging the jury that the peaceable possession which would confer title was any possession held without a breach of the peace and not by strong arm or force of numbers, and that the possession would be peaceable and confer title although within the statutory period others claiming adversely should be in possession of a part of the same land under color of title to the whole.

6. Because the presiding judge erred, it is respectfully submitted, in charging the jury that possession by the plaintiff for ten years under color of title, although within the ten years others were in possession under color of title covering the whole of the same land and claiming adversely to plaintiff continuously, would give title to the plaintiff not only to the part in actual possession but also to the limits of his color of title.

Mr. Ernest Moore, for appellant.

Messrs. R. E. & R. B. Allison, contra.

March 17, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The questions of law involved in this case, we think, can be understood without a statement of the facts. Such statement will therefore be omitted. The legal questions referred to are as follows:

1. Whether a certified copy of a power of attorney, under which a certain deed had been executed, and which had been recorded with the deed—both of which had been lost—could be introduced in evidence, the party offering it having made oath of the loss, and having given the ten days' notice as required, but offering no proof of its execution.

2. Whether the defendant or any party, in an action to recover *real estate, relying upon adverse possession with color of title, can be allowed to sustain his color of title by introducing the books of the register of mesne conveyance, showing the record of a certain deed covering the land, having made no proof of its loss, nor given any notice as required by General Statutes, §§ 2224–5.

*364

3. Where both parties claimed by adverse possession, whether it was error for the judge to refuse to charge "that any acts of ownership, by others than the plaintiff, over land claimed under color of title within the statutory period, or any action for trespass thereon against him within such period, will prevent his possession from ripening into title;" and in charging instead, "that for a possession to be peaceable in the contemplation of law, it must be without force or violence, and might be peaceable even if, during the statutory period, there were occasional acts of trespass by others, even if they were claiming under some color of title, or even actions of trespass were brought in consequence of the adverse possession of the party who claimed the benefit of it."

The Circuit judge held affirmatively as to the first proposition, and therefore admitted the certified copy of the power of attorney. He held negatively as to the second, and excluded the books of the register of mesne conveyance, and he declined to charge as requested in the first paragraph of the third, and charged as stated in the second paragraph. The verdict was for the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed upon six exceptions. The only questions raised, however, are substantially the questions mentioned above.

In sections 2224 and 2225, General Statutes, is found the authority for the introduction of certified office copies of grants, plats, and deeds of land in evidence, and section 2224 prescribes the conditions upon which such evidence may be introduced, which are that the persons so applying to produce such copy, must swear that the original is lost or destroyed, or out of his power to be produced, &c.; and ten days' notice must be given of the intention to offer said copy. The power of attorney, by virtue of which the deed relied on by the plaintiff was executed, was a part of said deed; it was recorded with the deed, and the *necessary oath and notice, as required in the sections supra, were made and given. We think, therefore, that the evidence was competent, notwithstanding there was no testimony of the execution of the power, such testimony not being required under said sections. Darby v. Huffman, 2 Rich., 532.

*365

In reference to the second question. The defendant proposed to introduce not a copy but the books of record, and that, too, without having laid the foundation by averring as to the loss and by giving the necessary notice as required in the act. We do not know by what authority such evidence could have been allowed. Certainly not by the sections above, for the simple reason that it was not proposed to introduce a copy as provided for therein, nor was any oath made as to the loss, &c., nor any notice given as to the intent. There was in fact not the slightest approach to a compliance with the requirements of the act in such case made and provided.

It is said, however, that it was not the purpose of the defendant to rely upon this deed as a link in his chain of titles, but simply to show a color of title as supplemental to his adverse possession. Be it so; and yet we cannot see how this should make any difference, or why this should relax the rules of evidence in such cases. The defendant desired to introduce this copy on the books to show the extent of his adverse holding. Certainly the original deed in which the boundaries of the land were described would have been the primary and best evidence of these boundaries, and was the evidence which the general rules of evidence demanded, and before the defendant could ask that these rules should be suspended in his behalf he should have brought himself under the act which provides for such suspension. This he failed to do entirely.

The point underlying the third question is whether where a plaintiff claims by adverse possession under color of title, any acts of ownership exerted by others over the land during the statutory period, or any and every action of trespass against him, will prevent such adverse possession from ripening into a title at the expiration of said period. His honor, Judge Fraser, charged upon this point that occasional acts of trespass by others, even though those others claimed under color of title, would not pre*vent the ripening of the adverse title of plaintiff, nor would an action of trespass during the period necessarily have that effect. Was this error? We think not. The foundation of title by adverse possession is the fact that the party holds possession by virtue of a claim of ownership and in his own right as contradistinguished from permission granted by another, the true owner; and while it may be true that certain acts of ownership exerted by others during the statutory period, submitted to by the plaintiff, or that an action of trespass under some circumstances might afford evidence that he was not holding as owner himself but by permission of the true owner, yet it would not be true that any act of ownership by another, or that any and every action of trespass, as the judge was requested to charge, would have that effect.

*366

We think the qualification given to this doctrine by the judge, in what he did charge, was correct. The possession must be peaceable, without force and violence, notorious and visible, and founded upon a claim of ownership, and occasional acts of trespass by others, and even an action brought against him, would not necessarily and under all circumstances prevent him from standing on his adverse possession and of obtaining title thereby. Each case must be governed by its own facts and circumstances, and what would be the law in reference to one state of facts might not be in reference to another. Adverse possession is one of the modes of acquiring title to land. At the beginning of such possession the actual title is in some one other than the adverse holder, i. e., the true owner. If he submits for the statutory period, the adverse holding ripens into a title against him and of course against all others, and the fact that others not being the true owner may have attempted during his possession to exercise some acts of ownership, or commit some trespass, or may have brought action of trespass against him and failed, would not prevent the title of the true owner from passing to him at the expiration of the statutory period.

We have not found in the "Case" that the judge charged as stated in exceptions five and six. In those exceptions the charge as stated therein is stronger than as found in the "Case." The judge does not seem to have been requested nor did he charge *upon the effect that would result where the defendant was in possession of a portion during the ten years with a color of title covering the whole as well as the plaintiff. The request to charge as found in the case did not raise this question. It simply raised the question of the effect of acts of ownership exerted by others during the possession of the plaintiff, and it claimed that any such act, whether occasional or otherwise, whether single or repeated, and any action brought, whether successful or not, would defeat the adverse possession. The judge responded to this request as herein above stated.

*367

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 367

NORWOOD & CO. v. FAULKNER.

(November Term, 1884.)

[Contracts ⇐64; Usury ⇐58.]

In consideration of an advance by plaintiffs, who were cotton factors, defendant agreed to repay the amount advanced with ten per cent. interest, and also to ship to plaintiffs two hundred bales of cotton, to be sold on commissions, and failing so to do, to pay commissions for every bale deficient. Held, that the agreement to pay commissions on bales not shipped did not render the contract usurious, and was supported by a sufficient consideration.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Witte v. Weinberg, 37 S. C. 593, 17 S. E. 681; Brown v. Brown, 38 S. C. 182, 17 S. E. 452.

For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 269; Dec. Dig. ⇐64; Usury, Cent. Dig. § 131; Dec. Dig. ⇐58.]

Before Wallace, J., Darlington, July, 1884.

This was an action by Norwood & Co. against L. Faulkner, commenced February 1, 1884, to foreclose a mortgage given to secure the payment of $1.25 a bale for 149 bales of cotton not shipped as required by contract. The mortgage secured a bond in the penal sum of $5,000, the condition of which was as follows:

That if the above bound L. Faulkner, his heirs, executors, and administrators, shall and do well and truly pay, or cause to be paid, unto the above named G. A. Norwood & Co., their certain attorneys, executors, administrators, or assigns, the full and just sum of twenty-five hundred dollars, if so much shall be advanced (or whatever sum or sums may be advanced) by them to me in moneys, merchandise, or other supplies or credits, to be evidenced *by my drafts, orders, and requests, and by their books, or otherwise, with factor's rate of interest on each advance from the time of the advance, by the first of December next; and shall also ship to them at least two hundred bales of cotton—commencing early in the season—to be sold by them on usual commission and applied to this indebtedness, or in default thereof to pay them the commissions on deficit shipment without fraud or further delay, then the above obligation to be void and of none effect, or else to remain in full force and virtue.

*368

The Circuit decree (omitting its statement of the case) was as follows:

There being mutual stipulations, from which benefit was expected by each, the contract was certainly not without consideration; and this agreement as to the shipment of cotton being a part of the contract, is supported by the consideration that supports the contract.

The second ground of defence is that the agreement in relation to the shipment of cotton makes the contract usurious. We have just seen that the contract is supported by a consideration; a failure to perform, therefore, by either would immediately raise in the other a right of action for damages. To recover damages, proof would be required as to the extent of the injury. It being stipulated between the parties, however, that if the defendant failed to perform that part of the contract in relation to the shipment of cotton, he would pay one dollar and twenty-five cents for each bale of the number not shipped according to agreement, this amount becomes liquidated damages. This has been expressly declared in the case of Williams & Co. v. Vance & Moseley, 9 S. C., 374 [30 Am. Rep. 26]. In that case a contract almost precisely similar to this was the ground of the action. Williams & Co. agreed to make advances to Vance & Moseley; Vance & Moseley agreed to pay interest on the advances and to ship cotton to Williams & Co., or to pay a stipulated sum for each bale not shipped, according to the agreement, just as in this case; they did not ship the number of bales they agreed to ship, just as in this case. Williams & Co. brought their action to foreclose for the payment of the balance due, and part of the balance was made up of the sum agreed to be paid upon the non-shipment of the number of bales agreed to be shipped. The court held in that case that the *agreement to pay one dollar and twenty-five cents for each bale not shipped was liquidated damages and recoverable, and I must so hold here.

*369

It is therefore adjudged, that plaintiffs have judgment for the sum of one hundred and eighty-six dollars and twenty-five cents. It is further ordered that plaintiffs have leave to apply at the foot of this decree for an order of foreclosure of the mortgage described in the complaint, and of the sale of the mortgaged premises.

Defendants appealed upon the following exceptions:

I. Because, it is respectfully submitted, that it was error for his honor, the presiding judge, finding as a matter of fact that "the agreement as to the shipment of cotton being a part of the contract, is supported by the consideration that supports the contract," to hold that the contract between plaintiffs and defendant was not usurious.

II. Because it was error for his honor to find that the covenant on the part of defendant to ship 200 bales of cotton to plaintiffs, to be sold by them on commission, was not a nudum pactum.

Messrs. Ward & Nettles, for appellant, contended that if the agreement to ship cotton was in consideration of the money advanced, the promise to pay $1.25 a bale for cotton not shipped was usurious; if not so supported, then there was no consideration at all for such promise; and they cited, 9 S. C., 374; 16 Stat., 325; 18 Stat., 35; Pars. Cont., 108; Bac. Abr., tit. Usury, 405, 409; Jones Mort., § 639; 17 Ves., 46; 13 Pet., 47; 15 S. C., 468; Tyl. Usury, 104, 105; 20 Am. Dec., 301.

Messrs. Edwards & Rankin, contra.

March 17, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiffs, who were factors and commission merchants, doing business in the city of Charleston, entered into an agreement with the defendant, doing business in Darlington County, whereby the plaintiffs were to make advances to defendant of money and supplies to an amount not exceeding *$2,500, and the defendant agreed to repay the same with interest at the rate of ten per centum per annum; and also agreed to ship to the plaintiffs at least two hundred bales of cotton to be sold by them on the usual commissions, shown by the evidence to be $1.25 per bale, or in default thereof to pay the like commissions on such number of bales as he might fail to ship. To secure the performance of these stipulations the defendant executed his bond and mortgage to the plaintiffs, which constitute the cause of action in this case. It is conceded that the defendant has repaid all the advances with interest, but having shipped only fifty-one bales of cotton the action is brought to recover the amount of the stipulated commissions on the one hundred and forty-nine bales which the defendant failed to ship according to contract.

*370

The defence is rested upon two grounds; first, that the contract, so far as the stipulation to pay commissions on the cotton not shipped is concerned, is usurious. Second, that such contract was without any consideration. The Circuit judge held otherwise and rendered judgment for the plaintiffs. From this judgment defendant appeals upon the same grounds.

First, was the contract usurious? The act of 1882 (18 Stat., 35,) forbids the taking of a greater rate of interest than seven per centum per annum "for the hiring, lending, or use of money or other commodity," except upon contracts in writing where the parties may stipulate for a rate not exceeding ten per cent. It is incumbent, therefore, upon the defendant to show that the charge for commissions was for the hire, loan, or use of money or other commodity, and this we think he has not shown. If this were so, then the plaintiffs would be converted from factors and commission merchants into mere money lenders, and there is nothing in the evidence to warrant us in so doing. The object of the contract, so far as the plaintiffs were concerned, was not merely to secure a return of the money which they might advance, or the amounts which they might expend in the purchase of supplies shipped to the defendant, with interest on the same, but also to promote their business in which their capital was invested and to which their personal services were devoted, besides the necessary outlays in the way of store rent, clerk hire, &c. Hence the contract obligated the defendant to do two things—to refund the *advances made to him with interest, and to ship the stipulated amount of cotton to the plaintiffs which they had prepared themselves to take charge of and sell, and in so doing had incurred expense not only in loss of time but in money actually paid out. The plaintiffs having thus equipped themselves for business as factors and commission merchants would very naturally endeavor to take all lawful means of extending their business as such, and, therefore, they very naturally required that the defendant should not only secure them the repayment of any advances they might make, with the lawful interest thereon, but, in order to forward their primary object required the defendant also to ship them cotton, the main staple of their business. These views are fully sustained by the cases of Matthews v. Coe, 70 N. Y., 239 (26 Am. Rep., 583,) and Cockle v. Flack, 93 U. S., 344 [33 L. Ed. 949], cited in the argument of the counsel for respondent. We are satisfied, therefore, that there was no error on the part of the Circuit judge in holding that there was no usury in the transaction.

*371

The only remaining inquiry is whether there was any consideration for the contract. The obligation of the defendant being under seal necessarily imported a consideration, but waiving that we think that the Circuit judge was right in holding that "there being mutual stipulations from which benefit was expected by each, the contract was certainly not without consideration." The defendant desired the plaintiffs to sell his cotton for him in Charleston, and this they agreed to do upon certain terms. In order to perform their part of the contract it was necessary for the plaintiffs to prepare themselves and hold themselves in readiness to receive and sell defendant's cotton as it was shipped to them, and necessarily involved, on their part, an expenditure of time and money. If the defendant incurred no liability by a failure to ship a part of the cotton which he agreed to ship to the plaintiffs, then he would incur no liability by a failure to ship any cotton at all; and if he could thus relieve himself from liability by a failure to perform his obligation, then all of the customers of the plaintiffs could do likewise, and this would certainly cause damage to the plaintiffs. It is clear, therefore, that the defendant would be liable to the plaintiffs for any damages which they might be able to show that they had sustained by reason of *the failure of the defendant to ship them the stipulated number of bales of cotton, if there had been no special contract between the parties fixing the amount of such damages. But in this case such special contract was entered into, which, it is conceded, under the case of Williams v. Vance (9 S. C., 344 [30 Am. Rep. 26]), was an agreement for the payment of liquidated damages, and not a mere penalty to secure the performance of the contract on the part of defendant.

*372

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 372

ZIMMERMAN v. McMAKIN.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Libel and Slander ⟸7.]

An allegation that "defendant, on January 7, 1882, in the city of S., and in the presence of T. and others, did falsely and maliciously defame and slander the plaintiff, by saying that she had sworn lies on that day before Trial Justice Thomason, on the trial of a cause in which one M. was plaintiff, and one Z. was defendant, thereby injuring the said plaintiff"—states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. If more particularity was desired, a motion should have been made, before trial, to require the allegations to be more definitely stated.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Whaley v. Lawton, 53 S. C. 583, 31 S. E. 660.

For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 56; Dec. Dig. ⟸7.]

[2. Libel and Slander ⟸112.]

In action of slander it is not incumbent on plaintiff to show, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant uttered the words charged, or their substance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 328; Dec. Dig. ⟸112.]

[3. Libel and Slander ⟸100.]

In action of slander it is not necessary to prove the words precisely as laid in the complaint, but it is sufficient to prove them substantially as laid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 246–256, 258–272, 291, 322, 323; Dec. Dig. ⟸100.]

[4. Libel and Slander ⟸100.]

There seems to be no substantial difference between the words, "public whore," charged in the complaint, and "whorish bitch," the words proved at the trial; and it should have been left to the jury to say whether the words proved were used in the sense of those alleged. The Circuit judge erred in charging, as matter of law, that they were not substantially the same.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hubbard v. Furman University, 76 S. C. 512, 515, 57 S. E. 478.

For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 269; Dec. Dig. ⟸100.]

Before Fraser, J., Spartanburg, March, 1884.

This was an action commenced February 20, 1882. The allegations of the complaint were as follows:

*373

*I. That the plaintiff, Rachael Zimmerman, is the wife of the plaintiff, Edward J. Zimmerman.

II. That the defendant, Elizabeth E. McMakin, is the wife of the defendant, Peter C. McMakin.

III. That after the plaintiff, Rachael Zimmerman, became the wife of the plaintiff, Edward J. Zimmerman, the defendant, Elizabeth E. McMakin, being then the wife of the defendant, Peter C. McMakin, and being in his presence, and encouraged by him, did, on the seventh day of January, 1882, in the city of Spartanburg, S. C., in the presence of one Isham Turbyfill, and a number of other persons, falsely and maliciously defame and slander the plaintiff, Rachael Zimmerman, by calling her a public whore, whereby said Rachael Zimmerman was injured in her reputation to the damage of plaintiffs, in the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars.

IV. That at the time and place aforesaid and in the presence and hearing of the persons aforesaid, the said Elizabeth E. McMakin, in the presence of, and encouraged by, her husband, the defendant, Peter C. McMakin, did falsely and maliciously defame and slander the plaintiff, Rachael Zimmerman, by saying that she, the said plaintiff, had sworn lies on that day before Trial Justice W. S. Thomason, on the trial of a cause in which one B. J. McMakin was plaintiff, and Edward J. Zimmerman was defendant, thereby injuring the said Rachael Zimmerman in her reputation, to the damage of plaintiffs as aforesaid.

Wherefore plaintiffs demand judgment against the defendants for the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars, and for costs and disbursements of this action.

The defendants denied each and every allegation of the complaint. Other matters are stated in the opinion. The judge charged the jury substantially as stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Duncan & Sanders, for appellant.
Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, contra.

March 23, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This is an action brought by the plaintiffs to recover damages for certain slanderous words alleged to have been spoken by the wife of defendant McMakin, of and concerning the wife of the plaintiff Zimmerman. The slander alleged in the third paragraph of the complaint was in calling *Mrs. Zimmerman "a public whore." In the fourth paragraph of the complaint, the slander alleged is that Mrs. Zimmerman

*374

"had sworn lies on that day before Trial Justice W. S. Thomason, on the trial of a cause in which one B. J. McMakin was plaintiff, and Edward J. Zimmerman was defendant." The defendants demurred to the fourth paragraph of the complaint, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, which demurrer was sustained. At the trial, the testimony on the part of the plaintiffs tended to show that Mrs. McMakin called Mrs. Zimmerman a "whorish bitch," with certain additional adjectives appended, much more forcible than polite, and also that she called her "an infernal, stinking whore," "a whore in most every form." On the part of the defendants, Mrs. McMakin testified that she did not use the words attributed to her above, but that she called Mrs. Zimmerman, a Moorish looking bitch or devil, she did not remember which.

The Circuit judge charged the jury that it was incumbent upon the plaintiffs "to show, by a preponderance of the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the words, or at least the substance of the words alleged to have been spoken, were used by the defendant;" that if they come to the conclusion that the charge made was that Mrs. Z. was "a whorish bitch," this would not be sufficient to establish the allegation of the complaint, for those words only indicate that she had the tendencies of character of a whore, but do not necessarily import that she was a whore. But if they come to the conclusion that the words used were that she was "a stinking whore," or an "infernal stinking whore," then those words, being substantially the same as the words "public whore," would be sufficient to support the allegation in the complaint.

The jury having rendered a verdict in favor of the defendants, and they having entered judgment thereon, the plaintiffs appeal substantially on the following grounds: 1. Because of error in sustaining the demurrer. 2. Because of error in charging that the plaintiffs must prove the words as alleged in the complaint, or at least their substance, beyond a reasonable doubt. 3. Because of error in instructing the jury that the words

*375

"whorish *bitch" were not sufficient to establish the allegation of the complaint.

As is said in several of our cases, even prior to the adoption of the code, the strictness formerly required both in regard to the pleading and evidence in actions for slander has been much relaxed in modern times; and certainly since the adoption of the code, no court can be expected to require a strict adherence to those rigid rules which at one time prevailed. As is said in Pomeroy on Remedies, § 549: "The true doctrine to be gathered from all the cases is that if the substantial facts which constitute a cause of action are stated in a complaint or petition, or can be inferred by reasonable intendment from the matters which are set forth, although the allegation of these facts are imperfect, incomplete, and defective, such insufficiency pertaining, however, to the form rather than to the substance, the proper mode of correction is, not by demurrer, nor by excluding evidence at the trial, but by a motion, before the trial, to make the averments more definite and certain by amendment." This doctrine has been distinctly recognized in this state. Childers v. Verner, 12 S. C., 1.

Now, testing the fourth paragraph of the complaint by this rule, we do not think it was demurrable upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The allegation was that Mrs. Zimmerman had sworn lies before a certain trial justice, on the trial of a cause in which certain persons named were parties. This was in effect a charge of perjury, for it was not simply a charge that Mrs. Z. had sworn falsely, but that the false oath was taken before an officer competent to administer an oath, and in a judicial proceeding, to wit, a trial of a cause. The defendant certainly could not have been misled or misinformed as to the nature of the charge; and if any more particularity in the statement of the facts was desired, then, under the rule which we have cited, the proper mode of attaining that end was by a motion, before the trial, to require the plaintiffs to make a more specific statement. Even under the former and more strict system of pleading, it was held, in the case of Simpson v. Vaughan (2 Strobh., 40), that it was not necessary, in an action for slander for charging the plaintiff with false swearing, "to so charge and state the false swearing, in the pre*liminary part of the declaration, as would be necessary in an indictment for perjury. Still, enough ought to appear, in words or by legal intendment, to show an oath in a court of justice." In this case it did appear, if not in words, certainly by legal intendment, that the oath was taken in a court of justice.

*376

So in a case like the one now under consideration, Dalrymple v. Lofton (2 McMull., 112), it was held that it was not necessary to aver in the declaration that the justice had jurisdiction of the cause in which the plaintiff was sworn as a witness, or that his testimony was on a point material to the issue, for these things will be presumed until the contrary is made to appear. So when the same case subsequently came before the court, as reported in 2 Speer, 588, it appeared that the allegation was, "You swore falsely on the trial of a case between me and Jerry Joiner before Squire Johnson," it was held that the words spoken did not per se impute the guilt of perjury, because the addition of "squire" to the name of Johnson did not impute that he was an officer competent to administer an oath; but if the words "court," or "magistrate," or "justice," had been used, the crime of perjury would have been imputed; "but in the absence of any word aptly denoting a court or judicial officer, the word 'squire' or 'esquire,' which is unknown to our law, and is, by the usage of our society, applied without any just discrimination, can be of no avail." In the present case, however, the word trial justice was used, a word which denotes a judicial officer, competent to administer an oath, with jurisdiction for the trial of causes.

The case of Morgan v. Livingston (2 Rich., 573) is cited by counsel for respondents to show that the words "you swore a lie," or "he swore a lie," are not actionable per se, nor can an action be maintained for the use of such words by an innuendo that they were intended to impute perjury, but that there must be an averment and colloquium of a judicial proceeding to which such words referred. This, no doubt, is good law, for it is not every false swearing which constitutes perjury. In that case the words were introduced by a colloquium, in which was set out a suit before a magistrate between certain parties, in which the plaintiff was examined as a witness, and that defendant, speaking of his testimony so given, said to the plaintiff, "you swore a *lie," and that allegation was held sufficient. In the present case, however, the allegation was not simply that Mrs. Z. had sworn lies, in which case some prefatory averment would have been necessary to connect such false swearing with a judicial proceeding, but here the words used were that the plaintiff "had sworn lies on that day before trial justice W. S. Thomason, on the trial of a cause in which one B. J. McMakin was plaintiff and Edward J. Zimmerman was defendant;" and inasmuch as the words used, of themselves, showed that the false swearing was before an officer competent to administer an oath in the course of a judicial proceeding—the trial of a cause—there certainly could be no necessity for introducing such words by a prefatory averment, or colloquium, in which the very same facts should be stated as appear in the words themselves. We are satisfied, therefore, that the Circuit judge erred in sustaining the demurrer to the fourth paragraph of the complaint.

*377

The next question is as to that portion of the charge in which the Circuit judge instructed the jury that it was incumbent on the plaintiffs "to show by a preponderance of the evidence the fact, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the words, or at least the substance of the words alleged to have been spoken, were used by the defendant." The point of the objection is that the jury were instructed that the burden was on the plaintiff, to show not only by a preponderance of the evidence, but "beyond a reasonable doubt," that the words alleged, or their substance, were spoken by the defendant. In this we think there was error, as the distinction between civil and criminal cases seems to have been overlooked. The well settled rule in the former class of cases is, that it is sufficient for the plaintiff to establish his case by a preponderance of the evidence, and that he is not, as in criminal cases, bound to establish it beyond a reasonable doubt. This long established and well settled rule was disregarded when the jury were told that the plaintiffs must establish the words alleged, not merely by a preponderance of the evidence, but also "beyond a reasonable doubt;" and inasmuch as it seemed to be a question of great importance in the view taken by the Circuit judge, whether the words used were those testified to by Mrs. Z., or those testified to by other witnesses, it is not unlikely *that the plaintiffs sustained prejudice from this erroneous instruction.

*378

The only remaining inquiry is, whether there was any error in instructing the jury that if they came to the conclusion that the words "whorish bitch," and not the words "public whore," or "stinking whore," or "infernal stinking whore," were the words actually used, then the allegation of the complaint was not sustained and the action could not be maintained. There is no doubt that it is not necessary to prove the words precisely as laid in the complaint, but that it will be sufficient to prove them substantially as laid; and this rule was recognized by the Circuit judge in this case. Now the practical question in this case is whether there is any substantial difference between calling a female a public whore or calling her a whorish bitch. In Webster's Unabridged Dictionary the word "whore" is defined: "A woman who practices unlawful sexual commerce with men, especially one who does it for hire; a harlot," and the synonyms given are "harlot, courtesan, prostitute, strumpet, punk, wench, concubine." His definition of the word "whorish" is: "Resembling a whore in character or conduct; addicted to unlawful sexual pleasures; incontinent; lewd; unchaste." In Worcester's Unabridged Dictionary the word "whore" is defined: "A woman who practices illicit intercourse with men for hire; a prostitute; a harlot; a concubine; a strumpet; a punk." And his definition of the word "whorish" is "unchaste; lewd; incontinent." In view of these definitions, and in view of what we suppose would be the common understanding of such terms, we confess that we are unable to see any substantial difference between them.

But aside from this, and whatever may be the strictly correct definitions of these unsavory words, we think there was error on the part of the Circuit judge in instructing the jury as matter of law that these words were not substantially the same. In Hogg ads. Wilson (1 Nott & McC., 216) it is said: "Words are to be construed according to their most obvious meaning and import; and courts and juries cannot understand them differently from all the world besides. That they shall be substantially proved as charged is all that can or ought to be required. Could any person understand the words proved in this case in any other sense *than as conveying a direct charge of hog stealing?" In Sawyer ads. Eifert (2 Nott & McC., 511 [10 Am. Dec. 633]) the action was for slander in charging the plaintiff with having stolen iron and steel from defendant. In one count the defendant was charged with having spoken the words by way of interrogation, and in the other with having accused him directly of the larceny. The proof was that the words were spoken interrogatively. In delivering the opinion of the court, Nott, J., said: "It is now very well settled that words are to be construed by a court and jury in the same manner as they were, or ought to have been, understood or construed by the person to whom they were spoken. A person may convey a charge of felony as well by way of question as by a direct allegation. And it must always be a question of construction whether such is his meaning or not. The question was therefore properly referred to the jury." In Davis v. Johnston (2 Bail., 579) it is said: "The rule in verbal slander, as to the construction of words, is that they are to be understood in their ordinary and popular meaning. If words are susceptible of two meanings, one imputing a crime and the other innocent, the latter is not to be adopted and the other rejected, as a matter of course. In such a case, it must be left to the jury to decide in what sense the defendant used them. Their conclusion must be formed from the whole of the circumstances attending the publication, including the sense in which the witnesses understood the words."

*379

In Morgan v. Livingston (2 Rich., 573), the words alleged to have been used, in one of the counts, as imputing a charge of larceny, were: "You hired a negro to kill a beef and bring it to you; you are a sheep-killing son of a bitch; you make your living at night when honest people are abed; you get your living by sneaking about of nights; you stole a beef; you are a roguish rascal; you stole some hogs; you got some hogs dishonestly." The proof was that the words used were, "You get your living by sneaking about when other people are asleep. What did you do with the sheep you killed? Did you eat it? It was like the beef you got negroes to bring you at night. Where did you get the little wild shoats you always have in your pen?" The witness, who proved these words, was asked what he understood by them, and he replied that he understood the defendant to charge the plain*tiff with stealing. The defendant appealed upon the grounds, amongst others, that the words proved were not those laid in the declaration; that the words proved were not actionable; and that whether the words proved impute the charge of larceny, should have been decided by the court, and that it was error to permit the witness to prove his understanding of the words. All of these grounds were overruled, the court saying: "It is not necessary that the words, in terms, should charge a larceny. If taking them altogether, in their popular meaning, such is the necessary inference, then there is no doubt that they are actionable. * * * But if the words were doubtful and ambiguous, the plaintiff had the right to inquire of the bystanders, how did you understand the words? And if they said they understood them as charging larceny, and such understanding might fairly have been received from the words, it would prevent a non-suit, and make it necessary for the jury to inquire, did the defendant use the words in the offensive sense in which the hearers understood them?" In this case the language quoted above, from Davis v. Johnston, supra, is repeated with approval.

*380

It seems to us, therefore, that the Circuit judge erred in instructing the jury, as matter of law, that the words "whorish bitch," were not substantially the same as those laid in the complaint, and that it should have been left to the jury to say whether those words were used in the sense of those contained in the complaint, and whether they substantially conveyed the same imputation.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

---

22 S. C. 380

CORLEY v. HOLLOWAY.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Death ⇦2.]

When a person has been shown to be alive at a certain period, the presumption is that he continued to live for at least seven years; but when he has been missing and has not been heard from during that period of time, then the presumption is the other way.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. §§ 1–3; Dec. Dig. ⇦2.]

*381

[2. Death ⇦2.]

*Whether the death of a person not heard from for seven years occurred at the beginning or end of that period is a matter to be determined upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case, the burden of proof being upon him whose interest it is to fix the death prior to the expiration of the seven years.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. ⇦2.]

3. Naisor v. Brockaway, Rich. Eq. Cas., 449, disapproved.

[4. Appeal and Error ⇐1012.]

The decision of the Circuit judge that the person here not heard from in seven years did not die at the beginning of that period, was a finding of fact in a chancery case, and is approved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3990; Dec. Dig. ⇐1012.]

[5. Appeal and Error ⇐843.]

Where the Circuit judge, in reaching his conclusions did not consider certain testimony admitted by the master, this court declined to pass upon its competency.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3331-3341; Dec. Dig. ⇐843.]

[6. Tenancy in Common ⇐28.]

A tenant-in-common cannot be called upon by a co-tenant to pay rent during the time of occupancy before action brought, it not appearing that the occupant cultivated more than her share, and all the owners, including plaintiff, having permitted her to use the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. §§ 76-88; Dec. Dig. ⇐28.]

Before Cothran, J., Edgefield, June, 1884.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree, after stating the facts, continued as follows:

The main question involved in the case, growing out of the foregoing statement of facts, is an exceedingly nice one, and I have to regret that the extraordinary pressure upon my time forbids much more than a statement of the conclusions attained. At the hearing, the famous case of Pell v. Ball, first reported in Cheves Equity, 99, was constantly in my mind, and I looked forward with pleasure to the preparation of this decree, which I now find must be so hastily and perfunctorily done.

I assume at the outset, as a well settled proposition of law, that as the plaintiff's claim here depends upon the death of Henry W. before the demise of their child in January, 1865, which she affirms, that the burden of proof is upon her to establish this as a fact, in order that she may acquire the enlarged inheritance. It may with equal confidence be assumed as settled law that when one is proven to have been alive at a particular time, the presumption in favor of continued existence holds until broken down by proof of death or of seven years of absence and unheard of. It is not enough to show that the absent party was exposed to great danger, not even in battle when thousands perished. For the *fact is even more notorious now than when the ill-fated Pulaski foundered at sea, that in the most desperate engagements, thousands survive the casualties of battle. Some are killed, more are wounded, and still more survive as captured or as vanquished.

*382

The testimony of Captain Holloway and of Rufus Harling, so full and so singularly perspicuous upon this point, is not only insufficient to break down the legal presumption of continued life, but it goes, I might venture to say, to the extent of proving satisfactorily the affirmative proposition that Henry W. was captured at Deep Bottom; and it being contrary to the usages of civilized warfare to take the lives of prisoners, the negative proposition, that he was not killed, is inferentially proven. Captain Holloway says, substantially, that the first advance of the brigade was made through a corn-field, under a scattering fire, the alignment was broken, and a halt was made at the fence to rectify it. Here Pick Holloway was wounded, and Henry W. was ordered to take him to the rear. The charge was renewed through an old field for 100 or 150 yards, and the line becoming again deranged, was halted and reformed in a ravine. Captain H. was wounded then and went to the rear. In the meantime, or soon afterwards, Henry W. regained his place in ranks. Rufus Harling concurs in this description of the situation, and takes up the thread at the ravine from which Captain H. had retired wounded, and says that he and Henry were together some thirty paces in advance of the main line; that they could not see the enemy from the ravine, and that he and Henry ascended the hill beyond, so that they might see and shoot them. The firing had ceased, and whilst upon this eminence, on looking to his right, he discovered that our people had retreated, and he saw the enemy advancing upon his right and in rear of him. He called Henry's attention to this, and hastily retreated, leaving Henry there. He crossed back over the ravine and ran the gauntlet of the approaching Federals; was called to by them to halt and was fired at, but escaped unhurt. He saw no more of Henry, who was left on the other side of the ravine, and in a place of comparative safety. He further says that he retreated as rapidly as possible, and knows that if he had not done so, he would have been captured. He saw no effort made by

*383

Henry to escape. There was no *firing, he thinks, beyond the ravine, directly at Henry and himself.

In view of all this and more, I am unable to resist the conclusion that the proof fails to establish the proposition that Henry W. was killed at Deep Bottom. The master has reported in the testimony set up proof of a very extraordinary incident, to which the plaintiff, by her counsel, duly objected. I am inclined to believe that the testimony referred to is competent, but as it is doubtful in its character, as being obnoxious to the rule as to hearsay evidence, I have attained a conclusion without its aid. I shall, nevertheless, reproduce it here in the very words of the witness, as a curious incident, having the verisimilitude of truth itself and as confirming the conclusion already attained. Greenleaf says: "All rules of evidence are adopted for practical purposes in the administration of justice, and must be so applied as to promote the ends for which they were designed." §§ 83, 348.

W. V. Corley, sworn, says: That he belonged to same company that H. W. Holloway did. Witness was a teamster. Question: Where, when, and what did you hear of H. W. Holloway after the battle of Deep Bottom? Answer: Witness had been out after some forage, between Petersburg and Richmond, in March, 1865. On witness's return, a man belonging to the 14th or 24th North Carolina regiment came up with witness, and noticing the regiment and brigade on the wagon sheet to which witness belonged, said to witness: "Do you know a man by the name of Henry Holloway belonging to that regiment?" (1st South Carolina). Witness told him yes, that he belonged to the company witness belonged to. To which he replied: "Do you know anything of Henry Holloway now?" Witness replied: "No, I do not; he was taken missing at the battle of Deep Bottom." And asked him: "How do you know anything of Henry Holloway?" He replied: "We were in prison together, and he told me that he had a brother in that company by the name of Pickens Holloway; that he (the North Carolinian) had been exchanged, and that Henry came within three or four numbers of being exchanged also; that he had just been exchanged, and was then on his way to his command." As soon as witness got back to headquarters of wagon team, he got permission from the quar*termaster and went to Captain Holloway and reported to him what he had heard as stated concerning Henry Holloway. The whole company was under the opinion that Henry had been captured; the battle-field had been searched and he had not been found. Captain Holloway, upon being recalled, stated that W. V. Corley did report to him the information he had received about Henry as stated in his testimony.

*384

As to the rents: It appears from the testimony that the children all agreed that their mother should be allowed to live upon the land—the old homestead—as long as she pleased to do so, and without any accountability for rent. In this arrangement the plaintiff, although not actively participating, was consulted, and said that she would not be contrary about it. This was equivalent to assent, and certainly barred her until demand for rents was made, which was on August 29, 1883, the day that this suit was begun. The plaintiff is not entitled to interest.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed as follows: 1. That the writ of partition be issued according to law, for the purpose of making partition of the premises in question amongst the several parties in interest and according to their respective rights as herein adjudged, &c.

The plaintiff appealed upon exceptions alleging the following errors in the Circuit decree: 1. In decreeing that from the evidence and circumstances in the case, Henry W. Holloway was not killed at Deep Bottom on July 28, 1864, and therefore did survive his child by the plaintiff herein. 2. In not decreeing that the testimony of W. V. Corley was incompetent. 3. In decreeing that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover rents previous to August 29, 1883. 4. In not sustaining the exceptions of the plaintiff to the testimony of Capt. W. Holloway when called as a witness by the defendants to corroborate the evidence of W. V. Corley. 5. In not sustaining all of the exceptions by the plaintiff to the master's report.

Mr. C. W. Creighton, for appellant.
Messrs. Sheppard Bros., contra.

*385

*March 23, 1885. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIver. Ransom Holloway, being seized and possessed of the land, which is the subject of contention in this case, departed this life intestate on May 14, 1862, leaving as his heirs at law his widow and eight children. One of these children, Henry W. Holloway, intermarried with the plaintiff, who bore to him two children, one of whom died in September, 1862, and the other in January, 1865. This is a proceeding for the partition of the said land, in which a claim is made that the widow of the intestate shall account for the rents and profits thereof, under the allegation that she has enjoyed the exclusive use of the land. Henry W. Holloway was a soldier in the Confederate army and disappeared at the battle of Deep Bottom on July 28, 1864, and has not since been heard from. The plaintiff claims that he was killed in that battle, and that his share of his father's estate, as well as his share of the estate of his two brothers, who died intestate after their father, one in May, 1862, and the other in May, 1864, descended to her as his widow and his child, and that by the subsequent death of the child in January, 1865, the whole interest became vested in her. This claim is disputed by the defendants, who allege that there is no evidence sufficient to show that Henry W. Holloway predeceased his child, and hence that the plaintiff, as his widow, is only entitled to one-half of his estate, and his next of kin to the other half. They also dispute the claim for an account of the rents and profits from the widow. The Circuit judge sustained the positions taken by the defendants and rendered judgment accordingly. From this judgment plaintiff appeals upon the various grounds set out in the "Case."

The main question in the case is whether Henry W. Holloway predeceased his child, who died in January, 1865, and this really turns upon the question whether the evidence shows that Henry W. Holloway was killed at the battle of Deep Bottom, on July 28, 1864. There is no direct evidence of this fact, but the plaintiff claims that it must be inferred from the fact that he was then last seen, and has not been heard from since—a period much more than seven years. The rule, as we understand it, is that *when a person has been shown to be alive at a certain period, the presumption is that he continued to live for at least seven years; but that when he has been missing, and has not been heard from during that period of time, then the presumption is the other way. But these are both mere presumptions of fact, capable of being rebutted by evidence of such facts or circumstances as will be sufficient to induce a different conclusion. From this follows another rule, that the burden of proof is upon him who undertakes to overthrow the presumption. For example, a party who claims that a certain individual was dead at a certain time, prior to the expiration of the period of seven years from the time when he was last heard from, must overcome the presumption of continuance of life, for that period of time, by evidence of such facts and circumstances as will be sufficient to rebut such presumption. But on the other hand, when a party claims that a certain person was alive after the expiration of seven years from the time when such person was last heard from, the burden of proof is upon him to show such facts and circumstances as will be sufficient to rebut the presumption of death arising from his being absent and not heard from for a period of seven years. This latter presumption, however, does not fix absolutely the time of the death, either at the end, or at the commencement, of the period of the seven years, but that is a matter to be determined by the facts and circumstances of each particular case. These principles are fully sustained by the elementary writers, as well as by our own cases. 2 Stark. Evid., 457–8; 1 Greenl. Evid., § 41; 2 Ibid, § 278f; Chapman v. Cooper, 5 Rich., 452; Canady v. George, 6 Rich. Eq., 103.

*386

In Godfrey v. Schmidt (Cheves Eq., 57), the question whether a person absent and not heard from for a period of seven years, is to be presumed to have died at the commencement, or at the expiration, of that period, is left open, and authorities are cited both ways. The only case in this state, however, which is cited to sustain the doctrine that the presumption is that the death took place at the commencement of the seven years, is a Circuit decision of Harper, Ch., in Naisor v. Brockaway, Rich. Eq. Cas., 449; while, on the other hand, the Court of Appeals in the case of Craig v. Craig (Bail.

*387

Eq., 102) fixed the time of the death *at the expiration of the period of seven years. The view taken by Chancellor Harper, in his Circuit decision above cited, is evidently not sustained by the more recent cases, and is not sustained by reason. As is said by Wardlaw, J., in his separate opinion in Chapman v. Cooper, supra, in speaking of this question as to whether the time of the death is to be fixed at the beginning or the termination of the seven years: "To fix the time at the end of the seven years would be almost always contrary to the fact; to fix it at the beginning, immediately after the continuance of life had been positively ascertained, would be plainly contrary to truth and common-sense. Circumstances may enable a jury to say when it took place, or that it preceded a given event within the seven years. But there must be some circumstances to overcome the presumption that life continues for at least seven years; or if that presumption has been overcome by the lapse of the seven years, to fix at one period rather than another, the time of death left wholly uncertain; and these circumstances must be shown by the party whose interest it is to establish the time of death anterior to the expiration of the seven years."

Considering this case, then, in the light of these principles the question presented is really a question of fact, and under the well settled rule the conclusion reached by the Circuit judge must be sustained, unless it is without any testimony to sustain it, or is manifestly against the weight of the evidence. We not only do not think that this is the case, but we fully concur in the conclusion reached by Judge Cothran, and deem it scarcely necessary to attempt to add anything to what he has so well said. To sustain the claim of the plaintiff, it was necessary for her to show that Henry W. Holloway died prior to January, 1865, when her child died; and the burden of proof was upon her to show this fact. Practically she was bound to show, by the preponderance of the evidence, that her husband was killed in the battle of Deep Bottom; but, in our opinion, the testimony rather tends to show that he was captured, and not killed, in that battle. He had passed through the thickest of the fight unharmed, and when last seen he was at a place where there was but slight danger of his being killed by the bullets of the enemy, but where he was in *the greatest danger of being captured, and the natural inference would be that he was captured. If the testimony had been that, when last seen, he was going into battle where many were killed, there might have been good ground for the inference that he was killed. Such, however, is not the testimony; but, on the contrary, the testimony tends to show that when he was last seen the battle was practically over, or at least was not raging at the spot where he was seen alive and unharmed, and that the real danger to which he was exposed, was capture and not death. But we do not propose to discuss the testimony, being quite willing to adopt the view of it taken by the Circuit judge.

*388

The next question raised by the grounds of appeal, is as to the competency of the testimony of W. V. Corley, in regard to his interview with a member of a North Carolina regiment on his return from prison, in which he learned that he and Henry W. Holloway had been in prison together, and as to the competency of Capt. Holloway's testimony, in which he stated that W. V. Corley had communicated the fact of such interview to him, upon his return to camp. Inasmuch as this testimony was not ruled competent by the Circuit judge, and as he says expressly that he did not consider it in reaching his conclusion, we do not see how it can afford any basis for a ground of appeal. Whether the testimony was competent or incompetent (about which we do not wish to be understood as intimating any opinion), is wholly immaterial, for practically the judge did rule it out.

The only remaining inquiry is as to the claim for rents and profits. It is quite clear that this claim cannot be allowed. In the first place, it does not appear satisfactorily that the widow cultivated more than her share of the land, and, in the second place, the testimony shows that she used the land by the permission and acquiescence of all the heirs, including the plaintiff, and this alone would be sufficient to exclude her claim for rents prior to demand, which was not made until this action was commenced; and that she has been allowed.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. *389

*TEMPLETON v. LOWRY.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Ejectment ⟸145; Improvements ⟸4.]

Under the express terms of the statute, a party after verdict against him for recovery of land, is entitled to recover the value of all improvements made upon the land, where he supposed, at the time of his purchase, that he had a good title in fee, not excluding those made after subsequent knowledge of title in another.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Tumbleston v. Rumph, 43 S. C. 280, 21 S. E. 84; Bethea v. Allen, 85 S. E. 904.

For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. § 478; Dec. Dig. ⟸145; Improvements, Cent. Dig. § 14; Dec. Dig. ⟸4.]

[2. Ejectment ⟸142; Improvements ⟸4.]

Whether such party so supposed is a question of fact. In determining this question, his knowledge of facts which in law render his title defective, is a circumstance to be considered, but does not in itself show that he did not suppose his title to be in fee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. § 501; Dec. Dig. ⟸142; Improvements, Cent. Dig. §§ 25, 26; Dec. Dig. ⟸4.]

[3. Judgment ⟸715.]

The verdict in the action for the recovery of the land, and for damages, was no adjudication of the issue here raised, as to improvements by clearings on the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1244–1246; Dec. Dig. ⟸715.]

Before Fraser, J., York, November, 1883.

Action by John M. Templeton against John T. Lowry, to recover under the betterment law for the value of improvements. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. G. J. Patterson and Hart & Hart, for appellants.

Mr. Stanyarne Wilson, contra.

March 23, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The facts of this case, out of which the questions presented for our consideration arise, are substantially as follows. In June, 1875, a tract of land containing 228 acres was sold as the property of Bratton under executions against Allison & Bratton, and bought by Adickes & McGill, the lien of the judgments upon which these executions were issued extending as far back as the fall of 1873. The defendant, Lowry, was in possession of a portion, at least, of this land at the time of this sale, and held a deed from Bratton, dated April 30, 1875, and recorded June 14, 1875, but he claimed to have gone into possession in January, 1872, under a bond for titles from Bratton. In December, 1875, Adickes & McGill conveyed without warranty to the plaintiff, Templeton, 106 acres of said land, and he went immediately into possession, *and made improvements upon the portion thus conveyed to him. The land was uncleared, except one or two acres, and was all unenclosed when Templeton bought.

*390

At that time the defendant, Lowry, had tenants on the portion which was not sold to Templeton; but the testimony is somewhat conflicting as to whether he had any possession of the part conveyed to Templeton. Lowry testified that he "was cultivating some land on the part included in Templeton's deed from Adickes & McGill;" but this is denied by Templeton. It seems that Adickes & McGill brought an action against Lowry to recover possession of the whole tract, and we infer from the report of the case, in 12 S. C. Rep., 97, that they failed to recover, by reason of the fact that Lowry had gone into possession under a contract to purchase from Bratton prior to the time when the judgments, under which the land was sold, became a lien, although his deed was dated subsequent to that time. After this Adickes & McGill refunded to Templeton the purchase money paid them for the 106 acres, and in an action brought by Lowry to recover possession of the 106 acres "and for damages for cutting and removing timber from the premises," the jury found the land for Lowry, and three hundred dollars damages. Thereupon this proceeding was instituted by Templeton for betterments under the statute.

The defendant requested the Circuit judge to charge the jury as follows: "1. If you shall find that Templeton had actual notice of Lowry's title when he bought and entered, or had notice of such facts in regard thereto as would put a man of ordinary prudence on inquiry, then his purchase and entry were in bad faith, and he is not entitled to recover in this issue." This request was refused except with the following qualification. "Unless he had made due inquiry, and he was not able to find any ground for the counterclaim." "2. If you shall find that Lowry was in possession of this land by his tenants at the time Templeton bought and entered, this is such a fact as would put a prudent man on inquiry, and a disregard thereof is such evidence of bad faith in Templeton that he is not entitled to recover in this issue." This request was likewise refused except with this proviso: "If he had the whole land under fence, or was in the actual and constant use of *it in reference to well known natural boundaries." "3. In no event can you allow anything to the plaintiff for clearing lands, inasmuch as that has already been adjudicated by the verdict in the previous action for damages against plaintiff." His honor refused this request, saying, "Nothing in the other verdict can be considered here." 4. The last request was that the jury should be instructed that "virtual or actual possession of land, under color of title, is evidence of right of so high a character that he who disregards it and steals unawares into the possession of any part of it, can only rebut the legal presumption, thence arising, of bad faith, by proving title in himself, which plaintiff has failed to do." This request was refused.

*391

The jury was instructed "that plaintiff could recover for value of improvements put upon this land after he had notice of defendant's title, provided his original purchase and entry were in good faith, and provided the notice was received after the purchase and entry." The jury having found a verdict for the plaintiff, the defendant appealed on the ground of error in refusing to charge the several propositions requested, and in charging that the plaintiff might recover for improvements put upon the land after notice of defendant's title.

This is a proceeding under a special statute, which reads as follows: "That after final judgment in an action to recover lands and tenements in favor of the plaintiff, if the defendant has purchased the lands and tenements recovered in such action * * * supposing at the time of such purchase such title to be good in fee * * * such defendant shall be entitled to recover of the plaintiff in such action the full value of all improvements made upon such land by such defendant," &c. A careful consideration of the terms of this statute, which the courts have no right to abridge or extend, will show conclusively that none of the grounds of appeal can be sustained. It may be that the statute should have been more carefully framed and its operation limited, but of this we are not the judges. That belongs to another department of the government whose province we have no power or desire to encroach upon. By the express terms of the statute the condition upon which the party making the improvements is entitled to recover is declared in language which *admits of no doubt as to its meaning, and which, therefore, affords no room for construction or inference. That condition is that the person from whom land has been recovered shall have purchased a title to the same, "supposing at the time of such purchase such title to be good in fee." The statute makes no provision or exception for a case in which the purchaser shall afterwards obtain notice or even knowledge that the title was in another, but the only thing necessary to his recovery is that he supposed, at the time of his purchase, that the title he was purchasing was a good title in fee.

*392

This must necessarily be a question of fact, for it cannot be doubted for a moment that a person may in the best faith purchase a title which he honestly supposed to be good, but which turns out, as matter of law, to be bad. Indeed, the very purpose of the statute was to relieve in just such a case. Every man is presumed to know the law, and to say that if he knew, even at the time of his purchase, certain facts, which the court subsequently determines were sufficient, as matter of law, to show that the title he was purchasing was not good, and therefore that he had no right to suppose that the title was good, would defeat the manifest object of the act. Of course, the proof of such facts might, and in some cases undoubtedly would, have a very strong bearing upon the question whether he really and honestly supposed at the time of his purchase that he was procuring a good title, but they could not be said, as matter of law, to be conclusive, for the question is, as we have said, a question of fact to be determined by that branch of the court entrusted with the trial of such issues.

So, too, the question as to what a party is entitled to recover is not left in any doubt, for the statute expressly declares that he is entitled to recover the value of all improvements made upon the land by the party from whom it has been recovered. There is no limitation as to the time when such improvements may have been made, whether before or after notice, or even knowledge of title in another. Here again there may possibly be room for legislative action, but certainly none for the action of the court. In fact, it might prove a very difficult task to fix any definite limit. It certainly would not do to say that where one has in *good faith bought and paid for a tract of land, honestly believing that he had obtained a good title and has commenced the construction of improvements, say the building of a dwelling house, he should be compelled to suspend the work when half complete, or run the risk of losing the value of what he might subsequently add, simply because he has received notice that some one else claims the land. But it is not for us to suggest difficulties that might arise in the attempt to improve upon the terms of the statute. We are simply called upon to administer the law as we find it written.

*393

These views, it seems to us, dispose of the first, second, and fourth requests to charge, for they are all based upon the assumption that the question of whether Templeton supposed at the time of his purchase that he was obtaining a good title was a question of law, and not a mere question of fact. The Circuit judge could not have charged any one of these requests without first assuming to determine what would be sufficient evidence to show that Templeton did not suppose that he was obtaining a good title. If the requests had been that the jury should be told that the circumstances therein mentioned should be considered by them and given due weight in determining the question whether Templeton supposed he was buying a good title, then they would have been unexceptionable; but they could not properly be told that any one or more of these circumstances were conclusive, and if established would defeat Templeton's right to recover.

The third request was also properly refused. The verdict in the former case only established the right of Lowry to recover the land and the damages he had sustained "for cutting and removing timber from the premises." That was the only thing he sued for, and the question at issue in this case could not arise or be determined in that case.

The only remaining ground of appeal complains of error in instructing the jury that plaintiff could recover for improvements put upon the land after notice of defendant's title, provided his original purchase and entry were in good faith, and provided the notice was received after purchase and entry. This is disposed of by what we have already said. The statute does not limit the *recovery to those improvements put upon the land before notice of another's title, and we think the Circuit judge in his charge to the jury simply followed the terms of the statute.

*394

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 394

BOMAR v. EZELL.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Executors and Administrators ⟸537.]

Under the practice prevailing in 1859, in action by the ordinary on an administration bond after decree, the parties at whose instance the action was prosecuted were required to endorse their names on the record, and only they could claim any rights in the action, or be liable for the costs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2453, 2485–2581; Dec. Dig. ⟸537.]

[2. Executors and Administrators ⟸537.]

When, therefore, such an action was brought, and afterwards discontinued, distributees whose names were not so endorsed, and for whose benefit the action was not instituted, cannot have an order to restore the case to the docket.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 2493; Dec. Dig. ⟸537.]

Before Kershaw, J., Spartanburg, June, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. J. S. R. Thomson and S. Wilson, for appellants.

Messrs. Bomar & Simpson, contra.

March 23, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an application for an order to restore the above entitled case to the docket and refer the same to Geo. W. Nichols, judge of probate, "for the purpose of passing upon and assessing the amounts due upon the claims of those legatees of Ezekiel Dobbins, deceased, against the defendant, James H. Ezell, that have not been satisfied." The notice of this motion was signed by Messrs. J. S. R. Thomson and Stanyarne Wilson, "attorneys for William Potter and other children of Nancy Potter, deceased."

The application was based first upon the affidavit of one of the *above named attorneys, stating, upon information and belief, that the above entitled cause was on the docket of the Court of Common Pleas on March 29, 1871, when an order was taken, on the motion of Mr. Elford, plaintiff's attorney, referring the case to Benjamin Wofford, judge of probate, "for his adjudication and to assess the amounts due the several legatees in interest, more especially that due to Marvel Cash;" that no action was taken under this order, and the case, remaining in abeyance, was left off the docket until March 29, 1879, when, on motion of Duncan & Cleveland, the case was restored to the docket, "it having been left off by mistake," and the reference previously ordered was directed to be held by Geo. W. Nichols, judge of probate and successor in office of Wofford, the former referee; that, in accordance with this order, a reference was held and testimony taken on August 22, 1879, but no report was made and no further proceedings had, owing to the fact that the claim of the legatee represented by the attorneys who took the order was settled by the defendant, Ezell, and the referee being of opinion that said legatee was the only party in interest, and not knowing of the existence of others, or misconstruing the scope of the order of reference, concluded that it was unnecessary for him to take any further steps in the matter; that the case remained on the docket until March, 1880, when it was marked "discontinued" by consent of the attorneys representing the defendant and the said satisfied legatee; that there are other legatees of said Ezekiel Dobbins, to wit, the children of Nancy Potter, whose claims have not been satisfied, now represented by the attorneys making this motion, and that said claims have not yet been adjudicated, or the amounts due upon them assessed; that the action was commenced for the purpose of enforcing the payment by the said Ezell of the amounts which had been previously decreed by the said ordinary to be due by the said Ezell as administrator (with the will annexed, as it subsequently appears) of Ezekiel Dobbins to his several legatees, among whom were the said Marvel Cash and the said children of Nancy Potter.

*395

Next follows the affidavit of Mr. Cleveland, one of the firm of Duncan & Cleveland, to the effect that his firm represented Marvel Cash, and did not represent the children of

*396

Nancy Potter, *and therefore when their client was settled with, as has been stated, they took no further proceedings in the case, and consented that it should be marked "discontinued." Finally the record in the case was presented, being a declaration on the administration bond of the defendant, filed October 2, 1867, with order for judgment November 2, 1867; but as a plea is also endorsed on the declaration, and the case seems to have been at issue for many terms of the court, the probability is that this order for judgment was set aside and the defendant allowed to put in his plea, although the rule to plead had expired, as was very frequently done under the old practice.

The motion was resisted by the defendant, who made the following showing: First, his own affidavit, stating that in May, 1872, in answer to a citation issued by Benj. Wofford, judge of probate, which appears, from the copy appended to the "Case," was entitled "Marvel Cash v. J. H. Ezell," and required him to show cause "why an execution should not be issued against you in the above stated case," he appeared and showed for cause "that he had invested the amounts decreed against him in favor of Marvel Cash and the other legatees of Ezekiel Dobbins in Confederate bonds;" that his showing was deemed satisfactory, and the matter was abandoned by the attorney then representing said Cash, who was present at the hearing, and at whose instance the citation was issued; that he heard no more of the matter until after the case had been restored to the docket in 1879, which was done without any notice to him; that thereafter he did compromise and settle the claim of said Cash, and that before said compromise was made, he had frequent conversations with one John Potter, who claimed to have a power of attorney from the heirs of said Nancy Potter to collect whatever might be due them out of the estate of said Ezekiel Dobbins, and said John Potter knew that this case was then pending for the benefit of the said Marvel Cash.

Then follows the affidavit of Benj. Wofford, who stated that he as judge of probate did, on May 27, 1872, issue the citation above mentioned, and that said Ezell appeared in obedience thereto and made the showing above stated, which was deemed satisfactory, and the matter was thereupon abandoned by the *attorney of said Marvel Cash, at whose instance the citation was issued; that he never held any reference in the case of John Earle Bomar, Ordinary, v. James H. Ezell, and according to his recollection and understanding that action (being the same in which the motion now under consideration was made) was brought for the benefit of Marvel Cash.

*397

Upon hearing these affidavits and the argument of counsel, Judge Kershaw passed an order refusing the motion made by the plaintiff to redocket the case, stating at the time "that as the decree of the ordinary against the defendant herein in favor of the heirs of Nancy Potter, deceased, among the other legatees of Ezekiel Dobbins, deceased, had been rendered on April 26, 1859, and more than twenty years had elapsed since that date, and no action brought within that time by the heirs of Nancy Potter, deceased, they were barred by presumption of payment, and could have no interest in having the case redocketed."

The plaintiff appeals upon the ground "that the Circuit judge erred (1) in holding that the decree of the ordinary having been rendered against the defendant herein in favor of the heirs of Nancy Potter, among the other legatees of the deceased Ezekiel Dobbins, on the 26th day of April, 1859, and more than twenty years having elapsed since that date, and no action having ever been brought by the heirs of said Nancy Potter upon said decree, they are now barred by presumption of payment, notwithstanding the fact that this cause was begun as a declaration upon the administration bond of the defendant in 1867, was never pressed into judgment, and was on the calendar of this court as late as March, 1880. (2) In refusing to grant their motion to restore this cause to the docket, so that the rights of the heirs of Nancy Potter under said decree may be enforced and restored."

As we understand the practice which prevailed at the time this action was originally commenced, after a decree by the ordinary, or by the Court of Equity, ascertaining the amounts due by an administrator to the distributees of his intestate, an action could be brought, in the name of the ordinary, at the instance of any one or more of the distributees, against the administrator upon his administration bond, and upon proof of the breach thereof *judgment would be rendered for the penalty; whereupon the parties at whose instance the action was commenced, and any others who might choose to come in upon the same conditions, might have their damages assessed and execution for the same. But the parties at whose instance the action was commenced were required to endorse their names upon the record as the real parties in interest, and as such liable for costs. Until this was done, no distributee, even though he might have a decree of the ordinary in his favor, could be regarded as a party to the action on the bond, or claim any rights as such, or to be subject to any liability for the costs of such action.

*398

It seems to us, therefore, that the insuperable obstacle which the children of Nancy Potter, in whose behalf this motion is made, have to encounter, is the fact that it does not appear that they were ever parties to the case which they are seeking to redocket; for certainly one who is not a party cannot have any right to such an order. This is doubtless the real ground upon which the motion was refused in the Circuit Court, for it is manifest that Judge Kershaw did not consider them as parties to the action, and we think he had good reason for reaching that conclusion. In the first place, it does not even yet appear who are the children of Nancy Potter, what their names are, or what their number. All that does appear in the "Case," and that only incidentally, by the signature to the notice of the motion, is that William Potter is one of them. We are, therefore, bound to conclude that they were not made parties in the proper way by endorsing their names on the record as the real parties in interest, and as such liable for costs. But more than this, the testimony of Wofford shows that the action was brought for the benefit of Marvel Cash, and this is confirmed by the action of the other Judge of Probate, Nichols, who, when the claim of Cash was satisfied, regarding him as the only party in interest, took no further steps in the case. So that there is not only no evidence that the children of Nancy Potter ever made themselves parties to this action, but, on the contrary, all the testimony goes to show that they were not parties.

It may be said, however, that they can come in now and make themselves parties, and thus obtain such a standing in court as *would entitle them to have their motion granted. But to say nothing of the effect of the great lapse of time which might of itself be sufficient, we think they are too late. The case was entered on the docket as "discontinued" in March, 1880, and, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, we are bound to assume that the judge did so, either by the consent of the plaintiff, or of the real party in interest, or that such a showing was made as would justify such an entry even without consent. And certainly after a case has been discontinued it is too late for any person to become a party thereto.

*399

The first ground of appeal which imputes error to the Circuit judge, in saying that after the lapse of twenty years the decree of the ordinary would be presumed paid, is based upon the assumption that the children of Nancy Potter were originally parties to this action, which, as we have seen, is without foundation, and therefore it cannot be sustained. Indeed, we do not understand that Judge Kershaw based his refusal of the motion upon the ground that the decree would be presumed paid after the lapse of twenty years, but, after refusing the motion, he merely stated that after such a lapse of time the presumption of payment would arise, and therefore the children of Nancy Potter "could have no interest in having the case redocketed."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 399

Ex parte EPTING.

In re GIST v. RUTHERFORD.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐1022.]

Findings of fact by the master concurred in by the Circuit judge approved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4015; Dec. Dig. ⇐1022.]

[2. Trusts ⇐217.]

Where a trustee was ordered by the court to purchase a tract of land for the separate use of a married woman (his cestui que trust) from her husband, and he paid for the place by purchasing a judgment against such husband, and put her in possession, he substantially made the investment directed, although the deed from the husband was not executed nor the judgment marked satisfied until long afterwards.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 302; Dec. Dig. ⟸217.]

*400

[3. Equity ⟸431.]

*A master's report, confirmed by the court in a creditor's action, is res judicata as to a decree in a former cause reported against, and of all matters arising under such decree, and may be pleaded as such in a subsequent proceeding seeking to enforce a claim under such decree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 1048-1051; Dec. Dig. ⟸431.]

[4. Executors and Administrators ⟸437; Wills ⟸746.]

A claim for a legacy prosecuted twenty-four years after decree ascertaining its amount, and directing its investment, is barred by lapse of time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1761; Dec. Dig. ⟸437; Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1929; Dec. Dig. ⟸746.]

Before Aldrich, J., Newberry, June, 1884.

The opinion fully states the case. The master's report of his conclusions of law was as follows:

The claim of the petitioner is for a balance of legacy under the will of William Rutherford, deceased, ascertained by the settlement in the ordinary's office in 1849, and again ascertained by the decree in Epting v. Epting and Rutherford, in 1857, while the administrator de bonis non of the estate of Thomas B. Rutherford, deceased, sets up in his answer that the whole claim is satisfied by the investment by Thomas B. Rutherford of petitioner's legacy in land, pursuant to the decree of the court in Epting v. Epting and Rutherford, dated September 23, 1857, payment of the interest on said legacy up to the time of the investment, and the receipt by the petitioner of the rents and profits of said land since said investment, and that this claim has been heretofore adjudicated in this action and rejected.

Has this claim been theretofore adjudicated in this action and rejected? We have seen that the creditors of the estate of Thomas B. Rutherford, deceased, were called in and required to establish their demands under the bill in this action, and enjoined from prosecuting their claims elsewhere. And the referee states in his report in this case, dated May 21, 1874, that, amongst other claims, this one was presented, and was ascertained to have been satisfied, except as to certain costs. This report was confirmed, and became the judgment of the court, from which no appeal was taken.

It is said in the case of McDowall v. McDowall (Bail Eq., 330), that what parties have once had an opportunity of litigating in the course of a judicial proceeding, they shall not draw in *question again; but whatever might properly have been put in issue, shall be concluded to have been put in issue and determined. And in the case of Manigault v. Deas (Ibid, 293), Judge O'Neall, in delivering the opinion of the court, used the following language: "It may be laid down, as a general rule, that a direct final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, on the same subject matter between the same parties and privies in law or estate, is conclusive, and cannot be re-examined in a subsequent original action in the same or any court."

*401

It is argued, however, in behalf of this petitioner, that the record does not show in what manner the decree in Epting v. Epting and Rutherford, was ascertained to have been satisfied. But the referee expressly states, in his report, that the decree in Epting v. Epting and Rutherford, was presented and ascertained to have been satisfied. True, he does not say in terms that petitioner's interest was actually represented, or in what way the conclusion was arrived at, that the decree had been satisfied; but I think the presumption must be now that petitioner's interest was duly represented, and that the conclusion that the decree had been satisfied was reached through a full investigation, unless the contrary is shown, which has not been done.

We have no doubt either but that every presumption is to be made in favor of the regularity of the proceedings of the court, and that we must take for granted that all persons were properly made parties, on whose rights, as parties, the decree purports to decide. Chancellor Harper in Cruger, Adm'r, v. Daniel, Riley Eq., 106. I conclude that this claim must be held to have been heretofore adjudicated in this action and rejected, and that it cannot now be re-examined.

As to the questions, whether the claim has actually been fully paid, as alleged in the answer to the petition, or whether it is presumed paid by the lapse of time, as argued by the counsel for the administrator de bonis non of the estate of Thomas B. Rutherford, deceased, I think it unnecessary, after the foregoing conclusion, to advert to them for the purposes of this case. However, they have been made, and I will notice briefly the latter, as it seems wholly unnecessary, under the circumstances, to go into any mathematical calculation for the purpose of determining the former.

*402

*We find this petition presented in June, 1882, about 33 years after the settlement, in 1849, in the ordinary's office; about 25 years after the petitioner says she received the $180 note from Thomas B. Rutherford, in 1858; about 14 years after the order in Gist and wife, et al., v. Rutherford, Adm'r, et al., in 1868; about 8 years after the report of the referee in Gist and wife, et al., v. Rutherford, Adm'r, et al., was filed in 1874; and about 5 years after that report was confirmed in 1877.

It is now well settled in this state, that the lapse of twenty years is per se conclusive evidence of the payment of a bond conditioned for the payment of money, or for doing any other act, but this can, in my view, make no difference in that respect. Judge Nott in Ordinary of Charleston District v. Steedman, Ex'or, Harper, 289 [18 Am. Dec. 652]. After the expiration of twenty years, the presumption of payment acquires an artificial force, so that it stands in the place of belief, and an admission that the payment has not in fact been made, cannot of itself destroy the effect which considerations of policy have given to a certain period of time whether the payment has or has not been made. Stover and Barnes v. Duren, 3 Strob., 451, [51 Am. Dec. 634], quoted and approved in Willingham v. Chick, 14 S. C., 102. In Riddlehoover v. Kinard, 1 Hill Eq., 378, Chancellor Harper said: "The lapse of twenty years is sufficient to raise a presumption of a grant from the state, of the satisfaction of a bond, mortgage, or judgment, of the grant of a franchise, or the payment of a legacy, or almost anything else that is necessary to quiet title of property." The doctrine upon this subject, laid down in these cases, is strongly approved in the case of Boyce v. Lake, 17 S. C., 481 [43 Am. Rep. 618].

I must decide that the claim is barred, and presumed paid, by the lapse of more than twenty years since the decree in Epting v. Epting and Rutherford, or since the time the petitioner says she received the $180 note from Thomas B. Rutherford. Neither the passage of the order of 1868, nor the execution of the deed in 1870, can be regarded as circumstances to rebut the presumption under the cases cited above. Rutherford had doubtless seen the necessity of taking up the judgment in Hentz v. Epting, in order to preserve the property to this petitioner; and the investment in this judgment was equivalent to an investment in the land, as *it was the oldest and only lien against the land. Perhaps he considered the decree of September 23, 1857, sufficient to give the petitioner the possession of the land, and the right to the rents and profits; and if there was any difference between the amount of the legacy, and the amount paid for the judgment, it may have been adjusted by the payment of the $180 note, in 1858, which the petitioner says she received; and, besides this, it was ordered that the costs in Epting v. Epting & Rutherford, should be paid out of the legacy. At any rate, after the lapse of time, if there was any difference, it seems it must be presumed adjusted. The order of 1868 was perhaps considered necessary to have the judgment in Hentz v. Epting cancelled, as it had not been done in the life-time of Thomas B. Rutherford, and the deed of 1870 was simply in obedience to this order.

*403

I recommend that the petition be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Joseph L. Keitt, for appellant.
Mr. George S. Mower, for respondent.

March 23, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. William Rutherford, late of Newberry County, died, in 1845, testate. Dr. Thomas B. Rutherford qualified as executor of the will. The testator bequeathed to the appellant a legacy which, in some proceeding before the ordinary of said county had in 1849, was ascertained to amount at that date to $1,920.38. In May, 1856, the petitioner, then the wife of Henry Epting, filed a bill in equity, praying that her legacy, in the hands of Thomas B. Rutherford, be invested in a tract of land to be settled to her separate use upon certain terms. The interest on the legacy up to that time seems to have been paid. Henry Epting and Dr. Rutherford were made parties to this bill, who answered, consenting to the prayer. An order was accordingly made directing the investment, and referring it to the commissioner to report a suitable tract. The commissioner, in 1857, reported, and recommended a tract of land containing one hundred and twenty acres, belonging to the said Henry Epting for the investment. In September, *1857, the court confirmed this report, and ordered the investment at the price of $1,634, and directing Dr. Rutherford to hold the land subject to the terms of the trust, and that the costs be paid out of the legacy. In the meantime Dr. Rutherford had obtained a large judgment on Henry Epting, amounting to $1,290.35, February 9, 1855. No deed was ever executed from Henry Epting to Dr. Rutherford, but Mrs. Epting and her husband were in possession, and have so continued since.

*404

Dr. Rutherford died in 1865, intestate, and in May, 1866, the bill in which this petition is a matter in re was filed by R. V. Gist and wife et al. to partition his real estate; but it being ascertained that this real estate would be necessary to be used in aid of the personalty to pay debts, the bill was converted into a bill to marshal assets, and creditors were called in and enjoined from suing elsewhere. The claim of the petitioner was presented, but before the commissioner reported on claims, Chancellor Lesesne, in 1868, passed an order in this bill, directing that the tract of land aforesaid be vested in the trustee of the petitioner, under the terms and limitations of the trust, and that the judgment which Dr. Rutherford held against Henry Epting be marked satisfied, and the debt and interest represented by said judgment be credited upon the claim of Harriet Epting against the estate of Dr. Rutherford. In April, 1870, Thomas V. Wicker having been appointed trustee of Mrs. Epting after the death of Dr. Rutherford, a deed of one hundred and twenty acres (the land above referred to) was executed by Henry Epting to the said trustee, Wicker, in consideration of $2,502.07. It appeared in evidence before the commissioner that Dr. Rutherford had paid to Mrs. Epting, in 1858, $180 by note on Wicker, besides several other payments before that date, and that Mrs. Epting had been in the possession of the land since the filing of her bill praying the investment in 1856.

No report was made on the claims of creditors until 1874, when the former commissioner was made special referee and made a report, in which he stated that the decree in the case of Epting v. Epting & Rutherford, had been satisfied, except as to certain items of costs. This report was confirmed in 1877.

*405

and *there was no further reference to the claim of the petitioner among the debts established or rejected.

Thus matters stood until May, 1882, when the petition below was filed in re, in the same case of Gist and wife v. A. O. Rutherford, which seems to be still pending. The petition asked leave to present the claim of Harriet Epting for her legacy under the will of William Rutherford against the estate of Dr. Rutherford, executor, amounting to $1,920.38, on July 29, 1849, acknowledging a credit of $400, and ignoring the settlement of the land in trust upon her altogether. This petition was referred to C. D. Barksdale, master for Laurens County, with a limitation that it should not be regarded as opening any matter already adjudicated, or as an acknowledgment in any way of the claim of Mrs. Epting, or of the fact that it had not been settled and adjudicated. The master, after full investigation, made a careful and well-considered report, both upon the law and the facts, in January, 1884, in which he found, first, that the claim of the petitioner was res adjudicata; second, that it had been satisfied and was barred by the lapse of time. And he recommended that the petition be dismissed with costs.

The petitioner excepted to this report, upon the following grounds: "1. That the master erred in not finding, as requested, that Thomas B. Rutherford did not invest the legacy of the petitioner in the land of John H. Epting, under the decree in Epting v. Epting & Rutherford. 2. That he erred in not finding, as requested, that the excess of the claim of the separate estate over the consideration of the deed has not been paid. 3. That he erred in his conclusions of law that the petitioner's claim has been heretofore adjudicated and rejected. 4. That he erred in his conclusion of law that the petitioner's claim is barred by the statute of limitations." The case, upon these exceptions, was heard by his honor, Judge Aldrich, who, in a short order, overruled the exceptions and confirmed the report, dismissing the petition as recommended by the master. The petitioner has now appealed to this court upon the exceptions filed to the report of the master, claiming that his honor should have sustained said exceptions.

The objection that this petition could not be heard because of *the fact that this party had already had her day in court under the call for creditors, with the report of the commissioner substantially against her claim, confirmed by the court, was not interposed when the motion for reference was made without prejudice. No objection, however, of this kind has since been made, and we must regard the petition, therefore, as properly before the court, and must consider the exceptions upon their merits.

*406

The first two exceptions complain that the master did not find that the legacy of plaintiff had neither been paid nor had been invested in the tract of land mentioned. We do not see how the master could have found either of these facts as requested. It appears that at the time the petitioner filed her bill to have the fund invested—i. e., in May, 1856—the interest had been paid up. The corpus amounted to $1,895. Previous to that time—i. e., in February, 1855—there was a judgment in the office against Henry Epting, amounting to $1,290. This passed into the hands of Dr. Rutherford. It appears, too, that in 1858 Dr. Rutherford paid the petitioner, in a note on Wicker, $180, and he was directed to pay the costs of the bill out of the legacy, amounting to some $190. These amounts with the judgment would be near $1,700. The interest on the legacy up to May, 1856, when the bill was filed, had been paid; since then the petitioner has been enjoying the rents and profits of the land, and therefore no interest could be charged. So that the payments above, with the judgment, are nearly the amount of the legacy, which, according to the finding of the master, was $1,815. Now give the estate credit for the other payments which the report states had been made, though the amounts are not stated, and it might well be supposed that the legacy was understood by the parties to be paid in full, especially as the petitioner did not press before the commissioner for any excess, but submitted to the report, in which no additional amount was allowed her.

It appears clearly enough that this legacy had been substantially invested by Dr. Rutherford in the land. It is true the deed from Henry Epting to the trustee was not executed until after the death of Dr. Rutherford. But the petitioner had gone into the possession of the land previous to his death, in pursu*ance of the order directing the investment, and the subsequent order of Chancellor Lesesne merely consummated the previous arrangement.

*407

Had this claim been previously adjudicated? It was certainly before the commissioner, because he reported that the decree directing the investment had been satisfied except the costs. Whether the petitioner made any claim for an excess over the investment does not appear; but she had the opportunity, and according to the authorities cited by the master, she must be concluded—certainly until the report of the special referee is reversed. That report was confirmed in 1877, and then became the judgment of the court. There has been no appeal, and it has settled the rights of the parties for the time being at least. Whether it can be reversed as an interlocutory judgment, at some future stage of the case, is not before us.

We concur in the judgment of the court that the claim is barred by the lapse of time. Dr. Rutherford put the plaintiff into possession of her legacy through the land in 1856, he paid her $180 in 1858, and this is the last connection which he seems to have had with the matter. The petitioner has not claimed from any one any further payment until the filing of this petition in 1882, twenty-four years, and some seventeen years since the death of Dr. Rutherford. We adopt the reasoning of Master Barksdale on this subject and the authorities to which he refers.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 407

LIPSCOMB v. SEEGERS.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Bonds ⟸130.]

In action to recover the damages stipulated in a bond, which was given under the requirements of a statute, conditioned that the defendant would safely keep the convicts leased to him from the State Penitentiary, and if they escaped through negligence of any kind, then to pay the state therefor $50 per annum, &c., the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show that the escape of the convicts was through the negligence of defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bonds, Cent. Dig. § 223; Dec. Dig. ⟸130.]

*408

[2. Evidence ⟸91.]

*Under the terms of the contract the plaintiff's right of action was grounded upon a negative allegation, hence he must prove it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 113; Dec. Dig. ⟸91.]

[3. Convicts ⟸10.]

The convicts having been leased under the contract required by the state, the contractor's liability is fixed by such contract, and cannot, therefore, be measured by the relations of the parties, or a supposed public policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Convicts, Cent. Dig. §§ 19, 20, 22–29, 32; Dec. Dig. ⟸10.]

[4. Convicts ⟸11.]

The act of 1882 declaring the escape of leased convicts to be prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the lessee, cannot affect this case, as the contract was made and the convicts escaped prior to the passage of that act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Convicts, Cent. Dig. § 31; Dec. Dig. ⟸11.]

[5. Convicts ⟸10.]

The Circuit judge ruled that he would receive evidence to show negligence by defendant during the time the convicts were in his possession, but not at other times. Held, that in this there was no error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Convicts, Cent. Dig. §§ 19, 20, 22–29, 32; Dec. Dig. ⟸10.]

Before Fraser, J., Richland, April, 1884.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion of this court.

Messrs. Pope & Haskell, for appellant.

Messrs. Clark & Muller, contra.

March 26, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This case was once before in this court, and is reported 19 S. C., 426. It will there be seen that the action was brought by the Superintendent of the State Penitentiary against John C. Seegers for a sum of money alleged to be due the state by him for the escape of certain convicts hired to him in the year 1879. The claim originally was for the escape of five convicts by name. The former case disposed of that of Spry, but ordered a new trial as to the claim for the escape of four, Williams, Robinson, Talbert, and Blakely.

There was no question as to the fact of escape while in the service of Seegers—that was admitted in the answer—but whether they had been allowed to escape negligently, and as to the burden of proof upon that point. The plaintiff, Lipscomb, was examined as a witness, and being asked "if he knew anything of the general management of the convicts on the Seegers farm," the defendant objected, and the judge sustained the objection, ruling that he would permit any question going to show negligence between the dates of receiving these convicts and *their escapes, but not questions going to show negligence at other times. (Plaintiff excepted.) After other evidence was offered upon the point of negligence, the case was submitted to the jury. The plaintiff made several requests to charge which were refused. Under the charge of the judge the jury found for the defendant, and the plaintiff gave notice of appeal to this court "on account of the rulings of the presiding judge during the trial, and from his refusals to charge as requested at the trial."

*409

The first and second requests to charge were substantially the same: "That this action is upon a contract; that the damage for its infraction is fixed and liquidated; that the contract of Seegers was that he would safely keep the convicts, and when plaintiff proved the escape the defendant was at once put to his defence to prove that he had safely kept, or that he could show facts that would excuse the escape." The judge refused to charge this request, but did charge as follows: "That while the mere escape is not prima facie evidence of negligence, the jury have the whole case before them. It is for them to say whether there has been an escape; whether this has been for the want of a proper guard, or from negligence of the guard, which was entrusted with them, or whether there was anything else shown in the case which was a want of due care of the convicts, and from which want of due care, if any, their escape was due."

Was this error? The real question is, Upon whom was the onus of proving negligence? In order to have a clear view, let us go back a little and ascertain the precise condition of things. The former case decided that this was an action on a bond, assumed to have been given by the defendant, Seegers, under the act of 1877, corresponding in its terms to the requirements of that act, that is to say, on a bond conditioned "for the safe-keeping of the convicts named, and if they should escape through negligence of any kind, then to pay the state therefor the sum of $50 per annum," &c. Considering the action upon a bond containing such covenants, upon whom was the onus of proving negligence? The plaintiff alleged that the convicts escaped, and that they were allowed to escape through negligence, and the undoubted rule is, that he who affirms must prove, and as a consequence the *plaintiff must prove his allegations or fail. In an ordinary action for the non-performance of covenants the plaintiff must assign breaches and prove them.

*410

But it is suggested that this case should constitute an exception to the general rule for several reasons: and first, that it is against one of the fundamental rules of evidence that a party should be required to prove a negative; that as the defendant held the affirmative of the issue as to due care, and the facts upon the subject were peculiarly within his knowledge, he should have been required to prove it after an escape was shown. Whether the allegation was in its nature affirmative or negative depended very largely upon the form in which it was made. If stated in the words of the act "through negligence," it would seem to have been affirmative in form as well as in substance. But if negative in form, that did not dispense with the necessity resting upon the plaintiff to prove it, as it was one of those cases "in which the plaintiff grounds his right of action upon a negative allegation." 1 Greenl. Evid., § 78. See Latimer v. Latimer, ante, 257, where this court has lately discussed the whole subject. If the words "through negligence" had been omitted, and the action had been simply for a breach of the covenant to safely keep the convicts, the rule of evidence as contended would have been otherwise. But as these words were in the bond, it became part of plaintiff's case to prove them. 1 Whart. Evid. (2d edit.), § 362.

But it is urged that the case should be an exception to the general rule, as to the onus of proof, on account of the peculiar relations of the parties; that the superintendent was the custodian, jailer, of the convicts, and in case he were sued, the fact of escape itself would be taken as prima facie evidence of negligence; and that Seegers, under the contract, simply took the place of the superintendent as to the custody and safe-keeping of the convicts, and the same rule should be applied to him when he is sued. This is ingenious, but it does not seem to us sound. There is little doubt that as to convicts the main purpose of the state is their safe-keeping, and anything outside of that is subsidiary. It is true that this is the primary and controlling duty of the superintendent as the officer and agent of the state. And it may also be true that a contractor, in hiring convicts, takes in *some sense the place of the superintendent. But it must not be overlooked that a voluntary contractor may not be an official, with duties and liabilities definitely prescribed; and, therefore, in allowing convicts to be farmed out, the state undertook to fix the liabilities of a contractor by requiring him to give a bond of a certain character; which, as it seems to us, is the law of the case, and must be interpreted, like all other bonds, according to its terms. The state herself thereby fixed the measure of a contractor's liability, and it is now too late to fall back upon the relations of the parties or a supposed public policy.

*411

It seems that the legislature took this view of the matter, and in 1882 thought it necessary and wise to amend the law by declaring that "the fact of escape shall be taken as prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the contractor," &c. This amendment of the law, however, was not passed until after 1879, when the transactions under consideration took place, and we cannot think that it was merely declaratory of a rule of evidence and applicable retrospectively to this case. When a contract is made, the law then in force becomes part of the contract. The court is not inclined to give laws a retroactive effect. The rule is that statutes are not to be construed retrospectively or so as to have a retroactive effect, unless it shall clearly appear that it was so intended by the Legislature. Ex parte Graham, 13 Rich., 277; Nichols v. Briggs, 18 S. C., 473. Such clear intent is not apparent in the amendment of 1882. We see no error in the rulings of the Circuit judge as to the onus of proof.

The only other alleged error was the exclusion of testimony as to the general management of the convicts on the Seegers farm. The judge ruled that he "would permit any questions going to show negligence between the dates of receiving the convicts and their escapes, but not questions going to show negligence at other times." Was this error? The precise point in issue was whether the convicts, Williams, Robinson, Talbert, and Blakely, escaped from Seegers' farm "through negligence." All evidence directly on the issue, of course, had to relate to the time between their delivery to and their escape from Seegers, and everything not embraced in that time must be considered as collateral. As a general rule, evidence that is collateral is irrelevant, but not *always. The words are not identical in import. There are cases in which collateral facts are properly admitted as having a bearing upon the direct issue. Mr. Wharton says: "Relevancy is that which conduces to the truth of a pertinent hypothesis, which, if sustained, would logically influence the issue." 1 Whart. Evid. (2d edit.), § 20. Whether the collateral facts proposed to be proved have such bearing upon the issue must to a large extent be decided by the judge who tried the case; and the same learned author gives us some general principles as to when collateral matters should or should not be admitted. He says: "A party's habits in doing business cannot ordinarily be put in evidence to show that he did a certain thing in a particular way. Ordinarily when a party is sued for damages flowing from negligence imputed to him, it is irrelevant, for reasons already given, to prove against him other disconnected though similar negligent acts. Thus in an action against a bailor for the loss of property entrusted to him, evidence of independent acts of negligence not connected with the loss is inadmissible," &c. 1 Whart. Evid. (2d edit.), § 40; Parker v. Portland Publishing Company, 69 Me., 178 (31 Am. Rep., 262). We fully appreciate the difficulty of offering direct evidence of negligence as to the particular convicts who escaped, but that arose, in great part at least, from the nature of the issue imposed by the act, and we cannot say that the judge committed error of law in refusing to receive the testimony as to general management on the Seegers farm.

*412

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 412

DELEON v. BARRETT.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Courts ⇐65.]

On July 11 the Circuit judge ordered that the daily sessions of the court be dispensed with, but the term not to be closed. The clerk of court thereafter opened and adjourned the court every day (Sundays excepted) until September 4, when the judge returned, held court, heard and determined this cause, and then adjourned the term sine die. The next succeeding term of court in this county, and the next succeeding court to be held by this judge were after this sine die adjournment. Held, that the case was heard within the term. This case distinguished from Ex parte Lilly, 7 S. C., 373.

*413

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 230; Dec. Dig. ⇐65.]

[2. Executors and Administrators ⇐315.]

A testator left certain property to his children and directed a division of his estate among them twenty years after his death, certain real estate devised to be accounted for by them at a valuation fixed in the will. By a codicil, the division was directed to be made at the end of ten years. All the property so given was to be held by his children during life, with contingent remainders over. At the expiration of ten years the executors sought the instruction of the court as to the proper distribution of the estate, all parties in interest, including all contingent remaindermen in esse, being defendants. These defendants agreed upon a proper distribution among the life-tenants and delivery of possession to them, which arrangement was approved and directed by the decree of the court, and on the appeal of some of the executors, the Circuit decree was affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1298–1314; Dec. Dig. ⇐315.]

[3. Remainders ⇐17.]

All the contingent remaindermen in esse being before the court, a decree might be made putting the life-tenants into possession of their shares, to be held by them under the limitations of the will; and such decree would be binding upon contingent remaindermen thereafter born.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Faber v. Faber, 76 S. C. 161, 56 S. E. 677.

For other cases, see Remainders, Cent. Dig. § 15; Dec. Dig. ⇐17.]

4. The case of LeRoy v. City Council of Charleston, 20 S. C., 71, explained.

[5. Executors and Administrators ⇐111.]

The executors appealing in this case should be allowed the expenses of their appeal out of the estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 453; Dec. Dig. ⇐111.]

Before Hudson, J., Charleston, September, 1884.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit judge wrote at the foot of his decree, embodying the arrangement agreed upon by the parties, the following memorandum:

I have signed the foregoing decree for the following reasons: 1. Because it carries out the wishes of all the adult beneficiaries under the will of Jacob Barrett, who have propounded it to the court as a family settlement agreed upon among themselves after much consideration. It is pronounced by the executors (who have testified in the cause) to be judicious and to the best interest of all concerned. The master, after full hearing and careful examination of the whole subject, has recommended it in a very elaborate and able report. All the attorneys representing the various parties concur in pronouncing it a prudent, wise, and beneficial arrangement, if legal. In these views I fully concur and feel well satisfied, that in the decree no interest is jeopardized *or sacrificed, and that the terms of the will are in no way violated. The changes in the valuations by the testator of the real estate specifically devised are very slight, and only such as are necessary to be made in fairly and impartially equalizing these shares, and this equality the testator requested should be made.

*414

2. Because, under the authority of Bofil v. Fisher, 3 Rich. Eq., 1 [55 Am. Dec. 627], and cases therein cited, it is clear that the court has the power to sell the residuary real estate in which contingent remaindermen born, and to be born, have or may have an interest —so as to bar them from ever disturbing the title of the purchasers—and in doing this, and in taking charge of the fund arising therefrom, and administering the same under the terms and limitations of the will, and in accordance with its provisions, there is no right on the part of any of these contingent remaindermen ever thereafter to question this exercise of jurisdiction, save by appeal in due time taken—nor is there the shadow of danger that the executors can ever hereafter be made to suffer for obeying the aforesaid judgment. All apprehensions in this regard are groundless and may at once be laid aside.

3. Because it is entirely unnecessary that I should comply with the request of the counsel of the executors and give interpretation to the entire will. All the issues raised in the pleadings have been adjusted by the beneficiaries, and in such a manner as fully to protect infants and all contingent remaindermen.

Such in brief are my reasons for signing the decree, and are thus partly stated because counsel of the executors preferred that such should be done. All exceptions, therefore, at variance with the terms of the decree, are overruled.

Messrs. Simons & Seigling, for appellants.
Messrs. J. N. Nathans, J. B. Cohen, contra.

March 26, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The late Jacob Barrett, of Charleston, died in November, 1871, leaving a will and codicil, of which the appellants, and one H. H. DeLeon, were the qualified executors. The testator left, surviving him, his widow, Hetty J. Bar*rett, and children, Laura L. Levy, Sarah B. Cohen, Eugenia A. Rice, Pauline Dishon, Jacob Barrett, and Mary Beatrice Larendon. His son Isaac did not survive testator, but died before him unmarried, intestate, and without issue.

*415

After specifically devising certain real estate in this state, and also in the states of New York and Georgia, to each of his children, to be charged against them in the final distribution of his estate at valuations fixed in the will, and directing that the executors should set apart a sum sufficient to pay an annuity of $4,000 to his widow, the principal of which, at her death, was to revert to his estate, and be distributable under the provisions of his will respecting the residue of his estate, and also directing that the further sum of $50,000 be set apart to accumulate to be disposed of by his said wife, by her will, to one or more of his children or grandchildren; the testator disposed of the rest and residue of his estate, both real and personal, to his children for life, and from and after their death to their children; providing that if any child or children should die leaving no child or children surviving him or her, or in case any child or children so left surviving should die before attaining the age of twenty-one or marriage, the property so devised to such child or children should revert to his estate; and providing further, that the child or children of either of his children, who may have died previous to the time of distribution fixed in the will, should stand in the place of such deceased parent.

The testator further directed that his residuary estate should be "kept together until twenty years after his death, and then at that time that the final division should take place, according to the tenor and meaning of his will, among his surviving children," &c., which period was changed to ten years by the codicil, in which the testator also directed as follows: "I do further direct that the portion of my estate left to all of my children, shall be subject to the following trusts, to wit: in trust to them for life, and after their death to such children as they may leave surviving; the child or children of any deceased child to take such share as his or her parent would have taken if alive, and in case there shall be no such child or children, grandchild or grandchildren, then *the same to revert to my estate, and become devisable as a part of the residue of my estate," &c.

*416

Soon after the testator's death, Jacob Barrett, Laura L. Levy, and his other children, filed a complaint against the executors, who had qualified, the widow, Hetty J. Barrett, and all the children of testator's children who were then in esse, in which various questions were brought before the court, and after long litigation it was adjudged that Mrs. Laura L. Levy was entitled to two shares under testator's will, and that a certain amount of income should be annually paid by the executors for the maintenance of testator's children and grandchildren. See Levy v. Williams, 4 S. C., 515, [Levy v. Barrett], 7 Id., 25, and [Levy v. Williams], 9 Id., 153.

The ten years after his death fixed by the testator for "the final division of his estate" expired November 13, 1881. At that time

Mrs. Sarah B. Cohen, one of the testator's daughters, had died, leaving surviving her children, Octavus Cohen, Jacob Barrett Cohen, Joseph Cohen, Abram Cohen, W. C. Cohen, and Sarah Bell Cohen. The plaintiffs, on January 9, 1882, commenced this action. But certain events having occurred after it was filed, which it was necessary to bring to the attention of the court, particularly in reference to the lands of the testator lying in the State of New York, the executors filed an amended and supplemental complaint on November 26, 1883, stating the condition of the estate, and praying for instructions from the court: "That said estate should be divided and settled, and the same paid over to such persons as are entitled to the same under the direction and order of the court, and that upon such payment and settlement, the said plaintiffs be discharged from any further accountability as executors of the same." They made defendants, by regular and proper service, all the children and grandchildren of the testator, and also the infant, Barrett Foster Cohen, a grandchild of testator's daughter, Sarah B. Cohen, thus including all the issue of the testator now in existence. The numerous defendants, many of them minors, filed answers making various and embarrassing questions.

An order of reference was made to Master Hanckel, submitting, among other things, a proposed scheme of a settlement and decree at the instance of the parties. The master took testi*mony, heard arguments, and made an elaborate and full report, recommending a scheme for the settlement of the estate, the most striking feature of which was a recommendation that the valuations affixed by the testator in the body of the will, at the end of twenty years from the time of his death (which were excessive and arbitrary), should be equalized at the end of ten years, the time for distribution as changed by the codicil. To this report exceptions were filed, but after argument, the report was substantially affirmed and made the judgment of the court on September 5, 1884.

*417

From this decree, the executors, George W. Williams and Charles T. Lowndes (the other qualified executor, H. H. DeLeon, not concurring), appeal to this court upon the following grounds:

I. "That the will of testator, Jacob Barrett is changed thereby (the decree), contrary to his express intention, and new provisions substituted in place of his will and direction.

II. "That in consequence of the changes made thereby in the valuations of the property specifically devised in the will of testator at valuations fixed by his will, the amounts and values of the respective shares in the personal property in the hands of the plaintiffs are correspondingly changed. That while the parties defendant may be bound by a decree of the court, changing the valuations placed by testator on the various pieces of real estate specifically devised by his will, and the corresponding changes in the shares of the personalty consequent thereon, the parties who may be entitled to the respective shares, on the falling in of the respective life estates, cannot now be ascertained, and who they will be, and whether now in existence depends upon the contingency of the state of the respective families of the children of testator parties to this action at the time of their respective deaths, the eventuation of which contingency cannot now be foreseen. By reason of which these plaintiffs would not be protected by the decree in any payments they might make thereunder.

III. "That there is no power in the court to bind the interest and rights of contingent remaindermen not parties to the action, and that whilst the court would have the power to order property sold or converted for change of investment, so as to 'alienate the *contingent titles of unborn remaindermen, who, from the nature of things, cannot be made parties or be represented in the proceedings before the court,' there is no power in the court, under such circumstances, virtually to abrogate the provisions of the will by way of family settlement or otherwise, so as to bind unborn contingent remaindermen, and to direct the plaintiffs with safety to pay over the personal estate in their hands.

*418

IV. "That the will of testator should be construed by the court and the rights of the parties and the duties of the plaintiffs ascertained by the decree of the court, in response to the prayer for judgment and complaint in the action.

V. "That the decree should not have directed the respective shares of testator's estate paid over to his children, defendants to this action, the codicil of testator's will specifically directing that they should be subject to the trusts therein prescribed.

VI. "That the decree proposes to adopt the recommendation of the master, and is made thereon, which recommendation is based on agreement of parties by their counsel; whereas plaintiffs claim that the matters involved in this action should be adjudicated by the court without reference to any such agreement to which plaintiffs are and were no parties, especially as parties under age are interested, and it is now impossible to foresee who will be eventually entitled to the respective shares on the falling in of the life estates.

VII. "Because no construction of the will of the testator is made by the decree, but only a scheme of family settlement is adopted; whereas it is submitted that the will of the testator should be construed and the rights of the parties and duties of the plaintiffs ascertained by the decree of the court, &c.

VIII. "Because the decree makes no provision for the payment of the costs and expenses of proceedings on appeal from the said decree in case the plaintiffs should deem it their duty as executors to appeal.

IX. "Because the said decree should have held that the defendant, Barrett, Foster Cohen, has a contingent interest in the estate of the testator, Jacob Barrett, dependent on the state of affairs at the falling in of the respective life estates.

X. "The plaintiffs further except to the said decree because *the court had no power to hear the same for the reason: The Court of Common Pleas was regularly begun to be holden on June 25, 1884, as appears by the journal thereof. On Thursday, July 11, 1884, at the end of the proceedings for that day appears the following entry in the journal: 'By the court: Ordered, that all cases ready for trial having been disposed of, the daily sessions of the court will be dispensed with, the term of the court not being closed. Further ordered, that judgments upon all issues determined by the jury, or by the court, without the intervention of a jury, at this term, may be entered on or after the 16th July inst. (Signed) July 11, 1884, J. H. Hudson, presiding judge.' That the judge thereupon left the Circuit, and, as appears by the journal, the court was opened at 10 o'clock a. m. every day (Sundays excepted), and at 3 p. m. was adjourned to the next day (Sundays excepted), until Thursday, September 4, 1884, when the presiding judge, Hon. J. H. Hudson, returned. And the journal on that day shows that the court was opened at 10 o'clock a. m., his honor, Judge Hudson, presiding. On that day the hearing of this action was commenced, the plaintiffs not consenting to said hearing. That the court was thereupon adjourned until the next day, September 5, 1884, when the hearing was resumed, and the decree now appealed from was made. Whereupon the court was adjourned sine die. That by the terms of the said order of July 11, 1884, the court was in effect adjourned sine die." &c.

*419

The last exception makes the point that the Circuit decree should be set aside, for the reason that it was not rendered in term time; that it was coram non judice. The term for Charleston County began on the fourth Monday of June (18 Stat., 167), and being without limit as to time, unless ended by a regular adjournment sine die, might continue until the next term of the court for the county, which did not begin until the first Monday of October; or it may be that the assignment of the presiding judge to duty elsewhere would necessarily end the term. It appears that the presiding judge (Hudson) was assigned to hold the fall term of the Second Circuit, which began at Beaufort on the second Monday of September (8th). 18 Stat., 462. This *cause was heard and decided in Charleston on September 5, and therefore within the term, unless that had been terminated.

*420

The record shows that the Circuit judge certainly did not intend to end the term until September 5, when he regularly adjourned it sine die. It is true that on July 11, having disposed of all cases then ready for trial, and there being no necessity for him to sit in court every day, he filed an order dispensing with the daily sessions, but expressly declaring that the term of the court was not closed. The court was opened at 10 o'clock a. m. and closed at 3 p. m. every day (Sundays excepted) until Thursday, September 4, when the judge took his seat and heard this cause, rendering the decree appealed from on September 5, and then regularly adjourned the court sine die. It is urged, however, that the order of July had the effect of ending the term, even contrary to the intention of the judge. We cannot doubt that the Circuit judge, proprio vigore, may control his own sessions during the term, and we do not think that the order of July was beyond the power of the judge or had effect to terminate the term. We do not consider this case like that of Ex parte Lilly, 7 S. C., 373. In that case the court adjourned for the term and directed the clerk to enter in the journal that the court adjourned from day to day, but without any date being fixed for its reassembling.

All the other exceptions relate to the rights of contingent remaindermen not now before the court, and the duties and liabilities of the executors in that regard. There seems general accord in the view that the Circuit decree is a proper and just settlement of the many and perplexing questions arising under the will. No one seems to doubt that it is the best possible solution of the case that can be made, and the only question is whether it can be enforced. The Circuit decree is certainly binding upon all the parties who were before the court and did not appeal. All the living descendants of the testator were before the court and are bound. No one appeals but two of the executors, and their appeal, although stated in various forms, really goes no further than to question the power of the court to make a decree which will bind unborn contingent remaindermen so as to be a perfect protection to them as executors.

*421

*If there is anything perfectly plain in the will of the testator, Jacob Barrett, it is that, after making certain specific devises to his children, and providing for the comfortable support of his widow, he desired that the residuum of his estate should be kept together in order to accumulate for a certain period after his death, and then there should be made "a final division" among his children. In this division the children were to be equalized, and in order to facilitate that he placed upon the specific devises before given particular valuations. The time fixed by the testator himself has arrived, and why should not "the final division" be now made? If from any cause it is not made, that which was manifestly the leading purpose of the testator will be defeated. Besides there are many good reasons why it should not be postponed. It is the policy of the law that estates should be settled, partitioned, and go into the hands of those entitled to them as speedily as possible, consistent with the rights of parties. We have not been able to discover anything in this will, either as to the character of the limitations or in any other respect, which should necessarily stand in the way of the "final division" directed, and the delivery of their respective shares to the children to be held under the terms of the will to them for life and then to their children.

Neither do we see any wrong or injustice in correcting the arbitrary valuations attached to the specific devises. These valuations, admitted to be erroneous and excessive, were fixed in the will proper in the view then entertained, that the time for final division would be twenty years after testator's death; but afterwards the codicil fixed the time at ten years, reducing the period of possession one-half. Construing the will and codicil together we can hardly suppose that the testator intended to make the change as to time and yet to retain unchanged the old valuations. At all events it was a proper case for a judicious "family settlement" which, where "fairly and reasonably made to prevent family disputes and family forfeitures, are upheld with a strong hand; and are binding when in cases between mere strangers the like agreements would not be enforced." 1 Story Eq., § 132, and authorities.

But it is insisted by the executors that from the terms of the *limitations in the will contingent remaindermen may be hereafter born, who, not being now before the court, will not be bound by the decree and may at any future time come back upon them as executors. It is undoubtedly true that as a rule a decree or judgment binds none but the parties before the court and their privies, but there are circumstances in which, from the necessity of the case, Courts of Equity act upon the property itself, and in doing so adjudicate questions which in effect must be binding upon those who are not in esse, but may come into existence. "That the Court of Equity has the power to sell the estates, whether vested or contingent, of infant remaindermen who are parties before the court is unquestionable. The court also has the power to bar, by its decree for sale of the property, the interests of unborn contingent remaindermen, and of contingent remaindermen residing abroad whose names and places of residence are unknown and who of course cannot be made parties before the court." Bofil v. Fisher, 3 Rich. Eq. 1 [55 Am. Dec. 627]; Bouknight v. Brown, 16 S. C., 170; Knotts v. Stearns, 91 U. S. 641 [23 L. Ed. 252]; Story Eq. Pl., § 120. See the opinion of Chancellor Dunkin in Van Lew v. Parr, 2 Rich. Eq., 321, and the authorities there cited, especially the case of Giffard v. Hort, 1 Sch. & L., 408.

*422

It will be observed that this case is not as strong as that of Bofil v. Fisher, supra. In that case the application was to sell the property, conveying the fee to the purchaser for the benefit of the first taker. But in this case it is not proposed to sell the property, but only to divide it among the children of the testator and according to the positive directions of his will. This division does not propose "to sell or alienate the contingent titles of unborn remaindermen," but to turn over to each child his or her proper share to be held during his or her life subject to the provisions of the will. It neither sells nor destroys any interest, but simply gives to the parent the share intended by the testator with proper responsibility over to the children as remaindermen. The testator must be supposed to have known the limitations he was creating, and when he directed a final division to be made at a particular time he could not have intended that the possible contingent interest of grandchildren should prevent that division *among his children; that the interests of the living children should be subordinated to that of unborn grandchildren.

*423

It would indeed be remarkable if the anxious desire of this testator to keep the property in his family to the second generation, should result in preventing its enjoyment in severalty by the first generation, who were manifestly the primary objects of his bounty, to whom it was expressly given with the requirement that it should be finally divided among them at a time indicated. An estate ordered to be divided cannot be kept undivided for an indefinite period only for the reason that, by possibility, contingent interests in parts of it may in the remote future come into existence. As Chancellor Dargan said, in Bofil v. Fisher: "To say that the court could not, under circumstances like these, convey away the fee [not proposed here], would be to assert a doctrine that would render conditional limitations and contingent remainders an intolerable evil to a growing and prosperous community. Thus to shackle estates without the power of relief, unless every person having a contingent and possible interest could be brought before the court, as a party complainant or defendant, according to the several forms and ordinary practices of the court, would be to sacrifice the rights and interests of the present generation to those of posterity and of citizens to aliens."

We do not think that the views here stated are in conflict with the case of Le Roy v. The City Council, 20 S. C., 71. In that case the contingent remaindermen were in esse and could have been made parties, and the chief justice in delivering the judgment of the court, remarked that the grandchildren should have been made parties. That was obviously correct, according to the familiar equity rule, that all parties in interest should be before the court. But it will be seen that the judgment did not go upon that alone but also on the other ground, that the heirs at law of Dupont, the trustee, should have been made a party. The opinion states the ground: "We think that the grandchildren in this case, at least those whose names and residences are known, should have been made parties. We think, too, that the proceeding was defective in the fact that the heir at law of the trustee was not summoned. The fee of this land was in him during his life and at his death it descended to his heir at law. Without their *presence or the presence of a substituted trustee in whom the fee could vest it is not in court, nor has it any representative here. Nor can it, under the circumstances, be conveyed to the purchaser. The title proposed to the appellant is thus defective, wanting a material link."

*424

We have not thought it necessary to advert to the fact, that this very estate has already been twice before this court, and that important questions, involving the rights of all the parties, were adjudicated. It was decided first that the income should be used and apportioned among the children and their families, and not be left to accumulate as directed by the will. And it was also decided that, according to a proper construction of the will, Mrs. Levy took two shares. Levy v. Barrett, supra. These questions were pressing and had to be decided, notwithstanding the unborn remaindermen were not parties. And thus it is necessary that "the final division" should be made, although these same parties in posse are not in esse.

In reference to the expenditures of executors, when they have some personal interest in judicial proceedings instituted in their representative character, the doctrine is "perplexing," as stated by Chancellor Wardlaw in the case of McClellen v. Hetherington, 10 Rich. Eq., 204 [73 Am. Dec. 89]. In that case the rule is stated, "that the representative should be reimbursed from the estate for the expenses he has incurred in litigation, fairly falling upon him in his character of trustee, although he may have some interest in the subject. He should have credit for all expenditures for the preservation and benefit of the estate, as for fees to counsel, for general advice in the administration of the estate, * * * for obtaining the instruction of the court in a proper case for settlement of the estate and for like services." This proceeding was for the instruction of the court, and was certainly "in a proper case." The objects of the executors were probably of a mixed character, to do their whole duty as executors, and at the same time to put their own security beyond doubt. They, as representatives of all parties, had a right to do so, and whilst they might possibly have rested securely upon the Circuit decree, it was not unreasonable that they should desire the judgment of the Supreme Court upon the subject. We cannot take this case *out of the operation of the general rule. The executors appealing should be reimbursed the expenses of the appeal.

*425

Subject to this modification, the judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 425

FELLERS v. DAVIS.

(November Term, 1884.)

[Evidence ⊂⊃580.]

In action against the sureties on an administration bond after decree by the Court of Probate against the administrator, testimony of a witness (since deceased) taken in the Court of Probate on the accounting there had cannot be given in evidence against the sureties in this action, they not having been parties to such accounting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2413; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃580.]

Before Fraser, J., Newberry, February, 1884.

The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. Pope & Packer, for appellants.

Messrs. Suber & Caldwell, Geo. S. Mower, contra.

March 28, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Raiford C. Swindler died intestate in 1871, and letters of administration upon his estate were granted to his son, John R. Swindler, who, together with Smith L. Davis and Micajah D. Suber, as his sureties, executed to the probate judge of Newberry the usual administration bond. Soon after, in August, 1871, Smith L. Davis died leaving a will, of which his widow, Keziah W. Davis, is the qualified executrix. On June 6, 1883, this action was brought in the name of the probate judge on the administration bond against the sureties, Micajah D .Suber and Keziah W. Davis, as executrix of her deceased husband. The estate of the intestate, R. C. Swindler, proved to be insolvent, and the action was brought at the instance of creditors to recover from the sureties the sum of $886.25, and interest thereon from December 5, 1871, which, as alleged, John R. Swindler, the administrator, had wasted of the estate of his *intestate. Suber is understood to be insolvent and did not answer, but Mrs. Davis, as executrix of the other surety, answered, denying that the administrator had committed any devastavit, and, insisting that she had never been made a party to any proceedings for an account against the administrator, who was not a party to this cause, denied all liability to account in the premises.

*426

The following facts, stated in general terms, were made to appear: On November 3, 1871, Micajah D. Suber, and wife, filed in the Probate Court a petition against John R. Swindler, and the other heirs at law of Raiford C. Swindler, for partition of his lands. On the same day (November 3), John R. Swindler answered, and in his answer set up that he was administrator, that there were debts unpaid, and had the creditors called in, turning the petition for partition into a proceeding to marshal assets, sell the lands, &c. A few days after this proceeding, viz., on November 13, 1871, the administrator petitioned the probate judge to sell the balance of the personalty (there had been a sale before). The probate judge made the order, but he directed the sale made by the then sheriff, one Thomas M. Paysinger; who made the sale aggregating $886.25, taking four notes payable to himself as sheriff, amounting to $797.65, on which John R. Swindler was either principal or surety, and the remainder he collected in cash. These assets were never turned over, either to the administrator or to the judge of probate, to be administered in that court in the proceeding then pending to marshal the assets. Paysinger soon after absconded. The lands were sold, and the proceeds of sale apportioned among the creditors in the probate proceedings, leaving still a large amount due.

Matters seemed to have stood in this condition for ten years, until 1881, when the proceedings were revived, and an effort made to charge the administrator, John R. Swindler, with the money lost by the Paysinger sale. It does not clearly appear under what proceeding this was done, but supposed to be the proceedings in the Probate Court, in which the said Swindler, although a defendant, had the creditors called in and the proceeds of the land sold distributed among the creditors, who are still not fully paid. But it is quite clear that the sureties on the administration bond were not before the Probate Court in that *proceeding, or any other when the account of the administrator was stated. The probate judge held that the administrator Swindler was not chargeable, in his official capacity, with the loss by the Paysinger sale; but, on appeal, Judge Pressley reversed that ruling, and, as directed, the probate judge then held that Swindler, the administrator, was officially liable for the loss in the Paysinger sale.

*427

Based on this last decree of the probate judge, this action was brought on the administration bond, to make the sureties liable for the Paysinger loss, on the ground that it was occasioned by a breach of the official duty of John R. Swindler as administrator. It seems that no effort was made, under the probate judgment, against the administrator, to make the money out of him, and he is not made a party in this action against the sureties. By consent of parties, the cause was heard by Judge Fraser without a jury. During the trial the plaintiff proposed to read, in evidence, what purported to be taken down in writing, as the testimony of Thomas M. Paysinger, at the accounting of the administrator (J. R. Swindler) in the Probate Court. This was objected to, but the presiding judge allowed the contents of the paper to be read as evidence. He held, among other things, that the decree in the Probate Court, against the administrator, was only prima facie evidence in an action against the sureties; but he decided that the evidence before him was sufficient to establish the claim against them. He ruled that the sureties had a right to have the accounts re-adjusted, if they could be benefited thereby, but he thought it would not be to their advantage to re-open the accounts, and pronounced judgment for the plaintiff to the extent of the Paysinger sale and interest, amounting to $1,652.57.

From this judgment the defendant, Keziah W. Davis, as executrix, appeals upon numerous grounds, which may be condensed into the following: I. That it was error to charge the sureties on the administration bond with the loss of the Paysinger sale. II. That it was error to find, as a fact, that the administrator did not take steps to force the sheriff to transfer the notes and money, in view of the uncontradicted testimony that very soon after the sale Paysinger absconded, and that at that time the unsettled condition of the country practically closed the courts. III. That it was *error to hold that the accounting of the administrator before the Probate Court, was binding on the sureties, who were not parties. IV. That it was error to admit the testimony of Thomas M. Paysinger, given before the Probate Court in the proceeding against the administrator for account.

*428

From the view the court takes it will not be necessary to consider any of the grounds, except the last, and as the case has to go back, it will perhaps be better not to discuss them now. In admitting as evidence what Paysinger was taken down as swearing in the proceeding before the probate judge, the ground upon which it was admitted is not stated; but as it was said at the bar that Paysinger is dead, we suppose that must have been the ground. Assuming that it was, and that the fact was regularly proved as a foundation for allowing the evidence, we do not think it was properly admissible. This case, and that before the Probate Court, cannot be regarded as "between the same parties." The sureties were not parties to that proceeding, and the administrator, who must be taken to have been a party there, is not before this court. In stating the different classes of exceptions to the rule rejecting "hearsay" evidence, Mr. Greenleaf says: "May be included the testimony of deceased witnesses, given in a former action between the same parties." 1 Green. Evid., § 163. Lord Mansfield in Mayor of Doncaster v. Day, 3 Taunt., 262, stated the rule thus: "What a witness, since dead, has sworn upon a trial between the same parties, may be given in evidence either from the judge's notes, or from notes that have been taken by any other person, who will swear to their accuracy; or the former evidence may be proved by any person who will swear from his memory to its having been given." See Bishop v. Tucker, 4 Rich., 178; Drayton ads. Wells, 1 Nott & McC., 409 [9 Am. Dec. 718]; State v. Campbell, 1 Rich., 124; Yancey v. Stone, 9 Rich. Eq., 429; Parker v. Leggett, 13 Rich., 171.

But it is urged that, although the parties personally are not the same, the subject matter is the same; that the judgment of the Probate Court against the administrator is prima facie evidence against the sureties, and therefore they must be privies. It is true that the liability of the sureties arises under the same bond as that which binds the administrator, and they all might, *and indeed ought to be, sued together (Taylor v. Taylor, 2 Rich. Eq., 128); but it does not seem to us that they are privies in the sense of the rule which makes evidence against one necessarily evidence against the other. The rule admitting the evidence is exceptional, and proceeds upon the view that the parties have had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness, but here the sureties never had such opportunity, and the fact that the administrator had such opportunity should not bind them. We can understand how one administrator might be a privy in estate with another administrator of the same estate, as one succeeds the other as to the same subject matter (Boudereau v. Montgomery, 4 Wash. C. C., 186 [Fed. Cas. No. 1,694]), but we cannot see that the same relation exists between an administrator and his sureties. "In an action on an administration bond against the sureties a decree in the Court of Equity, against the principal is only prima facie evidence, and the surety may impugn the decree." Norton, Ordinary, v. Wallace (in Court of Errors), 1 Rich., 507; Crane, Boylston & Co. v. Moses, 13 S. C., 580. In the case of Norton, Judge Butler said: "The question here suggests itself, upon what principle is it, that the surety has a right to look into the decree at all? Why, upon no other than this, that he was not privy to the former judgment, and as a stranger claims the right to be heard for the purpose of ascertaining his just and legal rights." It is true that afterwards Judge O'Neall said, in the same case (2 Rich., 461), that the remark as to not being privy to the judgment, "must be understood in a qualified sense." But accepting the qualification, we think the fact that the surety may "surcharge and falsify the account," excludes the idea of such identity of interest as to make evidence against one necessarily evidence against the other.

*429

It is said that no importance should be given to the admission of the evidence even if it was error, as the judgment was not rested on it. Of course, we cannot know what influence it had upon the court, but there is one view in which the testimony was important.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be set aside without prejudice and the cause remanded for a new trial according to the conclusions herein announced.

---

22 S. C. *430

*DONNAN v. WATTS.

(November Term, 1884.)

[Principal and Surety ⇨102.]

When a debtor to an estate by note for purchases of personalty at the estate sale afterwards becomes administratrix de bonis non, her debt is paid to herself as administratrix, and the sureties on her administration bond cannot call upon the sureties on her note to pay the debt.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Chick v. Farr, 31 S. C. 475, 10 S. E. 176, 390.

For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. § 181½; Dec. Dig. ⇨102.]

Before Fraser, J., Laurens, February, 1884.

On the hearing of this appeal Judge Witherspoon, of the Sixth Judicial Circuit, sat in the place of the chief justice, who had been of counsel in the cause.

The opinion states the case. The order of the Circuit judge was as follows: "It seems to me that the sureties on the bond of the administrator de bonis non, and who was the debtor, are the very persons who have put the sureties on the note in a position of very great hardship if they have not been relieved of this liability. It is their fault that Sophia M. Langston is both payor and payee in this case. The case of Jacobs v. Woodside (6 S. C., 490), seems to be conclusive. In that case the action was brought by a succeeding administrator, who might claim an option as representing creditors as to which party he would pursue. The primary liability is certainly on the sureties to the bond as administratrix de bonis non, and these sureties have no rights against the sureties on the note. It is therefor ordered and adjudged, that the demurrer be sustained and the complaint dismissed with costs."

Mr. James Farrow, for appellant.
Messrs. Holmes & Simpson, contra.

March 31, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice WITHERSPOON. John M. Langston died intestate in 1862, and D. M. H. Langston was duly appointed administrator of his estate. The administrator, on December 10, 1862, sold the personal property of his intestate. At this sale the defendant, Sophia M. Langston, the widow of the intestate, pur*chased a considerable amount of the property, for which she gave the administrator her sealed note, payable at twelve months, with J. F. Dorroh and Samuel J. Craig as sureties. In 1863 the administrator, D. M. H. Langston, died before he had fully administered the estate of John Langston. After the death of D. M. H. Langston, the defendant, Sophia M. Langston, the widow of John Langston, was duly appointed administratrix de bonis non of the estate of John Langston, August 31, 1863, and as such administratrix received her own note as part of the unadministered assets of the estate of John Langston. On November 16, 1879, upon the final settlement of the estate of John Langston by Sophia M. Langston, administratrix, in the Probate Court for Laurens County, a decree was rendered by said Probate Court in favor of creditors against said administratrix for $1,991.64, the administratrix having been charged with her own note as cash in hand.
*431

This action was instituted by plaintiff, one of the sureties upon the bond of Sophia M. Langston, administratrix de bonis non, against the said Sophia M. Langston, and the sureties on her note against the co-surety on the administration bond and creditors, to compel the sureties on the note to pay the amount of the note to the creditors of John Langston. Upon the call of the case and the reading of the complaint, all of the defendants interposed a general oral demurrer, upon the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. His honor, Judge Fraser, sustained the demurrer and dismissed the complaint with costs. The plaintiff appeals upon the ground "that the facts in this case warrant an exception to the general rule which charges executors and administrators with their own notes as cash."

Sophia M. Langston's relation to the debt was changed when she became administratrix. She thereby became both payer and payee of the note. The remedy for the collection of the note was completely suspended by Sophia M. Langston becoming administratrix, and by operation of law the administratrix is regarded as holding the amount of the note as cash in hands the same as the other effects of the intestate, subject to a due course of administration. See Schnell v.
*432
Schroder, Bail. Eq., 335; *Griffin v. Bonham, 9 Rich. Eq., 71; Jacobs v. Woodside, 6 S. C., 490. The facts in the case of Jacobs v. Woodside are similar to the case under consideration. We see nothing in the facts of this case that should make it an exception to the well-settled principle of law which charges an administrator with his own note as cash in hand to be accounted for in the due course of administration.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, and that the complaint herein be dismissed with costs.

---

22 S. C. 432

ARTHUR v. ALLEN.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Process ⊂⊃163.]

While a summons cannot be amended without leave of the court, an order that a person "be made a party defendant herein," implies that the summons is to be amended and then served on such person.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Lyles v. Haskell, 35 S. C. 403, 14 S. E. 829.

For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. §§ 224–238; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃163.]

[2. Parties ⊂⊃54.]

When a summons is amended by making a new party the better practice is that the amendment should be inserted in the original summons, but where an additional summons incorporating the amendment is issued, there is substantially an amendment of the original summons.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parties, Cent. Dig. § 85; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃54.]

[3. Equity ⊂⊃298.]

Where it becomes necessary since the adoption of the code of procedure to revive, or amend by supplemental pleading, a bill instituted in the Court of Equity prior to 1870, it should be done under the forms of the code. Such a bill in this case was properly revived and amended by supplemental complaint and summons.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Sparks v. Green, 69 S. C. 229, 48 S. E. 61; Sims v. Davis, 70 S. C. 374, 49 S. E. 872.

For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 589; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃298.]

[4. Equity ⊂⊃297.]

Where there is an order granting leave to file supplemental complaint, doubted whether an order to revive was necessary; but, if necessary, it may be granted at the hearing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 588; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃297.]

5. The case of Suber v. Allen, 13 S. C., 317, does not decide that this present action was then no longer pending.

Before Fraser, J., Richland, July, 1883.

The Circuit decree in this case was as follows:

This case came before me at the term for July, 1883, on a motion on notice on behalf of James C. F. Sims, Nancy Allen, James Kitchens, and Adelaide Kitchens to set aside the service of certain papers served on them entitled "amendment to supple*mental summons, and complaint making J. C. F. Sims a party defendant." These papers were served on J. C. F. Sims personally, and on Messrs. Pope & Haskell as attorneys of Nancy Allen, James Kitchens, and Adelaide Kitchens. I do not understand that any objection is made on account of this service having been made on the attorneys instead of having been made on these persons personally.

*433

A brief statement is necessary to show how the questions arise which are now presented for the consideration of the court. In May, 1861, John M. Allen died intestate, and in June, 1861, Addison R. Phillips was duly appointed administrator of his estate. On October 5, 1867, Addison R. Phillips, as administrator, filed a bill in the Court of Equity for Richland District (now County) against Nancy Allen, Rebecca Cornwell, and Adelaide Kitchens, heirs and distributees of John M. Allen, James Kitchens, husband of the said Adelaide, and William D. Cornwell, husband of the said Rebecca, and John Caldwell, John Coate, Charles A. Bedell, and Jesse Baxter, creditors of John M. Allen, for an injunction, an accounting by the administrator, sale of the real estate, and marshaling of the assets of the estate of John M. Allen. All the parties named as defendants answered the bill, creditors were called in to establish their claims, and the commissioner in equity was ordered to take the testimony and state the accounts of the administrator, Phillips. On June 9, 1868, some testimony was taken by the commissioner as to the condition of the estate and as to the claims of certain creditors.

After this, but it does not appear when, Addison R. Phillips, the administrator, died, and on August 1, 1878, Daniel B. Miller, who was then clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for Richland County, as was his duty, applied for administration, and was duly appointed administrator de bonis non of the estate of Addison R. Phillips. It is not alleged that any proceedings were taken by Daniel B. Miller, under the said bill in equity. The term of office of Daniel B. Miller as clerk of the Court of Common Pleas has expired, and he has been succeeded in office by E. R. Arthur, who, it is alleged, has also succeeded him as administrator de bonis non of John M. Allen, and as administrator of Addison R. Phillips. John Caldwell has died, leaving a will, of which *Thomas J. Robertson has qualified as executor. Charles A. Bedell has died, and E. W. Bancroft has administered on his estate. John Coate has died, and Christian H. Suber has administered on his estate. William D. Cornwell is not now named as a party defendant, perhaps because he has died, and all interest he may have had in the estate has survived to his wife Rebecca, who is a party.

*434

In June, 1882, E. R. Arthur, as clerk of the court, and administrator de bonis non of John M. Allen, without having obtained any order of court for this purpose, filed and served a summons, and with it a supplemental complaint on the said Nancy Allen, Rebecca Cornwell, James Kitchens, and Adelaide, his wife, Jesse Baxter, and the personal representatives of John Caldwell, John Coate, and Charles A. Bedell. In this supplemental complaint, the original bill in equity, and the proceedings under it, were substantially set out, and the facts which rendered a supplemental complaint necessary were stated, and the plaintiff, E. R. Arthur, joined in the prayer of said bill, and demanded such further relief as may be proper. To this complaint answers were filed by the personal representatives of John Caldwell and John Coate, deceased, creditors, and perhaps on behalf of other creditors which have not been brought to my attention. Nancy Allen, James Kitchens, and Adelaide Kitchens demurred to this supplemental complaint. The demurrer was overruled by Judge Hudson, April 24, 1883, and these defendants allowed thirty days to answer.

On April 27, 1883, an order was made by Judge Hudson, allowing the plaintiff to amend the said supplemental complaint. The order provides "that James C. F. Sims be made a party defendant. That the plaintiff have leave, within twenty days from the rising of the court, to amend his complaint by alleging therein that after the commencement of the original action herein, to wit, on or about the month of September, 1883, the said J. C. F. Sims took possession of the lot of land in the city of Columbia described in the complaint," with such other allegations as might be necessary to charge said J. C. F. Sims with the rents and profits of said lot. On May 15, 1883, in pursuance, I suppose, of the order of April 27, 1883, Nancy Allen, James

*435

*Kitchens, and Adelaide Kitchens filed their answer to said supplemental complaint. On May 17, 1883, and before the amended complaint, provided for by the order of April 27, 1883, was filed or served, another order was made by Judge Kershaw amending the order of April 27, made by Judge Hudson, so as to allow the plaintiff to make additional allegations in reference to the lot of land alleged to be in the possession of J. C. F. Sims. This order seems to have been made at chambers on notice to all the parties interested to oppose it.

Under this state of things, and claiming to proceed under the authority of the said orders of April 27 and May 17, 1883, plaintiff has filed and served on Nancy Allen, James Kitchens, and Adelaide Kitchens, and on the other parties defendant in the supplemental complaint, and on the said James C. F. Sims, a summons and complaint. On the back of the summons, after the title of the cause, is endorsed "summons for relief and amendment to supplemental summons and complaint, making J. C. F. Sims a party defendant." The title of the cause in the summons and complaint, is the same as in the supplemental summons and complaint, except that the name of James C. F. Sims is added as a party defendant. The summons is otherwise in the usual form. The complaint sets out substantially the matters alleged in the supplemental complaint, with the addition of such allegations as are allowed to be made by the orders of April 27 and May 17, 1883.

The object of the motion now before me is to set aside the service of these papers, this summons and this complaint in the words of the notice, to set aside the service of certain papers herein, styled "amendment to supplemental summons and complaint, making J. C. F. Sims a party defendant." These words seem to be a memorandum of the contents of the summons and complaint, which have each their own endorsement as above stated, and I take it the motion is to set aside the service of both. The motion is made by J. C. F. Sims and by Nancy Allen, James Kitchens, and Adelaide Kitchens, who have appeared for the purposes of this motion only.

The motion is based on the following grounds: 1. That said summons is without authority of law and void. 2. That said *complaint is without authority of law and void. 3. That there has been no order allowing the plaintiff to file the "amended supplemental complaint," or to file the original supplemental complaint. 4. That there has been no order allowing the original action (the bill in equity) to be continued against these defendants. 5. That there is no such cause of action pending.

*436

The first two grounds are very general, and depend on the other three, which can best be considered together. There are two sections of the code which apply to supplemental complaints—§ 142, § 198, of the code of 1882. Section 142 provides for those cases in which, under the old practice, a bill of revivor was necessary. Section 198 provides for those cases in which, under the old practice, a supplemental bill was necessary in order to bring in new matter occurring after the commencement of the litigation between the parties. No order of the court is now necessary for leave to file supplemental complaint under section 142, or even is it proper, it being a matter of right. 2 Wait. Pr., 469, ¶ 2 "a"—Vorh. Code, 188, ¶ 121, note "f." An order of the court, however, is necessary for leave to file supplemental complaint under section 198, to be obtained on motion, on notice, or under order to show cause. Vorh. Code, 357, ¶ 177, note "a."

The supplemental complaint, therefore, of June, 1882, was properly filed, without an order for leave to do so, but leave was necessary, and has been obtained, to bring in the supplemental matter, as to which J. C. F. Sims has been made a party under section 198. The provision in reference to existing suits found in the code of 1870, has been left out of the code of 1882—but a supplemental complaint is not a substitute for the original complaint, and it is not merged into it. They are separate but allied actions, to be tried together. While each contributes to the general result of the litigation, neither ever loses its individual existence. As to this supplemental complaint, there has been neither process nor pleading before the code, and it has come into existence since its adoption, though the office of the supplemental complaint may be to get the benefit of proceedings without which it would have been ineffectual. If this supplemental complaint of June, 1882, would have been good before May, *1882, it is good now, being, I think, amply provided for by section 449 of code of 1882: "And the practice heretofore in use may be adopted so far as may be necessary to prevent a failure of justice."

*437

I am inclined to think that the service of the summons and complaint of June, 1882, if not sufficient of itself to operate as a revivor of the bill in equity of 1867, was at least sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to an order of course to revive and continue the action, an order which can be made whenever the parties are all in court and the case ready for a hearing. It seems to me that, whatever may be the true view of the practice, it is now too late for Nancy Allen, James Kitchens, and Adelaide Kitchens to make the question that these proceedings are not pending. They have demurred to this supplemental complaint; their demurrer has been overruled. They have answered; and now two orders, April 27 and May 17, 1883, have been made in the case, allowing this supplemental complaint to be amended by making J. C. F. Sims a party defendant. My predecessors have treated these actions as pending, and until their orders allowing this amendment are set aside on Circuit, as having been made through "inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect," or by the judgment of the Supreme Court, I am bound to treat them as valid, and as made in an existing suit.

It is claimed, however, that it has been decided that the original bill in equity is no longer a suit pending, and that as to this it is res adjudicata. In 1878, C. H. Suber, one of the defendants in this action, commenced an action against D. B. Miller, as administrator de bonis non of John M. Allen, and as administrator of Addison R. Phillips, the deceased administrator, on behalf of himself and other creditors, and against the heirs and distributees of John M. Allen, and also against the sureties to the administration bond of Phillips and J. C. F. Sims; amongst other things, to subject this same lot of land to the payment of the debts, and for other purposes. On demurrer filed by the administrator of one of the deceased sureties on this bond of Phillips, it was held on Circuit by Judge Thomson that the complaint was multifarious, in that it joined improperly several causes of action. One of the causes of demurrer assigned was *that there was another action pending as to the same cause of action. Judge Thomson held that this ground was not well taken, as there was no such action now pending as to be a bar to Suber's action.

*438

Judge Thomson may have held that the original bill in equity had abated, and that it could not have been revived at all, or that it had not been revived by Miller, or that, even if it had been revived and was then an existing suit, it was not such a suit as would bar Suber's action, as the latter involved several matters not included in the first. Either view would have been sufficient to sustain his ruling on this point. If, however, Arthur had been the party instead of Miller, and Judge Thomson had made his ruling on the demurrer after a supplemental complaint had been filed and served, it is not clear how a demurrer to a complaint filed by Suber, and which assumes the facts in the complaint to be true for the purpose of the demurrer, can work an adjudication of these facts as to any one else except the plaintiff who alleges such fact in his complaint. Suber alleged certain facts in his complaint, and conclusions of law from these facts are binding only on Suber or on those who are bound by his statement.

This case was appealed to the Supreme Court, and it will be seen (Suber v. Allen, 13 S. C., 317) that the complaint improperly joined various causes of action, only a part of which were involved in the first action—the bill in equity of 1867. In the view I take of Suber v. Allen, there is nothing in it which adjudges the question here, whether there was a suit pending in which the orders of April 27 and May 17, 1883, were made.

I take it, then, that Nancy Allen, James Kitchens, and Adelaide Kitchens are in court, and cannot claim on this motion that there is no such action pending as to authorize a Circuit judge "to make J. C. F. Sims a party defendant." If they are parties to an existing suit, whether by service of summons, by appearance and answer, or by estoppel in such way as to be bound by the orders, it is not easy to see how Sims or any other person called in as a new party can take advantage of irregularities or defects of which for any reason they have failed to avail themselves. "A supplemental pleading is governed by all the rules applicable *to an original pleading of a similar character, and its defects are remediable in the same manner as defects in other pleadings." 2 Wait Pr., 474, a. There is no good reason why a supplemental complaint may not be amended by adding new matter occurring after the original action was amended. This new matter as to Sims and his possession of the lot was such as is provided for in Section 198, and orders have been obtained to allow the amendment, and the amended supplemental complaint has been filed in pursuance of them. If an order to revive is necessary after the filing and service of the supplemental complaint, it can be made "at the hearing," even in cases where the answer controverts the right to revive. Dan. Ch. P. & P., 1709.

*439

There is some confusion as to the terms, "commencement of an action." In one sense, an action is commenced when the first defendant is served with process or summons. It is not commenced, however, as to any particular defendant until he is served with summons. By the code all other modes of commencing actions, except by service of a summons, are abolished, unless it be by voluntary appearance. Actions are technically commenced by the service of summons. 1 Wait Pr., 501. Provisional remedies fail unless parties are served with summons in due time after they are allowed. Vorh. Code, 153, notes "a" and "d."

If this is the law, there is no way by which a new party can be brought in by a supplemental complaint except by the service of a summons. In case of the death of one of the heirs at law, after commencement of proceedings in partition, by whose death, as is often the case, the descent is cast upon infants, these infants can never be made parties at all without a summons, and a summons, too, to make them parties to a supplemental complaint. The time of service of summons is time in reference to which the rights of plaintiff and defendant, in the matter of the guardian ad litem, are fixed by the code. They can consent to nothing. It seems to me that process is necessary, as a matter of course, to bring in new parties. The code only substitutes a summons in the place of the old capias and other writs at law and of the subpœnas in equity. 1 Wait Pr., 467; see ibid, 441, 442, 443, 444. Under the old practice, subpœnas issued to make parties to bills of revivor and supplemental bills (Dan. Ch. P. & P., *1680 and 1707), and the former chancery practice is now adopted as to making parties. Vorh. Code, note "a," and cases.

*440

I therefore conclude that the summons and complaint, the service of which is sought to be set aside by this motion, are such as have been authorized by the orders of April 27 and May 17, 1883, and have been properly served, and that I have no right, even if I did not concur, to question the right to make them on this motion; they are the law of the case for me. It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the motion be refused, and that the said defendants, Nancy Allen, James Kitchens, Adelaide Kitchens, and J. C. F. Sims, have leave to file their answers within thirty days after notice of the filing of this order.

The defendants appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because his honor, the Circuit judge, erred in holding "that the summons and complaint, the service of which is sought to be set aside by this motion, are such as have been authorized by the orders of April 27 and May 17, 1883, and have been properly served; and that I have no right now, if I did not concur, to question the right to make them on this motion—they are the law of the case to me."

2. Because his honor, the Circuit judge, erred in holding that "no order of the court is now necessary for leave to file a supplemental complaint under section 142 [of the code], or even is it proper, it being a matter of right."

3. Because his honor, the Circuit judge, erred in holding that "the supplemental complaint of June, 1882, was properly filed without an order for leave to do so; but leave was necessary and had to be obtained in order to bring in the supplemental matter, as to which J. C. F. Sims has been made a party under section 198."

4. Because his honor, the Circuit judge, erred in holding that "the service of the summons and complaint of June, 1882, if not sufficient of itself to operate as a revivor of the bill in equity of 1867, was at least sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to an order of course to revive and continue the action, an order which can be made whenever the parties are all in court and the case ready for a hearing."

5. Because his honor, the Circuit judge, erred in holding that *it was not adjudged in the case of Suber, Administrator, v. Allen and others, whether there was another suit pending in which the orders of April 27 and May 17, 1883, were made.

*441

6. Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that J. C. F. Sims, made a new party defendant, could not take advantage of any irregularity or defects of which for any reason the original parties defendant had failed to avail themselves.

7. Because his honor, the Circuit judge, erred in holding that "there was no way by which a new party may be brought in by a supplemental complaint, except by the service of a summons."

8. Because there was no motion made, or leave granted, to amend the summons granted in said cause, and without such authority there could be no amendment of summons, and his honor erred in not so ruling.

9. Because there has been no amendment of the summons in said cause, and until the original summons is amended, no amended copies can be issued; and his honor erred in not so ruling.

10. Because his honor, the Circuit judge, erred in refusing said motion.

Messrs. Pope & Haskell, Clark & Muller, for appellants.

Messrs. Andrew Crawford Bachman & Youmans, contra.

April 6, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. The statement of the facts in the decree of Judge Fraser, from which this appeal is taken, is so full and clear as to supersede the necessity of making any further statement here.

The first point which we propose to consider is that raised by the eighth ground of appeal. It may be conceded that a summons cannot be amended without leave of the court, and the practical inquiry here is, has such leave been granted? The order of Judge Hudson was, "That James C. F. Sims be made a party defendant herein; that the plaintiff have leave within twenty days from the rising of the court to amend his complaint by alleging," &c. Now, if it be true, as it undoubtedly is, that the *proper mode of making a party defendant to a case is by the service of a summons upon him, it would seem to follow necessarily that where there is an order requiring a certain person to be made a party defendant, such order implies that the summons in the case is to be amended by inserting his name and serving a copy thereof so amended upon such person. While, therefore, the order in this case did not in words authorize an amendment of the summons by inserting therein the name of Sims as a party defendant, yet as it did require that he should be made a party defendant, it necessarily implied that the summons should be so amended, and then the order proceeded to provide for the amendment of the complaint by inserting certain additional allegations.

*442

The ninth ground of appeal seems to have been taken under a misapprehension of the real facts of the case, though the papers as printed in the "Case," would seem to warrant the assumption upon which that ground rests. The summons as printed did appear to be a copy and not an original, and there was nothing in the "Case" to show that there was any original amended summons; but from the original records introduced at the hearing by consent, it does appear that there was an original amended summons issued and served upon Sims, and the service thereof accepted by the attorneys representing the other appellants. It is true that the amendment of the summons was not made by inserting the name of the additional party authorized in the summons first issued, with an appropriate reference to the order authorizing such an amendment, as perhaps would have been the better practice, inasmuch as the rule seems to be well settled that there can be but one original summons in a case, and that instead thereof a transcript of such original summons was made in which the name of Sims was added as an additonal defendant, and was styled "amendment to supplemental summons and complaint, making J. C. F. Sims a party defendant," and marked "original"; but this departure from what would have been a better practice is merely formal and cannot have the effect of annulling the paper. It appears to us, therefore, that the summons was substantially amended, and that this was done by virtue of an order which necessarily implied leave to make such amendment.

The next position which we shall notice is

*443

"that there is no *form of proceeding under the code by which Sims can be made a party to this original bill of complaint." If this be so, then certainly there was a very strange and unfortunate omission made in the code. But we do not think any such omission was made. The code, as originally adopted, (section 34,) provided for the transfer of all actions then pending in the Court of Chancery to the Court of Common Pleas, to be there "heard, tried, and determined, with all rights respected and preserved in the same manner as if originally brought there." It also provided (section 465) that the provisions of the code should apply "to future proceedings in actions or suits heretofore commenced, and now pending, as follows: (1) If there have been no pleading therein, to the pleadings and all subsequent proceedings. (2) Where there is an issue of law or of fact, or any other question of fact to be tried, to the trial and all subsequent proceedings." And in section 471, after repealing all statutory provisions inconsistent with the provisions of the code, it proceeded to declare as follows: "And all rights of action given or secured by existing laws may be prosecuted in the manner provided by this act. If a case shall arise in which an action for the enforcement or protection of a right or the redress or prevention of a wrong cannot be had under this act, the practice heretofore in use may be adopted so far as may be necessary to prevent a failure of justice."

These provisions manifestly show that the intention of the legislature was that there should be no obstacle of any kind thrown in the way of parties who had commenced their actions in the Court of Equity to prevent them from proceeding to enforce their rights according to the forms of law, notwithstanding the abolition of the court in which they had originally instituted their actions and the transfer of the same to another court in which the forms of proceeding had been materially altered, and that for this purpose they might, in all subsequent steps, adopt the new forms of proceeding; but if that was impracticable, then, in order to prevent a failure of justice, they might resort to the former practice. We do not see how the legislature could have, in general and comprehensive terms, without descending to innumerable details, better expressed their intention that no such result should follow the change in the tribunal and in the *modes of proceeding, as that which appellants contend have followed such change. Here was a proceeding pending in the Court of Equity at the time that court was abolished, which was, by the provisions of the code above referred to, transferred to the docket of the Court of Common Pleas to be there "heard, tried, and determined, with all rights respected and preserved in the same manner as if originally brought there;" but owing to the death of some of the parties it could not be determined without bringing the representatives of such deceased parties before the court. How was this to be done? If there had been no change of the law, it would have been by a bill of revivor, upon the filing of which subpœna ad respondendum would have issued to bring before the court the representatives of the deceased parties, and this of course would have involved the necessity for further pleading. But since the code the action would not abate, and all that was necessary in order that the rights of the parties should be respected and preserved was to continue the action against such representatives, and the mode of doing this is provided for by the code. The parties having the right to proceed with their action notwithstanding the death of some of the necessary parties, that right is "preserved" to them, after the change in the mode of proceeding and the transfer of the case to another court "in the same manner as if originally brought there." Now, if the case had been originally brought in the Court of Common Pleas after the adoption of the code, there can be no doubt that the manner in which they had a right to proceed with their action would have been that prescribed by the code. Two modes are prescribed, one of which by motion, with notice of course to the representatives of the deceased parties, who are thus to be brought in, is applicable within one year after the death of a party, and the other by supplemental complaint if more than a year has elapsed (Code, § 142; old Code, § 144); and no leave is necessary to file such supplemental complaint. Parnell v. Maner, 16 S. C., 348.

*444

But it is said that there was no necessity or authority for issuing a summons with such supplemental complaint. The object was to make the representatives of the deceased persons parties to the action, and as the only mode of effecting that object is by the service of a summons, unless in the case where the ap*plication is made by motion within a year from the death of such parties, it would seem to follow necessarily that a summons must issue, or such representatives never would become parties. It does not appear, therefore, that the objections urged to the validity of the summons of June, 1882, and the supplemental complaint issued thereon, can be sustained. More than a year had elapsed from the death of the several parties, and hence the action could not be continued by motion, and only by supplemental complaint, for the filing of which no leave of the court was necessary, as we have seen. The case being thus properly pending in court, and it becoming necessary to amend by making a new party by reason of circumstances occurring since the commencement of the action, it became necessary to obtain an order for that purpose and for filing an amended supplemental complaint under section 198 of the code (old code, § 200), and hence the propriety of, and necessity for, the order of Judge Hudson of April 27, 1883, as well as the order of Judge Kershaw of May 17, 1883, amending and extending the same.

*445

Again, it is urged that even granting that the summons of June, 1882, and the supplemental complaint issued thereon were regular and proper, yet there was no order to revive, and such an order was necessary before any order to amend could be granted. Whether an order to revive was necessary under the code may, perhaps, be doubted; but even if such order be necessary, we agree with the Circuit judge that such order may be taken at the hearing. See the authority cited by him, 3 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr., 1709.

Finally, it is urged that the original action was no longer pending at the time the effort was made to revive it in June, 1882, and there was therefore no suit to be revived. This position, as we understand it, is based solely upon the decision of Judge Thomson in the case of Suber v. Allen, 13 S. C., 317. The full record in that case is not before us, and all that we know of it is what is said in the decree of Judge Fraser, and what appears in the case as reported. It seems that one of the defendants in that case, who does not appear to be a party to this case, demurred to the complaint filed by Mr. Suber in that case upon two grounds: 1st. "That there is another action pending between *the same parties for the same cause of action." 2d. "Because different causes of action were improperly joined." Judge Thomson overruled the first ground and sustained the second, and upon appeal his judgment was affirmed. As Judge Fraser very properly says, it does not, by any means, follow from this that Judge Thomson decided that the present action was not then pending. Indeed, there is nothing here to show that the present action was referred to. What allegations were made in Mr. Suber's complaint, all of which would be admitted by the demurrer for the purposes of that case, we are not informed of; but whether such allegations would be admitted by the parties to this case is another matter. The opinion of the Supreme Court in Suber v. Allen was confined solely to the consideration of the second ground of demurrer, and the first is not even mentioned, except in the statement of the case by the reporter. We concur, therefore, with the Circuit judge in holding that this position of appellants cannot be sustained.

*446

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 446

WHITMIRE v. WRIGHT.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Dower ⇐12.]

A widow is not entitled to dower in lands held by her husband under lease. Thus where a husband during coverture held land under a lease for 999 years, the widow has no dower therein.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Morgan v. Smith, 25 S. C. 339; Holley v. Glover, 36 S. C. 416, 15 S. E. 605, 16 L. R. A. 776, 31 Am. St. Rep. 883; Ex parte Steen, 59 S. C. 223, 37 S. E. 829.

For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 43; Dec. Dig. ⇐12.]

[2. Dower ⇐72.]

In action for dower, the defendant, by having accepted a title in fee from the demandant's husband, is not estopped or precluded from showing that his grantor, the husband, had only a leasehold estate of which the widow was not dowable.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Pruitt v. Pruitt, 57 S. C. 162, 35 S. E. 485.

For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 254; Dec. Dig. ⇐72.]

[3. Evidence ⇐84.]

Where a party accepts in 1853 a lease for 999 years, and thereafter in 1863, conveys the land in fee simple, no presumption arises that he had meantime acquired the fee simple title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 106; Dec. Dig. ⇐84.]

Before Aldrich, J., Newberry, June, 1884.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

I agree with the judge of probate in his conclusion as to the *property being partnership assets. As the probate judge says, the lot was sold long before the dissolution of the partnership. The deed to Smith is dated February, 1863, but the sale was made and possession given more than five years before. This was a withdrawal of the land from the partnership assets. Further, there is no proof that the firm was insolvent then, for they continued to do business for a long period after. It is not to be presumed that creditors would stand idly by and see an insolvent firm dispose of partnership property and make no effort to secure the same for the satisfaction of their claims.

*447

This brings us to the main, and, in my opinion, the only question in the case. When the decree of the judge of probate was read, I was so impressed with the fact that the deceased husband had only a leasehold estate, and therefore his widow was not dowable, that I came near declining to hear the able argument of Mr. Jones. But the very strong array of authority and searching application of the same to the case presented by Mr. Cromer, on the part of the demandant, forced me to take the papers, and the more I have considered the question, the more satisfied I am that my first impression was error.

There can be no doubt that dower does not attach to lands of the husband held under lease; and if Mrs. Whitmire, the demandant, was claiming her dower in the leasehold estate of her deceased husband, Henry Whitmire, she could not get it, provided there was any one to dispute her claim. But, as Chancellor Johnstone is reported to have said, "Who would be here at the end of 999 years to dispute his title?" But this is not the case presented. She is not demanding her dower against the reversioners of the leasehold estate, but against the tenant in fee, who holds the estate by virtue of his fee simple title derived from her husband. Will he be allowed to say to Mrs. Whitmire, You have no dower in the land, because your husband was not a tenant in fee, but for years; and to the rest of the world, I hold a fee simple in the land, derived from the husband of demandant? He will not be permitted to blow hot and cold in the same breath. If he holds in fee through Henry Whitmire, Whitmire's widow is entitled to dower. If he does not derive his fee from Henry *Whitmire, then he has no title, and cannot dispute the demand for dower of the widow.

*448

I do not agree with the learned counsel that, since the adoption of the constitution of 1868, dower is a less favored estate than formerly. The dower is for the widow, the homestead is for the family, and the law guards the one as jealously as it does the other.

The question here is, not what estate did Henry Whitmire have, but what estate did he convey? What estate does Robert Wright, the defendant, claim through Whitmire—a lease for years or an estate in fee? If the latter, he is estopped from denying the demandant's claim for dower. Chancellor Kent (4 Com., 38) says: "When the husband had been in possession for years, using the land as his own, and conveying it in fee, the tenant deriving title under him is concluded from controverting the seizin in the action of dower." And Mr. Scribner, in his treatise on dower (2 vol., 217, ch. X.), holds the same doctrine: "According to the principles of the common law, if a tenant at will, or for years, makes a feoffment in fee, his widow will be entitled to dower as against the feoffee and his heirs; for the feoffee, by accepting the conveyance, admits that the husband was seized in fee and entitled to pass it; and the feoffee and such claimants are estopped from showing that the husband had a less estate."

It is controverted if this doctrine is applicable where a tenant for life makes a feoffment in fee. Mr. Preston maintains there is no dower in such case, and in this he is supported by the textbooks. On the other hand, it is laid down in Fitzherbert that the wife of a tenant for life who makes a feoffment in fee shall have dower as against the feoffee, and Mr. Park and Mr. Roper concur in this statement of the law. And our cases of Gayle v. Price, 5 Rich., 525, and Pledger v. Ellerbe, 6 Rich., 266 [60 Am. Dec. 123], sustain this view.

Let the appeal be dismissed with costs and the demandant have her writ, as directed by the judge of probate.

The defendant's exceptions, omitting those relating to the partnership, were as follows:

4. Because his honor erred in holding that the demandant's *dower depended upon the estate which her husband conveyed, and not upon the estate he held.

*449

5. Because his honor erred in not holding that T. & H. Whitmire only had a leasehold estate, and could convey no greater estate than they had, and that the deed in fee simple from T. & H. Whitmire to G. D. Smith, and through him and others down to the defendant, R. H. Wright, cannot transmit any other estate than the leasehold estate.

6. Because his honor erred in deciding that the defendant was estopped from denying that the husband of the demandant was seized of any greater estate than a leasehold estate, by accepting a deed poll in fee simple.

Messrs. Jones & Jones, for appellant.

Messrs. Johnstone & Cromer, contra, on the question of estoppel, cited 4 Kent., 38; 2 Scrib. Dow., 231, 248, 249; 3 Bac. Abr., 209; 5 Rich., 526; Big. Estop., 282, 283, 294; 2 Hill, 440; 32 E. C. L. R., 42; 6 Rich., 270; 5 S. C., 215; Park. Dow., 297. There is a presumption that demandant's husband had acquired a title in fee. 14 S. C., 93.

April 6, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. By this proceeding, originally commenced in the Court of Probate, and carried thence by appeal to the Circuit Court, the petitioner demands her dower, as the widow of Henry Whitmire, deceased, in a certain lot in the town of Newberry. Her claim is resisted by the appellant upon two grounds: 1st. That the said Henry Whitmire never had such an estate in the premises as would entitle his widow to dower, he having merely a leasehold estate therein. 2nd. That the premises in question were partnership property, bought with partnership funds for partnership purposes, by the late firm of T. & H. Whitmire, and that the interest of said Henry Whitmire therein was not subject to dower, until all the debts due by said partnership have been paid, which has not yet been done.

The facts, as ascertained by the decree of the judge of probate, are as follows: On December 3, 1849, one John W. Summer conveyed, by way of lease for the term of 999 years from March *14, 1797, the said lot to a partnership of which said Henry Whitmire was a member, and on February 17, 1853, the other members of said partnership conveyed, in the same way, their interest in the lot to Henry Whitmire and Thomas Whitmire. On February 5, 1863, Thomas Whitmire and Henry Whitmire conveyed the said lot, in fee simple, with full warranty to Geo. D. Smith, and on February 10, 1864, Geo. D. Smith conveyed the same in fee simple, with full warranty, to Bates, Cox & Hammett. On August 4, 1866, Bates, Cox & Hammett, by a like conveyance, upon which the wives of all three of the grantors renounced their dower, conveyed the lot to Robert H. Wright and Emanuel S. Coppock, with full warranty, "except the unrenounced claim of dower of the wife of Henry Whitmire." On January 24, 1882, Coppock conveyed his interest to Robert H. Wright, the defendant, with full warranty. Henry Whitmire died in July, 1882, and this proceeding was commenced on December 2, 1882.

*450

The judge of probate overruled both of the objections urged by the defendant, and sustained the claim of dower, and upon appeal to the Circuit Court his decree was affirmed. The defendant now appeals to this court upon the several grounds set out in the record, but from the view which we take it will not be necessary to state them specifically.

It is conceded that the right of dower does not attach to a leasehold estate, and, therefore, if Henry Whitmire had died before conveying the premises in question, there can be no doubt that his widow would not have been entitled to dower therein, inasmuch as the conveyance under which he held did not purport to convey anything more than a leasehold estate. It is contended, however, by the petitioner, and such was the view taken below, that inasmuch as the deed from Thomas Whitmire and Henry Whitmire to Geo. D. Smith purported to convey the fee simple, and inasmuch as the other intermediate links in the defendant's title purported to convey the fee simple estate, the defendant is estopped from disputing the fact that Henry Whitmire held the fee simple. To simplify the question we will consider it as if Henry Whitmire, holding as he unquestionably did under the deed from his grantors only a leasehold estate in the premises, had conveyed the same in fee simple to the defendant. *The inquiry, then, is whether the defendant, by accepting a conveyance of the fee, is estopped from showing that his grantor held only a leasehold estate of which his widow would not be dowable.

*451

As will be seen by an examination of chapter X. of 2 Scribner on Dower, 231–252, there is no little conflict of authority upon this question; but in this state we do not find that the point has ever been distinctly adjudicated. Gayle v. Price (5 Rich., 525) was a case in which the defendant, holding under a deed from the husband, attempted to show in defence to a claim for dower, that the husband never had the legal title, having bought the premises at sheriff's sale, but never having received a deed from the sheriff. This defence was not allowed, the court saying: "He who enters under the title of another is, in general, estopped from denying it. To this general rule there are exceptions, such as where the title of the grantor, or lessor, is determined, as in cases of life estates or leases; or where the allegation does not contest the legal estate, as in the case of a trustee conveying, and his widow claiming dower. There it may be shown that his legal estate was not such an one as of which a widow was dowable. Or where one enters under a title supposed to be good, but subsequently finds it to be bad, and bona fide acquires the paramount title; there he is permitted to show this, as an answer to the prima facie case made against him by his entry; or where a tenant in possession disclaims the title of his landlord, or buys it by a mere parol contract, and holds in his own right for the statutory period, he may show these facts as an answer to his landlord's claim." From this quotation it will be observed that one of the recognized exceptions to the general rule is that where the defendant enters under a title of a trustee, he may, in bar of an action for dower by the widow of such trustee, be permitted, not to dispute the legal title or right of possession of his grantor, but to show that the nature of his title was such as would not support a claim of dower. This doctrine also seems to be conceded in the case of Plantt v. Payne, 2 Bail., 319. Indeed, we do not understand that it is anywhere denied.

Now, if a defendant in dower who holds under a title from the husband, under which he has gone into possession, while not permitted to dispute the fact that his grantor had a legal title, and *the right of possession, is permitted to show that the title of the husband is not of such a character as would support a claim of dower, to wit, that though having an absolute legal title and right of possession, yet that he held such title as trustee, to which the right of dower would not attach, we do not see why, upon the same principle, the defendant in this case may not be permitted to show that though Henry Whitmire had a legal title and right of possession, yet that such title did not confer upon him an estate to which the right of dower would attach. In Gaunt v. Wainman, 3 Bing. N. C., 69 (32 E. C. L. Rep., 42), it was held that a defendant in dower who had taken a title from the assignees of the husband, in which the premises conveyed were described as freehold, was not estopped by that deed from showing in defence to an action for dower that the premises were leasehold. And this case seems to be recognized in Gayle v. Price, supra.

*452

As was said by Tindal, C. J., in Gaunt v. Wainman, "suppose he had bought the premises as leasehold, would the demandant be estopped to say that they were freehold?" It is quite clear that she would not, for no act or declaration of the husband, after the inchoate right of dower has once attached, can be allowed the effect of depriving the wife of the right of dower. Tibbetts v. Langley Manufacturing Co., 12 S. C., 465. This is upon the ground of the want of privity between the husband and wife. She is not a party or privy to any deed he may make, and therefore is not bound or estopped by anything therein contained; and as estoppels must be mutual, it would seem to follow that if she is not estopped from claiming dower in lands held by her husband in fee simple, by reason of a deed from him in which such lands are conveyed as a mere leasehold estate, it would seem that the rule ought to work both ways, and her husband's grantee, to whom lands have been conveyed as freehold, should not be estopped from showing that in fact they were merely leasehold.

Indeed, it seems to us, as has been shown by Marshall, C. J., in Blight's Lessee v. Rochester (7 Wheat., 535 [5 L. Ed. 516]), that it is a mistake to rest the rule, that one who enters under the title of another, conveyed by a deed poll, and not by an indenture, cannot dispute the title under which he enters, upon the doctrine of estoppel, but that the true ground upon which it rests is that it is *against "the moral policy of the law." A deed poll is the act of the party making it alone, and concludes him only, while an indenture is the act of both parties, and both are concluded by it. Hence where, as in this case, one accepts a deed poll, and goes into possession under it, he is not estopped by the terms of the deed from disputing the title under which he enters, but having gained the great advantage of possession by accepting the deed and entering under it, it would be against "the moral policy of the law," while retaining such advantage to dispute the title under which he acquired so great an advantage. Hence if one acquires possession under a lease, he cannot dispute the title of his lessor until he surrenders the possession (Wilson ads. Weathersby, 1 Nott & McC., 373, note), or perhaps until he disclaims holding under his lessor's title, and retains the adverse possession for a period long enough after such disclaimer to give him a title under the statute of limitations. Willison v. Watkins, 3 Peters, 43 [7 L. Ed. 596]. Accordingly in the case of Giles v. Pratt, 2 Hill, 439, it was held that one already in possession and accepting a title from another is not thereby precluded from disputing the title of such other.

*453

This being the true ground of the rule by which one who enters under the title of another is precluded from disputing such title, we do not see how it can properly be applied in a case where the widow of the grantor is claiming from his grantee dower in the premises conveyed. His possession acquired by such a title gives him no advantage in such a contest, and there is no room for the operation of the rule. The case of Horde v. Landrum (5 S. C., 213), relied on by respondent, simply decides that where land has been sold under a judgment at law upon a bond given for the purchase money, but not under the mortgage given to secure the payment of such purchase money, the widow may claim dower from the purchaser at such sale. This was upon the plain principle that the deed of the sheriff to the purchaser was in law the deed of the husband, and of course if Horde, the husband, had sold directly to Landrum, there could not be a doubt that the wife's right of dower would attach. We do not think, therefore, that this case is applicable to the point under consideration. Nor do we think that the case of *Pledger v. Ellerbe (6 Rich., 266 [60 Am. Dec. 123]), as it is construed in the more recent case of Tibbetts v. Langley Manufacturing Co., supra, affords any support to the position contended for by the respondent.

*454

The position taken by respondent's counsel in his argument, that the facts of the case raise the presumption that Henry Whitmire had acquired the fee which he assumed to convey, cannot be sustained. The record shows that until February 5, 1863, all parties confessedly held the premises as leasehold, and after that date Henry Whitmire certainly could not claim by possession, for he then conveyed to another; and even assuming that he did, as it is claimed he had done some time in 1858, attempt, by an informal deed, to convey in fee simple to George D. Smith, and then put him into possession, that would not help the matter.

We think, therefore, that there was error on the part of the Circuit judge in holding that the defendant, by accepting a deed for the premises in question, purporting to convey the fee simple title, was estopped, or in any way precluded from showing that the husband of the petitioner never had such an estate in the lot as would support her claim for dower.

Under this view of the case the other question as to the effect of the partnership character of the property cannot arise, and need not, therefore, be considered.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to the Court of Probate for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the views herein announced.

---

22 S. C. 454

McKEEGAN v. O'NEILL.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Wills ⟸58.]

A person may bind himself to dispose of property by will in a certain way or to certain parties, and, failing to do so, his agreement, if clearly established, may be enforced after his death against his legal representatives.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hunter v. Mills, 29 S. C. 77, 6 S. E. 907; Fogle v. St. Michael Church, 48 S. C. 90, 26 S. E. 99; Bruce v. Moon, 57 S. C. 71, 35 S. E. 415; Wilson v. Gordon, 73 S. C. 159, 53 S. E. 79; Hursey v. Surles, 91 S. C. 288, 74 S. E. 618; Dicks v. Cassels, 100 S. C. 341, 84 S. E. 878.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 164; Dec. Dig. ⟸58.]

2. Agreements or contracts at law and in equity defined and classified.

[3. Contracts ⟸176.]

The intention of parties to a contract, so far as it depends upon the construction of a letter, is a question of law and not of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 767–770, 917, 956, 979, 1041, 1097, 1825; Dec. Dig. ⟸176.]

[4. Wills ⟸58.]

A party in possession of a farm, "Cloney," in Ireland, proposed to his *uncle, the owner in fee, to rent Cloney, and afterwards, learning that his uncle wished to sell, begged to be allowed to purchase, leaving the price to be named by the uncle; in reply, the uncle wrote to his nephew that he would sell to the nephew for "£1400 sterling cash, to any one else it will be £1500, but you get all I am worth at my death." Held, that the clause italicised was only the expression of an intention on the part of the uncle and not a contract to give his entire estate to this nephew in consideration of the purchase of this land; and the nephew having stamped this letter with an agreement stamp, and completed his purchase at £1400 cash, and after his uncle's death brought action to recover the uncle's entire estate from those to whom it had been given by will, the complaint was dismissed.

*455

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 164; Dec. Dig. ⟸58.]

[5. Wills ⟸58.]

The real value of Cloney, and the effect upon that value of the tenant's rights of the nephew and his mother under the laws of force in Ireland, do not affect this contract, which was nothing more than an offer made and accepted for the sale of Cloney at £1400.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 164, 165; Dec. Dig. ⟸58.]

[This case is also cited in Mullaly v. Smyth, 96 S. C. 16, 79 S. E. 634, without specific application.]

Before Kershaw, J., Charleston, February, 1884.

This was an action by Francis McKeegan against Bernard O'Neill and Daniel J. Quigley, executors of John McKeegan, and against the legatees of John McKeegan, to recover the entire estate of John McKeegan, under an alleged contract contained in the following paper:

(1st page.)

Charleston 22 March 1876

Mr F. McKeegan

Dear Sir

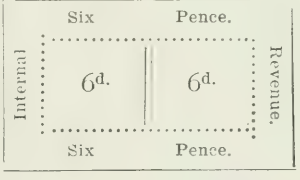
this morning i got a letter from Mr McNeill and one from you Relating to Cloney * * *

I have sent all the Power of aturney to Mr Nelson and title deed and mape of Cloney—yisterday according to Mr McNales Letter of requist—i have other Pappers Parteing to the same whish I will send if wanted — — — May Prise for Clony is 1400 haundred Pounes Cash And to anney one else £1500 haundred Poun Starling — — Mr R. Nelson takes charge of the sale the same As if i ware there what ever he dos in the selling of Cloney is Binding and right — — —

(2d page.)

Why did you not say what Cloney was worth in your letter as i wanted you to dow — — — May Prise to you is all ready sade on the other side £1400 haundre Pounes Starling Cash—to anney one else it will bee £1500 haundre Pounes but you get all i am worth at my death Plese let Nothing happen the Propperty until it is sold — — —

I am sorrey to heare that may frend Mr R. Nelson is sick at Present but i hope he will bee well soon JOHN McKEEGAN.



*456

*To the statement of facts made in the opinion it will be proper to add the following: John McKeegan purchased Cloney, a farm of twenty-eight acres, two roods, situated in the parish of Layd, barony of Glenarm, county of Antrim, in Ireland, for £1020, in the year 1839. John put his brother Francis (father of plaintiff) in possession, who paid no rent, but was allowed to use and occupy it as an acknowledgment of the care and attention paid his mother. There was an understanding that Francis was to pay the taxes and rates on the land, and also in later years to pay James (an older brother) £10 per annum. About 1860 plaintiff moved with his wife into a house on Cloney, and thereafter helped his father to pay the charges on the land. Francis died November 8, 1875, and two days thereafter the correspondence between plaintiff and John McKeegan commenced, the substance of which is stated in the opinion.

The chief witness for plaintiff was his attorney, W. W. McNeill, of Larne, County Antrim, who was examined by commission. Upon the subject of the value of Cloney, he testified that it was worth to John McKeegan only £900, and thus explains how it was that Frank was induced to pay £1,400:

I say, on more than one occasion, on my being consulted by the plaintiff with regard to his purchasing said farm, I most distinctly informed him that the farm offered to be sold was not value for the purchase money required, as I considered such an exorbitant price, basing my estimate of the value not only on the nature of the lands themselves, and on their locality with which I was well acquainted (there being no railway within many miles of them or market town of any importance—Cushendall, the nearest town, being merely a village), but also on the government or poor law valuation, and which only estimated the entire lands and premises at the yearly value of forty-two pounds ten shillings, and also on the fact that the plaintiff, as the tenant in occupation, could not have been evicted by the said John McKeegan, as the landlord or owner, without first paying to the plaintiff as the tenant in occupation, at his election, a considerable sum, either for tenant right or for improvements and disturbance under the landlord and tenant (Ireland) act 1870; when the plaintiff met my objections by replying that his paying the £1,400 as the purchase money would be to all intents and purposes merely a temporary payment by him, as his uncle, the said John McKeegan, had given him to understand and believe, that *the said John McKeegan by his will either had or would bequeath him, the said plaintiff, all his property; and I therefore most distinctly say that from my consultations with the plaintiff prior to the purchase it was only on the grounds and belief of his uncle carrying out such promise that the purchase was completed.

*457

As to how those tenant's rights in Ireland affected the value of Cloney, Mr. McNeill explains:

I say the landlord or owner of the farm would not have obtained the full value upon a sale in open market with a tenant in possession; and I say that to enable him to obtain the full value of the farm he would have had first to evict the tenant in occupation by ejectment proceedings. And I further say that immediately upon the service of such ejectment by the landlord or owner, such tenant in occupation, under the landlord and tenant (Ireland) act 1870, could have served upon the landlord or owner a notice of claim either for tenant right, under section 1 of said act, or for compensation for disturbance and improvements, under sections 3 and 4 of said act, with power to proceed either under section 1 separately or under sections 3 and 4 conjointly, and thereupon obtain from the landlord or owner, or person so evicting him, compensation as before mentioned, and in the manner he should elect.

After a very full statement of the pleadings and evidence, the Circuit decree proceeded as follows:

The preponderance of the evidence satisfies me that the estate was worth, over and above the tenant's claims insisted upon, more than the £1,400 paid and that plaintiff so regarded it. In addition to what has already been referred to as evidence of the value of the place, it is in evidence that Mr. Hugh Bailey, an extensive farmer and an expert in such matters, lent the plaintiff £1,400 on the place, to pay the purchase money. Under the law, if there were any such rights of tenants as claimed, they existed in favor of the estate of Frank McKeegan, the elder, and not in favor of the plaintiff, since the plaintiff was put in possession by his father, and never held under John McKeegan, or by his consent. His occupancy from November, 1875, to March, 1876, was not a tenancy. The loan of the purchase money by Mr. Bailey, on the security of Cloney, was therefore subordinate to the claims of the tenant, if the estate was so encumbered. This is manifest from the letter of plaintiff to his *uncle, of 24th January, 1877, after the purchase, where he says: "My mother instructed John Rhea, of Belfast, solicitor, to institute proceedings against me to have a writ marked out of one of the Superior Courts, if I do not give a sufficient offer of money to satisfy her through him."

*458

But that letter, it may be remarked, before leaving it, shows more than this. It shows that Frank McKeegan, when he bought, got the place, or at least considered that he got it, free from any charges or encumbrances of this nature, as will be seen from the following extract. He says: "Now the way that Mr. Nelson arranged that matter was, that I purchased your whole interest in the town land of Cloney, and that I stood in the same position as you did, for £1,400, so that as no one could have any claim against it on account of any existing tenant right now of force in Ireland, and you will please let me know if you sold it to me with any claim against it." It appears to me that this destroys the whole fabric of that portion of plaintiff's cause which rests upon the insufficiency of Cloney as a consideration for the payment of £1,400, by reason of the encumbrance of tenant rights thereon.

If such rights did exist, they have no doubt been covered by the warranty covenants of the deed of John McKeegan, conveying the estate. If there were no such covenants, plaintiff could have shown it by the production of the deed. But the circumstances negative the idea that there were any such encumbrances on the place. This family had not occupied the property as tenants in the sense of the act of parliament referred to. They held gratuitously. The assessed value of the rent was, before 1839, £30, and now £42.10. The taxes were £5, and the rates 42s., and there was paid to James McKeegan £10 per annum by the occupants of the place, but there was no payment after he died, which was some time before the death of Francis McKeegan, Sen., except the rates and taxes.

This shows that the occupancy was a gratuity of considerable value, given for many years to this family. If they had set up a claim for tenants' rights, &c., they would have been charged for the use and occupation, the rental value less the rates and taxes and payment to James *McKeegan, and would have been left largely in debt to the landlord.[1]

*459

But upon the theory set up by the plaintiff, that his father was a tenant, and he also a tenant, they both would be shown to have no claim to compensation under the act, because, upon this hypothesis, the father, who it is said was the original tenant, sublet to plaintiff, on his marriage, and divided the holding "without" (so far as appears in the testimony) "the consent of the landlord in writing," which, by the provisions of section 3 of the act, deprives both tenant and sub-tenant of all compensation under this section or section four.

Mr. McNeill, therefore, is mistaken in supposing that the circumstances attending the occupancy of Cloney by Frank McKeegan and family were such as to entitle any of them to tenant rights in the same, and hence his estimate of the value of Cloney, as being depreciated by reason of the existence of such rights, is not entitled to be considered. He must have been misinformed as to the nature of the occupancy. I think it is manifest that he first suggested this claim of tenant rights to plaintiff, as nothing was heard of them until plaintiff had consulted him. In the instructions forwarded by him to plaintiff to be sent to John McKeegan, he proposes, if terms are agreed upon, "an agreement drawn in accordance with the late landlord and tenant Ireland act, 1870."

Efforts were also made to induce John McKeegan to institute proceedings to eject plaintiff's mother, or at least to write her a notice to quit. John McKeegan seems to have done neither. Perhaps, if he had, it might have been construed as a recognition of such a tenancy as would have entitled these parties to their tenant rights. All this may have been done in good faith, but if so, it must have been because plaintiff and McNeill, his attorney, were misinformed or misunderstood the condition of things. It is certain that nothing is heard of such claim in the case, except from plaintiff and McNeill. Mr. McNeill seems to have assumed *the existence of such a tenancy from evidence which is wholly inadmissible. He says it was from the representations of Mr. Nelson and others. These declarations are certainly not evidence to establish such tenancy.

*460

Plaintiff himself says his father did not consider himself a tenant; he is "sure of that." Plaintiff did not consider himself a tenant, he says, "because he paid no rent." This would make them "tenants at will," for a person who holds rent free, by permission of the owner, "is a tenant at will." Taylor, Land. & Ten., § 60. Tenants at will are not tenants of a holding, within the meaning of the act. 33, 34 Vic. Ch., 46, § 70. Very strong evidence that there were no such encumbrances on the property is to be found in the fact that they have never been enforced or insisted upon. If they had been, there would have been proof of it in this case.

It seems unnecessary to pursue this point further, nor do I consider it necessary to discuss the bearing of the testimony derived from the various wills made by the testator. I cannot see anything in them to aid me in determining whether those words, relied on by the plaintiff as having a contractual efficacy, entitling him to the relief he claims, are to be so construed or not. I conclude that the expression on the part of testator, in his letter to plaintiff, of March 22, 1876, in relation to the sale of Cloney, that "you get all I am worth at my death," is not such an expression of intention as amounts to a contract. It was not made by testator in order to accomplish the sale of Cloney, nor was the purchase of Cloney induced by the representation. Therefore there was no contract—either legal or equitable—created by the representation.

I need not follow the learned counsel in this case through their exhaustive array of authorities upon this subject. The principles, I think, are most satisfactorily stated by Mr. Pomeroy (3 Eq. Jur., 1244, and notes), and in a paper in the Central Law Journal (vol. 15, p. 445). Mr. Pomeroy, in the section referred to, mentions two classes of contracts. First, all ordinary contracts which consist of an intentional offer on one side, and an intentional acceptance on the other, resulting in the meeting of minds upon the same terms. And adds: "There is, however, a *form of contract peculiar to equity, which is created by representations made by one party, and acts done by the other upon the faith of such representations. When an absolute unconditional representation of something to be done in the future, is made by one person in order to accomplish a particular purpose, and the person to whom it is made relying upon it, does the acts by which the intended result is obtained and purpose accomplished, a contract is thereby concluded between the parties."

*461

In regard to the first class of contracts, Mr. Waterman, in his work on the performance of contracts, in a passage cited for the plaintiff, laid down the rule in regard to contracts to make a will thus: "A person may make a valid agreement binding himself to dispose of his property in a particular way, by last will and testament, and a Court of Equity will enforce such an agreement, by compelling the heirs at law to convey the property in accordance with the terms of the contract; but such a contract, especially when it is attempted to be established by parol, is regarded with suspicion, and not sustained, except upon the strongest evidence that it was founded upon a valuable consideration, and deliberately entered into by the decedent." According to this authority the relief, when the alleged promise is to make a will, is confined to the first class of contracts: legal contracts—where the minds of the contracting parties meet upon the same terms: "where there is an intentional offer on one side, and an intentional acceptance on the other"—deliberately entered into by the decedent.

[1] In the Supreme Court, plaintiff contended that his honor had overlooked the first section of this act, which legalized "the usages prevalent in the province of Ulster," to which section Mr. McNeill testified this property was subject.—REPORTER.

There is, however, another class of contracts involving promises to make provision by will, which are doubtless enforced in equity, where there was no intention on the part of the decedent to bind himself, but where he makes a declaration of intention, "in order to accomplish a particular purpose, and secure what he desired by means of such representation." "A will is the free, voluntary, uninfluenced expression of a testator as to the disposition of his property." To say that a person is bound to make a will in a particular way, is to assert a contradictory proposition. A contract to make a particular sort of will, would appear, upon principle, to be a promise to do an act, in its nature revocable, *amounting to no more than a promise that the party should continue of the same mind.

*462

If one desired to make a contract whereby he would secure a present benefit, to be paid for by a gift of his estate, to take effect, like a will, after his death, it could be done by deed inter vivos, even in regard to chattels, and without a conveyance to trustees. Jaggers v. Estes, 3 Strob. Eq., 383. At common law that could not have been done in regard to chattels. Where it can be done, there is no necessity for the enforcement of agreements to make a will. Because if there really was an intention so to contract, it could be done without any violation of the legal principles applicable to wills. A will is not only voluntary and revocable, but it is an instrument of great solemnity, required to be executed with extraordinary formalities. It must be in writing by the testator, in presence of three witnesses, who must subscribe the same in his presence, and in the presence of each other, all of which must be proven in the Court of Probate before the instrument can take effect as a will. It would be an extraordinary exercise of power in a court to give effect to a representation by words, or in a letter, of a purpose to make a will of a particular sort, to the extent of conveying the entire estate of a decedent, as if he voluntarily made such a will, thus dispensing with all the statutory requirements in regard thereto. Such contracts have been enforced in some cases, but it is everywhere recognized that the proof must be clear that the representations were made and acted upon as an inducement.

There has been a great diversity of opinion and decisions in cases of this character. Most of those enforcing such contracts have been where the consideration was marriage, or settlements on marriage, or the making of mutual wills, and other acts performed by the other party, irrevocable in their nature, and not capable of compensation otherwise. Rivers v. Rivers, 3 DeSaus., 190 [4 Am. Dec. 609], was a promise to make provision by will by a husband for his wife in consideration of her release of all claim to his estate, executed by her before marriage. Chancellor DeSaussure said he considered "that to make a will in a particular way, on proper consideration, is as much the subject of contract as any other, and he who makes a contract on the subject is as much bound *thereby as he would be by any other agreement on any other subject." He adds: "To be sure, the court would be more strict in examining into the nature and circumstances of such agreements than any other, and would require very satisfactory proof of the fairness and justice of the transaction."

*463

In Gary v. James, 4 DeSaus., 188, the daughter of testator, with her mother, had been driven away from his home by him. After many years, during which he lived with another woman as his wife, in order to induce his daughter to leave her mother and live with him, he wrote to her, promising if she would come, that she should be the object of his care, and should enjoy all the care and attention that could be bestowed upon her by a tender father, and adding, "you are the object of my love, and shall be the heir of my property." The daughter came to live with the father for a time, and was finally driven off. He made a will in favor of the woman he lived with and died. The court enforced the contract, Judge James delivering the opinion of the court, saying: "Upon the whole of the reasons above stated, and under the particular circumstances of the case, I am of opinion that the contract entered into by the father with the daughter is binding upon his estate, and claims precedence of the will." The circumstances constituting the consideration for the contract are summed up in the following extract from the opinion: "On the part of the daughter the disadvantages were to quit a tender mother and subject herself, not to the reasonable will alone, but to the caprices of a father governed by a woman who had usurped her mother's place, and who, it might be expected, was naturally her enemy. Surely such sacrifices should have entitled her, as an only child, to look forward to the remuneration offered her by the letter, of being the heir of her father's property."

The following is not a case of a promise to make a will, but is instructive in this connection. In Caborne v. Godfrey, 3 DeSaus., 514 [5 Am. Dec. 593], the representation was made to a son by his father, who had heard of his intended marriage. He promised to give him, by deed, whether he married or not, eleven or twelve negroes, and half of his stock, and perhaps more. The son married in two months thereafter, and sued for the property in the father's lifetime. The father died without making any provision for the son.

*464

*Chancellor DeSaussure on Circuit said: "I admit that the promise must be positive in order to be binding. On examining the letter carefully it does appear to me to contain a distinct and positive promise, etc. * * * I feel warranted, therefore, in saying that this was a solemn promise made by a father to a son to induce and promote his marriage." This construction was sustained by the Court of Appeals. It will be observed that this case is decided upon the ground that there was a positive promise, upon the consideration of marriage, induced and promoted thereby, and made upon that promise.

In most of the other cases cited for the plaintiff, the principles laid down in these cases are maintained, and the contracts were formed upon similar considerations. The case under consideration is not founded upon an irrevocable consideration, as in the case of marriage or mutual wills, or the performance of personal services not capable of compensation otherwise. If Cloney had been purchased at a price beyond its value, and the circumstances were such as claimed for the plaintiff, he might have a rescission of the contract and be fully restored to all he may have lost by the contract. He does not ask that. No necessity would exist for the enforcement of the extraordinary powers of the Court of Equity to make a will for John McKeegan, and to enforce it in favor of the plaintiff against his lawful devisees and legatees.

I do not understand that any of the cases, which I regard as authority, require that I should go so far, even had the case gone to the extent claimed by the plaintiff. But, as I have said, I do not find that the representation in this case was intended as a promise, or as an inducement to a contract, nor that it was acted on as such, and therefore it is not necessary to pursue this line of thought further.

I will only add that had this been such a representation as plaintiff would have it declared to be, acted upon by him, I would not have considered it a proper case for a decree for performance, for the reason that I regard Cloney as full value for the amount, and there would be no equity to support the demand of plaintiff for a conveyance, upon the same consideration, of the large estate of his uncle, already otherwise disposed of for laudable and beneficent purposes.

*465

*I conclude, therefore, that the evidence does not entitle the plaintiff to the relief demanded. It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the complaint be dismissed, and that the plaintiff do pay the costs of this action.

Plaintiff's exceptions to this decree are very lengthy, and consist of extracts from the decree, and then allege error therein. It is not necessary to a full understanding of the case that any of them should be inserted except the 17th, which was as follows:

17. Because his honor erred in that he held as follows: "To say that a person is bound to make a will in a particular way is to assert a contradictory proposition. A contract to make a particular sort of will would appear upon principle to be a promise to do an act in its nature revocable, amounting to no more than a promise that the party should continue of the same mind."

Messrs. McCrady, Sons & Bacot, for appellant.

Messrs. De Saussure & Son, B. H. Rutledge, contra.

April 21, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. John McKeegan, late of Charleston County, departed this life about August 10, 1881, at Charleston, unmarried and without children or lineal descendants. He died possessed of considerable estate, both real and personal, situate in Charleston and elsewhere in the state. He left a will, in which his said estate was disposed of as follows: a house and lot in the city of Charleston was devised to a former slave of his, Robert Morrison, a legacy of $1,000 was given to the "Sisters of our Lady of Mercy," in the city of Charleston, $500 to one Ella O'Neill, $500 to Bella O'Neill, $500 to Mary Janney, and $500 to the Very Reverend Daniel J. Quigley, and the remainder he devised and bequeathed to his executors upon certain trusts therein set forth, nominating Bernard O'Neill and the Very Reverend Daniel J. Quigley as his executors, both of whom qualified.

During the life of the testator he was seized and possesed of a *certain estate in the County of Antrim, Ireland, commonly known and called "Cloneymore." This estate it seems he owned as far back as 1839, which, under some arrangement, he permitted his brother, one Francis McKeegan, the father of the plaintiff, to occupy, and, as al-legal in the complaint, free of rent or charge, except taxes, rates, and assessments, and also an annual allowance of £10 sterling to be paid to another brother, James McKeegan, the said Francis having occupied the same under said terms from 1839 to 1875, when he died.

*466

Shortly after the death of the said Francis, the plaintiff opened a correspondence with his uncle, the said John McKeegan, as to this estate, which resulted in a purchase of Cloneymore by the plaintiff at £1,400 sterling cash, which was paid and titles executed in fee simple. The plaintiff alleges in his complaint that he was induced to make said purchase by a written agreement made by his uncle with him, that if he would purchase Cloneymore at the price of £1,400 sterling, at that time equivalent to $7,700, he, the said John McKeegan, would at his death give and leave him, the plaintiff, all he was worth; that is, all of the property, real and personal, of which he might die possessed; that, acting upon this promise and inducement, and at great inconvenience, sacrifice, and expense to himself, he did raise the said sum and paid the same to the agent of the said John McKeegan, from whom he received title deeds to Cloneymore, in fee simple.

John McKeegan having disposed of his entire estate, as hereinbefore stated, to other parties than the plaintiff, the action below was instituted, in which the plaintiff demands judgment that the executors of the said John McKeegan may be compelled to perform the agreement above, and to pay over, transfer, and deliver all of the property of their testator to him, the plaintiff, in pursuance thereof.

The case was heard by his honor, Judge Kershaw, upon testimony taken by the master and reported to the court, who in an elaborate decree dismissed the complaint with costs.

The exceptions to the decree by plaintiff, appellant, are numerous, but they may be disposed of, we think, in the discussion of the following grounds: 1. What is the law applicable to a case of *this kind, and did his honor lay it down correctly? 2. Did the testimony bring the case under this correct principle? And 3. Did his honor reach his conclusion as to the facts by the admission and influence of certain alleged incompetent testimony objected to by the plaintiff?

*467

As to the first question, there is authority for the position that while a man may ordinarily by will dispose of his estate, either in whole or in part, at his pleasure, nay, even at his caprice, yet he may also bind himself to dispose of it in a certain way or to certain parties, and failing to do so, his agreement may be enforced against his legal representatives. This proposition is sustained by the following cases cited from our own reports: Izard v. Middleton, 1 DeSaus., 116; Grimke v. Ex'rs of Grimke, Ibid. 366; Rivers v. Ex'rs of Rivers, 3 Id., 190 [4 Am. Dec. 609]; Gary v. Ex'rs of James, 4 Id., 185; Caborne v. Godfrey, 3 Id., 514 [5 Am. Dec. 593]. Besides, it is supported by numerous English cases cited in appellant's argument.

It is true, however, in all the cases, in view of the fact that a will is the free, voluntary, and uninfluenced expression of a testator as to the disposition of his property, which in fact he may make or not as he chooses, and when made revocable if he desires; that for one to be bound to dispose of his property in a certain way by will, the agreement or contract requiring him to do so must be established by the most satisfactory proof and after the strictest and most thorough examinaion of all circumstances attending it; or, as we said by Chancellor DeSaussure in Rivers v. Ex'rs of Rivers, supra, "To be sure, the court would be more strict in examining into the nature and circumstances of such agreements than any others, and would require very satisfactory proof of the fairness and justness of the transaction."

The above proposition being conceded, we are led next to the inquiry: What is an agreement, and under what circumstances does it become binding on the parties? Agreements may be divided into two classes, distinguished by the mode in which they are made. 1. The ordinary agreement, where an intentional offer is made on the one side founded upon a sufficient consideration, and an intentional acceptance on the other, resulting in the meeting of minds upon the same terms. 2. "Where it is created *by representations made by one party and acts done by the other upon the faith of such representations. When an absolute, unconditional representation of something to be done in the future is made by one person in order to accomplish a particular purpose, and the person to whom it is made, relying upon it, does the acts by which the intended result is obtained and purpose accomplished, a contract is thereby concluded between the parties." 3 Pom. Eq. Jur., § 1244.

*468

The first is a contract at law and the second a contract in equity, and a disposition of property by will may be made the subject matter of either as well as any other subject matter. The following proposition laid down in appellant's argument we think is a correct result from all the cases on this subject, i. e.: "That to make a will in a particular way, on proper consideration, is as much a subject of contract as any other, and he who makes a contract on this subject is as much bound thereby as he would be by any other agreement on any other subject." It is said, however, by Mr. Waterman, which is in accordance with the caution already adverted to, that when the subject of the contract is the disposition of one's property by his will, "such a contract, especially when it is attempted to be established by parol, is regarded with suspicion and not sustained except upon the strongest evidence that it was founded upon a valuable consideration and deliberately entered into by the decedent." Now, no error can be attributed to his honor, the Circuit judge, on the ground that he failed to recognize the possible existence in law of these two classes of contracts. On the contrary, he recognized both, but he failed to find facts sufficient for the application of either, and it was upon this ground that he dismissed the complaint.

We do not think, therefore, that the decree of the judge, when read as a whole, is obnoxious to the seventeenth exception. Was his finding error? Generally, as we have had frequent occasion to say, in appeals in chancery cases, where the facts are found by the Circuit judge upon testimony, this court will not disturb such findings unless the manifest preponderance of the evidence is the other way. And if in this case the findings of fact below rested entirely upon evidence, the rule referred to would be applicable. But the plaintiff here claims under what he styles a written con*tract, found in a certain letter of his uncle, the intent of which is a matter of construction; and construction of instruments being a matter of law, the question whether John McKeegan made the agreement relied on by the plaintiff is fully before us, at least so far as it depends upon the construction of the letter in question. The letter referred to is as follows:

*469

"Charleston, 22 March, 1876.

"Mr. F. McKeegan.

"Dear Sir: This morning I got a letter from Mr. McNeill and one from you, relating to Cloney. I have sent all the power of an attorney to Mr. Nelson, and title deed and map of Cloney, yesterday, according to Mr. McNeill's letter of request. I have other papers pertaining to the same which I will send, if wanted. My price for Cloney is 1,400 pounds cash, and to any one else 1,500 pounds sterling. Mr. Nelson takes charge of the sale, the same as if I were there. Whatever he does in the selling of Cloney is binding and right. Why did you not say what Cloney was worth in your letter, as I wanted you to do? My price to you is already said on the other side, 1,400 pounds sterling cash, to any one else it will be 1,500 pounds, but you will get all I am worth at my death. Please let nothing happen the property until it is sold. John McKeegan."

It is proper here to notice with somewhat more particularity than above the facts and circumstances surrounding John McKeegan when this letter was written. As we have already stated, Francis McKeegan, Sr., the father of the plaintiff, went into possession of Cloney in 1839, and remained in possession until 1875, when he died. The plaintiff during this time had grown up and married, and was living upon Cloney and cultivating a portion of it, paying part of the expenses attendant upon the possession. It was understood during all this time in the family of Francis, Sr., that at the death of John McKeegan Cloney would be theirs by will of the said John.

On the death of Francis, Sr., the plaintiff immediately wrote to his uncle John informing him of that event, and also that his elder brother, Alex., would have a place, and, stating his own embarrassed situation, asked as a great favor to him that he might rent one-half of Cloney and half of the house, proposing to *secure the rent, and saying that the other half would be sufficient for his mother and his brother John. This was November 8, 1875, two days after the death of his father. Receiving no answer, he then on December 30, 1875, addressed a letter to Mr. Bernard O'Neill, of Charleston, informing him that he had heard that his uncle intended to sell Cloney, and imploring him, Mr. O'Neill, to see his uncle and learn from him if he would not let his brother John and himself have the first offer, and to know his price. On February 19, 1876, having received a reply from Mr. O'Neill, he again wrote to him, thanking him for the information, "the manner and terms," and stating that he could raise the funds for the purchase, and further, that he would leave the value of the property to his uncle, and urging him to learn whether his uncle would accept his proposition. The letter above referred to, from Mr. O'Neill to which this was reply, the plaintiff failed to produce. No doubt, however, from the reply, that the "terms" were mentioned.

*470

About this time the plaintiff received a letter from his uncle, but this letter he failed also to produce on the trial. To this letter he replied on March 2, 1876, acknowledging the receipt of his uncle's letter, and saying that he consulted Mr. Robert Nelson, to whom his uncle had referred him, about the present value of Cloney, and stating that if he (his uncle) intended to sell Cloney to him, he would leave the value to him, saying he could get two-thirds of the purchase money from the board of trade; and further, that he could get the other third in some way. He also enclosed a letter from an attorney, Mr. O'Neill, of Larne, conveying instructions as to drawing the papers necessary to the trade. On March 22, 1876, John McKeegan replied in the letter first above mentioned, which is the letter upon which the case turns. In the meantime and before the trade was concluded some correspondence took place between Mr. Nelson and Francis McKeegan as to the value of Cloney, but as the originals of these letters were not produced, and the copies were objected to, they will for the present be omitted.

Now, looking at this important letter from the standpoint of these surroundings, did his honor, Judge Kershaw, err in holding that there was no contract therein embracing the property now *claimed by the plaintiff? There was certainly no contract in express terms in the sense that a proposition was made and accepted for anything besides the estate of "Cloney." The negotiation up to this time between the parties referred to nothing else. The letters of Francis McKeegan indicated an earnest desire to obtain an interest in Cloney. At first he desired to rent one-half, but learning that it was the intention of his uncle to sell, he then became anxious to buy, and was willing for his uncle to fix the price, and distinctly made that proposition, first through Mr. Bernard O'Neill and then in a letter to Mr. John McKeegan himself. Nothing had been said about the estate of John McKeegan in America. Nor does it appear anywhere that John McKeegan was at all anxious to sell Cloney to any one, nor that it would be a difficult matter to make a sale thereof. Nor does it appear in the letter that John McKeegan considered the value of any other property besides Cloney in fixing the price at which he was willing to trade. He thought "Cloney" was worth £1,500, but to his nephew he would let it go at £1,400, and it is manifest that there was no distinct, positive, and absolute contract made as to anything except Cloney, and that Francis McKeegan did not understand it to be a clear and distinct contract for more, is evidenced by the fact that he consulted his attorney, and afterwards, under the hope of fixing it, had the letter stamped, and this, too, without the knowledge of his uncle.

*471

Was there a contract of the second class mentioned above? i. e., "When absolute, unconditional representation of something to be done in the future is made by one person in order to accomplish a particular purpose, and the person to whom it is made, relying upon it, does the acts by which the intended result is attained and purpose accomplished, a contract is thereby concluded between the parties." To bring a case under this principle it must appear that the party sought to be bound desires to bring about a certain result, and that in order to accomplish his purpose he makes an absolute, unconditional representation that he will do something in the future, and that the party to whom it is made, relying upon it, does the act required. Or to make a specific application to the case at bar, it should appear that John McKeegan desired to sell Cloney to Francis McKeegan, and in *order to consummate the sale he made an absolute and unconditional representation to him that if he would purchase he would leave him all of his estate, and that relying on this representation Francis closed the trade and took Cloney.

*472

Do these facts appear either in the letter or in the evidence, or in the two combined? In the first place, it does not appear that John McKeegan was at all anxious to part with Cloney to any one, much less to Francis. The anxiety was all on the side of Francis. He wrote to his uncle within two days after the death of his father, and receiving no reply he then wrote to Bernard O'Neill imploring him to intercede in his behalf, proposing to buy upon terms to be fixed by his uncle, and then wrote a second letter to Bernard O'Neill, thanking him for information received as to the "manner and terms," stating that he could raise the necessary funds. These letters were all couched in the most earnest terms, and followed each other in quick succession.

John McKeegan finally replied to these earnest appeals, stating his price, and leaving it to Francis to say whether he would accept. It was in this letter, after stating to Francis that his price to him was £1,400, if to any one else £1,500, he added, "but you will get all I am worth at my death." Was this an unconditional statement that if Francis would take Cloney at the price mentioned, that in consideration thereof he would, in addition thereto, leave him all of his estate at his death? Was it made to induce Francis to take Cloney, and did Francis act upon it with that understanding? Would he have declined the purchase but for that representation? We cannot think so; we cannot think that John McKeegan ever intended the statement in that sense, or that Francis ever so understood it, or so acted upon it.

There is no sufficient and satisfactory evidence in the case showing that "Cloney" was worth less than £1,400, even with the tenancy rights (whatever they might have been) upon the place. The plaintiff's testimony on that subject is very guarded. He says: "At that time the value of Cloneymore to me was not £1,400." The plaintiff makes no offer to rescind. There is no evidence that there was any pressure upon John McKeegan requiring him to sell, or that Francis was likely to be the only purchaser. In fact, Francis deprecated a public sale and urged *that this should not be had, and earnestly requested that he and his brother John should have the first offer. The case is entirely destitute of any fact showing a reason or motive why John McKeegan should hold out such an unusual and extraordinary inducement for such a trade. The only fact indicating that Francis ever conceived the idea that the whole estate of his uncle was embraced is the fact that he consulted his attorney and had the letter stamped. Why did he not consult Mr. John McKeegan? If in his opinion the promise was so vague and doubtful as to require the opinion of an attorney, why, before acting, did he not have a distinct understanding with his uncle? and why, without any information to him at the time, or ever afterward during his life, did he have the letter impressed with sixpennny stamps?

*473

The natural explanation of the remark in the letter, "But you will get all I am worth at my death," seems to us to be as follows: John McKeegan had acquired a considerable estate in this country; he was an old man, without wife or children. His relatives lived in Ireland; he had been kind to them, especially to the family of his brother Francis; and it was the understanding, no doubt, with the knowledge of John, that at his death his kindness during life would be followed up by leaving to his family his estate here. No doubt he intended to do this, and when he wrote this letter this intention was present to his mind—not as a part of the proposed sale of Cloney, but as a long existing intention, altogether disconnected from Cloney, and this remark was thrown in, not as an inducement for Francis to buy, but as a reason why he was willing to take from him £100 less than from any one else. "I think the place," said he, "is worth £1,500, and if I was dealing with strangers, I should demand that sum, but you are to get my estate at my death anyway, and I will let you have Cloney at an under value." This is far more reasonable than that he was selling not only Cloney, but his whole estate, for £1,400, Cloney to be delivered at once and the estate at his death. At all events, the proof of the contract fails entirely to come up to the requirement of the cases cited.

It is urged, however, that there are numerous cases where the language used in a letter was not stronger than that used here, and yet the court held that a contract was established. And the *following cases are referred to: Gary et ux. v. Executors of James, 4 DeSaus., 185; Caborne v. Godfrey, 3 Id., 514 [5 Am. Dec. 593]; Goilmere v. Battison, 1 Vern., 48; Wankford v. Fotherley, 2 Id., 322; Hammersly v. Baron de Biel, 12 Clk & Fin., 45; Bold v. Hutchinson, 5 DeG., M. & G., 558; Ridley v. Ridley, 34 Beav., 478; Coverdale v. Eastwood, 5 Eng. Rep. (Moak), 755; Sutton v. Hayden, 62 Mo., 101. We have examined each of these cases and find the proposition stated by appellant fully sustained. The language used in each of them is very similar to that employed in the letter of McKeegan. For instance, in the last case referred to it was: "All her property should at her death be her niece's."

*474

There is a marked difference, however, between the case at bar and all of these, a difference which vindicates the judgment in the latter cases, and yet prevents the application to the former of the principle upon which said judgments were founded. In many of the cases cited, the act done by the promisee was founded primarily and entirely upon the promise made. It had no other consideration. To illustrate: In Sutton v. Hayden, supra, an aunt had written to the guardian of her niece promising that if she would come and live with her and nurse and take care of her for the remainder of her days, all her property should at her death be her niece's. The guardian assented to the arrangement, and the ward faithfully carried it out. So in the case of Gary et ux. v. Executors of James, 4 DeSaus., supra. "The father, who had separated from his wife, wrote to his daughter: If you will come and live with me, you shall be the object of my care, and shall enjoy all the attention that can be bestowed by a tender father. You are the object of my love and shall be the heir of my property." In both of these cases the contract was undoubted, and it was properly enforced.

In the other cases the promise was equally apparent, not, however, from the terms used simply, but because founded upon circumstances in the nature of marriage settlements, as in the case of Coverdale v. Eastwood, 5 Eng. Rep., supra, and Caborne v. Godfrey, 3 DeSaus., supra. In the former case, in contemplation of a marriage between a Mr. John Coverdale and a daughter of Eastwood, the mother of Coverdale wrote to

*475

Mr. Eastwood, *stating that her son was willing to settle £4,000 on Miss Eastwood, and inquiring whether he would make a corresponding settlement. To this Mr. Eastwood replied that his busineses was not in condition to extract £4,000 from it, but that he had some years before made a will, in which he had left his property to trustees for the use of his daughter, and in the event of the marriage taking place, it was his intention to make a will in accordance with the facts of the case, and of course he would settle his property on his daughter in strict settlement, &c., &c. "I will take care that my property, which I suspect will exceed £4,000, shall be properly secured upon her and her children after my death." Held, that the above expression of intention amounted to a contract to settle the whole property upon the daughter in strict settlement. In the cases found in 1 and 2 Vern., and 5 DeG., M. & C., supra, the promise was distinct and positive, and based on an event which was to happen, marriage or otherwise.

The case before the court is destitute of any fact of the kind mentioned in either of the classes of cases above. "Cloney" was the matter about which negotiations between the parties had been going on; nothing else was ever mentioned in any letter of the plaintiff, either to John McKeegan or to any one else. "Cloney" was the primary and, as it appears to the court, the only consideration for the payment of the £1,400. The remark of John McKeegan that the plaintiff "would get all of his property at his death," was not put upon the event of the purchase of Cloney, or as dependent in any way upon the negotiation in reference to "Cloney," but was a mere statement of what he, John McKeegan, had intended to do long since, voluntarily, and without regard to any consideration moving him thereto.

And it does not appear to the court that the value of Cloney is at all involved, or whether it was encumbered with tenancy rights, thereby reducing its present value to a purchaser. The plaintiff distinctly proposed, as we have already said, to purchase at a valuation to be fixed by the vendor, and this before the letter in question. That valuation was fixed and accepted, and the trade was consummated by the payment of the purchase money and the execution of titles, and in pursuance thereof the plaintiff has *been in possession for the last eight or ten years, without one word or whisper having ever been heard from the plaintiff that he had titles also to the estate of his uncle until the death of his uncle, when for the first time the claim is made upon his executors.

*476

It perhaps would have been more in accordance with the promptings of nature that this old man should have left his estate to his relatives, but this estate was the fruit of his own labor and toil. He had earned and made it, and it belonged to him, and under our law, which is one of its boasts, he had the right to dispose of it as to him seemed best: and this, too, whether the disposition was moved by a sufficient and commendable motive, or by caprice: and having done so, although it has defeated the reasonable and natural expectation and hope of the plaintiff, there being no allegation or proof of undue influence, deception, or fraud, it must stand.

From the view which we have taken of the facts of this case, independent of the alleged incompetent testimony, we do not deem it necessary to determine whether the exceptions of the plaintiff in that respect are well founded. Because, even admitting the incompetency of this testimony, we think the decree of his honor is abundantly sustained by that portion about which there is no dispute. Nor is it necessary to say more than we have said above in reference to the encumbrance upon "Cloney" of the tenancy rights referred to in the argument.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 476

EMORY v. THE HAZARD POWDER COMPANY.

(November Term, 1884.)

1. Causes of action and remedies distinguished.

[2. Action ⇨46.]

The insertion of two or more demands for relief in a complaint is not a misjoinder. When therefore a complaint demanded damages for a nuisance, and an injunction to restrain it, the Circuit judge committed no error in refusing to require the plaintiff to elect between these two remedies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. § 463; Dec. Dig. ⇨46.]

*477

[3. Appeal and Error ⇨204.]

*The admission of testimony which was introduced without objection cannot be made a ground of exception.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1149, 1258–1272, 1274–1278, 1280, 1569; Dec. Dig. ⇨204.]

[4. Nuisance ⇨33.]

Under the allegations of a complaint that the life of plaintiff and her family were in danger from the explosion of defendant's powder magazine near by, evidence in plaintiff's behalf as to the construction and management of the magazine is competent and pertinent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. §§ 84–89; Dec. Dig. ⇨33.]

[5. Nuisance ⇨3.]

A matter may be a nuisance although it injuriously affects only one household. The judge therefore properly refused to charge "that if the jury find that the site of the powder magazine is such as to cause danger to the fewest persons, at the same time affording an accessible depot of supply, they must find for the defendant."

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Woodstock Hardwood & Spool Mfg. Co. v. Charleston Light & Water Co., 63 S. E. 556.

For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. § 15; Dec. Dig. ⇨3.]

[6. Trial ⇨260.]

There is no error in refusing a request to charge where the matter so requested is substantially stated in the general charge.

[Ed. Note. For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651–659; Dec. Dig. ⇨260.]

[7. Nuisance ⇨34.]

The complaint made no allegation that defendant's magazine or powder were carelessly kept, but did allege that the magazine endangered the life of plaintiff and her family: Held, that the judge did not err in refusing to charge that the jury must consider the case as if the powder was kept with the greatest discretion and security.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. §§ 90–92; Dec. Dig. ⇨34.]

[8. Appeal and Error ⇨999.]

In a law case questions of fact cannot be reviewed by this court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3912 3921, 3923, 3924; Dec. Dig. ⇨999.]

[9. Appeal and Error ⇨232.]

This court declined to declare error in a charge which authorized the jury to find punitive damages where the only objections raised to such charge were that there was no testimony in the case to which it was applicable, and that its tendency was to inflame the minds of the jury against the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hall v. South Carolina Ry. Co., 28 S. C. 267, 5 S. E. 623.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1351, 1368, 1426, 1430, 1431; Dec. Dig. ⇨232.]

Before Kershaw, J., Charleston, February, 1884.

This was an action by Ann H. Emory against the Hazard Powder Company, commenced December 13, 1882. The opinion sufficiently states the case. The judge charged the jury as follows:

Gunpowder is a legitimate article of commerce. Therefore the storing and the keeping of gunpowder in a magazine, properly constructed, is a lawful business and not in itself a nuisance. Whether the particular magazine is or is not a nuisance must be determined by the circumstances of the case. When trade in a dangerous article, such as gunpowder, assumes large proportions, storehouses for the proper keeping of such dangerous articles become necessary for the safety of the community. Yet though necessary, the erection of such structures as to the location and manner of construction must be consistent with the rights of person and property of other persons. No one has the right, in *pursuit of his own private business, to injure another in his person or property.

*478

If the defendants have erected and maintained a powder magazine and kept explosives therein in such a manner, and in such a location, and of such a character as manifestly to injure the lives of the plaintiff, her family, or her servants, residing on her own premises, then the action would properly lie against the defendants as for a nuisance; as in this case. In order to establish the plaintiff's right of action it is necessary that you should find that either manifest danger or actual injury to the plaintiff, in her person or property, has resulted from the causes alleged in the complaint, and if there be neither apparent danger nor actual damage resulting from such causes, the verdict should be for the defendants. If, however, you find that such manifest danger, or actual damage to person or property has resulted to the plaintiff from the acts of the defendants complained of, your verdict should be for the plaintiff.

If you find for the plaintiff, you should find the actual damage done to her person or property, reasonably attributable to the causes alleged; and also such reasonable damages as you may think proper to compensate her for any mental fear or suffering which naturally and reasonably resulted from the alleged wrongful acts of the defendant. If you find anything in the case that shows a wanton or reckless disregard of the plaintiff's rights, amounting to criminality on the part of the defendants, you might add to your verdict such punitive damages as you think proper, to punish the defendants for such criminal acts, if any. Should you find for the plaintiff, your verdict should be for a given sum of money, expressed in writing, and written upon the complaint, and signed by the foreman. If you find for the defendant, you will simply say: "We find for the defendant."

Messrs. McCrady, Sons & Bacot, for appellants.

Messrs. Lord & Hyde, contra.

April 21, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, respondent, in*stituted the proceeding below, alleging, as a cause of action, that defendant, appellant, had erected upon its premises a powder magazine, within two hundred yards of the dwelling of respondent, and within twenty-five feet of the road leading to a ship yard, in which magazine the appellant intended to keep in store large quantities of gunpowder; that said magazine was erected, notwithstanding the respondent had given written notice that she objected to its location so near her dwelling. And in the 6th paragraph of the complaint, she alleged that the erection and maintaining of a powder magazine, on the premises aforesaid, greatly endangered the lives of herself, her family, and servants from explosion, and also the lives and property of the public travelling on said road; and she demanded judgment: 1st. That said nuisance be removed. 2nd. That she recover, of the defendant, five thousand dollars ($5,000) damages caused thereby, and the costs of action. The defendant, answering, denied the allegation of paragraph VI.; and for further defence alleged that said powder magazine was erected with the knowledge and consent of all the adjacent proprietors, save the plaintiff, whose dwelling is much further removed from its site, than that of one who consented to its erection.

*479

The cause came on for trial before his honor, Judge Kershaw, at the February term for Charleston County, when the counsel for the defence moved that the plaintiff be required to elect whether she would sue for damages, or for an injunction against a continuance of the alleged nuisance, which motion, after argument, was refused. The trial then proceeded, ending with a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $500. The defendant appealed upon the following nine exceptions:

I. "Because his honor erred, in that he refused the defendant's motion to require the plaintiff to elect whether she would proceed for damages, or for injunction.

II. "Because his honor erred, in that he allowed the plaintiff to introduce testimony as to injury to her health, claimed to have been produced by the proximity of the defendant's powder magazine, when there was no allegation in the complaint charging such injury.

III. "Because his honor erred, in that he allowed the plaintiff *to introduce testimony as to the construction of the magazine, and the conduct of the business, when there was no allegation in the complaint that the magazine was improperly constructed, or that the business was improperly conducted.

*480

IV. "Because his honor erred, in that he refused to charge the jury as the defendant requested, 'that if the jury in this case find that the site of the magazine is such as to cause damage to the fewest persons, at the same time affording an accessible depot of supply, that they must find for the defendant.'

V. "Because there was no proof that the proximity of the magazine was dangerous to the lives of the plaintiff and her family.

VI. "Because his honor erred, in that he refused to charge as the defendant requested, that the fears of the plaintiff, even though they may have been reasonable, will not create a nuisance.

VII. "Because there was no testimony introduced on the trial to show what, if any, were the damages complained of and sustained by the plaintiff, although his honor correctly charged the jury, 'therefore the storing and keeping of gunpowder in a magazine, properly constructed, is a lawful business, and not in itself a nuisance.'

VIII. "Because his honor erred in that he refused to charge the jury as the defendant requested, that there being no allegation in the complaint that the magazine or powder were carelessly kept, the jury must consider the case as if it was kept with the greatest discretion and security.

IX. "Because his honor erred, in that he charged the jury as follows: 'If you find anything in the case that shows a wanton or reckless disregard of the plaintiff's rights, amounting to criminality on the part of the defendant, you might add to your verdict such punitive damages as you think proper to punish the defendants for such criminal acts, if any;' when there was neither prayer for punitive damages, nor proof offered at the trial of any wantonness, recklessness, or criminality, nor any evidence at all introduced on the point."

We will consider these exceptions in their order. The first is as to the form of the action. The prayer of the complaint demands two kinds of relief—one equitable, and the other legal; *and it is contended that the plaintiff should have been required to elect between them; i. e., whether she should proceed for the removal of the nuisance, or for the recovery of damages. In other words, in the opinion of the defendant, there was a misjoinder, and on that account the action could not proceed until the plaintiff had elected. No doubt there can be a misjoinder of causes of action, and when this occurs it is objectionable, and may be met, either by demurrer, by motion to make more definite, and perhaps by motion to require the plaintiff to elect; but can there be a misjoinder of remedies demanded, liable to be assailed as on misjoinder of causes of action?

*481

Causes of action are very often confounded with remedies; and being regarded as synonymous, the rules established with reference to the one, are sometimes supposed to be applicable to the other. This, however, is a mistaken view of the subject, as a brief investigation will show. A cause of action may be defined in general terms to be a legal right, invaded without justification or sufficient excuse. Upon such invasion a cause of action arises, which entitles the party injured to some relief, by the application of such remedies as the laws may afford. But the cause of action, and the remedy sought, are entirely different matters. The one precedes and, it is true, gives rise to the other, but they are separate and distinct from each other, and are governed by different rules and principles. It is true, that the motive which prompts the action is a desire for relief, and to obtain this relief is the object of the action, and in this sense the relief sought is the cause of the action; but this is not the legal sense of the phrase "cause of action." On the contrary, that sense is as stated above; i. e., a breach of one's legal rights.

When thus understood, and when the two are kept separate and apart as they should be, it will be seen at once, that while in some cases there may be a misjoinder, by the incorporation of two distinct causes in the same complaint, which would be subject to censure and correction, yet it does not follow, therefore, that the insertion of two or more demands for relief in the same complaint would constitute a like misjoinder, and subject to like censure and correction. On the contrary, inasmuch as oftentimes there springs from one cause of action several remedial rights, *entitling the party injured to several kinds of relief, it is not only not improper to unite several demands in such cases for relief, but failing to do so, the plaintiff might fail to secure the full measure of his rights. Hence we find numerous cases in the books, where two or more demands are made in the same complaint, and especially is this so in cases where the party is entitled to both legal and equitable relief, as in the case now before the court. See Pomeroy on Remedies, § 460, in which is given, as an example of this principle, the very form of action adopted below, to wit, an action to remove a nuisance by injunction, and for damages. We think the ruling of the Circuit judge was correct, both upon principle and authority. Simonds v. Haithcock, 18 S. C., 604; Davis v. Lambertson, 56 Barb., 480; Pom. Rem., 460.

*482

The second exception assigns error in that plaintiff was allowed to introduce evidence as to injury to the plaintiff's health caused by the proximity of the magazine. It does not appear that any objection was made to the introduction of this testimony. This exception, therefore, cannot be considered. Burris v. Whitner, 3 S. C., 510; Fripp v. Williams, Birnie & Co., 14 Id., 508; State v. Washington, 13 Id., 453.

The third exception raises a question as to the competency of certain testimony in reference to the construction of the magazine and the conduct of the business. The issue raised in the pleadings, on plaintiff's allegations and statement of her cause of action, was danger from explosion of the magazine. This being the issue it was certainly competent to show the construction of the magazine, and also the manner in which the business of keeping and storing the powder therein was conducted. Such testimony, as it appears to us, was not only competent, but decidedly pertinent to the issue involved.

The fourth, sixth, and eighth exceptions complain because his honor refused to charge the requests contained therein, as follows:

1. "That if the jury find that the site of the magazine is such as to cause danger to the fewest persons, at the same time affording an accessible depot of supply, that they must find for the defendant." The main question in the case was one of fact, and that was whether the magazine endangered the lives of the plain*tiff, her family, and servants, residing on her own premises. The judge charged that if, from the evidence, the jury found that it did, then the action could be maintained as for a nuisance. No objection was made to this portion of the charge, and if this be good law, as no doubt it is, we do not see how the judge could have modified it as requested in this exception. It is not the number of persons affected by a matter that makes it a nuisance, but it is its injurious, offensive, and noxious character; and it is none the less a nuisance because it affects only one or two instead of a multitude. There may be a private as well as a public nuisance, the distinction being dependent upon the number affected, but the fact of nuisance itself does not depend upon number.

*483

2. Because his honor refused to charge as requested, that the fears of the plaintiff, even though they may have been reasonable, will not create a nuisance. The judge charged this in substance, or at least the difference between what he directly charged and this request, if there be a difference, is so slight that it cannot be assigned as error. He said to the jury, "In order to establish the plaintiff's right it is necessary that they should find that either manifest damage or actual injury to the plaintiff in her person or property has resulted from the causes alleged in the complaint, and if there be neither apparent danger, nor actual damage resulting from such cause, the verdict should be for the defendant." This was in substance saying that something more was necessary than the mere fears of the plaintiff.

3. Because his honor erred in that he refused to charge as requested, "that there being no allegation in the complaint that the magazine or powder were carelessly kept, the jury must consider the case as if it were kept with the greatest discretion and security." We do not think that this conclusion followed as a matter of law, because the complaint contained no allegation of the kind suggested, not so much at least as to require the judge to charge the request as a legal proposition, especially in the face of the allegation in the complaint that plaintiff's life and that of her family and servants were in danger from the explosion of the magazine, which allowed her to introduce testimony on that subject though not specially alleged in the complaint.

*484

*The fifth and seventh exceptions involve questions of fact entirely and are beyond our review.

The ninth objects to that portion of the charge which refers to vindictive or punitive damages; not because there was error in the legal propositions announced, but because, in the opinion of appellant, there was no occasion for the announcement as there was no testimony in the case to which it was applicable; and further, because it had a tendency to inflame the minds of the jury against the defendant. We cannot go into a matter of that kind. Our province is to review the propositions of law laid down in the case. But even if it were proper for us to consider the objection as urged, we do not think that it is well taken.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 484

THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA v. PINCKNEY.

SAME v. DAVIS.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⊂⊃1050.]

Entries of surveys and sales from the original books of the commissioners of United States tax sales would seem to be admissible to show what was sold, although not to impeach the regularity and validity of the sale; but not having been considered by the Circuit judge, his admission of such testimony cannot be assigned as ground for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1068, 1069, 4153–4157, 4166; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃1050.]

[2. Public Lands ⊂⊃169.]

Where information is brought by the State for the recovery of real property from an individual, the State is not required to prove her title; she is the sovereign, the source of title, and upon this prima facie showing she rests until it is removed by a counter showing.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Evans, 33 S. C. 186, 187, 11 S. E. 697.

For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. § 502; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃169.]

[3. Limitation of Actions ⊂⊃6.]

Statutes of limitation, affecting only the remedy, constitute no exception to the general rule that laws operate only upon matters which arise after their passage, unless they otherwise expressly declare.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 16–31; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃6.]

[4. Limitation of Actions ⟸6.]

The limitation of time within which the State will sue, adopted in 1870, cannot affect this action under the facts of the case.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Heyward v. Farmers' Min. Co., 42 S. C. 148, 149, 19 S. E. 963, 20 S. E. 64, 28 L. R. A. 42, 46 Am. St. Rep. 702; Busby v. Florida Cent. & P. R. Co., 45 S. C. 318, 23 S. E. 50.

For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 19; Dec. Dig. ⟸6.]

[5. Navigable Waters ⟸46.]

A deed that calls for boundaries on tidal navigable streams conveys the land down to the ordinary high water line only.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Nathans v. Steinmeyer, 57 S. C. 389, 35 S. E. 733.

For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. §§ 287, 288; Dec. Dig. ⟸46.]

[6. Internal Revenue ⟸28; Navigable Waters ⟸37.]

Under a certificate of sale of island lands by United States tax commissioners, the vacant marshes surrounding such island, being property of the State and therefore not taxable under the act of Congress, *did not pass; and evidence may be introduced to show the State's ownership.

*485

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Internal Revenue, Cent. Dig. § 80; Dec. Dig. ⟸28; Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. § 219; Dec. Dig. ⟸37.]

[7. Ejectment ⟸114.]

A judgment for the recovery of land is not voidable for uncertainty because that it will be necessary to make a location of the property designated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 352–370, 372, 374–378; Dec. Dig. ⟸114.]

[8. Appeal and Error ⟸1008.]

The Circuit judge's ruling that the trespass by defendant was not wilful, not disturbed; and doubted whether this court has the right to review a finding of fact in a case of this character.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3955; Dec. Dig. ⟸1008.]

[9. Internal Revenue ⟸28.]

[A tax certificate issued by United States direct tax commissioners cannot affect the question of the ownership of lands by including them within its boundaries.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Internal Revenue, Cent. Dig. § 80; Dec. Dig. ⟸28.]

[10. Deeds ⟸111.]

[Cited in Stephens v. Long & Bellamy, 92 S. C. 71, 75 S. E. 530, to the point that, if the description of the boundaries is ambiguous, the criterion for determining the location is the intention of the parties.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 309–315, 334, 335; Dec. Dig. ⟸111.]

Before Wallace, J., Beaufort, November, 1883.

These were informations filed September 20, 1882, by LeRoy F. Youmans, then attorney general, in the name of the State of South Carolina, one against C. C. Pinckney, jr., and the other against W. B. Davis, for the recovery of certain salt marshes alleged to be the property of the state.

At the trial, plaintiff offered in evidence certified copies of entries of surveys and sales from the original books of A. D. Smith, W. E. Wording, and William Henry Brisbane, of their surveys and sales made as United States tax commissioners during the years 1864 and 1863, under and by virtue of an act entitled "an act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts within the United States, and for other purposes" Defendant objected to this evidence on the ground that the commissioners' tax sale certificate is prima facie evidence of title to the premises described therein, and that the papers offered are not competent testimony to rebut the same. The judge did not consider this evidence in making his decision, but thought it admissible as throwing light upon the question, what did the commissioners sell?

The case is otherwise fully stated in the Circuit decree and in the opinion of this court. The Circuit decree in the Pinckney case was as follows:

A body of land composed partly of highland and partly of marsh, lies in Beaufort County, and is bounded on the north by Coosaw River and St. Helena Sound, on the east by St. Helena Sound and Morgan River, and west by Parrott Creek and Coosaw River. It is penetrated by two creeks—Safe Harbor Creek, from St. Helena Sound on the north, and Bass Creek from Par*rott Creek on the south. These creeks lose themselves in the marsh. The largest piece of highland lies upon the southern side of the body, and is bounded by Morgan River on the south, on the north by Safe Harbor Creek and salt marsh, and on all other sides by salt marsh. The balance of the highland is small islands —some in the eastern and some in the western part of the main body—each of which is surrounded by salt marsh.

*486

On June 4, 1787, a grant was issued by the state to William Fripp of "a plantation or tract of land containing one hundred and twenty acres of salt marsh and eight small islands, situate in the district of Beaufort, in St. Helena parish, bounding south on St. Helena River, commonly called Morgan River, west on Parrott Creek, north on vacant marsh, eastward on marshes from William Fripp's land, commonly called Morgan's Island showing such shape, form, and marks as are represented by a plat hereunto annexed." The plat referred to, dated April 18, 1787, is in evidence. It describes one hundred and twenty acres of salt marsh and eight small islands situate on the southwestern part of the main body.

On July 2, 1787, another grant was issued by the state to William Fripp, conveying to him "a plantation or tract of land containing thirty (being nine small islands) acres, situate in the district of Beaufort, in St. Helena parish; three of the islands bound westwardly on Safe Harbor Creek, the other six islands all sides on marsh lands, having such shape, form, and marks as are represented by a plat hereunto annexed." This plat, dated April, 1787, is in evidence. It describes nine small islands upon the eastern part of the main body. For the largest body of highland, that bounded on the south by Morgan River, no grant is produced. It is referred to in the grant of June 4, 1787, mentioned above, as "William Fripp's land, commonly called Morgan's Island," and it is conceded that William Fripp had title to this land.

Thus stood the title to this property, as far as appears from the evidence, until March 10, 1863. On that day, under "an act for the collection of direct taxes in the insurrectionary districts within the United States, and for other purposes," the United States commissioners sold and conveyed to Edward S. *Philbrick "the tract of land known as Morgan Island, bounded northerly by Coosaw River, southerly by Morgan River, easterly by St. Helena Sound, westerly by Parrott Creek, containing two hundred and fifty-five acres, more or less." This description is taken from the tax sale certificate which is in evidence.

*487

On January 27, 1865, E. S. Philbrick conveyed the same land to Geo. M. Wells. In January, 1867, Geo. M. Wells executed to E. S. Philbrick a mortgage of the same land. In pursuance of a judgment of foreclosure of the above mortgage, the same land was sold and conveyed by Alfred Williams, sheriff of Beaufort County, to Louis A. Phillips on December 22, 1869. On February 4, 1871, Louis A. Phillips conveyed to Theodore G. Eiswald "all that plantation or tract of land * * * known as Morgan Island, bounded on all sides by the waters and marshes of St. Helena Sound and of Coosaw and Morgan Rivers, measuring and containing eight hundred acres, more or less." Eiswald conveyed to W. B. Davis "that piece, &c., * * * known as Morgan's Island, bounded on all sides by waters of Coosaw River, St. Helena Sound, Morgan River, and Parrott Creek, measuring and containing four hundred acres, more or less."

On August 29, 1879, W. B. Davis executed a quit-claim deed to C. C. Pinckney, jr., of all his interest in "all that piece or parcel of land situate, lying, and being in the County of Beaufort and state aforesaid, being the northwestern portion of the island known as Morgan Island; bounded on the north by Coosaw River; on the east and south by a line beginning on Parrott Creek, forty-five chains to the southward of the mouth of Bass's Creek, and running north by forty-five degrees east (N. 45 ° E.) to Coosaw River or St. Helena Sound; and on the west by Parrott Creek, as indicated on the map of the United States Coast Survey of the entrance to Bull and Combahee Rivers, No. 435, A. D. 1871, attached to and made a part of this deed, and containing two thousand acres, more or less."

These deeds, from the tax sale certificate down to and including the deed of Davis to Pinckney, together with the state grants to Fripp, constitute all the paper title put in evidence.

This information was filed by the state to recover the marsh land included within the boundaries of Parrott Creek, Coosaw River,

*488

*St. Helena Sound, and Morgan River; the state conceding that the highland has been granted and so much of the marsh as is granted in the grant of June 4, 1787, to William Fripp.

To the demand of the state, the defendant opposes three grounds of resistance: 1. That in this action the state, to be entitled to recover, must show title affirmatively, and has failed to do so; 2. That the state is barred by the statute of limitations of actions by the state. 3. That defendant has title under a tax sale certificate issued under the laws of the United States.

It is hardly necessary to say that the state can only be brought into court with her own consent, and when she voluntarily comes into any of her own courts to assert a right of property, she is of course bound by the rules established there for the administration of justice between individuals, and to recover a demand must establish her right by proof. Has she done so in this case? The state at the close of the revolutionary war succeeded to the territorial rights of the British crown, and became the owner in fee of all the lands within her limits vacant at that time. She has no paper title; she acquired her right by the strong hand, and her title has been conceded by the British crown, the former owner by right of discovery and conquest. These are historical facts, of which the court will take judicial notice, and need not be formally proven. As to the right of the state as successor to the British crown, see 3 Kent Com., 377.

That salt marsh has for one hundred years been considered by the general assembly of this state as such land as when vacant was owned by the state, appears from the act of 1784 (4 Stat., 627) to raise supplies. By this act "all lands granted by the state" were classified and rated for taxation. This classification was continued from year to year in the annual acts to raise supplies, until the year 1815. In that year an act to fix the value of lands in the state for taxation, &c. (6 Stat., 7), was passed. In all these acts salt marsh is included as taxable when granted. In addition to this, the state has from ancient times actually exercised the power to grant lands of this description without question. See act of 1787 (5 Stat., 39, § 4); and act of 1836 (7 Stat., 151). See also grant of marsh land to William Fripp in 1787, in evidence in this case. From this it appears that *there is nothing in the fact that land is marsh land to affect the nature of the state's tenure of the soil.

*489

It thus appears that the state has title to all the ungranted land within her territorial jurisdiction. How is this to be made to appear when the state undertakes to establish such right? When an individual brings an action to recover the possession of land, the rules of evidence require that he should prove a prima facie title by showing that he has the title of the state. This is done by the production of a grant, or by proving such a possession as raises the presumption of a grant. He is not required to formally prove the title of the state under whom he holds. That is presumed. The rule admits the title of the state, and it is matter for judicial cognizance, without proof. So when the state brings her action to recover land on the strength of her title, she invokes the rule just referred to as obtaining between individuals, and asks that the court take judicial cognizance of the historical facts upon which her title rests. To push the resemblance between what is required as between individuals and the state and individuals a little further, when the individual plaintiff rests upon the right of the state as source of title conveyed to him by grant, the burden of proof is shifted to the defendant, who must then show, to defeat plaintiffs' recovery, that the title of the state is really not in plaintiff. Thus a successful defence, too, must rest upon the presumption of the state's title.

It appears, then, that the presumption of the state's title is a rule of evidence that applies whenever title and jurisdiction are asserted by the pleadings by the state, and where a grant from the state, either actual or presumed, is set up by an individual, and is sufficient in either case to put the defendant upon his defence. In New York a more stringent rule has been adopted. Under their statute of limitations of actions by the state to recover land, it has been held that in addition to the presumption of title in the state to entitle herself to recover, she must prove that the land claimed has been vacant within the statutory period. See People v. Rector of Trinity Church, 22 N. Y., 46, and numerous cases which need not be cited here. While this rule appears to be exacting and requiring the overthrow of matter of *defence before it is set up, and against principle, it need not be discussed here, for reasons that will appear hereafter.

*490

From the foregoing, it appears that the same rules that govern the procedure between individuals in actions to recover land are applied to the state as well when in a similar relation; the same presumption applying equally to both. Our cases upon this subject are State v. Arledge, 1 Bail., 551, and 2 Bail., 401 [23 Am. Dec. 145]; Trapier v. Wilson, 2 McC., 191.

The state then having a prima facie case, is she barred by the statute of limitations? It has long been settled that statutes of limitation do not run against rights of the state unless it is expressly provided that they shall. No statute of limitation upon the state's right was ever enacted in this state until 1870. This statute provides that the state will not sue after forty years from the accrual of her right. This was amended in 1873, reducing the time beyond which actions by the state would not be brought to recover land to twenty years. This latter statute has been reenacted in the revised code of 1882. All along, from the first enactment of the statute in 1870 down to the last, a provision has been preserved (see Code of 1870, § 96) to the effect that such limitation shall not extend to actions already commenced, or to cases where the right of action has already accrued.

The defendant went into possession in 1879, and traces title and claims under the United States tax sale certificate of the date of 1863. There is nothing to show adverse possession, or such trespass as indicated a claim and thus gave currency to the statute and right of action to plaintiff upon any part of the disputed territory outside of the grants to William Fripp prior to 1863. This action was commenced in September, 1882. No right of action then accrued until 1863. If either of the statutes of limitation above referred to had been of force in 1863, it is obvious that this action would not be barred by them, the least time (twenty years) not having run out.

If, however, in accordance with the New York rule, the plaintiff should be required to show affirmatively that his right of action accrued within the time limited by the act, the testimony submitted by him, both negative and positive, is full to the point. *To show that the right of action of plaintiff accrued within the twenty years, the witnesses, Windsor, Pengelly, and Freland, all testify that the salt marsh was vacant in 1877. White testifies that Davis, defendant's grantor, refused to receive pay for rock dug in the marshes in 1879. The grants to William Fripp are bounded on rivers and vacant marsh, and therefore do not include such marsh as they are bounded on, nor such parts of the shores of the tidal navigable streams as are covered by water at ordinary high tides. There is no proof in rebuttal of this testimony which shows vacant and unoccupied and unclaimed marshes within the statutory period, and brings this action within the scope of the stringent New York rule above referred to.

*491

The defendant sets up as a defence, and claims title to the disputed land under the United States tax sale certificate above referred to. The chain of title from this certificate has already been set out. This certificate, in effect, declares that under "an act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts within the United States, commissioners sold and conveyed to Edward S. Philbrick" the tract of land known as Morgan's Island, bounded northerly by Coosaw River, southerly by Morgan River, easterly by St. Helena Sound, westerly by Parrott Creek, containing two hundred and fifty-five acres, more or less.

In the case of DeTreville v. Smalls, 98 U. S., 522 [25 L. Ed. 174], the Supreme Court of the United States held that such certificate "shall be prima facie evidence, not merely of the regularity of the sale, but also of its validity, and of the title of the purchaser." The same case held further, that "all possible attack upon the prima facies of the certificate is limited by the express provisions of the act, which enacted that it should only be affected as evidence of the regularity and validity of the sale, by establishing the fact that the property was not subject to taxes, or that the taxes had been paid previous to the sale, or that the property had been redeemed." It will not be necessary to quote from the acts of Congress, as this citation from the opinion of the court embraces all that is material to the question under consideration.

The legality of the sales, evidenced by these certificates, having been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States (see DeTreville v. Smalls, supra), the only question in connection *with this certificate is, what did it convey? It describes the property conveyed as Morgan Island, and bounds it by certain great navigable tide-water streams. It is not described as the property of Fripp. If there is land within the descriptive boundaries that at the time of the sale belonged to the state, that land was not subject to taxes, and was not and could not, therefore, be conveyed by the certificate under the citation from the act of Congress in the quotation from the opinion in DeTreville v. Smalls, supra. According to that case (the lands of the state not being subject to taxes), the title of the state was not affected by the sale and certificate.

*492

In this connection, therefore, the important question is, did the state own any land within the descriptive boundaries mentioned in the certificate? and if so, what were its boundaries? A conveyance which calls for, as boundaries, navigable streams in which the tides ebb and flow, carries the title of the grantee to the line reached by the water at ordinary or daily high tide, as distinct from high spring tides or ordinary spring tides. This rule is distinctly described and established in the case of U. S. v. Pacheco, 2 Wall., 590 [17 L. Ed. 865]. Therefore the marsh land, between low water and ordinary high water, was not conveyed by the certificate. If it has not been conveyed by the state, it is still the property of the state. Any other land within the description, that had not been conveyed by the state, was the property of the state at the date of the certificate, and was not, therefore, conveyed by the certificate. The grant, therefore, of June 4, 1787, to William Fripp, conveys one hundred and twenty acres of salt marsh, and eight small islands, bounded south on St. Helena River, commonly called Morgan River, west on Parrott Creek, north on vacant marsh, eastward on marshes from said William Fripp's land, commonly called Morgan Island.

It will be observed that this grant conveys marsh which is bounded by vacant marsh and by great navigable tide water streams, and also conveys eight small islands as included in the marsh. It is obvious that the word "island," when used in this grant in relation to the small islands, signifies highland, and when in the same paragraph William Fripp's land is spoken of as Morgan's Island, it is impossible to resist the inference that there, *too, it was used to signify the same thing, and meant highland. This inference is strengthened by the words, "on marshes from William Fripp's land." If it had been intended to include marshes as part of Morgan's Island, the grant would have called for Morgan Island as a boundary instead of the "marshes from" that island. This grant, by calling for these marshes as a boundary, excludes them from the grant. By calling for Morgan River, Parrott Creek, and St. Helena Sound as boundaries, the ground covered by these rivers at ordinary high tide is excluded from the grant. By calling for vacant marshes on the north while conveying marsh excludes all marsh not included in the one hundred and twenty acres conveyed. This same grant recognizes William Fripp's title to Morgan Island, that is, to the highland called in the grant Morgan's Island, and this is the only evidence that the title to that land had passed out of the state.

*493

The quit claim deed of Davis to defendant, described above, includes much if not all the marsh and highland granted by the grant of June 4, 1787, as well as the marsh described as vacant and lying on the north of the one hundred and twenty acres. As the title to the land conveyed by Davis to Pinckney had never been conveyed by the state, except the one hundred and twenty acres of the grant of 1787 (to all the land except the one hundred and twenty acres), the state now has title and is entitled to recover it.

The title of the state to all the land within the boundaries claimed by defendant is absolute, except to so much of it as is embraced in the grant of 1787 to William Fripp. To ascertain, therefore, the exact physical boundaries of the land of the state, it will be necessary to locate this grant by a survey to be made according to the findings of the decree. For the phosphate rock and phosphatic deposits taken by defendant from land lying outside of this grant the state would be entitled to recover damages. As the defendant mined the rock under color of title there was no wilful trespass, and the measure of damages would be the value of the rock, less the cost of rendering them marketable. In the present state of the evidence, however, it is impossible to tell what amount of rock has been mined upon the land of the state *and how much taken from the one hundred and twenty acres for which the state would not be entitled to damages. These questions can be settled in the further progress of the case.

*494

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant all the land within the limits claimed by him, except the one hundred and twenty acres granted by the state in 1787 to William Fripp, and is also entitled to recover damages, according to the principle stated in this opinion upon that subject, for all phosphate rock and phosphatic deposits mined and taken by defendant from the land adjudged herein to be the property of the state. It is further ordered that the parties, or any of them, have leave to apply at the foot of this decree for all necessary orders to carry it into effect.

In the Davis case the Circuit decree was as follows:

A decree in the case of The State of South Carolina against C. C. Pinckney, Jr., has just been signed by me. This case involves precisely the same principles as that, and what is said there need not, therefore, be repeated here. The information there was filed to recover the marsh land upon the western end of the same body upon the eastern end of which the marsh land lies that the information here was filed to recover.

It may be said here, generally, that the state is the owner of all the land in the state that has not been granted by herself, or by former owners, before her title accrued. On the eastern end of the body of land bounded on the north by Coosaw River and St. Helena Sound, and on the south by Morgan River, and on the east by Parrott Creek, there are nine small islands, containing in the aggregate thirty acres, bounded on all sides by marsh. These islands were granted to William Fripp by the state on July 2, 1787, and described in the grant as follows: "A plantation or tract of land containing thirty (being nine small islands) acres, situate in the District of Beaufort, St. Helena Parish; three of the islands bound westwardly on Safe Harbor Creek, the other six islands all sides on marsh land." The plat of the same gives the same description. The title to the state, therefore, to these islands has passed away from her. The grant, however, calling for the surrounding marsh as a boundary of the land con*veyed, excludes the marsh from the grant, and there is nothing to show that the title of the state to that has been granted.

*495

The tax sale certificate does not convey this marsh, for the reasons stated in the decree in the case of The State v. Pinckney, Jr., above referred to. It is also in proof that these marshes have not been occupied or held adversely, and were, therefore, vacant prior to 1863. There is no proof that defendant has taken any minerals from the marshes or otherwise injured the property.

It is therefore adjudged that the State of South Carolina is the owner, and is entitled to recover all the marsh land described in paragraph 47 of the information.

Messrs. Hayne & Ficken, and Wm. Elliott, for appellants.

Messrs. Smythe & Lee, contra.

April 21, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. These cases, depending upon the same facts and principles, were heard together and they will be considered together. The attorney general in behalf of the state, filed an information against each of the defendants on September 20, 1882, for intrusion into certain salt marsh lands adjacent to and surrounding Morgan Island, and digging, mining, and removing phosphate rocks and phosphatic deposits from said territory, the property of the state. The defendants each answered, denying that said territory or any part thereof was the property of the state; and pleading "that no right or title in or to the territory described in the information accrued to the state within the space of forty (40) years next before the commencement of this action, and that if any such right or title ever accrued to said state, the same accrued more than forty (40) years before the time of the commencement of this action; and neither the said state nor those from or under whom it claims have received the rents and profits of said territory or of any part thereof within the space of forty (40) years before the commencement of this action." It was referred to Simeon Hyde, jr., to take the testimony which is in the brief. The Circuit judge makes so clear a statement of the facts, *we will not undertake to restate them, except so far as to make the opinion intelligible.

*496

Near the point where the waters of the Coosaw River mingle with those of St. Helena Sound, they divide, and while one portion goes direct, the other branches off towards the south, and known at first as Parrott's Creek, lower down assumes the name of Morgan River and flows into the Sound. The small body of land thus isolated is set down in chart No. 435 of the United States coast survey as "Morgan's Island." It is very low and flat as indicated by the fact that its superficial area consists of about three hundred and fifty acres of highland and about five thousand of salt marsh, for the most part subject to the ebb and flow of the tides, the mean rise and fall being from six to eight feet, and at full spring tides all the surface is under water, except the highlands and the spots called hammocks. What is known as the highlands are made up by a number of islets interspersed through the marsh; but by far the greater part is at one place on the south shore bounding on Morgan River, and contains about two hundred and fifty acres. This is the only part of the whole island capable of cultivation, and, as conceded, was once the private property of William Fripp, who had a settlement there.

On June 4, 1787, a grant was issued by the state to William Fripp of "a plantation or tract of land, containing one hundred and twenty acres of salt marsh and eight small islands situate in the district of Beaufort, in St. Helena parish, bounding south on St. Helena River, commonly called Morgan River, west on Parrott Creek, north on vacant marsh, eastward on marshes from William Fripp's land, commonly called Morgan Island, showing such shape, form, and marks as are represented by a plat herein to be annexed," &c. On July 2, 1787, a few days after the above grant, another was issued by the state to William Fripp, conveying to him "a plantation or tract of land containing thirty acres (being nine small islands), situate in the district of Beaufort, in St. Helena parish; three of the islands bound westwardly on Safe Harbor Creek, the other six on all sides by marsh lands, having such shape, form, and marks as are represented by a plat hereunto annexed," &c. There was no evidence that any other part of the marsh lands of the island had ever been granted, or *any thing tending to show that down to 1863 any person other than William Fripp, and those who held under him, ever had or claimed to have private property in any part of the said marshes.

*497

On March 10, 1863, during the late war, under and by virtue of an act of Congress "for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts within the United States," &c., the commissioners appointed by the general government for that purpose sold and conveyed to one Edward S. Philbrick for the consideration of $255 a tract of land, which in the certificate of the tax sale is described as follows: "the tract of land known as 'Morgan Island,' bounded northerly by Coosaw River, southerly by Morgan River, easterly by St. Helena Sound, and westerly by Parrott Creek, containing two hundred and fifty-five acres, more or less," &c. On January 27, 1865, Edward S. Philbrick sold the land (giving a quit-claim deed) to George Wells for $1,200, who executed a mortgage of the same, in which the land was still described as containing two hundred and fifty acres. The plantation was sold to foreclose the mortgage and purchased for $3,100 by one Lewis A. Phillips, who, on February 4, 1871, sold it without warranty to C. Eiswold for $6,000. For the first time this deed describes the plantation known as Morgan Island as containing eight hundred acres. Eiswold again conveyed it, on December 20, 1871, to William B. Davis, and in this deed the plantation is described as containing "four hundred acres, more or less."

On October 4, 1877, W. B. Davis & Son opened a correspondence with the secretary of state (Hon. R. M. Sims), for a grant of the marsh lands on Morgan Island (4,932 acres), assigning as a reason for desiring the grant, that "parties were trespassing on the marshes, and endangering their stock, and they wished to be entirely certain as owners, before they proceeded to extreme measures." This correspondence terminated July 16, 1879, by the secretary refusing to issue the grant, under the act of 1878, forbidding "the sale or grant of such lands, covered with water and marshes, as may be situated in that portion of the state, in which are phosphate rocks and phosphatic deposits." 16 Stat., 811.

On August 29, 1879, William B. Davis

*498

sold and conveyed to *Charles C. Pinckney, jr., all his interest in a tract of land, described in the deed as follows: "All that tract of land situate in the County of Beaufort and state aforesaid, being the northwestern portion of the island commonly known as 'Morgan Island'; bounded on the north by Coosaw River, on the east and south by a line beginning on Parrott Creek, forty-five chains to the southward of the mouth of 'Bass Creek,' and running north by forty-five degrees east (N. 45° E.) to Coosaw River or St. Helena Sound, and on the west by Parrott Creek, as indicated on the 'Map of the United States Coast Survey' of 'the entrance to Bull and Combahee Rivers,' No. 435, A. D. 1871, attached to and made a part of this deed, and containing two thousand acres more or less." This is the part of marsh lands adjacent to the Morgan Island plantation, upon which the state charges intrusion by C. C. Pinckney, jr., and the portion on the island not thus conveyed, is that upon which the state charges intrusion by the other defendant, William B. Davis, who claims to be the owner of the whole remainder of the island.

The cause came on for a hearing before Judge Wallace, who held that the state has title to all the ungranted lands within her borders, and that the presumption of her title is a rule of evidence that applies whenever title and jurisdiction are asserted by the pleadings for the state, and when a grant from the state, either actual or presumed, is set up by an individual, and in either case is sufficient to put the defendant to his defence. He held further, as matter of fact, that, up to 1863, all the marsh lands on Morgan's Island were vacant, never having been granted (except the two small portions which had been granted to Fripp in 1787), and that neither the tax title nor the statute of limitations divested the title of the state in that which was then vacant, and therefore he pronounced judgment for the state plaintiff in both cases for the marsh lands claimed, and damages for the phosphatic deposits taken from the respective parcels; excepting the one hundred and twenty acres granted to Fripp, June 4, 1787, and the little tract containing thirty acres (being nine small islands) granted to Fripp on July 2, 1787. The title to these parcels having passed out of the state, she can, as to them, neither claim the land itself, nor damage for the phosphates taken *from the parcels respectively. When they are located, it will appear upon whose part they will fall, and whether any phosphates have been taken from them. Both parties appealed.

*499

Plaintiffs appeal "First. Because his honor erred in holding that the trespass of the defendant (in the Pinckney case) was under an honest but mistaken belief of right, instead of being wilful. Second. Because his honor erred in holding that it was impossible to tell what amount of rock has been mined on land of the state, and how much on the one hundred and twenty acres of defendant; whereas the testimony clearly shows that none was taken from defendant's territory. Third, Because his honor erred in striking out the testimony reported at folios 359, 348 to 354, &c."

Defendant's exceptions. Each defendant appeals, but their exceptions are so nearly identical that we will set out only those of the defendant Pinckney.

I. "Because his honor erred in admitting in evidence the entries of surveys and sales from the original books of A. D. Smith, W. E. Wording, and William H. Brisbane of their surveys and sales, made as United States tax commissioners, during the years 1863 and 1864, under and by virtue of an act of Congress, entitled 'an act for the collection of direct taxes in the insurrectionary districts within the United States, and for other purposes,' &c.

II. "Because his honor erred in holding that because the state has title to all ungranted lands within her territorial limits, she is the presumptive owner of the lands described by the pleadings herein.

III. Because his honor erred in holding that when the state, as plaintiff, brings an action to recover land on the strength of her title, the defendant, to defeat a recovery, must produce a grant, or prove such possession as raises a presumption of a grant.

IV. "Because his honor erred in holding that the presumption of the state's title is a rule of evidence that applies whenever, by the pleadings, title and jurisdiction are asserted by the state; and that, to defeat a recovery, the defendant must rebut such presumption, either by the production of a grant, or by proving such possession as raises the presumption of a grant.

*500

*V. "Because his honor erred in holding that the assertion of title in the state by the pleadings established a prima facie case for plaintiff and put the defendant upon his defence, there being no allegation either that the land was vacant and ungranted when the state succeeded to the territorial rights of the British crown, or that the state has subsequently acquired title by gift, purchase, escheat, or otherwise, defendant in his answer having denied that the land is the property of the state, and set up title under a United States tax sale certificate.

VI. "Because his honor, having found as a question of fact that defendant traces title and claims under a United States tax sale certificate to Edward S. Philbrick of date 1863, should have held that this was prima facie evidence that the land in question is not the property of the state, and that the burden was then on plaintiff to rebut this evidence by showing that at the date of the sale to Philbrick the land within the descriptive boundaries of the certificate was the property of the state.

VII. "Because his honor should have held that by putting in evidence this certificate the burden of proof was shifted to the plaintiff to show that the land described in the pleadings was the property of the state at the date of the tax sale in 1863, and therefore not subject to taxation.

VIII. "Because his honor should have held that said certificate is prima facie evidence that all the land within the descriptive boundaries mentioned therein was subject to taxation at the date of the execution and delivery of the certificate; and he erred in holding otherwise.

IX. "Because, it not being alleged by the pleadings and there being no evidence whatsoever tending to show that the land in controversy was vacant and ungranted when the state succeeded to the territorial rights of the crown, nor that the state has since acquired title thereto by gift, purchase, escheat, or otherwise, his honor should have held that plaintiff is not entitled to recover the same in this action.

X. "Because the grant to William Fripp June 4, 1787, by calling for St. Helena or Morgan River and Parrott Creek as boundaries, included all the land down to low-water mark of said boundaries; and his honor erred in holding that said grant, by *calling for said boundaries, excluded from the grant the ground covered by said streams at ordinary high tide.

*501

XI. "Because the tax sale certificate to Edward S. Philbrick conveyed whatever land is contained within the natural boundaries mentioned therein; and his honor erred in holding that 'the marsh land between low-water and ordinary high-water was not conveyed by the certificate.'

XII. "Because there is no evidence whatsoever tending to show that the state's right or title to the land in question accrued within twenty years before the commencement of this action, or that the state has received the rents and profits thereof within the space of twenty years, and his honor should have so held.

XIII. "Because his honor erred in holding that the statute of limitations of 1870, as amended by the act of 1873, is not applicable to this case; and that the state's right of action against the defendant is not barred thereby.

XIV. "Because, having found that the testimony fails to establish either what portion of the land in controversy is the property of the state or the physical boundaries thereof, the judgment should have been for the defendant.

XV. "Because upon the pleadings and the facts found by his honor, the information should have been dismissed," &c.

We will not attempt to follow the exceptions, but endeavor, in our own order, to consider all the points made. The plaintiff's third exception, as to the exclusion of certain evidence of records, was properly withdrawn at the argument.

The defendant's first exception complains of error in admitting as evidence "the entries of surveys and sales from the original books of the commissioners of tax sales." These records are made "evidence in any court of the truth of the facts therein stated." 12 U. S. Stat., § 14, p. 425. It may be that under the decision in DeTreville v. Smalls, 98 U. S., 517 [25 L. Ed. 174], these records were not admissible in evidence for the purpose of impeaching the regularity and validity of the tax sale, but we can hardly doubt that they were admissible as throwing light upon the question, what did the commissioners actually sell? But the Circuit judge reports that when he came to study the case, the evidence was not considered by him in making up his judgment, and we need not therefore *consider the matter further. Susong v. Vaiden, 10 S. C., 247 [30 Am. Rep. 50]; Thompson v. Brannon, 14 S. C. 553.

*502

Several of the defendant's exceptions, in various forms, make the point that the Circuit judge committed error in holding that the presumption of the state's title is a rule of evidence that applies whenever by the pleadings title and jurisdiction are asserted by the state; and that to defeat a recovery the defendant must rebut such presumption either by the production of a grant or by proving such possession as raises the presumption of a grant. As we understand it, this objection does not go against the pleading, but the proofs in the case. When an individual sues for land, his complaint merely asserts title to the locus in quo; it need not set out the sources of his title, as that is matter of proof. So in these cases the information asserted the title of the state to the marshes in question.

But it is said that an individual would have to recover, if at all, upon the strength of his own title, of which he must make proof. That is true, and so it seems to us the state was required to do in these cases. It is said, however, that the state was not required to produce a paper title, but was allowed, contrary to the general rule, to recover upon the same presumption of a title. We do not see how the state could produce any paper title as to lands which, as alleged, had never been granted, unless perhaps she had been required to produce the history of the revolution. Our doctrine is that the state succeeded at the revolution to all the rights of the British crown, one of which, as Lord Coke tells us, was "that all lands are holden mediately or immediately of the king." The state with us is the common source of title, and retains it, indefinitely it may be, until it passes from her in the only manner known to the law, by presumption either express or implied, or hereafter possibly by operation of the new statute of limitations. We do not consider this fundamental doctrine as a mere presumption of fact, which may be overthrown; but as the established unalterable theory of our government as fixed and certain as any provision in the constitution itself. It is as if the people themselves had made a grant to the state, and to facilitate its proof had lodged it in the archives of the state. This is the original grant, so to speak, which constitutes the prima facie *title of the state, and as the courts take judicial cognizance of it and regard it in proof, it was, as we conceive, sufficient to put the defendant upon his defence.

*503

We have not been referred to a case in which the precise point was ruled, but the form of proceeding in all of the cases indicates that it was taken for granted. The cases rule that the state, as such, cannot maintain a direct action of ejectment, but must proceed by information filed by the attorney general, for the reason given, that the state being possessed of a theoretical ubiquity cannot be disseized. This indicates very distinctly that the state was seized, originally had the title, and that under the doctrine of nullum tempus it remained in the state until it was in some way transferred. State v. Arledge, 1 Bail., 551; Id., 2 Bailey, 401 [23 Am. Dec. 145]; State v. Stark, 3 Brev., 101; 3 Wash.. Real Prop., 172; 3 Bl. Com., 261. In the very learned argument for the defendants, it was said that in the case of Stark, supra, "that the highest court in the state, in an action by the state to recover land, declared that a non-suit ought to be granted, because the evidence failed to establish that the title to the land was vested in the state." That is true, but a careful perusal of the case will show that the question arose as to lands which had been granted for the settlers in the old town and township of Saxe Gotha. In the opinion, Judge Brevard said: "It has not been pretended that the locus in quo is vacant or unappropriated land, or that it has lapsed to the state by escheat. The title endeavored to be established, appears to be of a mixed and mongrel character, a legal nondescript, neither a legal nor equitable title, but partaking of the character of both; and the arguments which have been urged to support it, although learned and ingenious, appear of the same cut and character, and marvellously adapted to such a claim." We adhere to what was said by this court in the late case of the State v. The Pacific Guano Company, ante 50: "The state is the sovereign, the source of title, and upon this prima facie showing she rests, at least until it is removed by a counter showing."

But it is earnestly urged that, whilst such may have been the rule of evidence under the operation of the doctrine of nullum tempus occurrit regi, such doctrine no longer prevails in South Carolina; that the code adopted in 1870 (Code of 1882, § 95) *enacted what may be considered a statute of limitations against the state as follows: "The state will not sue any person for or in respect to any real property or the issues or profits thereof, by reason of the right or title of the state to the same, unless, 1, such right or title shall have accrued within twenty years before any action or other proceeding for the same shall be commenced; or unless, 2, the state, or those from whom it claims, shall have received the rents and profits of such real property or of some part thereof, within the space of twenty years." The defendants plead this statute, and insist that it shall be interpreted (as a similar provision in the New York code has, as alleged, been construed by the courts of that state) in such manner as to require the state, in order to defeat the bar of the statute, to show affirmatively that her right or title accrued within twenty years before action brought. The Circuit judge held as matter of fact, even according to the requirements of the New York rule, that the state had shown by both positive and negative proof that the right of action had accrued within the time limited by the act, and in that we concur with him.

*504

But we think the facts of this case do not require us to go into that matter, and we prefer to reserve our judgment as to the proper construction of the act. Statutes of limitation, affecting only the remedy, constitute no exception to the general rule, that laws operate only upon matters which arise after their passage, unless they otherwise expressly declare. Nichols v. Briggs, 18 S. C., 481. This section of the code expresses no such intent, and we think it does not operate retrospectively. This action was commenced September 2, 1882, and whether we consider the time of the tax sale (1863), when those under whom the defendants claim, had their first connection with these lands; or the time when the statute was adopted (1870), or that when the proof shows possession was first taken of these marsh lands (1879), the period of twenty years had not expired when the action was brought. It surely cannot be that a requirement as to proof, originating in a statute of limitations and having exclusive reference to that, can be obligatory in a case to which the statute of limitations has no application as an act, somewhat in the nature of a declaratory law. As was said in the case of

*505

The Pacific Guano Company, *above cited, "Until 1870 the doctrine of nullum tempus prevailed in this state, and since that time twenty years have not elapsed, so that it is not necessary to consider the scope and effect of the new provision in the code as to when and under what circumstances the state will not sue."

This brings us to the main defence made by the defendants—that they have title to the marshes in question under the tax sale certificate of the United States direct tax commissioners. It is as follows:

"United States of America.

"Tax Sale Certificate, No. 28.

"This is to certify, that at a sale of lands for unpaid taxes under and by virtue of an act entitled 'an act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts within the United States, and for other purposes,' held pursuant to notice at Beaufort, in the district of Beaufort, in the State of South Carolina, on the 10th day of March, A. D. 1863, the tract or parcel of land hereinafter described, situate in the district of Beaufort and state aforesaid, and described as follows, to wit: the tract of land known as 'Morgan Island,' bounded northerly by Coosaw River, southerly by Morgan River, easterly by St. Helena Sound, and westerly by Parrott Creek, containing two hundred and fifty-five acres, more or less, was sold and struck off to Edward S. Philbrick for the sum of two hundred and fifty-five dollars, he being the highest bidder, and that being the highest sum bidden for the same, the receipt of which said sum in full is hereby acknowledged and confessed.

"Given under our hands at Beaufort, S. C., this tenth day of March, A. D. 1863.

(Signed) "A. D. Smith,
"W. E. Wording,
"Wm. Henry Brisbane,
"Commissioners."

The defendants claim that this certificate is "equi-potent with a deed," and proves itself; that it must be taken as affording evidence, not only that all the land embraced within its extended boundaries, including the marsh as well as the highlands of the whole island, was conveyed to the purchaser, but *that the commissioners had the right to sell and make good title to the same. Judge Wallace, following the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of DeTreville v. Smalls (98 U. S., 522 [25 L. Ed. 174]), held that the certificate was prima facie evidence, not only of the regularity of the sale, but also of its validity and the title of the purchaser; but he held further, that it might be shown that the marsh lands included in the boundaries were vacant lands, and not taxable at the time of the sale in 1863, and if so, they could not be sold and conveyed for taxes.

*506

Was this error of law? In the first place, we are inclined to think that the certificate, considered as a deed and properly construed, did not convey or intend to convey the marshes, or any more than the Fripp highlands. This seems to have been the understanding of the parties themselves at the time of the sale, and long afterwards, as shown by the successive conveyances of the land, and the correspondence of W. B. Davis & Son with the secretary of state, seeking at first a grant for these marshes, and failing in that, to purchase them. This view is strengthened also by the surrounding circumstances at the time of the sale; by the fact that it was avowedly a sale of private property for taxes; by the character of the marshes, being uninhabited, and daily swept by the tides, they were considered worthless; and by the terms of the certificate itself, which carefully read, do not purport to convey Morgan's Island as such, but "the tract of land, known as 'Morgan Island,' containing 255 acres," &c. It is true the boundaries inserted are identical with those of the whole island; but that inaccuracy, or mistake, might and probably did occur by confounding the tract of land naturally called Morgan Island, with the island itself, especially as it was very difficult to give accurate boundaries to the tract of land bearing that name, as it was the only settlement on the island, and had no neighbors with adjacent lands, but rose out of the marshes, and stood in their midst isolated, and as clearly marked, as an island itself. We are aware that natural objects named as boundaries are entitled to much weight in questions of location, but at last the true criterion in such cases is the intention of the parties. Norwood v. Byrd, 1 Rich., 135 [42 Am. Dec. 406]. For many reasons it seems to us difficult, if not impossible, to conceive how commissioners, making sales *for taxes in arrear, could advertise for sale a tract of land "known as Morgan Island," containing 255 acres, and then not sell the tract of land, so advertised, but the whole of Morgan Island, containing nearly 6,000 acres, nineteen-twentieths of which was at the time regarded utterly worthless, and had never been occupied for agricultural purposes. But as the Circuit judge made no distinct ruling upon the point, we will pass it.

*507

Second. But on the presumption that there was no inaccuracy or mistake in setting out the boundaries, and that the certificate intended to convey everything within its extended boundaries, how would the matter stand? It will be observed that the territory embraced is bounded on all sides by great navigable tidal streams, viz., Coosaw River, Parrott Creek, Morgan River, and St. Helena Sound; and such description, according to the well established common law rule, only carried the title of the riparian proprietor down to ordinary high-water mark, excluding all the marsh lying below that line, and subject to the daily ebb and flow of the tides. United States v. Pacheco, 2 Wall., 587 [17 L. Ed. 865]; 3 Wash. Real Prop., *634; State v. The Pacific Guano Company, supra. Mr. Washburn, at the page indicated, states the common law rule thus: "If the boundary be a navigable stream, that is, one in which the tide ebbs and flows, the land extends only to the water's edge, or to high-water mark. 5 Wend., 423; 3 Scamm., 520; 7 Conn., 186. And the owner of land bounding on such a stream would have no cause of action against one who, in navigating it, should lay his boat or vessel or raft upon the shore fronting his land, if he has not made improvements upon the same, since the title to the shore is in the state. So a conveyance bounding 'westerly by the beach,' excludes the shore or land between low and high water mark. The same is the rule where the land is bounded by the sea, or an arm of the sea. The space between high and low water mark of the border of the sea is called the 'shore,' and belongs by the common law to the sovereign, precluding, of course, the claim of any other person, unless acquired by grant from the sovereign. The state, in such cases, holds the fee in trust for the public," &c.

This being undoubtedly the common law rule, has it been changed in this state? As there has been some change effected, *from well-known causes, as to what shall be regarded "navigability," we have looked in vain for some authoritative decision changing the law in relation to riparian rights on tidal navigable streams. We find no such case, but, on the contrary, that as late as 1850 it was declared by the late Law Court of Appeals, in McCullough v. Wall (4 Rich., 80 [53 Am. Dec. 715]), "that no authoritative decision has yet been made in this state which has changed the common law on the subject;" and that this exact expression was repeated two years after (1852) in Shands v. Triplet (5 Rich. Eq., 79), in the late Equity Court of Appeals, composed of such judges as Chancellors Johnstone, Dunkin, Dargan, and Wardlaw. By his great industry, the counsel for the defendants found and cited the case of Trapier v. Wilson (2 McCord, 191), which he urged had changed the rule. That was a contest between John T. Wilson and Paul Trapier as to whether there was any vacant land on "North Island"—meaning vacant highlands. The case itself states that "the question was whether the grant to Laroche (under which Mr. Trapier claimed) covered the whole of the island except the salt water marsh, or was it to be located according to the courses and distances set forth in the plat?" It was a simple question of location, the only point being whether the grant covered the upland of the whole island. It was held that the whole island was covered by the grant, and from this it is sought to draw an inference that the court held the doctrine that Trapier, as riparian proprietor, had title down to low-water mark. We cannot perceive that any such decision was involved in the case. The doctrine we are considering was not broached, and neither the common law rule nor the words "high" or "low-water" mark were referred to in the opinion. Judge Richardson, in delivering the judgment, again excepts the marshes. He says: "By the description set forth in the grant, the location is plain and unquestionable. The whole island (unless the marsh be so called) is clearly within it." It seems that in those days, before the discovery of phosphates, salt marsh went for nothing.

*508

It is strongly urged upon us that the line of high water, as a limit to the rights of riparian proprietors on navigable tidal streams, will be uncertain, inconvenient, and difficult of enforcement; that it will be against the settled usage of our people and *an injustice to such of them as live upon the seaboard. We have heard nothing of the "usage" spoken of through the medium of sworn testimony in the case. If the enforcement of the rule (it is no new law or principle) should produce inconvenience, we would most sincerely regret it. But finding it incumbent upon us to decide the question, seeing clearly the rule of the common law, and failing to find any authoritative decision which changes that rule, we must hold that it is now, as it always has been, the law of the state.

*509

Third. By the laws both of the United States and of this state ungranted vacant land is not taxable, and therefore cannot be sold for taxes. It is contended, however, upon this point, that proof tending to show that the marshes were vacant ungranted land at the time of the sale was inadmissible, for the reason that these marshes were included within the boundaries of the tax certificate, which must be taken as affording evidence of the fact "that all the land within the descriptive boundaries mentioned therein was subject to taxation at the date of the execution and delivery of the certificate." We cannot accept this view. The certificate may be conclusive evidence as to some particulars—as, for instance, the regularity and validity of the sale—but it would be against all principle to allow it to give character to lands by simply including them within its boundaries. As was said in the case of Cooke v. Pennington (15 S. C., 194): "It would be a reproach to the administration of justice if a deed executed under these circumstances should be held to prove itself conclusively and to transfer one man's property to another."

But even if such a prima facies existed, it was surely admissible to rebut it by proof. The act of Congress under which the sale took place has been construed to allow the certificate to be annulled by establishing the fact that the property was not subject to taxes. DeTreville v. Smalls, supra. In that case it is said that "the act of 1863 declares that the commissioners' certificate shall be prima facie evidence not only of the regularity of the sale, but also of its validity and of the title of the purchaser; and it enacts that it shall only be affected as evidence of the regularity and validity of the sale by establishing the fact that the property was not subject to taxes, or that the taxes had *been paid previously to the sale, or that the property had been redeemed," &c. Under the act, therefore, proof was allowable tending to show that "the property was not subject to taxes." This could be effected, as was done, by showing that at the time of the sale the marsh lands were vacant lands. The Circuit judge found as matter of fact that the marshes were vacant land at the time of the sale, and we cannot therefore say that he committed error when he held that "as the title to the marshes had never been conveyed by the state (except the one hundred and twenty acres granted to Fripp), the state is now entitled to recover the same."

*510

One of the grounds of appeal complains that the judgment was too uncertain to be enforced and therefore should be set aside. It does not seem to us that there is such uncertainty about it. The judge settled the rights of the parties by declaring that the state, plaintiff, was entitled to recover all the marsh lands except what was included in the grant to Fripp. Of course, that will have to be located, but does not make the judgment uncertain.

The plaintiff complains that the judge committed error in holding that the trespass of the defendants was under an honest but mistaken belief of right instead of being wilful. We are not sure that we have the right, but if we have, we decline to disturb the finding of the judge in the particular indicated.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court, in the case of The State v. C. C. Pinckney, Jr., and also in the case of The State v. William B. Davis, be affirmed.

In these cases there was a petition for a rehearing, upon which the following order was passed:

PER CURIAM. We have carefully considered this petition for a rehearing of the above stated cases. As we understand it, the application is based on two grounds.

First, for the reason as supposed that the court made a mistake in holding that "all the marshes in question are below high-water mark, while the testimony is that a large portion of the marshes are not covered by the ordinary or daily tides." This court did not undertake to decide how much of the marshes lie below high-water mark, but simply to announce the common law *rule as to the rights of riparian proprietors bounding on tidal navigable streams, and to hold that so much of the marshes as lie below that line (whatever it may be) could not pass by the certificate of tax sale which called for tidal navigable streams as boundaries; or, as stated in the decree, "excluding all the marsh lying below that line and subject to the daily ebb and flow of the tide," &c.

*511

Second. That it was a mistake in the court to assume that the Circuit judge (Wallace) found, as a matter of fact, that the marshes were "vacant" at the time of the tax sale in 1863. There was no mistake. As we understand, Judge Wallace did hold that the marshes (with the exception of the portion covered by the grants to Fripp) were "vacant" even down to 1877, and in 1879. In the case of The State v. C. C. Pinckney, Jr., he said: "Windsor, Pengelly, and Freland, all testify that the salt marshes were vacant in 1877. White testifies that Davis, defendant's grantor, refused to pay for rock dug in the marshes in 1879." A finding that the marshes were "vacant" in 1877 or 1879 involved necessarily a finding that they were vacant up to that time, including of course 1863. If vacant in 1877, they must have been vacant in 1863. Land is never again vacant after the title has once passed out of the state. In the case of William B. Davis, Judge Wallace says expressly: "The tax sale certificate does not convey this marsh for the reasons stated in the decree in the case of The State v. Pinckney, Jr., above referred to. It is also in proof that the marshes have not been occupied or held adversely, and were therefore 'vacant' prior to 1863. It is therefore adjudged that the State of South Carolina is the owner and is entitled to recover all the marsh land described in paragraph 47 of the information," &c.

The petition is refused.[1]

[1]These cases have been taken under writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States.—REPORTER.

22 S. C. *512

*WALKER, EVANS & COGSWELL v. BOLLMANN BROS.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸208.]

A complaint by subsequent creditors attacking as fraudulent a prior mortgage, should not be dismissed as insufficient. A prior deed of a debtor may under some circumstances be assailed by a subsequent creditor with notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 631, 633; Dec. Dig. ⟸208.]

[2. Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸8.]

Where a deed or other instrument has been executed by one not in debt at the time, and the deed is founded upon a sufficient consideration, it is invulnerable as to subsequent creditors with notice, as well as to all others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. ⟸8.]

[3. Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸208.]

Before a subsequent creditor can attack a settlement or transfer of a party made when not indebted, he must show that the same was voluntary and was made with reference to future indebtedness, or prove circumstances of fraud other than what arises from its being voluntary.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Bates & Co. v. Cobb, 29 S. C. 403, 7 S. E. 743, 13 Am. St. Rep. 742; Jackson v. Plyler, 38 S. C. 498, 17 S. E. 255, 37 Am. St. Rep. 782; Gentry v. Lanneau, 54 S. C. 516, 32 S. E. 523, 71 Am. St. Rep. 814.

For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 631, 633; Dec. Dig. ⟸208.]

[4. Appeal and Error ⟸991.]

When a Circuit judge in a chancery case has not indicated upon what findings of fact he bases his conclusion of law, this court must pass upon the facts as original questions.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Guckenheimer v. Libbey, 42 S. C. 167, 19 S. E. 999.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3896; Dec. Dig. ⟸991.]

[5. Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸298.]

A bond and mortgage executed between parties closely connected, held, not to have been without consideration, or given with a view to future indebtedness, or attended by circumstances showing fraud upon subsequent creditors, notwithstanding some suspicious conduct between the parties at or about the same time. Mr. Justice McGowan dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 892–895; Dec. Dig. ⟸298.]

[6. Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸205.]

The bond and mortgage being good, plaintiffs cannot attack its subsequent assignment by the mortgagee as collateral security for a debt due by her, or raise any question as to whether the debt so collaterally secured has been paid, both mortgagee and assignee being before the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 624–628; Dec. Dig. ⟸205.]

[7. Appeal and Error ⟸878.]

Where the plaintiff fails to appeal from a finding of fact in a decree which gives him the relief he asks, he is concluded by such finding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3573–3580; Dec. Dig. ⟸878.]

[8. Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸269.]

Where plaintiffs allege in their complaint that property of S. has been fraudulently disposed of by mortgage, the question whether such property is in the hands of S., only as agent of H., cannot be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 789–795; Dec. Dig. ⟸269.]

Before Cothran, J., Marion, April, 1884.

This was an action by Walker, Evans & Cogswell, H. K. & F. B. Thurber & Co., and others, judgment creditors of A. Schafer, against Bollmann Bros., H. Sternberger, L. Sternberger, and A. Schafer, trading under the firm name of A. Schafer, E. Iseman, and E. Sternberger. The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

*513

*The plaintiffs, to maintain the issues on their part, offered in evidence:

1. The judgments obtained by them in the court of trial justice; the transcripts of the same filed in the clerk's office; and the returns of nulla bona, made by the sheriff on the executions.

2. The proceedings before the referee supplementary to the executions, including Judge Hudson's order of February 2, 1884.

3. The certified examination under said order, taken in writing, of A. Schafer, H. Sternberger, B. Bollmann, and E. Iseman, with numerous exhibits, including the mercantile books of A. Schafer, the bond and mortgage of A. Schafer to H. Sternberger, of November 8, 1881; the three notes of Lizzie Sternberger to Bollmann Bros., aggregating $4,500; the accounts current severally of Bollmann Bros. with A. Schafer and Lizzie Sternberger, and the proceedings before trial justice Evans, resulting in judgments in favor of E. W. Percival and Boykin, Carmer & Co. vs. A. Schafer and Lizzie Sternberger sued jointly.

4. The order dated February 23, 1884, made at chambers on the motion to appoint a receiver. The defendants' counsel objected to the introduction of the evidence taken in writing before the referee in supplementary proceedings, upon the grounds: (1) that that is an independent proceeding; and (2) that the parties who testified there being present or procurable, the evidence proposed is not the highest evidence. The objection was sustained. The plaintiffs' counsel were not disposed to risk their case upon the testimony of adverse witnesses and declined to put the defendants upon the stand, but claimed the right, as they are all parties to this suit, to prove by the referee and others, who were present at the examination, the declarations there made by them. I held that this could be done; and to this ruling the defendants by their counsel duly excepted.

A. Q. McDuffie, Esq., the referee, was then sworn, and testified as follows: "I saw H. Sternberger sign this paper" (testimony taken upon the examination). "It was read over to him before he signed it. "Behrend Bollmann also appeared before me and testified as a witness, I took down his testimony, certified it, and believe that" (referring to the written testimony) "to be what he said."

*514

*X by Mr. Harllee: "A good deal of what he said was not taken down. I tried to take down all the material testimony I exercised great care and took down the answers as nearly in the words of the witness as I could. I don't think I read over Bollmann's testimony to him."

X by Mr. Nettles: "There were two examinations of H. Sternberger. I think I read both over to him; he only signed one."

"The corrections (alteration of words) ran through both examinations of H. Sternberger and were made at his instance as read over to him. I think as I said at first that both were read over to him; one follows the other." Again witness said: "As to A. Schafer and E. Iseman's testimony, I have the same to say as in regard to B. Bollmann's." "Schafer speaks indistinctly broken English."

The testimony is too voluminous to make further extracts from it; with my own notes of evidence, it is all in writing and can be taken up if necessary to do so. It consists, besides my notes taken at the trial and the numerous exhibits and books of account, of nearly ninety pages of legal cap, and from a careful and patient consideration of all of it, I have reached certain conclusions, which I shall now proceed to state:

First. The execution of the bond and mortgage by Schafer to H. Sternberger, and by him assigned to Lizzie Sternberger, and by her to Bollmann Brothers, was fraudulent.

Second. The transfer of the same to Bollmann Bros. was without fraud so far as they are concerned, but the three notes made by Lizzie Sternberger and signed by them as accommodation endorsers, were paid by them with her funds as appears by the account current, and at or about the time of their maturity. They were so marked at the time of payment by Bollmann Bros., who had the unquestionable right if they paid them with their own funds, to have cancelled their own endorsements, and to have held them as subsisting claims against Lizzie Sternberger, the maker. Instead of doing this, however, they have marked them paid, and their true and only value now is that of vouchers in their hands, showing the disbursement to that extent of her funds.

The question of application of payments, so earnestly urged at the trial by the counsel for the Sternbergers, is at rest, when*ever it appears that the application has been actually made by the creditor and acquiesced in, as was done in this case; and notwithstanding the fact that there is a balance still due to Bollmann Bros. on the account with Lizzie Sternberger, such can only appear by striking the same at the foot of the account, and the balance so found cannot be referred to the intermediate items of the notes which had been already paid, and such payment destroyed forever the said mortgage as a security in the hands of Bollmann Bros. "When the brains are out the man must die." B. Bollmann said in his testimony concerning these notes, that when they were endorsed, on March 13, 1882, the several amounts were charged up to Lizzie Sternberger on her account current; that the rule of their house is the same as to endorsements and acceptances.

*515

This does not appear to me to be in conformity with the rule of law upon the subject or with the approved custom of merchants. The relations between the endorser and the endorsee, and between the acceptor and the drawer, are altogether different. In the former it is not the reasonable expectation of the endorser to be compelled to pay. In the latter the acceptor can expect nothing else, for the very fact of accepting implies the possession of funds of the drawer for that purpose, and in such case it is proper to charge up to the drawer the amount of the acceptance—not so, however, in the case of endorsement; and not withstanding the fact that in law the act of endorsement is an acknowledgment of pecuniary liability to the endorsee, and in order to preserve his credit and prevent protest the endorser does pay promptly and punctually, it is not in his original contemplation to do so.

The testimony of B. Bollmann that these notes were paid with the funds of Bollmann Bros. must be regarded as but little, if anything, more than a mere play upon words, for it clearly appears, from their own entries on the account current, that at the maturity of the two notes first due they were in funds of Lizzie Sternberger by remittances of cash for the exact amounts and at the precise times, and as to the third note that they were at its maturity partially in funds of hers, and soon afterwards fully so. It is most probable that Pelzer, Rodgers & Co., the *endorsees of said notes, were paid with funds of the bank upon the checks of Bollmann Bros. It is needless, however, to speculate upon this point. It is quite enough that the fact appears that Bollmann Bros. were in funds belonging to the maker of the notes.

*516

Third. It is contended by the plaintiffs that Bollmann Bros. should make up to the creditors of Schafer the difference between the appraised value of the stock of goods and the amount realized at the sale. I do not find in the connection that Bollmann Bros. have had with this matter enough to warrant the allowance of this demand, even if there were any proof upon this point to guide me to a satisfactory conclusion. I have already held that the transfer of the bond and mortgage to Bollmann Bros. was without fraud on their part; this, however, should be limited to the fact of transfer. They have not been blameless in the use which they have allowed to be made of this mortgage in the hands of E. Iseman. It is certainly extraordinary that, holding an unpaid demand of nearly $2,000 against Schafer, they should consent to his financial destruction by seizing and selling his only means of paying their demand for the purpose of applying all the property of their insolvent debtor, thus made more insolvent, to the payment of the debt of another debtor of theirs whose credit with them is good, and whose means of paying her own debts are not questioned. Besides, the sale of the goods was altogether satisfactory as to prices, and was greatly desired by the plaintiffs; and if Schafer and his alleged allies are capable of committing a tithe of the fraud charged, the plaintiffs should be satisfied with the result of the sale, even had it been at a sacrifice, which they do not pretend is the case. Bollmann Bros. therefore cannot be thus charged, and the measure of their liability in this suit will be fixed when the matter of apportioning the costs comes to be made.

Fourth. As to the alleged partnership between Schafer and the Sternbergers. Upon this point there is a great deal of testimony, much of it tending to show that Schafer was a very facile instrument in their hands; the mercantile books were very inartificially kept; the business was loosely and ill conducted; but I am unable to reach the conclusion that there was any partnership after the alleged dissolution between the parties.

*517

*Fifth. As to the purchase by E. Sternberger of the live-stock and wagons from A. Schafer shortly before the seizure of the stock by E. Iseman. The only direct proof upon this point is to the effect that said sale was bona fide, and there is nothing to the contrary except the suspicious circumstances of (1) proximity of time; (2) the relationship of the parties; and (3) the final catastrophe. These are not enough to warrant more than a presumption of fraud. The law makes no exception even in favor of strong presumption. The rule is inflexible. Fraud must be proved. It cannot be presumed. The proof is insufficient.

I have thus endeavored to dispose of the various issues presented in this case as briefly as I could to be perspicuous; but at much greater length than I desired. There are very few questions of law in the case, and these are of easy and familiar application when the facts are determined. The counsel for the defendants earnestly insisted that this case should fall within the operation of the principle recently established in this state in the case of Hirshkind v. Israel (18 S. C., 157), as to the retention of possession by the mortgagor of a stock of goods after condition broken. It could not have been the intention of the court in that case to make of such mortgages a favored class. On the contrary, the retention of possession was held in express terms to be a badge of fraud —a presumption against the validity of the mortgage; but it was as far from the purpose of the court to hold that such a transaction was sacred as that it was per se fraudulent. In short, the rule deducible from that case is, that in order to determine whether the mortgage is fraudulent or not, all of the circumstances must be taken into consideration. I have endeavored to do so in this case, and have attained the conclusions above set forth.

It would not be proper, however, to conclude this decree without adverting to the supplementary proceedings hereinbefore referred to. This matter has not been presented to me in such shape as to enable me to pass intelligently upon it. The order of February 23, 1884, under which this suit was instituted, has been already enlarged beyond the scope of said order, which was meant to make up and try the issues as to the validity of the bond and mortgage of November 8, 1881. At the trial, a ques*tion was suggested as to Schafer's right to a personal exemption of $500 in the personal property sold, in the event that the conclusions herein expressed should be attained. Under an intimation from the court that this, with possibly other matters pertaining to the supplementary proceedings, should be more appropriately determined when the said proceedings come up for consideration, counsel desisted, and it is but fair and just that any interest that Schafer may have therein should not be prejudiced by this decree.

*518

In the multitude of matters involved in this case, and the wide range which it has taken, I omitted to state at the proper place in the decree that during the trial a motion was made in behalf of Lizzie Sternberger to amend her answer so as to set up a claim to the assigned bond and mortgage, if it should appear that the notes to Bollmann Bros., had been paid off by her. The motion was refused for obvious reasons, which I will not here repeat, and her counsel duly excepted. Reference may be made to the sections of the code upon the subjects, especially section 194, and to Dunsford v. Brown, 19 S. C., 565.

Wherefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed as follows:

1. That the transaction of November 8, 1881, between A. Schafer and H. Sternberger, and the assignment of the latter of the bond and mortgage of Schafer to Lizzie Sternberger, and by her of the same to Bollmann Bros., was fraudulent, and that said bond and mortgage are null and void, and must be delivered up to the clerk of this court, to be by him cancelled.

2. That the three notes of Lizzie Sternberger, bearing date March 1, 1882, payable to the order of Bollmann Bros., at seven, eight, and nine months after date respectively, and aggregating $4,500, have been paid and satisfied with funds of the said Lizzie Sternberger.

3. That the proceeds of the sale of the stock of goods in the store at Little Rock, now in the hands of the sheriff, be disbursed pro rata amongst the plaintiffs and such other creditors of A. Schafer as may present and prove their demands before A. Q. McDuffie, master, to whom a reference for that purpose is hereby ordered.

4. That the costs herein be taxed by the clerk of this court *according to law, and when ascertained, that judgments for the same be entered against the defendants, Herman Sternberger, Lizzie Sternberger, and Bollmann Bros.; such judgments against Bollmann Bros. to be enforced only in the event that said costs cannot be made out of the said Sternbergers, or either of them. That in said taxation, costs be allowed to the defendant, E. Sternberger, but not to the defendant, E. Iseman, who must pay his own costs.

*519

The defendants appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because his honor erred in permitting to be read and used in evidence in the case, on the ground that the same could be regarded as admissions, certain notes of testimony taken by the master in a supplementary proceeding, in which neither the parties nor the issues were the same as in this action; which notes included the testimony of witnesses not parties to this action, and of parties not so connected as to make the admission of one evidence against the others, consisted solely and entirely of narratives of matters and things past and gone, and were permitted to be introduced and read upon the master saying upon oath "that the testimony taken by him and certified to contained, he believed, what was said by the witness at the time; that his memory was poor, and he could not testify from his recollection what was said, but could say that he took down at the time what was said, or the most of what was said, and the notes contained what he took down."

2. Because his honor erred in entertaining this action, and in holding that plaintiffs had the right to assail "the transactions of November 8, 1881 (to wit: the bond and mortgage of A. Schafer and the bill of sale of H. Sternberger of that date, and recorded November 10, 1881), they not being creditors of either A. Schafer or H. Sternberger at the time, and their claims in this action being against A. Schafer alone, and not dating back further than the summer or fall of 1883.

3. Because his honor erred in holding as matter of law that the defendants, Bollman Bros., when they paid the three notes of L. Sternberger, of date March 1, 1882, upon which they were accommodation endorsers, and marked the same paid, thereby *deprived themselves of all right to continue to hold the bond and mortgage in question in this action as collateral security.

*520

4. Because his honor erred in holding that said three notes were paid by L. Sternberger with her own funds, and that under the testimony Bollmann Bros. could not be permitted to claim that they had applied the money sent them by L. Sternberger to their unsecured open account against her.

5. Because his honor erred in refusing to allow defendants to introduce evidence to show that subsequent to the assignment of the bond and mortgage in question to Bollmann Bros., there was an understanding and agreement whereby the said bond and mortgage were to be held by Bollmann Bros. as collateral to secure, not only the said three notes, but all advances made, or that might be made, by them to said L. Sternberger.

6. Because his honor having refused to permit the introduction of said testimony on the ground that the same would not be responsive to any allegation in the answer, erred in refusing to allow defendants so to amend their answer as to lay the ground required by his honor for the introduction of said testimony.

7. Because his honor erred in holding the bond and mortgage in question to be fraudulent and void ab initio; such conclusion being not only not supported by the evidence, but contrary to the same.

8. Because his honor erred in holding as a conclusion of fact that the assignment of the bond and mortgage in question to L. Sternberger by H. Sternberger was fraudulent and void.

9. Because his honor erred in entertaining the question as to the validity of the said assignment in this action, the plaintiffs not being creditors of either H. or L. Sternberger, and having no right to ask for an adjudication as to the validity of said assignment.

10. Because his honor erred in refusing to permit L. Sternberger to so amend her answer as to claim as her own absolutely the bond and mortgage in question, in case it should be held that Bollmann Bros. had lost their right to hold the same as collateral security, it having been held by his honor that she could not make such claim her answer as it stood.

11. Because his honor erred in adjudging that the bond and *mortgage in question should be delivered up and cancelled; the same being, under the testimony in the case and the law applicable to the same, even if no longer collaterals in the hands of Bollmann Bros., a valid and subsisting claim against A. Schafer, and the property of either L. Sternberger or H. Sternberger, and because it was error not so to hold and adjudge.

*521

Messrs. Boyd & Nettles and W. W. Harllee, for appellants, cited 1 Story Eq. Jur., §§ 199, 200, 203; 9 Ala., 662; 44 Am. Dec., 452; 14 Ga., 207; 58 Am. Dec., 559; Adams' Eq., 176, note; Pom. Eq. Jur., § 968; 13 S. C., 253; 16 Id., 360; 20 Id., 46; Pom. Rem., §§ 566, 670–2; 13 S. C., 23, 401; Greenl. Evid., §§ 111, 178; 9 Rich. Eq., 431; 8 Rich., 292; 11 Id., 52; 2 Hill, Ch., 617; 1 Id., 121; Jones Ch. Mort., §§ 345, 346, 503, 638; 19 S. C., 385; 17 Id., 499.

Messrs. Johnson & Johnson and C. A. Woods, contra, cited Code, § 312, ¶ 5, 315, 316, 319; Riddle Supp. Proc., 7–9, 52–55, 102, 134, 162, 177, 238; 19 S. C., 565.

April 22, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The prominent features of this proceeding, taken from the voluminous "Case," and the statements in the decree of his honor, the Circuit judge, may be presented as follows:

The defendant, A. Schafer, sometime previous to November 8, 1881, was doing business as a merchant at Little Rock, Marion County, under the name, A. Schafer & Co., the defendant, Lizzie Sternberger, and one Wieselthier being his partners. Sometime in 1878, the two last named retired from the business, and the defendant, H. Sternberger, the husband of Lizzie, took their place, the business still continuing under the name of A. Schafer & Co. On November 8, 1881, it appears from the papers then executed, and hereinafter mentioned, that H. Sternberger sold out to Schafer for $2,785, payable in two equal annual installments, the first on November 8, 1882, and the second November 8, 1883, with interest from the date of sale, payable annually until the whole amount is paid. Upon this sale Schafer executed a bond *in the sum of five thousand dollars, and a mortgage of the stock of goods then on hand, with such other supplies and additions as he might from time to time make thereto in the course of his business, to secure the payment of the purchase money, one of the conditions expressed in the mortgage being that, until default be made, the said Schafer was to remain in possession, with power to sell, renew, and recruit the same, unless the said H. Sternberger, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall sooner choose to demand the same, and, until such demand, the possession of the said Schafer to be deemed the possession of an agent for the sole benefit of the said H. Sternberger, his duty being to sell, renew, and to recruit the said stock of goods and merchandise, as may be required by, and appertain to, the business of a country merchant, applying the profit of the same to the mortgage debt. This mortgage, after probate, was duly recorded in R. M. C., Marion County, on November 16, 1881. At the time that Schafer executed the bond and mortgage aforesaid, which are the papers now in controversy, Schafer had no other creditor, or at least none other has presented himself. On January 3, 1882, H. Sternberger assigned the said bond and mortgage to his wife, Lizzie Sternberger, at its full value as it is alleged, less 12 per cent., who afterwards, in March, 1882, assigned them to the defendants, Bollmann Bros., as collateral to secure the payment of three notes of hers to the said Bollmann Bros., one for $1,000, one for $1,500, and the other for $2,000. After the execution of these papers, Schafer continued in business at the old stand under the name of A. Schafer, until about the commencement of this suit, and during this time he contracted the debts claimed by the plaintiffs.

*522

In January, 1884, some two months after default of the mortgagor to pay the last instalment of purchase money secured by bond and mortgage, Bollmann Bros., who then held the mortgage as assignees of Lizzie Sternberger, sent up their chief clerk, the defendant, E. Iseman, to seize the stock of goods, who immediately took possession and advertised them for sale, after taking stock. The plaintiffs, becoming alarmed at this state of things, instituted suit before a trial justice, and having shown sufficient grounds for apprehending the loss of their debts, if judgments *were delayed the usual time, the trial justice rendered judgments at a short ened period—all of which was resisted strenuously by the defendant Schafer.

*523

These plaintiffs, immediately after obtaining judgments, made application, based on affidavits, for supplementary proceedings before Judge Hudson, who granted an order requiring the said A. Schafer, Bollmann Bros., E. Iseman, and H. Sternberger, to appear before A. Q. McDuffie, Esq., master for said county, on a certain day therein named, for examination as to the property of the said Schafer & Co., at the same time granting an injunction restraining the said A. Schafer, Bollmann Bros., and E. Iseman from assigning, or in any way disposing of, said property until the further order of the court, upon condition, however, that plaintiffs should give the bond ordered within ten days. Upon the report of Mr. McDuffie, with affidavits, the plaintiffs then made a motion, after notice, before Judge Cothran, for the appointment of a receiver, until such time as plaintiffs could commence action, who, hearing the motion on February 23, 1884, passed an order directing the sheriff of Marion County to take possession of the property and proceed to sell, for cash, on the 26th inst., at the store in Little Rock, at which time and place they had already been advertised to be sold by Bollmann Bros., under the mortgage, and that he hold the proceeds subject to the further order of the court. And he further ordered that the judgment creditors of A. Schafer, for their own benefit, and of all creditors who may come in and contribute to the expenses, have leave to commence their action against A. Schafer, H. Sternberger, L. Sternberger, Bollmann Bros., and E. Sternberger, or any of them, or others as they may be advised, for the purpose of testing the validity of the mortgage given by Schafer to H. Sternberger, and the assignments thereof; and also for the recovery of certain other property alleged to have been placed in the hands of E. Sternberger by Schafer. Whereupon the action below was commenced.

The complaint alleges in substance: 1. That the plaintiffs are judgment creditors of Schafer, with executions returned unsatisfied. 2. That after November 8, 1881, the mercantile business at Little Rock, though carried on in the name of A. Schafer, was *really the business of H. Sternberger, L. Sternberger, and the said A. Schafer, as copartners, and that the debts due the plaintiffs were contracted under the firm name of A. Schafer, for the firm, with many other debts. 3. The execution of the bond and mortgage in question is admitted, but it is alleged that they were pretensive, and the incipient steps of a scheme of fraud. Further, that the assignment thereof by H. Sternberger to his wife was without consideration, and for the purpose of fraud. But if the assignment was valid, the same has been paid so far as Bollmann Bros., are concerned, the three notes of L. Sternberger having been fully paid by Mrs. Sternberger. That Bollmann Bros. knew this when they attempted to foreclose the mortgage by seizing the goods, which therefore was aiding the fraud. 4. That the defendants conspired to foreclose the mortgage when a full stock of goods had just been brought in, at the expense of plaintiffs and other creditors who furnished the goods. 5. That just before the seizure of the goods, A. Schafer had turned over to E. Sternberger certain property of the value of $300, not covered by the mortgage, by way of preparation and consummation of the fraud intended.

*524

Upon this complaint judgment was demanded: 1. That the bond and mortgage, together with the assignments thereof, be declared invalid, fraudulent, and void. 2. If not invalid and void ab initio, that they be adjudged paid and satisfied. 3. That the net proceeds of the sale be paid over to the creditors hereto. 4. That defendants, Bollmann Bros., be required to make up the difference between the net proceeds of sale and the value of the goods as inventoried. 5. That it be adjudged that H. Sternberger, L. Sternberger, and A. Schafer are, and have been, partners under the name of A. Schafer, and that plaintiffs' judgments be decreed to have lien against them as such. 6. That the defendant, E. Sternberger, be ordered to surrender the property turned over to him, or to account for its value. And lastly for costs and disbursements.

All of the defendants answered—some with demurrer, and others by answer alone. The demurrers, however, were withdrawn, and the case went to trial upon the issues raised in the *pleadings, all of the defendants having emphatically denied the charges of fraud.

*525

As to the alleged partnership between Schafer and the Sternbergers, to use the language of the decree, the judge "was unable to reach the conclusion that there was any partnership after the alleged dissolution between the parties," November 8, 1881. As to the purchase, by E. Sternberger, of the live-stock and other property, said to have been turned over to him by Schafer just before the seizure of the stock of goods, he held that the proof was insufficient to impeach its bona fides. As to the validity of the bond and mortgage, he found: "That the execution of these papers by Schafer to H. Sternberger, and by him assigned to Lizzie Sternberger, and by her to Bollmann Bros., was fraudulent." That the transfer of the same to Bollmann Bros. was without fraud, so far as they are concerned, but the three notes made by Lizzie Sternberger, and signed by them as accommodation endorsers, were paid by them with her funds, &c.; and that this payment having been made by the application of such funds by the creditors, any further application was at rest. As to the demand that Bollmann Bros. should make up to the creditors the difference between the appraised value of the stock of goods, and the amount realized at the sale, he held that while Bollmann Bros. were not blameless in the use of the mortgage in the hands of Iseman, yet they were without fraud in the transfer, and therefore this claim could not be allowed.

The appeal of the defendants raises several questions: 1. As to the competency of certain testimony, which will be considered if necessary, as we get further along. 2. That his honor erred in entertaining this action, in which parties who were not creditors of Schafer until some year or more after the execution and recording of the bond and mortgage in question are attempting to impeach them for fraud. 3. In holding said papers fraudulent and void ab initio. 4. That he erred in entertaining the question of the validity of the assignment by H. Sternberger to his wife, raised by parties who were not creditors of either, and in holding that said assignment was fraudulent and void. 5. That he erred in holding that Bollmann Bros., even if the three notes mentioned have been paid, could not still continue to claim the *mortgage as collateral to other debts of L. Sternberger, and in refusing to allow defendants to introduce evidence to show that such was the understanding of the parties, and in refusing to permit defendants to amend their answers so as to make such evidence competent. 6. That he erred in ordering the bond and mortgage to be delivered up and cancelled, instead of allowing L. Sternberger to claim under it, if Bollmann Bros. had lost the right to do so.

*526

The main question in the case, and the one around which all the others cluster, is as to the validity of the bond and mortgage. This meets us at the threshold and will be first considered in connection with the subsidiary question, whether these plaintiffs being subsequent creditors with notice can impeach these instruments. We do not think that the complaint should have been dismissed upon this latter ground. We mean to say that there is no authority for the position that a subsequent creditor with notice can, under no circumstances, assail a prior deed of his debtor. On the contrary, we think that this might be done under certain circumstances (Iley and Wife v. Niswanger, 1 McCord Eq. 518; Henderson v. Dodd, Bail. Eq., 139, to be more particularly referred to hereafter); and therefore that the Circuit judge was not in error in refusing to dismiss the complaint solely on that ground.

The question, however, now arises, when and under what circumstances can such attack be made by a creditor occupying such a position towards his debtor? This perhaps will be better understood by considering when and under what circumstances an existing creditor or a subsequent creditor without notice can resort to equity for such purpose. Deeds and mortgages or other conveyances may be executed by one in debt without consideration and therefore voluntary, and yet be bona fide. Or they may be executed without consideration, with the view to hinder and delay creditors, by putting the property beyond the reach of creditors. Or, again, they may be executed upon a sufficient and valuable consideration and yet be not bona fide, being induced by some benefit obtained by the debtor as the price of the preference given to the special creditor.

Those of the first class are not void ab initio, but they may be *avoided afterwards by existing creditors, if, after establishing their debt and exhausting their legal remedies, they find it necessary to resort to the property conveyed on the ground that all of a debtor's property being liable for his debts he must be just before he is generous. It is a misnomer, however, to attach the term fraudulent to such a deed, as such deeds are often made upon the highest and most praiseworthy motives and as absolutely free from fraud as any deed, though based upon the most valuable consideration. But while this is so as to existing creditors, subsequent creditors with notice can certainly have no such right. The property having passed to the donee before the creditor has become a creditor, he can have no claim upon it either in law or morals.

*527

Those of the second class are void ab initio as to subsisting creditors with or without notice; but if there be no subsisting creditors, such a case could not arise, as the condition suggested is that the deed be voluntary and made to hinder and delay creditors, which could not take place if there were no creditors to be delayed or hindered. The same may be said as to the last class, because, if there be no voluntary creditors, such a deed and for such purpose could not be made. There is still another principle which applies to all deeds and instruments which are required to be recorded, and this brings in subsequent creditors, the law holding such deeds, if unrecorded, void as to subsequent creditors without notice.

The case at bar does not belong to either of these classes. It does not fall under the first for the reason that the plaintiffs were not existing creditors at the time of the execution of the bond and mortgage, a fact which is not denied. It does not fall under the second or third because there were no existing creditors to be hindered or delayed, and therefore these papers could not have been executed for that purpose. Nor does it fall under the last, because the mortgage was duly recorded, and therefore the plaintiffs had legal notice.

It would seem, then, that where a deed or other instrument has been executed by one not in debt at the time and the deed is founded upon a sufficient consideration, it is invulnerable as to subsequent creditors with notice as well as to all others. Nor as *a general rule can a voluntary conveyance, made under such circumstances, be avoided by subsequent creditors with notice. Lord Hardwicke said in the case of Russel v. Hammond (1 Atk., 19), "that a voluntary settlement is not fraudulent where the person making is not indebted at the time, nor will subsequent debts shake such settlement." This court, through Nott, J., said the same in the case of Iley and Wife v. Niswanger, supra, and such no doubt is the law for obvious reasons. Judge O'Neall, in the case of Eigleberger v. Kibler (1 Hill Eq., 121 [26 Am. Dec. 192]), said: "If he is a creditor at all, he is a subsequent one with notice, and as such he can have no ground upon which he can say that the gift is a fraud upon him, upon the conclusive ground that all the right of the debtor to the property has passed to his donee long anterior to the debt, and therefore that the creditor could have no ground, either legal or equitable, on which he could found a claim for relief."

*528

This, beyond doubt, is the established general rule, but as with most general rules there are exceptions. Lord Hardwicke, in the case of Stileman v. Ashdown (2 Atk., 481), said: "It is not necessary that a man should actually be indebted at the time he enters into a voluntary settlement to make it fraudulent; for if a man does it with a view to his being indebted at a future time, it is equally fraudulent and ought to be set aside." Judge Nott, in the case of Iley and Wife v. Niswanger, supra, speaking of voluntary settlements, said: "Such a settlement or transfer, I take it, cannot be impeached by a subsequent creditor unless made with a view of future indebtedness or attended with some circumstance of fraud other than what arises from its being voluntary." See, also, the case of Henderson v. Dodd, Bail. Eq., 140, to the same point. Before, then, subsequent creditors can attack a settlement or transfer of a party made when not indebted, he must show that the same was voluntary and was made with reference to future indebtedness or prove circumstances of fraud other than what arises from its being voluntary.

Now, the question arises, did the plaintiffs here bring themselves under this principle? We do not know upon what precise grounds the Circuit judge declared the mortgage in question void. He said in general terms that he had reached the conclu*sion that it was fraudulent, null, and void, and he ordered it on that account to be delivered up and cancelled. But whether upon the ground that it was voluntary, and had been executed with a view to future indebtedness, or was accompanied with other insignia of fraud than such as would arise from its being voluntary merely, does not appear. Now, waiving the question whether these plaintiffs, coming in as acknowledged subsequent creditors to attack a deed of their debtor made when he was free from debt, and on that account occupying an exceptional position, should not have made charges in their complaint of a specific character warranting such an attack, we are disposed to look at the case as we now find it and to consider it as if the necessary averments were in the complaint, applying the principles laid down above. First, then, is there any sufficient evidence that the bond and mortgage were without consideration and therefore voluntary? Second, if so, were they executed by Schafer with the view of future indebtedness? Or was their execution attended with circumstances of fraud other than what arises from their being voluntary?

*529

In the examination of the testimony bearing upon these questions we do not feel ourselves governed by the usual rule, when a finding of fact by the Circuit judge is brought up for review, for the reason stated above, that we are unable to determine what precise questions of fact were found by the Circuit judge, as involved in the general finding of fraud. In other words, we do not know, from the decree, whether or not his honor considered this case as one by subsequent creditors, attacking a voluntary deed of their debtor made when he was not in debt, and therefore bound to prove that the deed was voluntary, and that it was made with a view to future indebtedness, or was attended with other circumstances, showing a fraud upon such subsequent creditors; or whether he interpreted the testimony, under the principles of law applicable to a deed executed with existing creditors at the time above referred to. Had the Circuit judge found upon these questions distinctly, then the rule referred to would be applicable; but in the absence of such distinct finding, the questions are open, and we must necessarily draw our conclu*sions from the entire testimony as original questions. To what conclusions does this testimony lead us?

*530

1st. Was the bond and mortgage without consideration, and therefore voluntary? It seems to be conceded that, early in 1878, A. Schafer commenced merchandising at Little Rock, with L. Sternberger and one Wieselthier as his partners, under the firm name of A. Schafer & Co. This concern continued in business but a short time, a few months only, when L. Sternberger and Wieselthier retired, and H. Sternberger took their place. Wieselthier had put in no capital, but Schafer and L. Sternberger had invested something over $900 each. H. Sternberger bought out the share of his wife at $977.93, as he testifies, just what she put in, when the business continued under the same name until November 8, 1881, when a notice was put up at the door of a dissolution, and the papers in question were executed, and Schafer continued thereafter in his own name. Judge Cothran has found that there was no partnership after that date.

Now, in the face of these facts, of which there is positive testimony without contradiction, can it be said that the bond and mortgage had no consideration? Before the dissolution H. Sternberger had an interest as partner; after the dissolution A. Schafer retained possession of the entire stock, and executed the bond and mortgage, H. Sternberger having executed to him a bill of sale of his interest in the goods, &c. There is no intimation from any quarter that, before November 8, 1881, Schafer was sole owner. He was sole owner, however, immediately afterwards. How did he become so, except in the transaction referred to? For what other reason could these papers have been executed? They certainly on their face consummated a sale of H. Sternberger's interest, if he had any, and in the absence of all testimony showing that he had no interest, we must conclude that there was a purchase by Schafer, which constituted the consideration of the bond and mortgage. It is true the sum agreed to be given was not clearly explained. There was some confusion as to the mode of ascertaining this amount; but whether it was too much or too little, how could parties, who were not creditors of either at the time, complain?

These papers, then, having been founded upon a considera*tion, and there being no existing creditors interested, is not that an end of the case? Is there any law which allows subsequent creditors with notice, to attack, and set aside for fraud, a conveyance founded upon a consideration satisfactory to the parties, and made at a time when the grantor was free from debt? We know of none. The ground upon which such conveyances are subject to attack, either at common law or under the statute of Elizabeth, or under the recent assignment act, is that some unlawful preference has been given to some creditor; but how can there be a preference when there are no creditors?

*531

Assuming, however, that we are mistaken in the conclusion that the bond and mortgage were based upon a consideration, does the testimony show that they were executed with a view to future indebtedness by Schafer, or was the execution attended by any other circumstance showing fraud? We do not well see how there could have been any view of future indebtedness by Schafer. The mortgage was immediately put upon record in the proper office, and the proper county. There was no evidence of any concealment. An advertisement was posted on the door of the store, that a dissolution had taken place. There is nothing whatever, in the testimony, showing that Schafer was preparing to enlarge his credit, by contracting new debts in the future. On the contrary, by the terms of the mortgage, which covered not only the stock on hand but all subsequent accretions, and which was published to the world by its record, it would rather seem that he could not have expected to buy in the future on a credit, with no property himself, except that covered by mortgage, and with a statement put upon a public record that all he might acquire afterwards would also go under this mortgage, and be first liable for its payment. If he was preparing for future indebtedness, and fixing a trap for his future creditors, he certainly neither screened its entrance, nor enticed them by any device to walk in; and if any have been deceived and caught, they can hardly lay the blame on the mortgage.

Were there any circumstances attendant on the execution of the mortgage showing fraud? We have found nothing unusual in connection with this execution. It was properly attested, and was probated on the same day, and recorded within a few days *thereafter. There was a good deal of testimony as to Schafer's conduct about the time, and a short time before the seizure of the goods by Bollmann Bros., in reference to the house being built on the store lot, the paints and other materials for this house; but all this was a year or more after the execution of these papers, and while they reflect upon Schafer and the Sternbergers, with reference to these matters, they have no reference to the question now under discussion. And there is some suspicion, too, growing out of the rapid and frequent change of partnerships, transmissions of goods and books and accounts from Darlington to Little Rock, back and forth, varied with the assignment of these important papers, first from H. Sternberger to his wife, Lizzie, and from her to Bollmann Bros. But when all this is fully analyzed, we have not been able to find sufficient evidence upon which to say that the bond and mortgage were executed without consideration, or with the view to future indebtedness, or with attending circumstances showing fraud upon these plaintiffs, who were not then in existence as creditors. Therefore we think there was error in the finding of his honor below, that they were fraudulent and null and void.

*532

As to the assignment of these papers by H. Sternberger to his wife, and by her to Bollmann Bros. Since we have reached the conclusion that the evidence is not sufficient to invalidate said original papers, as between Schafer and H. Sternberger, we cannot see how the plaintiffs, who are neither creditors of the Sternbergers nor of Bollmann Bros., can have any interest in the question. The creditors of H. Sternberger existing at the time of the assignment to his wife, if any, might be interested, but how the creditors of Schafer could call in question the transaction is not apparent.

Nor, in that view, does it make any difference whether the notes of Lizzie Sternberger given to Bollmann Bros., and which were secured by her assignment of the bond and mortgage as collateral, had been paid by her funds, or the funds of Bollmann Bros.; because, whether paid by the one or the other, the mortgage would still exist. Nor can the plaintiffs complain that Bollmann Bros. have attempted to enforce it. They are in possession, and whether thus in possession as a security for the money *which they claim to have paid to Pelzer, Rodgers & Co. on the notes, or as security for the accounts against Lizzie Sternberger on their books, might be a question for Lizzie Sternberger, but she is before the court and does not deny the right of Bollmann Bros.

*533

The Circuit judge found that there was no partnership existing between any of these parties after November 8, 1881. This finding has not been appealed from by the plaintiffs; therefore the question urged in argument, that the claims of plaintiffs should be established against Schafer, H. Sternberger, and Lizzie Sternberger, is not before us. Nor can the more serious question, whether under the terms of the mortgage Schafer was not in possession simply as agent of H. Sternberger, and therefore all debts contracted by him in filling up the store were Sternberger's debts, be properly considered by us.

The plaintiffs taking the other view that these debts were Schafer's debts, and that the property embraced in the mortgage was Schafer's property, have sought to brush aside the mortgage and to enforce their claims established against Schafer through the property which they claim to be his; and it is too late now in this proceeding to change front and make a new attack.

If there was any undue haste, or any suspicious delay on the part of Bollmann Bros. in seizing the property, or any purpose to sacrifice it at an inauspicious sale so as not to reach beyond the mortgage to plaintiffs' claims, such object has been met and thwarted by the order of the Circuit Court putting the property in the hands of an officer of the court and ordering the sale to be made by him. This, under the circumstances, seems to have been proper, and should not now be disturbed. The proceeds of sale are now in the hands of the court, and should be paid out—first, in satisfaction of the mortgage; and then, if any over, to be distributed pro rata amongst the plaintiffs and such other creditors of A. Schafer as may present and prove their demands under the reference ordered. And to this end the judgment below in conflict with this should be reversed.

It is not necessary to discuss the question as to the competency of certain testimony admitted by the Circuit judge or any other than those already passed upon.

*534

*It is the judgment of this court that the judgment below be reversed, except as to the reference ordered, and that the case be remanded to be carried out in accordance with the opinion herein above.

Mr. Justice McIVER concurred.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I cannot concur in this judgment. As the facts impress me, the Circuit judge reached the equities of the case. I consider that the firm which did business at Little Rock as A. Schafer & Co. was never actually dissolved, but in reality continued to be the firm of A. Schafer and H.

Sternberger, and that the bond and mortgage to Sternberger for his alleged interest in the concern were pretensive, fraudulent, and void as to subsequent as well as subsisting creditors. Indeed, in the view that there never was in fact any dissolution, there could not be in the proper sense of the term any subsequent creditors. The property covered by the alleged mortgage was "a stock of goods," which, by the express authority of Sternberger, the alleged mortgagee, was being changed every day by contracting new debts for new goods. I cannot agree that these new goods so purchased shall go to the old claim of Sternberger, to the exclusion of the very debts contracted in their purchase.

---

22 S. C. 534

OLIVER v. FOWLER.

(November Term, 1884.)

1. In proceedings for the enforcement of a mechanic's lien, the findings of fact by the Circuit judge approved.

[2. Appearance ⟸20.]

The right to enforce a mechanic's lien may be prosecuted either by service of summons and petition (in which case no order of court is necessary) or else by filing the petition and obtaining from the court an order of notice to the owner.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Tenney v. Anderson Water, Light & Power Co., 67 S. C. 15, 45 S. E. 111.

For other cases, see Appearance, Cent. Dig. § 92; Dec. Dig. ⟸20.]

[3. Mechanics' Liens ⟸260.]

When a petition to enforce a mechanic's lien is filed, the action is commenced; and if filed within the time limited, the proceedings cannot be dismissed upon the ground that it was not commenced in time, even though the summons only was served.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 465; Dec. Dig. ⟸260.]

[4. Process ⟸167.]

If an order of court was necessary to make the service, answering to the merits waived such a requirement, and the defendant thereby sub*mitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court, even though in his answer he reserved the right to move to dismiss the proceeding for want of proper service.

*535

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Meinhard Bros. v. Youngblood, 37 S. C. 236, 15 S. E. 950, 16 S. E. 771; Ex parte Keeler, 45 S. C. 559, 23 S. E. 865, 31 L. R. A. 678, 55 Am. St. Rep. 785; Willoughby v. Northeastern R. R. Co., 46 S. C. 322, 24 S. E. 308.

For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. § 256; Dec. Dig. ⟸167.]

[5. Mechanics' Liens ⟸202.]

The assignee of a mechanic's claim for labor and material has the right to enforce the lien given by the statute to the assignor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 375; Dec. Dig. ⟸202.]

Before Pressley, J., Spartanburg, October, 1884.

The opinion states the case. The order of the Circuit judge was as follows:

This is an action by summons and petition to enforce a mechanic's lien. The case was heard in 1880 by Judge Fraser, and he, without a final decision, directed advertisement by the clerk for other lien creditors, none of whom have filed any claims. Plaintiff proved work done by her husband on defendant's house, for which he had agreed to pay $262. The work was done according to contract, and was accepted by his architect and by himself. Before the work was done, plaintiff advanced to her husband the sum of $275 of her own money, and to secure the same she afterwards took an assignment of said lien, which had been entered in the clerk's office according to law. Defendant insists that said assignment was collusive and fraudulent, but there is no proof of that before me.

He also alleges and proves that plaintiff's petition was not filed in the clerk's office as a commencement of this action; also that the service of plaintiff's summons was not lawfully made with the petition. No motion was made to set aside said service before the filing of defendant's answer. It was also claimed by defendant that said work was neither an erection, alteration, or repair, and further that a just and true account of the amount due had not been filed with the lien. I ruled that defendant, after answering, had thereby waived all defects in the manner of service of the summons and petition and the return thereon. I also overruled the other points raised by the defendant. The work done is clearly an alteration of the building, and the account filed with the lien is sufficient.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that plaintiff have judgment against defendant for the sum of $262, with the proper costs of this action, and to enforce payment of the same, that F. *M. Trimmier, clerk of this court, after due and legal notice, do proceed to sell at public outcry, on sales-day in December next, the property of defendant on which said lien exists, to wit, &c.

*536

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

Messrs. A. Blythe and S. T. McCravy, contra.

April 21, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. On June 16, 1880, George Oliver filed in the office of the clerk of the court for Spartanburg County "a statement" as the foundation of a claim for mechanic's lien against the defendant, W. D. Fowler, for furnishing material and work and labor in making, erecting, and setting up four flights of balusters and railings and two newel posts in the dwelling-house of the defendant, known as "the rock house," in the city of Spartanburg, as per verbal agreement, to the amount of $260. On the next day the claimant, Oliver, for value received, assigned the amount and lien to his wife, E. P. Oliver, the plaintiff.

On June 28, 1880, the plaintiff instituted proceedings by a petition inserted in a summons stating the work done by her husband, the filing of the statement for a lien upon the said building, the assignment to her, &c., and prayed judgment for the amount due and the sale of the house and lot in discharge of said lien. The sheriff's return stated that he had served "the summons in the action," but there can be little doubt that it was the summons with the petition inserted, as they were attached together by mucilage, and they both appear on the sheriff's book as "summons" and "complaint." On July 16, 1880, the defendant, Fowler (saving the right to move to dismiss the proceedings upon the ground that the court had never ordered him to appear and answer and that he had not been served "with any attested copy of the petition with the order of court thereon"), answered fully to the merits that George Oliver, who did the work, was indebted to him more than the account for work, which demand was in suit against him, and that the assignment to his wife was pretensive, null, and void, and for the purpose of evading the payment of his just debts, &c.

*537

*The cause came before Judge Fraser at the July term of 1881, and he refused to dismiss the proceeding, but ordered that notice "by copy of the petition" be given "the owner of the building" and also to all other creditors "having liens" of the same kind. Accordingly notice was given as directed. There were no other lien creditors, and the defendant (reserving rights as before) answered a second time to the merits, setting up the same defence as before. The case finally came before Judge Pressley, who refused the motion to dismiss the proceedings, holding "that defendant, after answering, thereby waived all defects in the manner of service of the summons and petition and the return thereon;" also overruling the other points raised by the defendant; that "the work done was clearly an alteration of the building, and the account filed was sufficient," &c. And on the merits of the case he gave judgment for the plaintiff, with order to sell the house and lot in payment of the same.

The defendant appeals on the following grounds:

1. That his honor erred in ruling that the service and answer in the first proceedings in which the amended petition was ordered to be served was a waiver of all preliminaries at that time, and waived everything except the matter of the plaintiff having no cause of action, or something of that sort.

2. In refusing to grant defendant's motion to dismiss the proceedings herein and set aside the service of the summons.

3. In refusing to hold that the filing of the petition in the clerk's office is the commencement of the action herein, and that said action was not barred by being brought too late.

4. In refusing to hold that there was no debt proved as due to George Oliver upon which to base a mechanic's lien, and in holding that there was such debt.

5. Because the onus of proof was on the plaintiff to show that a lien had been taken for a debt due George Oliver, whereas in the testimony no such debt was proved.

6. In holding that the alleged work done was an "alteration" of defendant's building, such as would sustain a mechanic's lien.

7. Because the alleged assignment to the petitioner was collusive and fraudulent.

8. Because the alleged mechanic's lien filed in the clerk's office *is fatally defective in that— 1. It claims a lien by reason of "repairing" and improving defendant's house. 2. There is no such certificate and oath filed with the clerk of the facts which are requisite to make a lien. 3. There was no sufficient account filed.

*538

9. Because this action was never lawfully commenced, if at all, against the defendant until October 3, 1881.

10. Because there was no right in George Oliver to transfer the alleged lien to the petitioner.

11. In ruling that answers such as were put in in this action waived all defects in the manner of service of the summons and petition and the return thereon.

12. In ordering a sale of all of defendant's property upon which it is alleged the mechanic's lien exists.

13. In ordering such sale for cash.

14. Because the court should have dismissed the proceedings herein.

The defendant did not deny that the work was done according to contract, was received by him, and the account just. All his objections went to the nature of the work as not being "in the erection, alteration, or repair of any building," or against the right of the wife to institute the proceedings, and the manner in which he was served with process. The Circuit judge found as matter of fact (and we see nothing in the "Brief" which authorizes us to dissent from his findings) that the work was done according to contract; that it was done by George Oliver, the mechanic, who transferred the claim and statement for a lien to his wife, bona fide and for full value; and that the work was of such a character as to authorize the establishment of a mechanic's lien on the rock house of the defendant. These points being settled, the only remaining matter is whether the whole proceeding should have been dismissed for the reason that the action was not commenced within the time prescribed, and the defendant brought into court in the manner by law directed, which seems to be really the principal defence in the case.

The defendant was served with process in the case on June 30, 1880, and on July 16, 1880, he answered to the merits, but in his answer he announced that he reserved the right to have the *whole proceeding dismissed, upon the ground that he was never made a party in the manner directed by law. The right of a mechanic to set up a lien for the value of his work upon a building which he has "erected, altered, or repaired," as well as the proceeding by which it may be done, are purely statutory. The provisions of the law fixing the right are reasonably plain, at least as to the essentials. For example, the mechanic must file "a statement," on oath, in the clerk's office, within "ninety days" after ceasing to labor on the building, and suit must be brought to enforce it within "six months" after the same lien. But it is not so clear as to the precise manner in which that suit should be commenced and conducted.

*539

The general statutes provide as follows: "Section 2357. The lien may be enforced by petition to the Court of Common Pleas, &c.; * * * may be filed in term or in the clerk's office in vacation, and the date of the filing shall be deemed the commencement of the suit." "Section 2359. The petition may be served with the summons or filed with the clerk, and shall be entered and returned as other civil cases." And "Section 2363. The court in which the petition is entered shall order notice to be given to the owner of the building, &c., by serving him with an attested copy of the petition, with the order of the court thereon," &c. While these sections do not undertake to set forth all the details of the proper practice, it is obvious that they provide two ways in which the right may be judicially established, intended probably to apply to different classes of cases. First, where the person who contracted the debt is the owner of the building, the mechanic, having made his preliminary statement as required, may, under sections 2357 and 2359, within six months, bring his action by serving summons and petition which may "be returned and entered as other civil cases." When the circumstances make this course proper, we do not understand that any special order from the court is necessary to make the defendant (owner of the building) a party, but he may be regularly served with summons and petition as in other cases with summons and complaint. Or, second, he may simply file his petition in the clerk's office of the county without summons, but, as a substitute therefor, obtain an *order from the court giving notice to the owner of the building that he may appear and answer.

*540

This construction seems to be warranted by the terms of the law, and is clearly indicated in the case of Johnson v. Frazee, 20 S. C., 502. That was a case precisely the converse of this. There the defendant (the owner of the building) had been brought into court "by an order based upon the petition of the creditors," and he complained that a summons was necessary: that he was not served in the manner in which the defendant here complains that he was served, viz., by summons and petition as in other civil cases. In that case it was held that the defendant was regularly in court, and, in delivering the judgment of the court, the chief justice said: "No doubt, had section 2359 been followed, and accordingly had the petition been served with a summons, instead of being filed in the clerk's office and an order of notice obtained as was done in this case, the proceeding would have been valid and unobjectionable; but this mode is not imperative or exclusive."

The defendant having been served with a summons and petition attached within the time prescribed, there was therefore no irregularity in the case. But if, as contended, the defendant was not served with the petition, but simply with the bare summons, that could not authorize the dismissal of the proceedings, for, in any view that can be taken, the action was commenced on June 28, 1880, when the petition attached to the summons was filed. When the clerk, on that day, marked the petition and summons filed, and put upon it the seal of the court, the action had been commenced, and the defendant could be served at any time thereafter. The statute declares that "the date of the filing of the petition shall be deemed the commencement of the suit."

Besides, if it had been necessary to have an order of court before service, we think by answering to the merits the defendant waived the objection and submitted himself properly to the jurisdiction of the court, and the matter stands as if he had accepted service or authorized his attorney to do so. Graveley v. Graveley, 20 S. C., 104.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. *541

POLSON v. INGRAM.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Deeds ⇐96.]

The recitals in a deed are only binding upon such persons as are shown to be parties and privies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 257; Dec. Dig. ⇐96.]

[2. Easements ⇐36.]

The law is jealous of a claim to an easement, and the party asserting such a claim must prove his right to it clearly; it cannot be established by intendment or presumption.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 77, 78, 88 93; Dec. Dig. ⇐36.]

[3. Trial ⇐194.]

Requests to charge upon the force and effect of testimony properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 413, 436, 439–441, 446–454, 456–466; Dec. Dig. ⇐194.]

[4. Easements ⇐37.]

Upon a disputed question of easement, the judge could not properly grant a request to charge that ignored the possibility of a right obtained by grant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. § 94; Dec. Dig. ⇐37.]

[5. Easements ⇐30, 37.]

While an acquired easement may be defeated by express grant or by prescription, the law will not presume its abandonment from twenty years' non-user; the abandonment of an easement is a question of intention to be determined by the jury.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Du Pont v. Charleston Bridge Co., 65 S. C. 532, 44 S. E. 86; Lorick & Lowrance v. Southern Ry., 87 S. C. 73, 68 S. E. 931.

For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 77, 94; Dec. Dig. ⇐30, 37.]

[6. Easements ⇐32.]

Getting timber by the owner of the soil from the land covered by defendant's back-water would not extinguish defendant's easement, if such acts were not inconsistent with the easement claimed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. § 84; Dec. Dig. ⇐32.]

[7. Adverse Possession ⇐85.]

What constitutes color of title is a question of law, but whether the matter showing color exists is a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 498–503, 656, 657, 665, 668, 688–690; Dec. Dig. ⇐85.]

[8. Evidence ⇐372.]

A deed, probated and recorded, and proved to have been in the possession of the party producing it, and of those under whom he claims, for more than thirty years, properly received in evidence as an ancient deed.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Moseley v. Hankinson, 25 S. C. 521.

For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1618; Dec. Dig. ⇐372.]

Before Cothran, J., Chesterfield, February, 1884.

The opinion of this court states the nature of this action, and some of the facts proved at the trial. Other matters necessary to a full understanding of the case are as follows:

A survey under order of the court showed that forty acres of land were covered with back-water from defendant's dam, of which twenty acres belonged to the plaintiffs. There was testimony to show that this land was swamp, and covered in wet weather by high water independently of the dam, but fit for pasturage at other times; and also the back-water destroyed juniper trees of value. Defendant's mill and dam were built about twelve years before the trial, but there had been a mill-dam there many years ago, and a part of the old dam remained. Ainsley Polson cleared some of the land now covered by back-water, and the plaintiffs have since cut hoop-poles from the land.

*542

*The deed from Parker to Ratcliff was dated May 14, 1804. The probate was in proper form and appeared to be regular. The signature of the probating officer was not proved. There was also a certificate of registry upon the deed, and proof that the public records of the county had all been destroyed. Alexander McQueen, witness, testified that this deed had been in his father's possession and his own for over thirty years; that his father held possession under it until his death in 1828, and then his father's heirs until the sale to Ingram in 1870.

The exceptions correctly state the requests to charge, and so much of the charge as appears in the brief.

Messrs. Hough & Kennedy, for appellants.
Mr. C. P. Townsend, contra.

April 21, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The action below was commenced September 5, 1881, and was brought to recover damages for overflowing the plaintiffs' land (as alleged) with a pond of water, by the defendant Ingram. Evander Polson was made a defendant, because he did not consent to join as plaintiff. The defendant Ingram interposed as defences: 1st, a general denial; 2nd, a right to overflow; and 3rd, that he was the owner of the land as purchaser from his co-defendant, Evander Polson.

On the question of title, the plaintiffs claimed as heirs at law of one Ainsley Polson, deceased. And to support title in Ainsley Polson, their father, they introduced, first, a certified copy of a grant and plat of one thousand acres, to one Gutheridge Lyons, dated November 6, 1787, conveying the land; next, an ancient deed from Wallace, E. A. Ellerbe, and M. A. Ellerbe, to the said Ainsley Polson, dated January 6, 1848, of five hundred acres, being a part of the Lyons grant lying north of Juniper Creek, the land described in the complaint. They then proved the death of Ainsley on March 3, 1858, and that the plaintiffs and Evander were his children and heirs at law. They also proved the possession of Ainsley from two years before the deed of January 6, 1848, until his death, March 3, 1858. The de*fendant overflowed the land in 1875 or in 1874. The youngest child of Ainsley was 30 years old at the time of the trial. No partition had ever taken place.

*543

It was admitted that the land upon which the defendant Ingram built the dam, which caused the overflow, was also granted to Gutheridge Lyons, but of junior date to the other grant. The defendant produced an ancient deed from Parker to Ratcliff, dated May 14, 1804, purporting to convey the land upon which his mill had been erected. This deed contained recitals that the land granted to Lyons, had by him been conveyed to one Joseph Booth, and by Booth to Parker (but there was no other evidence of the truth of these recitals). It also contained the following recital: "Also it is understood, and is an express part of this contract, that the said John Ratcliff is to have the entire and exclusive privilege of drowning, or covering with water, as much of the lands of said Parker above this tract, now intended to be conveyed, as the said Ratcliff may think proper to do, by building a mill or mills on their land, and the said land so covered with water, or to be covered, is considered by the parties part of this agreement." The defendant also introduced a deed from Ratcliff to Alexander McQueen, embracing the same land, and containing in substance the same words as above, with the same recitals. Alexander McQueen died, leaving a widow, three sons, and two daughters, one of whom, to wit, Alexander McQueen, had executed a quit claim deed of this tract, to the defendant Ingram, November 23, 1870. The defendant also held a deed from Evander Polson dated May 3, 1879, and some evidence was offered to show that Evander Polson had acquired title by adverse possession.

The jury found for the defendant. The plaintiffs have appealed upon exceptions as to the charge, and refusals to charge, as follows:

1. "Because his honor, after request, refused to charge the jury, 'that the deed made by Elisha Parker to John Ratcliff, bearing date May 14, 1804, did not convey to the said John Ratcliff the right to overflow the one thousand acres granted to Gutheridge Lyons, dated November, 1787, and now claimed by the plaintiffs, as it nowhere appeared in evidence that Elisha *Parker had title to the tract claimed by the plaintiffs, or to such an easement thereon when he made said deed.'

*544

2. "Because his honor, after request, refused to charge, 'that the mere recitals in the deeds made by Elisha Parker to Ratcliff, and also the recitals in the deed from Ratcliff to McQueen, sr., are no evidence that they had the right to overflow or cover said land with a pond of water.'

3. "Because his honor refused to charge, 'that if it has not been proven that either Elisha Parker or John Ratcliff or Alexander McQueen, sr., overflowed and covered the land claimed by the plaintiffs with a pond of water for the full period of twenty years; or that they together covered said land with water for the full period of twenty years, then there is no evidence that either the said Elisha Parker, John Ratcliff, or Alexander McQueen, sr., ever had a right to any such easement.'

4. "Because his honor refused to charge, 'that twenty years non-user will presume the abandonment of an easement.'

5. "Because his honor refused to charge, 'that if Ainsley Polson, and his heirs, held and possessed so much of the grant of land to Gutheridge Lyons as lies north of Juniper Creek, and is described in the deed made by Clement D. Wallace, E. A. Ellerbe, and M. A. Ellerbe, for the full period of twenty years, and during that time Ainsley Polson and his heirs had actual possession of a part of said land, and used the remainder of it for the purpose of getting timber and other purposes, and during all that time said land was not overflowed or covered with a pond of water, then all right to the easement is extinguished and gone, if it ever existed.'

6. "Because his honor refused to charge, 'that even if Evander Polson can hold by adverse possession, he must be confined to the land under his fence, as it has not been shown that Evander had any plat, deed, or anything else that constitutes color of title, and defines his boundary.'

7. "Because his honor erred in charging, 'that non-user would not presume the abandonment of an easement, and that it depended on what the owners of the dominant estate intended by the non-user, and that it was for the jury to say whether the owners of the dominant estate, by the non-user from the time the *old pond was discontinued until Ingram built, intended to abandon the easement.'

*545

8. "Because his honor refused to charge, 'that if the other heirs at law of Ainsley Polson have had possession of the tract of land described in the deed of Clement D. Wallace, E. A. Ellerbe, and M. A. Ellerbe, ever since Ainsley Polson's death, and there has been no division or partition of the same between Evander and the other heirs, then Evander cannot hold by adverse possession, as the possession of the other heirs protects their rights.' It is submitted that his honor erred in charging, 'that this was true, unless you find from the evidence that his father, in his life-time, put him in open, notorious, and actual possession of his part of the land,' when there was no evidence upon which to base such a finding, and the youngest one of the heirs of Ainsley Polson was only thirty years old at the trial.

9. "Because his honor erred in charging, that it was a question of fact for them to determine whether it had been shown that Evander Polson had anything that would constitute color of title, so as to enable him to claim beyond his fence, or his pedis possessio, when there was no evidence that Evander had anything that constituted color of title.

10. "Because his honor erred in admitting the deed of Elisha Parker to John Ratcliff as an ancient deed, because the proof was not sufficient to allow it to go to the jury as an ancient deed.

11. "Because his honor erred in refusing a motion for a new trial, as there was no evidence to support the verdict."

These exceptions will be taken up seriatim. His honor declined to charge as requested in the two first exceptions, and, instead thereof, charged, "that the recitals in a deed are only binding upon the parties and privies; that the relation of a party and privy must first be established before the recitals are binding. One claiming an easement on the lands of another, must prove his right to it clearly. The law is jealous of such claim, and the right cannot be established by intendment or presumption." We see no error of law in this. The request called substantially for a charge upon the force and effect of the testimony introduced, which is always a matter entirely for the jury. Instead of thus charging, his honor laid down a general propo*sition covering the effect of recitals in deeds, when and as to whom they are binding, and also the necessity of clear proof of easements, leaving it to the jury to determine from the testimony the facts of the case under the principles which he announced. This, it appears to us, is as far as he could have gone without invading the province of the jury. The first request was based upon the assumption of a fact, which was beyond the province of the judge to make; and the second requested a charge as to the effect of the recitals in the deeds from Parker to Ratcliff, and from Ratcliff to McQueen, without regard to any testimony which might or not connect the plaintiffs therewith, which would have been misleading.

*546

The third request was properly refused. The question at issue between the parties, was the existence of an easement, or a right on the part of the defendant Ingram to overflow the land. What constitutes an easement, or a right thereto, is a question of law, upon which a judge may charge; but whether the facts, necessary to the existence of the easement or the right, have been proved, is for the jury. This request did not ask the judge to charge as to the legal requirements of an easement, or under what circumstances it becomes a right; but it asked a charge, that supposing there was no proof of overflow by Parker, Ratcliff, or McQueen, for the full period of twenty years, then there was no evidence that either of these parties ever had such right. In other words, that these parties could only acquire the easement by an overflow of twenty years, and if there was no proof of such overflow, then there was no easement. Such a charge would have ignored easements by grant, which would have been an error of law, and would have taken from the jury the question of fact, whether there had been a grant, as this depended not simply upon the construction of the Parker, Ratcliff, and McQueen deeds, but also upon the question of fact as to the relation of the plaintiffs therewith, as charged by his honor, in answer to the two first requests.

4. His honor refused to charge, "that twenty years non-user will presume the abandonment of an easement," holding that this was a question of intention, to be determined by the jury. No doubt it requires twenty years adverse use to acquire an ease*ment, where said easement is claimed simply from use and occupation. A grant will not be presumed from a use shorter than twenty years. An easement, however, may be created by express grant executed at the beginning of the use. And when once it has been created, and has become vested in the grantee, either by an express grant, or by prescription which presumes a grant, it then becomes a permanent right, according to the terms of the grant, which cannot be defeated or divested except by another acquiring a right in opposition thereto in one of the modes above mentioned, i. e., by express grant or prescription.

*547

True, a party in the enjoyment of an easement may abandon it, but whether an abandonment has taken place in a special case, depends upon the intention of the party claiming, which is a question of fact for the jury. This was held distinctly in the case of Parkins v. Dunham (3 Strobh., 224), where the court said: "Whether a party has abandoned his right to an easement, is a question of fact and intention for the determination of the jury." It will be observed that the question of abandonment is a very different question from having the easement defeated and divested by the adverse use of another. This last question is to be determined by the character of the adverse use, and how long continued, while the former depends upon the intention of the party in possession, without regard to the claims of others. Such being the law, it would have been error for the judge to have charged, as a direct and positive proposition, "that twenty years non-user will presume the abandonment of an easement."

5. As to the fifth exception, his honor charged that whether the acts of plaintiffs in getting timber from the land would extinguish the easement, would depend upon the fact whether such acts were inconsistent with the easement; that defendant's right to the easement did not deprive the plaintiffs of such rights as were not inconsistent with the enjoyment of the easement. This was in accordance with the principles above stated.

6. The sixth exception involves a question of fact which was for the jury. There was some evidence intended to show that Evander Polson had acquired title to the land by adverse possession, and the whole question was properly left to the jury.

*548

*7. The seventh exception has already been disposed of in the discussion of the fourth.

8. The modification given by his honor to the eighth request seems unobjectionable. He sustained the request, provided there were no other principle in the case which would prevent its application, and the plaintiffs can have no just cause of complaint on account of this qualification.

9. There certainly was no error in submitting to the jury as a question of fact whether it had been shown that Evander Polson had anything constituting color of title. What constitutes color of title may be a question of law, but whether the matter showing color exists is a question of fact, and this was submitted to the jury.

10. It is claimed that it was error to admit the deed of Parker to Ratcliff as an ancient deed. This deed was more than thirty years old, was probated, and no doubt recorded; it was in the possession of the McQueens as a link in their chain of titles, and had been for over thirty years. Its admission as an ancient deed under these circumstances is sustained by abundant authority. 1 Greenl. Evid., § 144, and note; Thompson v. Brannon, 14 S. C., 551; Swygart v. Taylor, 1 Rich., 54.

The refusal of the motion for a new trial has not been shown to be error of law.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. 548

DUNLAP v. GOODING & ELLIOTT.

(November Term, 1884.)

[Estoppel ⟸75.]

Where a mother allows her son to hold a mare out to the world as his property, and he sells it as his own to a stranger, who, in payment, drew an order on defendants, and they give to the son therefor a due bill payable to himself which was declared to be not transferrible, the defendants are affected by the conduct of the mother, and in action by her on the due bill, she is estopped from denying the son's ownership, and the defendants may interpose as defences discounts against the payee and payments to him.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Jennings v. Harrison, 33 S. C. 209, 11 S. E. 695; Chambers v. Bookman, 67 S. C. 453, 46 S. E. 39; Pollock v. Pegues, 72 S. C. 70, 51 S. E. 514; Sullivan v. Moore, 84 S. C. 430, 65 S. E. 108, 66 S. E. 561.

For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 192; Dec. Dig. ⟸75.]

*549

*Before Aldrich, J., Fairfield, February, 1884.

The opinion of the court fully states the case.

Mr. E. B. Ragsdale, for appellant.

Mr. C. A. Douglass, contra.

April 21, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action by Charlotte T. Dunlap against Gooding & Elliott on a due bill in the following terms: "Due Thomas R. Dunlap on demand $100. This D. B. not transferrible. January 16, 1883. (Signed) Gooding & Elliott." This due bill was given under the following circumstances: Thomas R. Dunlap, a young man 23 years of age, lived with his mother, the plaintiff, and, she being a widow, transacted most of her business. He had in his possession a mare, and sold her to one Moss for the sum of $100, who, upon delivery of the animal, paid for her by giving to the said Thomas R., in his own name, an order for the amount on Gooding & Elliott. The said Thomas R. presented the order to Gooding & Elliott, who accepted the order and gave him in payment the due bill sued on. When payment was demanded by the said Thomas R., the defendants claimed that they had an account against him for $48.07, and that they should have a discount for that sum. This method of payment not being satisfactory, they applied to the account enough to pay it, and paid the remainder, $51.93, on a judgment against the said Thomas R., in favor of W. R. Doty & Co., and produced the sheriff's receipt therefor.

The plaintiff, mother of Thomas R., then sued Gooding & Elliott on the aforesaid due bill, alleging that, although given to Thomas R., and in his name and not transferrible, it was her property, having been given in payment for the mare, which belonged to her, and was sold by the said Thomas R. as her agent. The defendants denied her right to recover on the due bill, which was the property of Thomas R., and had been paid as above stated. The evidence was somewhat contradictory as to whether the mother or son was the owner of the mare. But *if the jury took the view that the mare belonged to the mother, the judge refused to charge as requested, "that if the jury find that the plaintiff had allowed Thomas R. Dunlap to hold out to the world this mare as his own property, still if Gooding & Elliott had not been affected by such conduct, they could not urge this in bar of her recovery;" but, on the contrary, charged "that if the plaintiff, C. T. Dunlap, in this case had allowed Thomas R. Dunlap to hold this mare out to the world as his own property, she would be estopped from denying that fact." The jury found for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals, alleging error both in the charge and the refusal to charge.

*550

We assume that the appellant is right when he insists that, in order to estop a party by conduct, that conduct must be shown to have affected others. But what seems to be the difficulty in this case appears to us to be more apparent than real, growing out of the fact that Moss, the purchaser of the animal, is not a party before the court. If the plaintiff, acting in the view that the animal sold was her property, had sued Moss, the purchaser, either for the mare or the purchase money, there could be no question of the correctness of the proposition charged by the judge, "that if Mrs. Dunlap allowed her son to hold himself out to the world as the owner of the mare, she would be estopped from denying the fact." Moss, the purchaser, was certainly affected by such conduct. He was an innocent third party. He found the animal in the possession of Thomas R. Dunlap, who made no disclosure of any agency, but, on the contrary, claimed the animal as his own, and not only as such sold her, but accepted in payment an order payable to himself, and presented that order and received therefor a due bill payable to himself and made not transferrible. So far as concerns Moss, there could be no question that he was affected by the conduct of the plaintiff in allowing her son to hold himself out as the owner of the animal, and as to him she was estopped. "It is now a well-established principle that when the true owner of property holds out another, or allows him to appear, as the owner of, or as having full power of disposition over, the property, and innocent third parties are thus led into dealing with such apparent owner, they will be protected.

*551

Their rights in such cases do not depend *upon the actual title or authority of the party with whom they have directly dealt, but they are derived from the act of the real owner, which precludes him from disputing, as against such third party, the existence of the right or power which he caused or allowed to appear to be vested in the party making the sale." Big. Estop., 434.

It is ingeniously urged, however, that while this would be sound as to Moss, the purchaser, the benefit of it cannot be extended to the defendants, Gooding & Elliott, who had nothing to do with the horse trade, but simply accepted an order upon them by Moss in favor of Thomas R. Dunlap, without even knowing, it may be, out of what transaction the order arose, and therefore they were not affected by the aforesaid conduct of the plaintiff. If this were the correct view, then the plaintiff should not have been allowed to offer any evidence as to the ownership of the animal or the trade at all, but should have been required to stand on the due bill, according to its terms, which was not transferrible; such was the extent of the defendants' contract by its own terms. But it was necessary to connect the due bill sued on with the sale of the animal as claimed belonging to her, in order to give her a status in court. Both sides seem to have taken it for granted that the sale of the mare to Moss and the giving of the due bill by the defendants were parts of the same transaction; and in that view the judge could not charge, as requested, that Gooding & Elliott had not been affected by the conduct of plaintiff, and could not urge that in bar of her recovery. The plaintiff herself made the execution of the due bill for the price of the mare part and parcel of the sale transaction, and therefore it must be considered that her conduct in its effects reached to the defendants who executed the due bill for the purchase money. We do not think the plaintiff could connect the defendants with the horse trade and at the same time isolate them and cut them off from a defence legitimately arising out of that transaction.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

---

22 S. C. *552

*CARROLL CO. SAVINGS BANK OF UNIONTOWN v. STROTHER.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Guaranty ⟸1.]

Generally a guaranty is a collateral undertaking, and it is essential to its existence that there should be some one liable as principal; and if there be no valid claim against the principal, there is no existing contract of guaranty.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ruberg v. Brown, 71 S. C. 293, 51 S. E. 96; J. L. Mott Iron Works v. Clark, 87 S. C. 203, 69 S. E. 227.

For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. ⟸1.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⟸1012.]

Judgment rendered by the judge without a jury, against persons alleged to be guarantors, without proof of demand against the principal, upon an instrument never proved, nor fully before the court in pleadings or evidence, set aside, the answers being held to have sufficiently raised issues requiring proof.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hall v. Woodward, 30 S. C. 564, 577, 9 S. E. 684.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3990 3992; Dec. Dig. ⟸1012.]

[3. Pleading ⟸376.]

An admission that defendants "signed an instrument of writing supposed to be the paper sued on, but cannot be positive without an inspection of said paper, and cannot say whether the endorsement was before or after due or contained a guaranty"—was not such an admission as would justify a judgment without proof of the instrument.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in American Button-Hole, Overseaming & Sewing Mach. Co. v. Hill, 27 S. C. 166, 3 S. E. 82.

For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1226; Dec. Dig. ⟸376.]

Before Aldrich, J., Edgefield, October, 1883.

The opinion sufficiently states the case.

[For subsequent opinion, see 28 S. C. 504, 6 S. E. 313.]

Messrs. Jones & Jones, R. W. Shand, for appellants.

Messrs. W. H. Lyles, B. W. Bettis, Jr., contra.

April 21, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. John C. Strother executed a paper, of which the following is a copy:

"Saluda Old Town, S. C., March 30, 1878.

"$656. Eighteen months after date I promise to pay to the order of the Taylor Manufacturing Company of Westminster six hundred and fifty-six dollars, payable at Central National Bank of Columbia, S. C., for value received, with exchange on New York, and if not paid when due, bear interest from maturity at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, as agreed for negotiating and carrying this loan, so long as it remains unpaid, and also all counsel fees and expenses in collecting this note if it is sued or placed in the hands of counsel for collection; hereby waiving all homestead and personal exemptions without any relief whatever, or from valuation or appraisement laws. The express *conditions of the sale and purchase of the engine and saw-mill for which this note is given is such that the title, ownership, or possession does not pass from the said Taylor Manufacturing Company until this note, with interest, is paid in full. The said company have full power of declaring this note due and take possession of said engine and saw-mill at any time they deem this note insecure, even before maturity of same.

*553

"Witness, Ira P. Culbreath. (Signed) John C. Strother."

On this paper appeared the following endorsement: "For value received we hereby guarantee the payment of within note when due, and hereby waive the demand and notice of non-payment thereof." (Without date.) "(Signed) Taylor Manufacturing Company. P. H. Irwin, Treas., J. E. Taylor, David Fowble, Edward Lynch, and H. Haines."

On March 17, 1883, this action was brought by the Carroll County Savings Bank of Uniontown, the plaintiffs, against John C. Strother as maker of a promissory note, and David Fowble and Edward Lynch as endorsers thereof before due to the plaintiffs; but no copy of the paper was attached to the complaint. Strother answered, stating that the note was one of four, aggregating $2,126, given for a steam engine, saw-mill, and appurtenances, and alleging failure of consideration, fraudulent concealment, usury, &c., and pleading that more money had been paid than the property was worth. The attorney of Fowble and Lynch asked for a copy of the paper upon which they were alleged to be guarantors, but it was declined. They then answered, repeating the defence set up by Strother, and denying that they were liable as guarantors, "the requirements of the law not having been complied with." They stated that they "did endorse and deliver to the plaintiffs an instrument of writing supposed to be the paper sued on, but cannot be positive of this without an inspection of said instrument. Whether said endorsement was made before or after due, or contained a guaranty, they cannot now answer without an inspection of the instrument."

Again, complaining that no copy of the paper sued on was filed, the defendants gave notice of a motion to amend their answer by stating that the alleged guaranty was signed by several persons jointly, some of whom had not been sued, and also de*murred to the complaint upon the ground that several causes of action were improperly united, one being against John C. Strother as maker, and the other against them as guarantors.

*554

On this state of the pleadings the cause came on for trial. The demurrer as to the misjoinder of actions was overruled. A jury was empanneled and the case opened. The counsel for the plaintiffs and defendants do not agree as to what occurred at the trial, and upon application to the Circuit judge to settle the case he was unable to remember the particulars in which they differed. But we will take the statement of the respondent, which was as follows: "At the hearing of the cause, after the complaint was read, the defendants, David Fowble and Edward Lynch, moved, upon the notice before referred to, for leave to amend their answer, which motion was refused by the court. After the reading of the pleadings, and before any evidence was introduced, plaintiff moved the court for judgment against David Fowble and Edward Lynch, and for leave to discontinue the case against John C. Strother, and thereupon the court passed the following order: 'The case having come on for a hearing and the claim for counsel fee having been withdrawn, after argument by counsel, it is ordered that plaintiff have judgment against David Fowble and Edward Lynch for the sum of $840.50, and for costs and disbursements. It is further ordered that the suit be discontinued as to the defendant, John C. Strother, and that said John C. Strother have judgment for his costs and disbursements.'"

The alleged guarantors appeal from this judgment upon the following grounds:

I. "Because his honor erred in giving judgment against the said Fowble and Lynch for the debt sued on and seven per cent. interest instead of the principal alone without interest or costs, as the instrument sued on stipulates for ten per cent. per annum, which was usury by the law of the state when it was executed.

II. "Because his honor erred in giving judgment against the said Fowble and Lynch for principal and interest, when it is submitted that the stipulation for the payment of all costs and fees for collecting the same also made it usurious.

III. "Because his honor erred in not ruling that when an instrument stipulates for usurious interest or for any other sum *besides principal and legal interest, such as costs and fees for collection, the plaintiff could not avoid the usurious effect by withdrawing them or by not claiming them in his complaint.

*555

IV. "Because his honor erred in allowing the plaintiff to discontinue this action as to John C. Strother, the maker and principal of the instrument sued on, and holder of the engine for which it was given, and to continue it against David Fowble and Edward Lynch, only two of the alleged guarantors of said instrument, and that, too, when the said John C. Strother was in court with his witnesses prepared to prove that the consideration of said instrument had failed, and insisting upon trial and protesting against said discontinuance.

V. "Because his honor erred in not holding that the said David Fowble and Edward Lynch were in no event liable to pay more than was legally due, and in not allowing them to introduce evidence to show that the consideration of the said instrument had failed, and especially when this evidence could have been introduced in behalf of all the defendants if the action had not been discontinued as to Strother.

VI. "Because his honor erred in not allowing the alleged guarantors to interpose at the trial, by way of amended answer, the objection that the alleged guaranty was joint and some of the signers not made parties, when it was admitted by plaintiffs' attorney that no copy of the instrument sued on with the guaranty and names of alleged guarantors endorsed thereon was served with the complaint and that he was written to for a copy and did not send it.

VII. "Because the order passed by his honor, that said John C. Strother have judgment for his costs and disbursements, releases him from all liability on the instrument sued on, and thereby the defendants, David Fowble and Edward Lynch, alleged guarantors, are also released."

From the view the court takes it will not be necessary to consider all the exceptions, but, as the case must go back, we think it better not to discuss now the various questions involved in the case. It is certainly true, as a general proposition, that a guaranty is a collateral undertaking, and it is essential to its existence that there should be some one liable as principal, and *if there is no valid claim against the principal, there is no existing contract of guaranty. It seems that a judgment was rendered against persons alleged to be guarantors, not only without proof of any valid demand against the principal, but upon an instrument which was never proved, and, indeed, in its entirety, was never before the Court, either in the pleadings or evidence. There was no proof of the execution of the note by Strother, or of the alleged guaranty by the defendants; but it is claimed that the allegations were admitted by the answers. It was not a case of judgment "by default," for all the defendants answered and made vigorous defense, and particularly Strother, the principal, who had purchased the engine, and was better able to make the defence than the alleged guarantors. But they sued with him—made common cause with him in resisting a recovery. At the last moment the cause was discontinued as to Strother, the principal, against his consent, and the other defendants being thus isolated, it was claimed that their answers, standing by themselves, made no denial of the plaintiffs' cause of action against them, and that the judge, without the assistance of the jury, could hear the cause and pronounce judgment.

*556

We cannot take this view. Even after the motion of defendants to amend their answer was refused, and the case, as to Strother, was discontinued, we think there was, in the original answers, enough to make issues of fact upon several points which the judge could not properly decide, and they should have been left to the jury after hearing the evidence in the case. The answers not only denied generally the right of the plaintiffs to recover against them as guarantors, on account of failure of consideration, usury, &c., in the original contract (which at least receives color from their discontinuance as to the principal), but substantially put in issue the execution of the alleged guaranty sued on, its date, character, &c. The plaintiffs sued on an instrument of writing, but did not make exhibit of it, stating in their complaint only parts of it, omitting any reference to the interest stipulated, the names of all the alleged guarantors, the right reserved to the payees to take possession of the engine in payment on the debt, &c., &c. The defendants did not admit that they executed the alleged guaranty on the instrument, but *on an instrument supposed to be the paper sued on, "but could not be positive without an inspection of the instrument, nor as to whether said endorsement was made before or after due, or contained a guaranty."

*557

We do not think that, in the absence of the instrument itself, this was such an admission as dispensed with further proof, and authorized the judge to pronounce judgment, without the knowledge even of the other stipulations in the instrument. It was saying in substance "that they had not sufficient knowledge to form a belief" as to the particular instrument sued on, which made it necessary that the plaintiffs should prove their case, and of that proof the jury were the only proper judges. Tharin v. Seabrook, 6 S. C., 118; Kennedy v. Moore, 17 S. C., 464; McConnell v. Kitchens, 20 Ib., 433 [47 Am. Dec. 845]. A party is entitled to an inspection of the original to enable him to answer, and is not presumed to recollect the date or contents of a written instrument, not in his possession or control, and as to date may deny knowledge. Kellogg v. Baker, 15 Abb., 287; Wait. Anno. Code, 244.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial, or for such further proceedings as the parties may be advised.

---

22 S. C. 557

COUCH v. CHARLOTTE, COLUMBIA & AUGUSTA R. R. CO.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Dismissal and Nonsuit ⇐65.]

A Circuit judge, having refused defendant's motion for non-suit, may afterwards, during the trial with the facts unchanged, order a non-suit of his own motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. § 160; Dec. Dig. ⇐65.]

[2. Trial ⇐68.]

Where the judge, in his discretion, refuses to allow the plaintiff to introduce further testimony after closing, upon motion made both before and after an order of non-suit, he commits no error of law for which the verdict may be set aside.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 160; Dec. Dig. ⇐68.]

[3. Master and Servant ⇐270.]

In action by a laborer, against a railroad company, to recover damages for injuries received by reason of the negligence of a section master of the road, the position, duties, and powers of such section master having been proved, it was irrelevant and unnecessary to show what was the custom of other section masters in such matters.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 913–927, 932; Dec. Dig. ⇐270.]

*558

[4. Evidence ⇐519.]

*Witnesses who know the position and character of an open water-way across a railroad track, are not therefore competent to state their opinion of the dangerous character of the place, and of the requirement of prudence that notice should be given to one pushing a hand-car over it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2328; Dec. Dig. ⇐519.]

[5. Negligence ⇐136.]

On the question of negligence, it is the right of the trial judge to determine whether there is any evidence to make a prima facie case, and, if not, he may grant a non-suit.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Kaminitsky v. Northeastern R. Co., 25 S. C. 59; Coleman v. Wilmington, C. & A. R. Co., 25 S. C. 452, 60 Am. Rep. 516; Hall v. South Carolina R. Co., 25 S. C. 570; Madden v. Port Royal & W. C. Ry. Co., 35 S. C. 383, 14 S. E. 713, 28 Am. St. Rep. 855; Cope v. Hampton County, 42 S. C. 21, 19 S. E. 1018.

For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 277–353; Dec. Dig. ⇐136.]

[6. Master and Servant ⇐214.]

An employee assumes the risks of his employment; therefore a railroad company is not answerable in damages for the injuries received by one of its section hands, from falling into an open water-way, properly constructed, while pushing a push-car over his section of the road.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Simms v. South Carolina Ry. Co., 26 S. C. 496, 2 S. E. 486.

For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 565; Dec. Dig. ⇐214.]

[7. Master and Servant ⇐219.]

Nor for the failure of the section master to give to this laborer, working on the road under him, special notice of the approach of the push-car to this water-way.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 610–624; Dec. Dig. ⇐219.]

[8. Master and Servant ⇐189.]

It seems that a section master is a representative of the company, to the extent to which he discharges the duties of his master, the company, and not a fellow-laborer with the hands working under his orders.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Calvo v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co., 23 S. C. 528, 55 Am. Rep. 28; Boatwright v. Northeastern R. Co., 25 S. C. 133; Coleman v. Wilmington, C. & A. R. Co., 25 S. C. 451, 60 Am. Rep. 516; Richey v. Southern Ry., 69 S. C. 393, 48 S. E. 285; Brabham v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 71 S. C. 56, 50 S. E. 716; Martin v. Royster Guano Co., 72 S. C. 243, 51 S. E. 680.

For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 427–435, 437–448; Dec. Dig. ⇐189.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Aiken, April, 1884.

This was an action, by Watson E. Couch, to recover ten thousand dollars damages for injuries alleged to have been received through the negligence of the defendant company. The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. Henderson Bros., for appellant.

Messrs. J. H. Rion, Croft & Dunlap, contra.

April 22, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action brought by the plaintiff, an employé of "The Charlotte, Columbia & Augusta Railroad Company," to recover, from the said company, damages for a personal injury received by him in the discharge of his duty as a section hand on said railroad. He complained: "While pushing a hand-car up a grade for said company, and over the track of said railroad, the defendants carelessly, negligently, and without any warning whatever, caused the plaintiff to fall into a ditch, or water-way, not covered, and which was negligently con*structed, by the said company, across the road-bed, and carelessly and negligently omitted, while approaching said ditch or water-way, to give any signal or notice whatever to plaintiff, by reason whereof the plaintiff was unaware of the danger. That by reason of the negligence and carelessness of the defendants, and without any fault on the part of the plaintiff, he was precipitated into the ditch or water-way, and by the fall his leg was broken below the knee," &c. The defendant corporation put in a general denial, and pleaded: "That the injuries alleged to have been received by the plaintiff, were not caused by any negligence on the part of the defendant or its servants, but was owing to the negligence and fault of the plaintiff himself."

*559

The case came on to be heard before Judge Witherspoon. There was much testimony as to the circumstances under which the plaintiff received the injuries complained of, which is in the "Brief," and of course cannot be re-stated here. During the progress of the trial, the plaintiff's attorney asked one of his witnesses whether it was "the custom of section masters on the road to turn off hands when they displeased them." The judge would not allow the question to be answered, and plaintiff excepted. He asked another witness, William Davis, after he had described minutely the water-way where the plaintiff was injured, "to give his opinion as to the danger of the place." The judge also refused to allow this question to be answered, and plaintiff excepted.

When the plaintiff announced that he had closed, the defendant's attorney moved for a non-suit, which the judge refused. The defendant offered no testimony, and, before going to the jury, the plaintiff asked permission to offer further testimony, which had only come to his knowledge, as alleged, during the argument for a non-suit. The judge declined to admit further testimony, and sent the case to the jury. Before the argument closed the court adjourned for the day, and the next morning the judge announced that, after looking through the authorities, he had changed his mind, and thought there ought to be a non-suit. The plaintiff then renewed his request for leave to offer further testimony, which was refused, and the judge granted the following order: "At the close of the plaintiff's evidence, a motion for *a non-suit was made by the attorney for the defendant. After hearing argument in support of the motion, and in opposition thereto, the court decided to permit the case to go to the jury. There being no more evidence, after hearing most of the argument to the jury upon the merits of the case, as appears from the evidence, and the law applicable thereto, the court became convinced that the non-suit should have been granted, and, at this stage, arrested the case; and it is therefore ordered that the motion for non-suit be granted, and that the defendant have leave to enter up judgment of non-suit herein, and for the costs of this action."

*560

From this order the plaintiff appeals to this court on various exceptions, which it will be necessary to take up seriatim, as the particular grounds upon which the non-suit was granted are not stated.

First. The plaintiff alleges that the judge committed error in granting the non-suit of his own motion after he had refused it when made by the defendant's counsel. There is nothing in the fact that the order was made without a motion to that effect being before the judge. McCall v. Cohen, 16 S. C. 448 [42 Am. Rep. 641]. Nor do we see that it was beyond the discretion of the judge during the trial of the cause, and while the facts were unchanged, to correct his own rulings and grant a non-suit which he had before refused. He could lawfully make such an order. Chichester & Co. v. Hastie, 9 S. C., 331.

Second. The plaintiff also alleges that the judge committed error in not allowing the plaintiff to introduce the testimony tendered by him, both after he had refused and after he had granted the non-suit. The plaintiff formally announced that his case was closed. After that the Circuit judge, in his discretion, sometimes in the interest of justice admits further testimony; but we do not understand that this is a right of the plaintiff which he may demand, but an indulgence extended in order that all the facts may be considered. When a Circuit judge in his discretion refuses such an application, we cannot say that in doing so he committed error of law, which would be sufficient to set aside the verdict.

Third. The plaintiff also excepts, that it was error not to *allow the plaintiff, Couch, when a witness on the stand, to testify as to the custom of section masters, other than Satcher, on the road of the defendants in employing and discharging hands. It appeared that Satcher was the boss of Section No. 3 on defendants' road; that his position, as expressed by one of the witnesses, was as follows: "He was overseer: he hired and discharged, got tools, and ordered the hands what to do, and it was his duty to keep the track in good condition." If there was no other objection to the testimony, after this proof, it was irrelevant and unnecessary to show what was the custom of other section masters in the matter indicated.

*561

Fourth. The plaintiff also complains that the judge erred in not allowing William Davis and other witnesses, after they had stated the condition of the water-way, or heard it described by others, to go on and give their opinion as to the dangerous character of the place, and that prudence required that notice should have been given to one situated as the plaintiff was. The general rule certainly is that the mere opinions of witnesses are not admissible. There are some exceptions to the rule for particular reasons, but we do not think that any of them cover this case. The subject matter was not of such character as to authorize the introduction of opinion from the necessity of the case. See 1 Greenl. Evid., 514; Ward v. Charleston City R. R. Co., 19 S. C., 525 [45 Am. Rep. 794]; Jones v. Fuller, 19 S. C. 66 [45 Am. Rep. 761].

Fifth. The plaintiff finally excepts in general terms "that the Circuit judge erred in granting the non-suit." This certainly opens a very wide field, embracing all possible objections to the ruling. The order does not state the grounds on which the non-suit was granted, and the exception is as indefinite as the order itself. Under these circumstances we can do no more than consider the specific points made in the argument. It was urged that there were issues of fact involved in the case, and therefore the judge should not have decided it himself and ordered a non-suit, but should have referred it to the jury, the rule being as stated in Davis v. C. & G. R. R. Co. (21 S. C., 93): "When there is any pertinent, competent, and relevant testimony to the facts in dispute, the case passes into the hands of the jury and beyond the judge."

*562

*The facts necessary to be understood are, briefly: In June, 1881, the plaintiff, Couch, was employed as a section hand to work on the railroad of the defendant corporation. He worked on the section nearest Vaucluse, where he had lived for some time, and in the gang of W. S. Satcher, who was boss or master of that section—No. 3. The second day after his employment the section squad (under their boss) left Vaucluse for their work on a hand-car, which was propelled by four men, one at each corner, sitting on the floor of the car, and putting their feet against the ends of the cross-ties on the track. There were three of the hands, Couch and two others, who were not expert in thus paddling, and on that account were called "dead-heads"; and when they struck an up-grade these were required by the boss to jump out, and walking behind the car, to push it forward with their hands or shoulders. In this way the party went over the road in the morning going to their work. As they were returning in the evening over the same road and came to an up-grade, Satcher ordered Couch and the two other "dead-heads" to get out and push. They did so, and were pushing when they approached the water-way, when the accident occurred. The other two jumped on the car, but Couch, the plaintiff, did not, but remained pushing, and fell into the water-way, and received the injuries of which he complains.

The allegation of the plaintiff was that the injuries he received were caused by the negligence and carelessness of the defendant corporation. That was the essential issue he tendered, and of course it was necessary for him to prove it before he could claim a verdict. In considering such an issue, is it necessary that every case, in which there is any testimony as to facts, should be sent to the jury? As we understand it, negligence is not a simple fact in itself, but is rather an inference from facts. It is defined to be "want of ordinary care," and is generally understood to be a mixed question of law and fact. It is certainly the duty of the judge to define what it is; and it seems that it is also his right to determine as "a preliminary question" whether there is any evidence to make a prima facie case, and if not, he may grant a non-suit. Carter v. Columbia & Greenville R. R. Co., 19 S. C., 23 [45 Am. Rep. 754]. In other words, as some one has expressed *it: "It is for the judge to say whether there are any facts in evidence from which negligence may be reasonably and legitimately inferred, and it is for the jury to say whether, from those facts, when submitted to them, negligence ought to be inferred." Hooper v. C. & G. R. R. Co., 21 S. C., 541 [53 Am. Rep. 691]; Pierce R. R., 313; Pleasants v. Fant, 22 Wall., 122 [22 L. Ed. 780].

*563

Now, applying these principles to the facts of this case, can we say that the judge erred in not sending this case to the jury? Were there any facts proved by the plaintiff, and taken to be absolutely true, from which negligence on the part of the defendant corporation could be reasonably and legitimately inferred? The plaintiff's first specification was that the water-way across the track, into which he fell and was injured, was negligently constructed. We have read the testimony carefully and fail to discover any proof of this allegation, unless negligence could be inferred from the fact that it was not covered in, but left open. There was no evidence of a wagon road crossing the track at that point. It was not a place for private travel, and so far as concerned the railroad company itself, as the cars passed over it on stringers, the water-way accomplished its uses as well open as if it had been closed. But was leaving it open negligence in reference to the safety of employés on the road? It is true that a railroad company, like any other master, is under an implied obligation to provide suitable apparatus and appliances for their employés to prosecute their work "with a reasonable degree of safety to life and security against injury." But what are suitable appliances must always, to some extent, be determined by the nature of the business. The employé assumes the natural risks of his employment, and "if the company exercise reasonable or ordinary care in making such provision for the safety of its employés, it is not liable to them for injuries resulting from defects in such appliances. It does not undertake to warrant their completeness in all things." Pierce on Railroads. It seems that something may be left to the sense and volition of persons having intelligence. This water-way was not of recent construction. Other structures somewhat of the same character, such as cattle-guards, from the very purpose of their creation are always left open; and we cannot say that the judge committed *error of law in concluding that the fact of the water-way remaining uncovered was not sufficient, as against employés upon the road, reasonably and legitimately to raise the inference of negligence on the part of the company.

*564

The only other allegation of negligence was in not giving the plaintiff specific notice of the condition of the water-way when he was employed or at the time of the accident. As involved in this question, it was stoutly contested at the bar whether the section master, Satcher, was a middle-man or fellow-servant of the plaintiff within the meaning of the rule upon that subject. As to who are fellow-servants, within the meaning of the common law rule that exempts the master or employer from responsibility for injuries to one from the negligence of the other, there has been much diversity of opinion. The cases are not only not in accord, but are absolutely contradictory. In this confusion, we think we have discovered that there is a manifest tendency in the latest authorities to follow principle and to make the employer responsible wherever the act complained of was done by one placed in authority by the principal to discharge some of the duties of the principal, and in regard to which he is the representative of the company and as such entitled to be obeyed. As we understand it, that is the principle of the rule. As was said by Mr. Justice McIver, in the second opinion of this court in Gunter v. Graniteville Manufacturing Co. (18 S. C., 270 [44 Am. Rep. 573]): "The true test is whether the person in question is employed to do any of the duties of the master; if so, then he cannot be regarded as a fellow-servant or co-laborer with the operatives, but is the representative of the master, and any negligence on his part in the performance of the duty of the master thus delegated to him must be regarded as the negligence of the master," &c.

This rule has the recommendation of resting on sound principle, and has been sustained and illustrated by a number of cases very recently decided and reported in 15 American & English Railroad Cases, from page 304 to 330. It is there announced, in reference to section masters and positions of similar character, as the better opinion upon the subject, that "a servant having the exclusive control over other servants under a common master, *including the power of hiring and discharging, is, in the exercise of those powers, the representative of the master and not a mere fellow-servant." In the case of Gilmore v. Northern Pacific Ry. Co. (reported as above), a section boss having charge of a squad of hands, but all under a general superintendent, directed a laborer to assist in thawing a quantity of frozen giant powder before an open fire, in which operation the plaintiff was blown up and severely injured. He sued the company for the act of the section master and the court held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover; that "the rule first suggested in Priestley v. Fowler (3 M. & W., 1), that a master who has exercised due care in the employment of his servants is not responsible for an injury sustained by one of them in the course of his employment by the negligence of another, however distinct the grade or different the labor of such servants, or how widely separated the locality of their several employments, is being modified by the course of judicial opinion and decision so as to meet the ends of justice in cases since arising of corporations and others engaged in varied and widely extended operations under one nominal and invisible head, but in reality divided into separate parts or divisions under the direction and control of local bosses, superintendents, or heads of departments, who, to all intents and purposes, represent and stand for the corporation with practically unqualified power to employ, direct, and discharge workmen." &c.

*565

Assuming, then, that, in the control and direction of his squad of hands, Satcher was in the performance of duties of the company and to that extent their representative, did he do or omit to do anything from which negligence, binding on his principal, could be fairly and reasonably inferred? He had been delegated the power to command Couch and if, like the section master on the Northern Pacific R. R., he had ordered him to do something out of the line of his duty, something not within the scope of his employment, and in doing so he had been injured, we incline to think the company would have been liable. But he was hired as a laborer on that section of the road, and we do not see that it was outside of his employment when he was directed to get down and push behind the car. As they approached the open water-gap he was not prevented from jumping on the cars as his com*panions did. If Satcher had ordered him to remain on the track and continue pushing, it may be that the company would have been responsible for the consequences. It is laid down as one of the duties of a railroad company to notify servants of peculiar dangers which are not known or obvious to them, but it is also a rule that employees are presumed to take the natural risks of their employment and not arising from its negligence. Pierce R. R., 371. We cannot affirm that the judge committed error of law in considering either that the risk in this case was incident to the employment or that the want of special notice to the plaintiff of the obvious condition of the water-gap was insufficient to raise fairly and reasonably the inference of negligence.

*566

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit court be affirmed.

22 S. C. 566

HAIR v. GOLDSMITH.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Wills ⟸782.]

The right of dower is by operation of law, and beyond the control of the husband; but he may give property to his wife by will upon condition that she surrender her claim of dower, in which case she is put to her election between the legacy or devise and the dower.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 2018–2033; Dec. Dig. ⟸782.]

[2. Wills ⟸782.]

The right of dower is a legal right, and a devise to the widow cannot be held to be in lieu and bar of dower, unless so declared, or unless manifestly repugnant to a claim of dower.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Callaham v. Robinson, 30 S. C. 253, 9 S. E. 120, 3 L. R. A. 497; Sumerel v. Sumerel, 34 S. C. 89, 12 S. E. 932; Hiers v. Gooding, 43 S. C. 434, 21 S. E. 310; Otts v. Otts, 80 S. C. 19, 61 S. E. 109; Scott v. Vaughn, 83 S. C. 365, 65 S. E. 269.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 2018–2033; Dec. Dig. ⟸782.]

[3. Wills ⟸782.]

A testator, seized and possessed of 361 acres of land, bequeathed specifically some goods of little value, $500 in lieu of administrator's commissions, and to his grandchildren C., a note on their father, and devised four-tenths in value of his lands to his widow for life, with remainder to their daughter A., and to his grandchildren B. and C. three-tenths each, and named persons to make such division of his lands. Held, that the provision for the widow was intended to be in lieu and bar of dower, Mr. Justice McIver dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Callaham v. Robinson, 30 S. C. 254, 9 S. E. 120, 3 L. R. A. 497; Otts v. Otts, 80 S. C. 20, 61 S. E. 109; Scott v. Vaughn, 83 S. C. 365, 65 S. E. 269.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 2024; Dec. Dig. ⟸782.]

[4. Wills ⟸800.]

The widow having, under her hand and seal, elected to take the devise to her under this will, she cannot claim dower in the lands assigned to B. and C., notwithstanding she made such election very soon after her husband's death—there being no imposition, misrepresentation, nor persuasion practiced upon her.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Bannister v. Bannister, 37 S. C. 534, 16 S. E. 612.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 2074; Dec. Dig. ⟸800.]

Before Pressley, J., Newberry, November, 1884.

*567

*This was a petition by Rosannah C. Hair against Harriet S. Goldsmith and others. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Jones & Jones, for petitioner.

Mr. Y. J. Pope, contra.

April 22, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Peter Hair, late of Greenville County, died on September 26, 1882, leaving of force a last will and testament. At the time of his death he was seized and possessed of certain real estate situate in Newberry County. Of this real estate, he devised four-tenths to his wife, the plaintiff, for life, with remainder in fee to his daughter, Hattie S. Manly, three-tenths to the children of his son, John Hair, and three-tenths to the children of his daughter, Mrs. Goldsmith. His son-in law, William Goldsmith, administered with the will annexed.

On October 26, 1882, just a month after the death of testator, the plaintiff executed a receipt, of which the following is a copy: "I hereby acknowledge that I have received from William Goldsmith, administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Peter Hair, deceased, the four-tenths of the real estate of said deceased devised to me under the will of the said deceased, and of which he died seized and possessed. Witness my hand and seal this 26th of October, A. D. 1882. (Signed) R. C. Hair. (Seal.) In presence of (signed) A. J. Kilgore, M. C. Kilgore." On the same day, at the solicitation and request of her friend, A. J. Kilgore (who, it seems, told her that it would be carrying out his uncle's will), she signed a paper, of which the following is a copy, which was presented to her by the said Kilgore: "I hereby acknowledge that I have received from William Goldsmith, administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Peter Hair, deceased, the four-tenths of the real estate of said deceased for and during my natural life; and I hereby accept the same in lieu of all claim of dower in the real estate of said deceased and of which he died seized and possessed. Witness my hand and seal this 26th of October, 1882. (Signed) R. C. Hair. (Seal). In the presence of (signed) A. J. Kilgore, M. C. Kilgore."

*568

*Some time the next year, i. e., 1883 (the precise time is not stated in the "Case," nor are there any dates to the initiation papers), she filed a petition in the Court of Probate for Newberry County, demanding dower in the said real estate. The defendants, some of whom were minors, answered (the minors by guardian ad litem), denying her right to dower both under the terms of the will and because of the receipts above mentioned which they set up in bar. The probate judge, after taking testimony and hearing argument, held that while the terms of the will did not exclude her from the claim of dower, yet having expressly accepted the devise thereunder in bar of dower in the lands devised to the other devisees, she was precluded from now claiming it. He therefore dismissed the petition, with costs and disbursements against the plaintiff.

From this decree of the probate judge an appeal was taken to the Court of Common Pleas, which came up before his honor, Judge Pressley, who, holding that the second instrument above was based upon a valuable consideration and in the nature of a family settlement, decided that the plea of mistake could not avail, and he adjudged that the appeal should be dismissed with costs to the defendants, with directions that his judgment be certified to the court below.

The case is now before us upon appeal by both plaintiff and defendants. The defendants contend that the judgment below may be sustained on the ground that the devise to the plaintiff in the will was intended to be in lieu and bar of dower; and that the plaintiff having elected to take the devise, and having received it, she was now barred, and that the Circuit judge should have so held. The plaintiff, contesting this proposition of the defendants, has excepted to the ruling of his honor, Judge Pressley, in that he erred in holding that the second receipt above was a bar to the claim of dower—the plaintiff alleging that said receipt was without consideration; that the release therein was to no one; that it was executed before the dower had been laid off; that the plaintiff did not understand her rights at the time, but one month having elapsed since the death of her husband and before she had an opporto consult her attorneys, and be*cause her friend, A. J. Kilgore, had advised that she could not claim the devise and the dower both.

*569

It has been often said that the right to dower is a highly favored claim, and under the influence of this principle the courts have been slow to defeat such a claim. It is not meant, however, by this that the allowance of dower is dependent upon the favor or kind disposition of the courts merely. On the contrary, this right is as much governed by established rules and principles as any other. The difficulty arises when these rules and principles come to be practically applied to the facts of a special case. For instance, it has been well established that when a widow of a deceased testator has been bequeathed or devised a legacy or devise in the will, this does not affect her right to dower in the lands of her deceased husband unless such claim is in opposition to the declared intentions of the testator, or is in such manifest repugnancy to the will that the two cannot stand together.

These are plain enough as general rules, but when the question is presented whether the provisions of a certain will are manifestly repugnant to the claim of dower, neithe the text-books nor the decided cases afford any positive and definite test. And after full examination of these authorities, it will be seen that the question at last must depend upon the intention of the testator, to be ascertained by the ordinary rules of construction and interpretation, and especially whether the devise and dower are repugnant, each case turning upon its own facts and circumstances.

Now, what is precisely the character of the case at bar? The testator died seized and possessed of considerable real estate. He left surviving him his widow, two children, and several grandchildren, the children of a deceased daughter. In his will he devised four-tenths of this real estate to his widow for life, with remainder to his and her daughter, H. S. Manly, in fee, three-tenths to the children of his son, John Hair, and the remaining three-tenths to his grandchildren, the children of Mrs. Goldsmith, deceased. There is no express declaration in the will that the devise to his wife was in lieu and bar of dower; the question then is presented, did the testator intend this devise as such bar? This must be determined by the fact whether the two are so *manifestly repugnant that they cannot stand together. This being determined, the intention of the testator is reached and must govern.

*570

It must be remembered in considering this question, first, that dower is a right to which a widow becomes entitled on the death of her husband, not by any gift, contract, or indulgence of her husband, but by operation of law, which is fixed at his death, and over which he has no control, and cannot defeat. Second. That while this is true, yet the husband may bequeath and devise his entire estate to whomsoever he pleases, and upon such conditions as he may choose. There is nothing, therefore, illegal in his annexing, either expressly or by implication, a condition to a bequest or devise to his widow, that she shall surrender her claim to dower. In such case the widow is put to her election, and if she accepts the devise or bequest, she loses her dower, not by the act of her husband, but by her own voluntary choice and surrender. So that although the right to dower is favored by all the courts, yet it is no violation of this principle to hold that she cannot claim it, and also another right which was given her on the condition that she should surrender her dower.

Now, is the devise to the plaintiff in the will in question so manifestly repugnant to her claim of dower as to show that it could not have been the intention of the testator that the two should stand together? At the death of the testator he was seized in fee of the real estate mentioned, subject to a life estate of his widow in one-third thereof as her dower, which inchoate before his death became consummated and vested by his death. The will directed that this real estate should be divided into three parts: one, four-tenths; the remainder into two, three-tenths each: and the persons to make this division were nominated therein, and it was evidently contemplated by the testator that this division should be made as early as the condition of the estate would allow. The testator left two surviving children and the children of a deceased daughter. The scheme of the will was evidently to make an equal division among these, the children of his son, John Hair, representing one share, and the children of Mrs. Goldsmith, deceased, representing their mother in one share; and inasmuch as the share of his daughter, H. S. *Manly, was to be encumbered with the life estate of her mother, he gave to her four-tenths, which was one-tenth more than he gave to the other two.

*571

Now, would it not be manifestly against this scheme if the widow was allowed to come in and claim a life estate in each of the three-tenths, in addition to a life estate in the four-tenths, which is directly devised to her? How could a claim of this kind be practically enforced without breaking up the entire scheme? The land was in two tracts, one containing 167 acres, and the other 194 acres, in all 361 acres. Divide this into three portions—one, four-tenths; the other two, three-tenths each, and we have one, 144½, and two, 108½. Set apart to the widow for life the 144½ acre tract under the will, and give her one-third for life in each of the other two as dower, and the scheme of the division directed in the will is destroyed; and especially if the widow's dower in the two three-tenths should be assigned to her out of one of them—and who could say that it should not?

The share of H. S. Manly was subjected to a life estate therein of her mother, and therefore the testator gave her four-tenths, which was one-tenth more than the shares of the others; but after making this difference so as, no doubt, to make the shares as nearly equal as possible, he could have hardly intended that the shares of the others should also be subject to a life estate of his widow to the extent of one-third each as dower, because this would have destroyed the equality among his children, and not only so, but would have postponed the division and enjoyment of the devises until the death of his widow, when the dower would fall in—which would manifestly contravene his intent. The testator evidently intended that the whole of his lands of which he was seized should ultimately belong to his children and grandchildren, in equal parts, and he desired an immediate division, but he knew that his wife was entitled to a life estate in one-third as dower, which, if she claimed in the whole, would defeat an immediate division. He therefore gave her a life estate in four-tenths, which was a little more than her dower in the whole, and then to make her daughter, Mrs. Manly, about equal with the others, he gave her this four-tenths at the termi*nation of her mother's life estate. For the widow now to claim the four-tenths for life and dower too in the remainder, we think would be manifestly repugnant to the scheme of the will.

*572

In our case of Bailey v. Boyce (4 Strob. Eq., 84), the general principle which should control in cases of this kind is laid down as herein above; and it is sustained by many cases, both English and our own, cited in the opinion of the court and the Circuit opinion of Chancellor Dargan, as also in his elaborate dissenting opinion. The difference however, in the court was not so much as to the general principle, but in its application to the facts of that case. It was conceded that in all such cases the intention of the testator was the controlling factor, and that this intention was to be reached by the fact whether or not the devise and the claim of dower were manifestly repugnant.

Now, the widow has accepted the provision made for her in the will. True, this acceptance seems to have been brought about in same haste, one short month only having intervened between it and the death of her husband, but neither the probate judge nor the Circuit judge have found as matter of fact that she was in any way imposed upon in executing this receipt and in accepting the devise. The receipt has not been impeached by any direct proceeding. Nor does it appear that any advantage was taken of her through the persuasion or misrepresentation of any of the parties. The only testimony upon that subject is her own, in which she states that she did not understand the true condition of the estate, and that she would not have accepted if time had been given her to consider and to consult with her attorneys. Whose fault was it that deprived her of time and opportunity for consultation? Her own, as far as we can see. Besides, from the view which we have taken, inasmuch as she could not have claimed both the devise and the dower, even if she had taken time, she no doubt would have still accepted the devise, as by that she gets a life estate in four-tenths, which is greater than would have been her dower. So that she has not shown or claimed that she has been injured by a hasty acceptance.

The acceptance, then, being inconsistent with the claim of dower, and this being sufficient to sustain the judgment below, it is unnecessary to discuss the effect of the second receipt, in which *she released all claim to dower, because whether or not that receipt is obnoxious to the objections interposed by the plaintiff can make no difference. As the case is one of election and the plaintiff having elected as evidenced by her taking possession of the property devised to her, and executing the first receipt, she cannot claim both under and against the will.

*573

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I concur with the chief justice. It is true that the husband cannot defeat the wife's dower by willing all his estate to others, but he may give her of his property what he pleases as a substitute for dower, which provision the wife may take instead of dower; and where the intention is manifest that the provision was given as a substitute, she cannot take the provision and at the same time dower. She may take one or the other, but not both. I think that in most cases where a husband makes provision for his wife by will, and makes no allusion to dower, he intends such provision to be her full share of his estate including dower. The widow of course is concluded when he says expressly that the provision is in lieu and bar of dower, but he often omits to say that in express terms and the question arises whether such was his intention. And upon that subject the rule is as stated in Gordon v. Stevens (2 Hill Eq. 48 [27 Am. Dec. 445]), "That as the right of dower is a clear legal right, an intent to exclude that right must be manifested by express words or by clear and manifest implication," &c.

Taking this as the rule, it seems to me that such implication is manifest in this case. There could be no question about it if the whole real estate had been given to the widow for life. Shaffer v. Shaffer, 16 S. C., 625. If one moiety of it had been given, that would have shown such intent by implication. Bailey v. Boyce, 4 Strob. Eq., 84. Then why should not the same result follow when four-tenths of it was given to her? In the case last cited the testator gave to his wife, Eliza Henry, one-half of his estate, real and personal, and the other half to his daughter, Eliza Bailey, and the court held that the wife could not have dower because it would be "inconsistent with the provisions of *the will and conflicting with the evident intent of the testator to make an equal partition of his property." Upon what principle did that case proceed? Why, manifestly upon none other than this—that a certain proportion of his whole estate was given by the testator to his wife, and to take out dower first, before ascertaining that proportion, would be inconsistent with the provisions of the will. As I understand it, this principle is entirely independent of what the proportion may be, one-half, one-third, or four-tenths. In either case, taking out the dower first would equally defeat the intention of the testator.

*574

It does not seem to me that this view is answered by saying that the husband could not give more than he had, and that the wife's right of dower did not belong to him, and therefore he must be considered to have intended that the proportions named should be out of what remained after dower was assigned. That would certainly be a strained construction. The question is not one of power, but of intention, and, considering that the right to dower is in abeyance during the life of the husband, can it be doubted for an instant that the testator, when he spoke of his lands, meant the property itself of which he had the title and which, as understood in common parlance, was his, and was his to all intents and purposes, subject only to his wife's inchoate right of dower? He not only gave his lands to be divided in the proportions indicated, but he appointed three persons to make the division, and we cannot assume that he intended these gentlemen to divide, not his lands as stated, but two-thirds interest in them after allowing the wife's dower. I can have no doubt whatever that he meant all his lands, and that being his intention it follows that to take dower out before making the division would defeat that intention and would, as said by the court in Bailey v. Boyce, supra, "be directly inconsistent with the provisions of the will."

The view is, that the testator intended to dispose, by will, of his whole property, without regard to the wife's inchoate right to dower, and giving to the wife a certain proportion of that property, implies an intention to exclude dower in it as unmistakably as if the whole of it had been given to her. I am aware that there was a long contest in the English courts, whether a wife was entitled to dower in lands upon which her husband *had charged an annuity in her favor. It seems to have been finally settled that such charge did not necessarily exclude the widow's right to dower. But the question being merely as to the intention of the testator, that case is not identical with this, where the testator devises to the wife an arithmetical proportion of the land itself. I think the provisions of this will make a case of election; and that the widow cannot take under the will and against it at the same time. She may take the provision in the will or dower, but not both.

*575

In this view, the paper signed by the widow, after her husband's death, may be regarded as the expression of her election to take under the will.

Mr. Justice McIVER, dissenting. As I cannot concur in the conclusion reached by the majority of the court, I will proceed to state, as briefly as practicable, the reasons for my dissent. But two questions are raised by this appeal. 1st. Whether the provision made in the will of Peter Hair for his widow, the petitioner, is such as, if accepted, will exclude her claim for dower. 2nd. If not, whether the paper signed by the petitioner, which will be hereinafter set forth, operates as a bar or release of her right of dower.

For a proper understanding of these questions, a brief statement of the facts will be necessary. Peter Hair being seized and possessed of two tracts of land—one containing 167 acres, and the other 194 acres—departed this life on September 26, 1882, having first duly made his last will and testament, by which he disposed of his estate as follows:

To his wife, the petitioner, he gives four-tenths of all his real estate for life, and after her death he gives the same in fee to his daughter, Mrs. Hattie S. Manly; to the children of his son, J. S. Hair, he gives three-tenths of his real estate; and the remaining three-tenths to the children of his daughter, Mrs. N. C. Goldsmith, the wife of Wm. Goldsmith, with a provision that the portions which may go to his married granddaughters shall be settled to their sole and separate use. He then makes several specific bequests, viz., to his grandson, Peter Hair, his gold watch and chain; and to his grandson, Peter H. Goldsmith, his shot-gun and two fine pistols. *To the children of his daughter, Mrs. Goldsmith, he bequeaths whatever may be due to him by their father, Wm. Goldsmith; and to his daughter, Mrs. Hattie S. Manly, he gives all the residue of his estate. The will also provides for three persons designated therein to make a division of his real estate, in the proportions previously directed, amongst the several devisees named. And by a codicil to his will, he provides for the payment of $500 to the person who shall administer on his estate in lieu of all commissions and expenses, saying that his son-in-law, Wm. Goldsmith, had signified his willingness to become the administrator upon these terms.

*576

It seems that J. S. Hair and Mrs. Goldsmith were the children of a former marriage of the testator, and that Mrs. Manly was the only child of the marriage with the petitioner. Wm. Goldsmith, having qualified as administrator with the will annexed, procured from the petitioner on October 26, 1882, just one month after the death of the testator, her signature to the following paper, which is relied upon as, and which was held by the Circuit judge to be, a release of her right of dower in all the real estate of the testator, of which he died seized, viz.:

"I hereby acknowledge that I have received from William Goldsmith, administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Peter Hair, deceased, the four-tenths of the real estate of the deceased, devised to me under the will of said deceased, for and during my natural life; and I hereby accept the same in lieu of all claim of dower in the real estate of said deceased, of which he died seized and possessed. Witness my hand and seal this 26th day of October, A. D. 1882." (Signed) "R. C. Hair. (Seal.)" "In presence of (signed) A. J. Kilgore, M. C. Kilgore."

Under this state of facts, the questions above stated will be considered.

First, as to whether the terms of the will are such as put the widow to her election of dower, or of the portion devised to her by the will. It is conceded that the rule is well settled that in order to put the widow to her election, the testator must, either in express terms or by clear and necessary implication, declare his intention that she shall not have both. It is quite certain that there is no such intention declared in express terms by the *testator in this case, and the only inquiry, therefore, is whether such intention is clearly and necessarily implied from the terms which have been used. When it is considered how easy it would have been for the testator to have expressed his intention in terms, that the provision made for the wife was intended to be in lieu of dower, which, of course, it must be assumed that he knew she had the right to claim, and when it is remembered that dower is an estate which vests in the wife immediately upon the death of the husband, over which the husband can exercise no control, either by will or otherwise, it must be conceded that when a husband makes a devise of his real estate, or any portion thereof, the presumption always is that such devise is made subject to the widow's right of dower therein, and hence the burden is upon those who seek to deprive her of such right, to show that the terms of the will are such as necessarily imply that the intention was that she should not take both her dower and the provision made for her in the will. As is said by Dargan, Ch., in his Circuit decree, in Cunningham v. Shannon (4 Rich. Eq., 140), which was adopted, on this point, by the Court of Appeals: "Dower is a right which, inchoate during the coverture, becomes absolutely vested in the wife as an estate on the death of her husband, and is as much beyond his control or power of disposition as her own inheritance. It not being his to give, every devise which he makes of the land upon which the right of dower attaches is presumed to be given subject to the legal estate, unless the contrary appears on the face of the will, in express words, or by the strongest kind of implication."

*577

It does not appear to me that the respondents have succeeded in showing that the terms of the will under consideration necessarily imply that the testator intended that the provision made for his widow should be in lieu of her claim of dower. So far as I have been able to discover, the authorities do not establish any rule by which it can be absolutely declared what particular provisions of a will necessarily imply an intention to exclude the claim of dower, but that each case must be determined for itself, upon a consideration of the terms used in the will presented for construction. It certainly cannot be said that such an intention is to be implied from the fact that if the claim of dower is allowed, the *provisions made for other objects of the testator's bounty will be reduced in amount, for that would be the result in every case, and the necessary consequence would be that dower would be excluded in every case. The case of Bailey v.

*578

Boyce (4 Strob. Eq., 84), which, though decided by only two chancellors against one, less than a majority of the full court, ought properly to be considered as authority, may be regarded as establishing the doctrine that where a testator by his will divides his estate equally between his widow and his only daughter, such a provision must be regarded as necessarily implying an intention on his part to exclude the widow's claim of dower, upon the ground that such a claim, if allowed, would defeat the scheme of his will.

This case is relied upon as conclusive of the question now under consideration, for it is argued that the scheme of Hair's will was to divide his estate equally amongst the several objects of his bounty, and therefore that the doctrine established in Bailey v. Boyce should control here. But was equality the scheme of the will under consideration? It appears to me clear that it was not. On the contrary, out of all the various persons mentioned in the will as objects of the testator's bounty, only two of them (considering the children of J. S. Hair as one and the children of Mrs. Goldsmith as another) are given equal portions. To say nothing of the small specific bequests to the two grandsons who bore the testator's name, we find that the amount due to the testator by Wm. Goldsmith is given to his children, and the whole residue of the estate is given to Mrs. Manly. What was the amount of the indebtedness of Goldsmith to the testator, or what would be the probable value of the residue, does not appear, and we have no means of determining.

Even as to the real estate, I see no warrant for saying that the testator designed an equal distribution of his estate. The figures certainly do not show it, except as has been stated, as to the provision made for the two sets of grandchildren; and the suggestion that the share of Mrs. Manly was increased by one-tenth, because the enjoyment by her of her share was to be postponed until her mother's death, must be based entirely upon conjecture, as there is nothing in the terms of the will to warrant such a suggestion. The testator having burdened the whole of the por*tion intended for his daughter with the life estate of the widow, it does not seem unreasonable that the portions intended for his grandchildren should be likewise burdened with the dower or life estate of the widow to the extent of only one-third; and this may possibly have been the reason why the portion which the daughter was ultimately to have was enlarged one-tenth; but this, too, is mere conjecture.

*579

I have not deemed it necessary to cite the several authorities in support of the views herein advanced, as they may be found in the case of Cunningham v. Shannon, supra, though they are more fully collected and more elaborately considered in the dissenting opinion of Dargan, Ch., in Bailey v. Boyce, supra. It seems to me, therefore, that it does not appear from the terms of Peter Hair's will that the provision therein made for his widow was intended to be in lieu of her claim of dower. He has not said so, and there is nothing in the will from which such an intention is clearly and necessarily inferrible. The provision is not so large a proportion of his estate as would excite the belief that it must have been intended to be in lieu of dower. Indeed, as we are not informed as to the value of his personal estate, it is impossible for us to say what proportion is given to the widow, and the burden is on those who resist the claim of dower. It only exceeds by a very small fraction, one-fifteenth, the value of the dower in the real estate. The allowance of dower would not destroy the scheme of the will or defeat any of its provisions. The only effect would be to lessen the value of the portions given to the devisees, and that certainly is not sufficient to defeat the claim of dower. Braxton v. Freeman, 6 Rich., 35 [57 Am. Dec. 775].

The testator having no right to dispose of that portion of the real estate covered by the claim of dower, could only give three-tenths of his own estate subject to his disposition to his grandchildren, and not three-tenths of that which he had no right to dispose of. When he says, "I give three-tenths of my real estate to the children of Mrs. Goldsmith," he must, in the absence of anything showing a contrary intention, be regarded as meaning only three-tenths of that of which he had the right to dispose, and not as intending to include also three-tenths of that of which he did not have the right to dispose. Hence the allowance of the *claim of dower is not necessarily inconsistent with the devise of three-tenths of his real estate to the children of Mrs. Goldsmith.

*580

The next inquiry is as to the effect of the paper signed by the petitioner, a copy of which has hereinbefore been set out. The judge of probate having found that there was no sufficient evidence to show that her signature was improperly obtained, and the Circuit judge having concurred in this finding, there is no ground upon which it can be successfully assailed as not binding on the petitioner. It will be necessary, therefore, to consider its legal effect. It will be observed that as the paper was executed after the death of the petitioner's husband, and after her estate of dower had become vested, it cannot be regarded as a renunciation of an inchoate right of dower; but if it can have the effect attributed to it, it must be as the conveyance of an estate either by way of deed or by estoppel. It certainly cannot be regarded as a legal conveyance, for there is no grantee named, and there are no conveying words used. It does not even amount to such an informal conveyance or agreement to convey as would be given effect in equity. There is no consideration expressed in it, and none given, so far as I can see, from the evidence. The allegation that it was given to enable Wm. Goldsmith, as administrator, to settle up the estate, as well as in consideration of love and affection to the grandchildren of her deceased husband, has not only no support in the testimony, but is directly contradicted in the testimony of Mrs. Hair.

Nor do I see any foundation for the idea that it was in the nature of a "family settlement." The other parties surrendered nothing, and it does not even appear that any controversy had arisen calling for such a settlement. The position that the paper was executed in order to enable the petitioner to obtain immediate possession of the portion devised to her for life cannot be sustained, for there is not only no evidence that such was the consideration moving her to sign the paper, but as matter of law she was entitled to such possession. The paper amounted to nothing more than a naked declaration by the petitioner that she accepted something which she was clearly entitled to, in lieu of something else to which, in my judgment, she was equally entitled. The other parties gave up nothing, and the most that *can be made of it is that she gave up something to which she was clearly entitled in consideration of receiving something else to which she had as good a right before as she would have after the surrender. I do not think it needs any argument or authority to show that a court of equity would never enforce such a one-sided agreement.

*581

Nor do I think that the paper can be regarded as estopping her from asserting her claim of dower, for it does not appear that the parties claiming the benefit of such estoppel were induced by her execution of the paper to do, or omit to do, any act, or in any wise changed their position by the doing or omission of which they have sustained or might sustain any prejudice.

These views, thus hastily thrown out amidst the pressure of other official duties, compel me to withhold my concurrence in the view taken by the majority of the court.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTES OF CASES

Decided during the period comprised in this Volume, and not reported in full.

---

22 S. C. *582

*No. 1629. LANG v. WORKMAN. April Term, 1884.

[1. Receivers ⟸101.]

Moneys and assets turned over by the receiver of an estate to some of the creditors, to be accounted for on final settlement, are chargeable with only the legal rate of interest, notwithstanding a subsequent order in the cause permitting creditors to borrow the funds at 12 per cent. interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. § 189; Dec. Dig. ⟸101.]

[2. Receivers ⟸98.]

Where moneys of an estate were paid out by the receiver, without an order of court, to an attorney representing several creditors, such of the creditors so represented as are afterwards shown to have been alone entitled to receive dividends on their claims, are chargeable pro rata with the whole amount so received by their attorney, although he in fact distributed it pro rata among all his clients in the cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. § 182; Dec. Dig. ⟸98.]

Circuit decree of Fraser, J., affirmed on the first ground and reversed on the second. Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON (who, however, was overruled on the second ground), filed November 28, 1884.

No. 1631. THE STATE ex relatione BOOZER et al. v. THE MAYOR AND ALDERMEN OF THE CITY OF COLUMBIA. November Term, 1884.

[Mandamus ⟸74.]

On November 11, 1884, a petition was presented to the City Council of Columbia asking that an election be ordered under the provisions of the local option law. Gen. Stat., § 1746. No quorum being present, the matter was postponed until the next regular meeting of Council on November 25, when it was referred to a committee to ascertain and report whether the petition was signed by the required number of citizens. Before action taken by this committee, this application was made to the Supreme Court November 26 for a writ of mandamus requiring the City Council to order such election. The Council in their return state that their committee inform them that the petition is *not signed by the requisite number. This allegation was traversed by the relators. The court referred this issue of fact to a referee, who took testimony and reported that 505 votes were cast in the next preceding municipal election; that there were unauthorized signatures to the petition; but that there were authorized signatures of 165 legal voters, and of nine other voters who had not heretofore registered.

*583

This court, after argument, thereupon adjudged that the petition was signed by a number "equal to one third of the number of votes cast in the next preceding municipal election;" but that the City Council had not refused to discharge their ministerial duty, nor been guilty of unnecessary or unreasonable delay, and therefore the relators were not entitled to the writ of mandamus prayed for.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 150–157; Dec. Dig. ⟸74.]

Opinion PER CURIAM, December 9, 1884. Monteith & Ladson, for relators. F. W. McMaster, contra.

No. 1635. CURETON v. WESTFIELD. November Term, 1884. The facts of this case are the same as in the case next infra, except that no attempt was made to serve the answer until sixty days after the remittitur was filed with the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for Greenville County. Judgment of Hudson, J., affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, January 7, 1885. E. F. Stokes, for appellant. Wells & Orr, contra.

No. 1636. CURETON v. STOKES. November Term, 1884. On March 31, 1883, Judge Wallace overruled defendant's demurrer and gave him until April 3 to answer. Defendant did not then answer, but on April 4 gave notice of appeal from Judge Wallace's order. On April 5 defendant gave notice of a motion for further time to answer. On April 10 plaintiff moved for judgment, which was refused upon the ground that there was an appeal pending. Defendant thereupon withdrew his motion. The appeal was heard and dismissed (20 S. C., 582), and the remittitur filed in the court below March 17, 1884. On the same day defendant served a copy of his answer on plaintiff's attorneys, who refused to receive it. On the call of the cause at the next term defendant asked that his answer be admitted. Judge Hudson refused this application, and judgment was rendered by default for plaintiff. Defendant appealed. Held—

*584

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐87.]

*That giving further time to answer is a matter within the discretion of the Circuit judge, and his ruling thereon is not appealable. This case distinguished from Ayer v. Chassereau, 18 S. C., 597.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Lowry v. Jackson, 27 S. C. 324, 3 S. E. 473.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 559–569, 577–596; Dec. Dig. ⇐87.]

[2. Jury ⇐16.]

The rendition of a judgment by default is no violation of the right of trial by jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 84–94; Dec. Dig. ⇐16.]

[3. Limitation of Actions ⇐182.]

The plea of the statute of limitations can be made by answer only.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 676–680, 682, 695, 705; Dec. Dig. ⇐182.]

[4. Appeal and Error ⇐223.]

Error in the calculation of interest not brought to the attention of the Circuit judge, nor ruled upon by him, cannot be considered by the Supreme court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1338–1342, 1344, 1346–1350; Dec. Dig. ⇐223.]

Judgment affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, January 7, 1885. E. F. Stokes, for appellant. Wells & Orr, contra.

No. 1637. DAUNTLESS MANUFACTURING CO. v. DAVIS. November Term, 1884.

[1. Execution ⇐407; Receivers ⇐40.]

A Circuit judge may appoint a receiver in supplementary proceedings, notwithstanding another Circuit judge, upon the application of other creditors, had previously refused a similar application. It does not appear that the testimony was the same in the two proceedings, but even if so, the Circuit judge was not bound to adopt the same conclusion reached by another judge in a case between different parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1161; Dec. Dig. ⇐407; Receivers, Cent. Dig. § 66; Dec. Dig. ⇐40.]

[2. Execution ⇐407.]

Application for a receiver in supplementary proceedings may be made and granted, notwithstanding the pending of an action in the nature of a creditor's bill in the courts of the United States, to reach the property of the debtor, the moving party here not being a party to such action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1161; Dec. Dig. ⇐407.]

[3. Assignments for Benefit of Creditors ⇐189.]

An assignment by a debtor of all his property for the benefit of his creditors does not prevent supplementary proceedings a year later, and the appointment of a receiver thereunder, the validity or effect of the deed of assignment not being thereby adjudicated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments for Benefit of Creditors, Cent. Dig. §§ 585–589; Dec. Dig. ⇐189.]

[4. Assignments for Benefit of Creditors ⇐343.]

The remedy provided by statute for avoiding assignments does not seem to be exclusive of the remedy through supplementary proceedings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments for Benefit of Creditors, Cent. Dig. §§ 1050–1052; Dec. Dig. ⇐343.]

[5. Appeal and Error ⇐150.]

A party assigned a judgment held by him to one D., and afterwards made a general assignment for the benefit of his creditors. Under supplementary proceedings afterwards taken out against this party, D. testified that the assignment to him was *without consideration, and that he made no claim to the judgment. The judge appointed a receiver and directed D. to transfer the judgment to this receiver. Held, that D. was not bound by this order, but that the defendant in the proceedings was not affected and therefore could not appeal.

*585

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Globe Phos. Co. v. Pinson, 52 S. C. 192, 29 S. E. 549.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 938; Dec. Dig. ⇐150.]

Order of Kershaw, J., affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, January 7, 1885. W. L. Wait, Wells & Orr, for appellant. J. H. Heyward, contra.

No. 1638. DOMINICK v. FARR. April Term, 1884.

[Property ⇐4.]

Conrad Farr permitted his son John to erect three houses on a tract of land, which he intended to give to John. John sold these houses to plaintiff in 1868, but remained in possession. Afterwards Conrad Farr died, and his administrator brought action against the distributees and creditors of the deceased; and under this proceeding this tract of land was sold to one Hope. At this sale Dominick gave notice of his claim to these houses. Hope sold to John Farr and his two brothers, George and Benson Farr. In 1873 Dominick brought this action against John Farr to recover these houses. John answered, relying upon his purchase from Hope, and the statute of limitations, and alleging that his two brothers were necessary parties.

Plaintiff then had George and Benson made parties defendant, who answered relying upon their purchase from Hope. Dominick received from the estate of Conrad Farr a dividend on a claim which he held against Conrad. Wallace, J., held that the houses were personal property and therefore did not pass under the deed conveying the property of Conrad Farr; but that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. Also, that George and Benson had no interest in the property. He dismissed the complaint with costs in favor of the defendants. On appeal, this judgment was affirmed.

[Ed. Note. Cited in De Laine v. Alderman, 31 S. C. 275, 9 S. E. 950.

For other cases, see Property, Cent. Dig. §§ 4 6; Dec. Dig. ⇐4.]

Opinion by Mr. Justice McGOWAN, January 7, 1885. L. J. Jones, for appellant. Moorman & Simkins, contra.

No. 1639. WRIGHT v. MARS. April Term, 1884. In action commenced January 12, 1882, on promissory note which fell due August 6–9, 1861, against the executor of the maker (who died in December, 1861), there was evidence of an admission made to plaintiff by the executor in 1881, which was relied upon as a new *promise. Witherspoon, J., in the language of the Brief, "charged the jury that if they found that such new promise had been made, it was sufficient to remove the bar of the statute if made within four years prior to the commencement of this action; and if they did not so find, the bar of the statute was complete." He also charged the jury "upon the nature and effect of the plea of the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of time." He refused plaintiff's request to charge: "That the plea of presumption of payment is not applicable to this case, and, if it were, the same promise necessary to remove the bar of the statute would remove the bar of the presumption of payment." Verdict for defendant, and plaintiff appealed alleging error in this refusal to charge.

*586

[Appeal and Error ⇐1067; Payment ⇐66; Trial ⇐261.]

Held, that the presumption of payment is applicable as well to cases in which a bar is prescribed by the statute of limitations as to other cases, and therefore there was no error in refusing the first clause of the request; that the second clause of the request states a correct principle of law, but the judge was not bound to separate it from the incorrect principle with which it was connected in this request. Moreover, under the charge of the judge, the jury must have found that there was no new promise, and therefore the refusal of the judge was immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4229; Dec. Dig. ⇐1067; Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 176–188; Dec. Dig. ⇐66; Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 484, 660, 671, 673, 675; Dec. Dig. ⇐261.]

Judgment affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, January 10, 1885. G. S. Mower, for appellant. Moorman & Simkins, contra.

No. 1643. THE STATE ex rel. THE SAVANNAH VALLEY RAILROAD COMPANY v. THE CITY COUNCIL OF ANDERSON. November Term, 1884.

[Municipal Corporations ⇐863, 935.]

This was a petition to the Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus to require the City Council of Anderson to issue the bonds in aid of additional subscription to the Savannah Valley R. R. Co., voted at an election on November 28, 1884, which was validated and confirmed by an act of the general assembly on December 23, 1884. 18 Stat., 755.

The City Council answered averring their willingness to discharge their duty whenever ascertained, but that at the time of said election the city charter (17 Stat., 980) limited the indebtedness of said city to $25,000, which indebtedness existed at the time of the election; and that by an act amending their charter, approved *December 24, 1884 (18 Stat., 812), all bonds issued by said city were to bear interest payable semi-annually, whereas the bonds here prayed for bore interest payable annually. The relators replied alleging that the limit imposed by the charter had been repealed by implication by act of December 24, 1883 (18 Stat., 633); and further, that in this matter the validating act must control.

*587

The court passed a short order directing the bonds to be issued, with interest payable annually.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1824–1827, 1951; Dec. Dig. ⇐863, 935.]

Opinion PER CURIAM, January 13, 1885. B. F. Whitner, for relators. Brown, Tribble & Brown, contra.

No. 1645. HYRNE v. ERWIN. November Term, 1884.

[Appeal and Error ⇐807.]

The appeal in this case having been dismissed by the clerk, it was restored to the docket by order of this court, on appellant's motion, after notice to the respondent, who failed to appear. This was a motion to dismiss this appeal, so restored to the docket, upon affidavits explaining respondent's failure to appear, and setting forth the facts upon which the appeal should be dismissed. But the court refused the motion, no facts being stated, except such as accrued prior to the order restoring the case to the docket, at which time the respondent had his opportunity to present these facts.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Clark Bros. v. Wimberly, 24 S. C. 138, 139, 140; Tribble v. Poore, 28 S. C. 571, 572, 6 S. E. 577; Dial v. Dial, 33 S. C. 607, 12 S. E. 474, 475.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3185; Dec. Dig. ⟸807.]

Opinion PER CURIAM, January 27, 1885. J. J. Brown, for the motion. Robert Aldrich, contra.

No. 1646. QUATTLEBAUM v. BLACK. November Term, 1884.

[Appeal and Error ⟸713.]

This was a motion by J. W. Tompkins, respondent, to have inserted in the Brief in this case, the order for judgment in the case of Tompkins v. Barr, rendered by the Circuit judge after the hearing of this case, the purpose being to furnish additional ground for sustaining the Circuit decree by showing that the rights of the appellants had been determined and settled in said case of Tompkins v. Barr. The motion was refused, the court saying that they could not incorporate in the case as made for appeal, evidence of a fact which occurred after the trial below, and which was not, nor could have been, introduced there.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2956; Dec. Dig. ⟸713.]

Opinion PER CURIAM, January 30, 1885. A. S. Tompkins, Gary & Evans, for motion. Shepherd Bros., contra.

*588

No. 1647. MAYBIN v. COLUMBIA & GREENVILLE RAILROAD *COMPANY. April Term, 1884.

[Carriers ⟸94.]

This was an action to recover the value of two bales of cotton. Plaintiff proved that he lost two bales of cotton from a platform under his charge, about 450 yards from the depot of the defendant, and that about the same time two bales of cotton were shipped from the depot at this place which were reported afterwards from Charleston as unclaimed, with some evidence of similarity of mark on one of these bales with the mark on one of the lost bales of plaintiff. These bales were afterwards claimed by other parties, and delivered to the claimants by the defendant. Fraser, J., granted a nonsuit, and on appeal his judgment was affirmed, this court saying "it was essential for the plaintiff to show that the cotton in question was delivered to the railroad company; and of this, we think, there was a total want of any evidence whatever."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 367–395, 456; Dec. Dig. ⟸94.]

Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, February 14, 1885. Moorman & Simkins, for appellant. J. C. Haskell, contra.

No. 1655. DOUTHIT v. WESTFIELD. November Term, 1884. These were two cases heard together, as involving the same questions. The following points were decided:

[1. Appeal and Error ⟸106.]

A refusal to grant a motion for continuance is not reviewable on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 729; Dec. Dig. ⟸106.]

[2. Equity ⟸395.]

"While perhaps it is the better practice, as a general rule, for the master to await an order from the court before suing on bonds held by him in his official capacity, yet such action would not, in all cases, be so wholly without authority as to make it legal error for the Circuit judge to refuse to dismiss the complaint on that ground." In this case there was such an order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 854–856; Dec. Dig. ⟸395.]

[3. Equity ⟸399.]

In a chancery case, the judge may order a reference as to the facts, but neither party has a legal right to demand it. If the judge so desires, he may have the testimony taken before him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 864, 865, 867, 868; Dec. Dig. ⟸399.]

A counter-claim disallowed, the amount thereof having been ordered to be paid out under supplementary proceedings, and under such order paid by this plaintiff.

Decree of Hudson, J., affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, February 27, 1885. E. F. Stokes, for appellant. M. F. Ansel, T. Q. Donaldson, contra.

*589

*A petition for rehearing was filed in this case, but it was refused.

No. 1661. COLLINS v. ROUMILLAT. November Term, 1884.

[Appeal and Error ⟸275, 766.]

This was an order dismissing an appeal on motion, because (1) the exceptions to the rulings during the trial, and to the order refusing a new trial, had not been furnished to the presiding judge; and (2) the Brief presented to this court was not the case as settled, and was not in compliance with the requirements of rule V.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1566, 1567, 1647, 3101, 3126; Dec. Dig. ⇐275, 766.]

Opinion by Mr. Justice McGOWAN, March 3, 1885. A. G. Magrath & Son, for the motion. W. M. Thomas, contra.

No. 1668. BEST v. SANDERS. November Term, 1884.

[Abatement and Revival ⇐74.]

A suit for partition was commenced in 1854, and Chan. Dunkin, in February, 1855, declared the right of the parties, and ordered a writ of partition to issue. The writ was issued, but no return was ever made because of disagreement among the commissioners. In February, 1856, the cause was marked "ended" on the docket by Chan. Johnston, and all the papers were put into a package, labelled and entered by its title on the "General Index." The affidavits now submitted show that there had been no partition, and no proceedings subsequent to the issuing of the writ.

This was a motion made before Aldrich, J., at Barnwell, in May, 1883, by the original plaintiff (who was then an infant, who married in 1858, and attained her majority in 1860) for leave to file and serve a supplemental complaint, the original parties and the heirs of those since deceased being named as parties in the supplemental complaint, and notified of the motion. The Circuit judge refused the motion.

On appeal this court held that the evidence showed that the entry on the docket, if not a mistake, was premature, and that the case was never ended; that under the old equity practice, the right to revive would exist without any well defined limit in point of time, and that it might have been accomplished by a bill in the nature of a bill of revivor and supplement; that this right has been substantially preserved by the code of procedure (§ 142); that this is a question relating merely to pleading, and does not affect the merits, but there is no authority for applying *the statute of limitations to the right to institute such a proceeding, although the relief therein demanded may be barred.

*590

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Bryce v. Massey, 35 S. C. 140, 14 S. E. 768; Dunham v. Carson, 42 S. C. 388, 20 S. E. 197; De Loach v. Sarratt, 55 S. C. 274, 33 S. E. 2, 35 S. E. 441.

For other cases, see Abatement and Revival, Cent. Dig. § 129; Dec. Dig. ⇐74.]

Judgment reversed. Opinion by Mr. Justice McGOWAN, March 13, 1885. I. L. Tobin, for appellant. No counsel contra.

No. 1671. CLEMONS v. C., C. & A. R. R. COMPANY. November Term, 1884.

[Appeal and Error ⇐1177.]

This was an action to recover the value of cross-ties and wood furnished by plaintiff to defendant. The trial justice gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the Circuit judge (Hudson) affirmed the judgment below. On appeal this court approved the findings below as to the cross-ties, but held that there was no evidence whatever as to the wood; and granted a new trial nisi.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4597–4604, 4606–4610; Dec. Dig. ⇐1177.]

Opinion by Mr. Justice McGOWAN, March 16, 1885. J. T. Barron, for appellant. H. A. Meltze, contra.

No. 1693. MILLER v. MORRISON. November Term, 1884. One Rives put $10,000 in Confederate money in the hands of defendant in 1864 to speculate with in the buying and selling of negroes, cotton, &c., the defendant to receive one-half of the net profits. At the close of the war defendant had on hand three negroes and some cotton. In 1870 Rives assigned his claim to plaintiff's intestate, who commenced this action in March, 1882. The complaint was dismissed by Aldrich, J., who held, among other things, that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. On appeal, held—

[1. Limitation of Actions ⇐197.]

That the finding of fact by the referee, concurred in by the Circuit judge, that Rives had demanded a settlement in 1866, approved, as it is sustained by evidence in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 722–726; Dec. Dig. ⇐197.]

[2. Limitation of Actions ⇐102.]

That the conduct of the parties show that the trust relation previously existing between them was terminated in 1865 or 1866; a reasonable time thereafter was allowed defendant for a settlement, and he was then liable to an action by Rives. Therefore this action was barred when it was commenced in 1882.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 494–505; Dec. Dig. ⇐102.]

[3. Appeal and Error ⇐169.]

A question not raised nor considered below cannot be considered here.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1018–1034; Dec. Dig. ⇐169.]

Judgment affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, April 21, 1885. W. B. Wilson, for appellant. C. E. Spencer, contra.

*591

*No. 1705. Ex parte FERGUSON, Sheriff, In re SULLIVAN, DREW & CO. v. HAMBLIN. November Term, 1884. Hamblin gave a chattel mortgage to several of his creditors. Afterwards, but before condition broken, several other creditors levied attachments upon the property covered by this mortgage, some of which attachments were afterwards vacated. After this levy, but before the condition of the mortgage was broken, the mortgagees demanded these goods from the sheriff, who refused to surrender them. The claims upon which the attachments were issued were reduced to judgment, and the executions thereon were levied on these same goods. This action was then commenced by one of these judgment creditors against all other claimants to have the mortgage declared fraudulent, and for a sale of the goods and distribution of the proceeds according to the rights of the parties. A consent order was passed, directing the sheriff to sell the goods and put the proceeds into a savings bank, subject to the further order of the court. In this action the mortgage was sustained, and as a result thereof, the judgment and attaching creditors would receive nothing.

The sheriff then intervened by petition, praying that he be allowed to reimburse himself for his expenses, disbursements, and costs. Kershaw, J., decreed that the sheriff pay the fund in bank, together with all accumulated interest, to the mortgagees, less the actual disbursements and expenses of said sheriff necessarily incurred in the sale so made under and since the order of sale, together with commissions on the amount of such sales; also that the complainant pay the costs of clerk and master in this cause, and that every other party pay his own costs; and that the sheriff vouch his claims in this cause to be paid by the parties liable. On appeal, held—

[1. Sheriffs and Constables ⟸74.]

That the sheriff is entitled to reimburse himself out of the proceeds of sale for all expenses and disbursements since the institution of this action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Cent. Dig. §§ 93–96; Dec. Dig. ⟸74.]

[2. Sheriffs and Constables ⟸74.]

But not for expenses and disbursements in and about the taking and safe keeping of these goods under the attachments and executions prior to the commencement of this action. Mr. Justice McIVER dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Cent. Dig. §§ 93–96; Dec. Dig. ⟸74.]

[3. Sheriffs and Constables ⟸74.]

That the sheriff may vouch his bill of disbursements and costs in this cause, but not his bill for expenditures incurred in *the attachment suits. Mr. Justice McIVER dissenting as to disbursements (distinguishable from costs) incurred in the preservation of the property (before this action was brought), out of which this fund was realized.

*592

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Cent. Dig. §§ 93–96; Dec. Dig. ⟸74.]

[4. Chattel Mortgages ⟸201.]

That the mortgagees are entitled to the interest accrued on the fund while on deposit in the bank.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 360; Dec. Dig. ⟸201.]

[5. Appeal and Error ⟸984.]

That this being a chancery case, the general direction of the Circuit judge as to costs will not be disturbed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3815, 3881–3888; Dec. Dig. ⟸984.]

Judgment modified. Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, May 9, 1885. Simonton & Barker, for the sheriff. Smythe & Lee, for plaintiff and other judgment creditors. J. N. Nathans, for mortgagees.

APPENDIX

22 S. C. *593

*At the suggestion of Mr. Justice McGowan, the decree of Hon. J. J. Maher, Circuit judge, in the case of THE STATE v. THE SOUTH CAROLINA PHOSPHATE COMPANY, LIMITED, alias THE OAK POINT MINES, is here inserted. This decree was as follows:

This is an information filed by the attorney general in which it is alleged that the defendants have intruded upon the rights and property of the state in North Wimbee Creek, a navigable stream, useful for purposes of trade and commerce, in which the tide from the sea ebbs and flows, by digging, mining, and removing from the bed of said stream, below usual high water mark, phosphate rock and phosphatic deposits of a stated quantity and value; and that they are engaged in such business and intend to pursue it; and judgment is demanded for the value of the rock and deposits so appropriated, and for a perpetual injunction to restrain like operations in future. Defendants in their answer to the information admit the acts charged, and that they are engaged in and intend to continue the business of digging, mining, and removing said rock and deposits, but deny that they have appropriated the quantity alleged; that said creek is a navigable stream; that the rock and deposits therein are the property of the state.

Upon this issue the cause was referred, by a consent order, to Asher D. Cohen, Esq., as special referee, "to report generally with any special matter." The report of the special referee was presented at the June term, 1874, wherein certain findings of fact were set forth, and, at the suggestion of the counsel, a question was proposed for determination by a jury, under instructions as to the law, viz.: Is North Wimbee Creek a navigable stream? In this report reference is made in general terms to a certain grant as part of and to be submitted with the report under which defendants set up a claim of title to low water mark in the bed of said creek. It is proper to state here that said grant bears *date June 17, 1869, and purports to convey to one Henry M. Stuart 343 21-100 acres of land, bounded north and northeast by North Wimbee Creek, and south and southeast by South Wimbee Creek, "and on each and every of said water courses extending to low water mark."

*594

The report being read and filed, a consent order was taken June 8, 1874, confirming said findings of fact and referring it back to the special referee "to take the testimony and report the facts as to the remaining questions of fact in the cause and the testimony in connection therewith." On the coming in of the report of the special referee, at February term, 1875, the cause was brought on to be heard upon the pleadings, the findings of fact set forth in the two reports, and certain exceptions on the part of the plaintiff to the second report, and was argued by the counsel of the respective parties. Further preliminary statement is deemed unnecessary.

Referring to the papers in the cause, which will speak intelligibly for themselves, I proceed at once to rule upon the exceptions in their order, and will then state my conclusions as to the law upon the merits.

1. The pleadings raise three issues: (1) As to the quantity of rock appropriated; (2) as to the navigability of the creek; and (3) as to the title of the state in the bed of the creek. The referee reported facts as to the first and third of these issues, and as the order referring the case back limited inquiry to the "remaining questions of fact," it is plain that the second reference was restricted to facts embraced in the general question as to the navigability of the stream. If this question had been submitted to a jury, as was first intended, their verdict would have ripened the case for final determination; and it is manifest from the terms of the order of June 8, 1874, confirming the referee's findings of facts, that they were closed from further investigation. But it appears that the findings now excepted to are based upon testimony which was admitted without objection, and that the referee was not called on to determine the scope of the order until the reference had been closed and requests of counsel were presented. I think, under these circumstances, that the referee rightly conceived his duty in considering such testimony, and in reporting his conclusions thereon; and these *being before the court, without complaint of any prejudice worked by the introduction of the testimony, should not be discarded in deference to an objection which now assumes a purely technical form. The exception is overruled.

*595

2. If the question as to the length of the bar up and down the creek depended entirely on the estimates of the witnesses who spoke from mere observation, I would not feel warranted in disturbing the referee's findings. But the wide differences that prevailed in these estimates give special prominence and weight to any testimony on this point which is founded on actual measurement. I think the map made by Edward F. Kittoe should control in determining the length of the bar. He is a civil engineer and surveyor by profession, and also superintendent of defendants' works, and he made this map for the use of the dredge and to keep account where it worked. True, he did not vouch for its perfect accuracy, yet he testified conformably to it in stating that the bar averages two hundred and fifty yards in length. Allowing for some inexactness in the measurement, the map still outweighs, in my judgment, estimates based on observations more or less casual, and I am satisfied that the length of the bar does not exceed three hundred yards. The hydrographical map of Barbot and Smith supports this conclusion, and the weight of the general testimony is to the same effect. The exception is sustained and the court substitutes this finding for that of the referee: That the length of the bar up and down the creek is about three hundred yards.

3. The United States coast survey was very properly adopted by the referee as the most scientific and exact representation of "the depth of water and tides in said stream." The soundings, as expressed in the chart, show the depth of mean low water. A section of the bar is represented as dry at low water, and the depth of mean low water upon the remainder of the bar is given as six inches. The fall of low water below the plane of reference, at spring tides, is seven inches, and the height of low water above the plane of reference at neap tide is six inches. These are facts in the case which have not been discredited. I am unable to reconcile them with the findings of the referee, that ordinarily the plateau practically runs dry at low tide. Such is undoubtedly the case at low spring tide, and that it is frequently *so at ordinary low tide, when off-land winds prevail, is made clear by the testimony. But I cannot understand how a place upon which the mean depth of low water is six inches can ordinarily be dry. The findings of the referee must be corrected in this particular, and the court substitutes the following: That at extreme low tides, and frequently at low tides when the same are affected by off-land winds, the plateau practically runs dry, &c.

*596

4. The conclusion of the referee does not seem to me to be compatible with that suggested as the proper conclusion in this exception. Both results are, I think, regularly deducible from the data given in the report. The referee states the rise of the tide upon the plateau to be about six feet, gives the rate of rise and fall, and concludes that for about twelve hours in each twenty-four there is a depth of from two and a half to three feet of water. Plainly this statement does not convey the idea that during the time specified there is no greater depth of water on the plateau than two and a half or three feet. I do not perceive any error in this conclusion, and accordingly overrule the exception.

5. There is no proper or sufficient proof of the existence of old rice fields now submerged with salt water on the promontory towards Horse Landing. The testimony on this point is mere hearsay, and this of the most vague and indefinite character. Old residents on the creek who were examined make no mention of this circumstance, which could not possibly have escaped their observation if it really existed. The general testimony makes decidedly against the probability of rice cultivation on Kean's Neck at any period of the past, and it is certain that for the last forty years rice has not been planted on the creek, except at its extreme headwaters, eight miles at least from the bar, and on the east of the stream where the waters of the Combahee are accessible for purposes of irrigation. The finding of the referee is reversed, so far as it certifies the existence of old rice fields on the promontory.

6. For reasons stated in the ruling upon the first exception, the finding impugned by the sixth exception must stand. But the clear weight of the testimony entitles the plaintiff to a finding of further matter, as suggested in the exception, and the court makes such finding, as follows: That the lands on either side of North Wimbee Creek, where the phosphate beds in con*troversy are deposited, are not now nor have they ever been rice lands.

*597

7. The seventh exception is overruled.

The questions to be considered are: 1. Whether North Wimbee Creek is a navigable stream? and if such, then 2. Whether defendants have established title against the state to the bed of the creek below usual high water mark, and if so, to what extent? To low water mark only or to the centre of the stream?

I. Our own cases afford little light on the subject of navigability, beyond the observation of Judge Nott, Cates v. Wadlington (1 McCord, 580 [10 Am. Dec. 699]), that "that cannot be considered a navigable river the natural obstructions of which prevent the passage of boats of any description whatever." In the case of the Daniel Ball (10 Wallace, 557 [19 L. Ed. 999]), the Supreme Court of the United States held that rivers are navigable in fact "when they are used or are susceptible of being used in their ordinary condition as highways for commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water."

This definition was followed and further elucidated in the case of the Montello (11 Wall., 411 [20 L. Ed. 191]), where it was held that "the capability of use by the public, for the purposes of transportation and commerce, affords the true criterion of the navigability of a river, rather than extent and manner of that use. If it be capable in its natural state of being used for purposes of commerce, no matter in what mode the commerce may be conducted, it is navigable in fact, and becomes in law a public river or highway." The court considered the vital and essential point to be "whether the natural navigation of the river is such that it affords a channel for useful commerce. If this be so, the river is navigable in fact, although its navigability may be encompassed with difficulties by reason of natural barriers, such as rapids and sand bars." Numerous authorities are cited in support of these propositions. The following remarks of Chief Justice Shaw, in Rowe v. Granite Bridge Corp. (21 Pick., 344), are quoted with approbation: "It is not every small creek in which a fishing skiff or gunning canoe can be made to float at high water which is deemed navigable; but, in order to give it the character of a navigable stream, it must be generally and commonly useful to some purpose of trade or agriculture."

*598

*The well considered case of Morgan v. King (35 New York, 454), is among the cases cited. The true rule on this subject was there declared to be "that the public have a right of way in every stream which is capable, in its natural state, and its ordinary volume of water, of transporting, in a condition fit for market, the products of the forests or rivers, or of the tillage of the soil upon its banks." It may be observed here, that Mr. Washburn, in his work on easements, page 397, states that this rule is pretty generally received in the United States. The court further held that it is not essential to the public easement "that the capacity of the stream, as above defined, should be continuous, or, in other words, that its ordinary state, at all seasons of the year, should be such as to make it navigable; if it is ordinarily subject to periodical fluctuations in the volume and height of its water, attributable to natural causes, and recurring as regularly as the seasons; and if its periods of high water, or navigable capacity, continue a sufficient length of time to make it useful as a highway, it is subject to the public easement."

I shall mention but one other case cited in the Montello, as expressing, in a concise definition, what seems to me to be the fair result of the leading authorities in this country on the question of navigability. In Hickok v. Hine (23 Ohio, 523; 13 Amer. Rep., 255), it was held that "a river is navigable which is capable of floating to market the products of the country through which it passes, or upon which commerce may be conducted; and from the fact of its being so navigable, it becomes in law a public river or highway."

The actual use commonly made of North Wimbee Creek, during the past forty years, by the proprietors of the six flourishing plantations bordering upon its banks, in the transportation of their crops to market, and of their return supplies, demonstrates the navigable capacity of the stream for purposes useful to trade and agriculture; and my conclusion is that North Wimbee Creek is a public navigable stream.

II. As to the title to the soil or bed of the creek, and first as to the space between usual high and low water mark, defendants claim this portion of the bed of the creek under the grant to Stuart. The validity of the grant is disputed, it being maintained on the part of the state that the bed of a navigable stream, *in which the tide ebbs and flows, is not "vacant land," within the meaning of the act of 1791 (5 Stat., 168), under which this grant purports to have been issued; and hence that it passed no interest in the soil of the creek below ordinary high water mark. The authority of the legislature to vest the title to such land in an individual is not controverted. The point made is, that lands of this character have been reserved from location and grant, under the provisions of the statute regulating vacant lands, and that a special act of the legislature is necessary to confer title in respect to such lands. Certainly no express reservation to this effect is to be found in any of the statutes relating to the public land.

*599

Land, in its legal signification, comprehends soil covered by water. 2 Black. Com., 18, 19. The words "lands liable to rates" may extend to navigation, cuts, and canals, as well as to quays and wharves. Regina v. Leeds and Liverpool Canal Companies (7 Adol. and El., 685), per Patterson, J. "They are not the less land for being covered with water." Potter's Dwarris, 290. "Vacant lands, in the sense of our statutes, are lands that have not been 'taken up' by individuals, nor appropriated to particular public purposes." Thus, by an act of 1695, § 15 (2 Stat., 101), lands escheated and reverted to the lords proprietors, under a former act, by reason of having "lain waste," and no rent having been paid, "shall be deemed, to all intents and purposes, as lands untaken up." By an act of 1731, § 7 (3 Stat., 292), lands not registered as therein required, "shall be deemed, reputed, and taken as vacant lands," and it is declared lawful for any person "to take up the same." An act of 1778 (4 Stat., 404) recites, in preamble, that certain land was "not granted, but still vacant." An act of 1787, § 7 (5 Stat., 39), avoids grants of land for Sullivan's Island, Middle Bay Island, "or any other lands whatever, which have been, or are now, appropriated for any particular public purposes."

In Thomas v. Daniel (2 McC., 354), it was held that land ceded to the state by the Cherokee Indians, with reservation of right to inhabit same during good behavior, was not vacant land, and a grant of such land was declared void. The court say: "Land appropriated by the legislature is not vacant, be that appropriation what it may, to individuals, to public purposes, or *to the Cherokees." In McHugh v. Dinkins (2 Brev., 324), it was held that lands escheated to the state were not vacant lands, the ground of the judgment being that a public sale of such property was required by the statute regulating escheats. And in State v. Arledge (2 Bail., 401 [23 Am. Dec. 145]), it was held that lands purchased by the state from a corporation to which they had been originally granted, were not subject to grant as vacant land. The decision was rested on the authority of the adjudged cases as to escheated land, without, it would seem, adverting to the special reason upon which they were based.

*600

It appears, therefore, that there is nothing in the legal signification of the term, "vacant land," to restrict its application, so as to exclude land covered by water, which has not been appropriated to individual or public use, by authority of law.

That land flowed by the tide is the subject of grant in this state is conclusively shown by statutes in which "all lands granted in this state" were classified and rated for purposes of taxation. The first of these was the act of 1784 (4 Stat., 627) to raise supplies. This classification was continued in the supply acts of each succeeding year until 1815, when it was made permanent by "An act to fix the value of lands in this state for taxation," &c. (6 Stat., 7). In these acts "tide swamp not generally affected by salt or freshets" and "salt marsh" proved to be "incapable of immediate cultivation" are set down, the first taking rank as the most valuable land in the state. There is no trace of any special legislation providing for the location and grant of lands of this character, and the necessary inference is that they were disposed of under the general regulations prescribed by the statutes relating to vacant lands.

An act of 1714 (7 Stat., 61 and 62, §§ 3 and 5) recognizes claims of individuals, under grant or conveyance, to sundry lots on the bay in Charleston, "from high to low water mark," and imposes penalties and forfeiture for neglect by such claimants to build their proportion of the sea wall. An act of 1719 (7 Stat., 69, § 20), reciting that owners of front lots on the bay were discouraged from building their part of the sea wall by reason of others claiming lots before them to low water mark, provides a mode of adjusting disputes, and declares that upon failure of the claimant of the lower lot to present his claim within a stated *time, said lot should be vested in the owner of the front lot, "he paying to the owner of the lot to the eastward from high to low water mark his full charges that he was at for his grant for the same," &c.; and section 22 provides that "upon the title to the front and lower lots becoming vested in the same person, they should not again be separated, and if the front lot should be disposed of by sale or gift, the other should go along with it as an appurtenance."

*601

An act of 1787 (5 Stat., 39, § 4) allowed persons to carry off oysters and oyster shells below high water mark from land for which surveys had been taken out but not passed and confirmed by grants under the signature of the governor since the opening of the land office by the act of 1784. And (§ 6) allowed owners of wharves and low water lots in Charleston exclusive privilege, for six months after the passage of the act, of obtaining grants for land covered by water in front of their wharves or lots as far as the western channel of Cooper River and the northern channel of Ashley River. By act of 1836 (7 Stat., 151), all vacant land not legally vested in individuals in the harbor of Charleston, covered by water, was vested in the city council of Charleston for public purposes, &c.

These citations from our statutes are, to my mind, conclusive of the question under consideration. They show unmistakably that lands below high water mark in tidal navigable rivers have been uniformly recognized by the legislature as embraced within the description of vacant lands, and subject as such to location and grant under the general regulations of the land office. This practical interpretation of its own language by the legislature, being in accordance with the comprehensive meaning which it bears in law, there would seem to be an end to the question whether a grant of land to low water mark in the bed of a tidal navigable stream, issued in conformity to the provisions of the act of 1791, passed the title of the state to the grantor.

My conclusion is that defendants have valid title, under the grant of 1869 to Henry M. Stuart (from whom they derived), to the soil between ordinary high water and low water mark in said creek, embraced within the lines of said grant. As to the title to the bed of the creek below ordinary low water mark, I hold that it is in the state. No express grant conveying this land has *been produced. No long-continued acts of ownership in the bed of the creek have been shown in support of a prescriptive right. Angell on Tide Waters, 96; Tyler on Boundaries, 36.

*602

The possession for forty years of the adjacent land by those under whom defendants claim undoubtedly raises the presumption of a grant co-extensive with the limits of such possession. But to extend the boundary to the centre of the creek would be to overturn an established principle of the common law which has never yet been questioned by any court in England or this country. The tendency of American decisions has been to restrict riparian proprietorship even upon navigable rivers above the tides, and not to enlarge it in respect to navigable streams in which the tide ebbs and flows. Whenever the common law test of navigability has been repudiated, the common law consequences of navigability have been held to attach. Nothing more can be claimed under the grant presumed from the possession of the upland than would result from an express grant calling for the creek as a boundary, conceding that usage would carry the line to low water mark, the principle on which it could be extended further upon the facts of this case is not to be found in the common law, nor in any decision that has come within my notice.

The plaintiff is entitled to judgment in conformity to this decision. The order for judgment will be settled at chambers, upon motion of either party, opposite counsel being duly notified.

AMENDMENTS OF THE RULES OF COURT

22 S. C. *603

*The last publication of the rules of court in book form was on July 1, 1882. Since that time some amendments have been adopted which are here reprinted for the convenience of the profession.

SUPREME COURT RULES.

Rule XIII. It is ordered that rule XIII. of this court be stricken out and the following inserted in lieu thereof: "In the hearing of causes in this court, counsel will be limited to two hours on each side, in which will be counted the time occupied in reading the Brief or Case; and the time thus allowed may be apportioned amongst the counsel on the same side at their discretion: Provided, however, that such time may be extended upon special application, in writing, to be filed before the case is called for hearing, stating reasons satisfactory to the court for such extension." Adopted May 30, 1884.

It is ordered that rule XIII. be amended by adding thereto the following words: "Hereafter counsel, in the course of their argument, will not be permitted to read from books, except by special leave of the court, which will only be granted in such exceptional cases as in the opinion of the court may call for a departure from this rule. When counsel wish to quote from books, they will be required to use written or printed extracts therefrom." Adopted June 2, 1885.

So that rule XIII. now reads as follows:

Rule XIII. In the hearing of causes in this court, counsel will be limited to two hours on each side, in which will be counted the time occupied in reading the Brief or Case; and the time thus allowed may be apportioned amongst the counsel on the same side at their discretion: Provided, however, that such time may be extended upon special application in writing, to be filed before the case is called for hearing, stating reasons satisfactory to the court for such extension.

*604

*Hereafter counsel, in the course of their argument, will not be permitted to read from books, except by special leave of the court, which will only be granted in such exceptional cases as in the opinion of the court may call for a departure from this rule. When counsel wish to quote from books, they will be required to use written or printed extracts therefrom.

22 S. C. 604

CIRCUIT COURT RULES.

Rule XI. is amended by striking out the second paragraph thereof and inserting the following: "Before the argument commences, the counsel on each side shall submit to the judge in writing such propositions of law as they propose to rely on, which shall constitute the requests to charge: Provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall prevent either counsel at the close of the argument from submitting such additional requests as may be suggested by the course of the argument." Adopted December 14, 1882.

So that rule XI. now reads as follows:

Rule XI. Counsel shall not attempt to argue or explain a case, or any matter arising therein, after he has been heard and the opinion of the court has been pronounced.

Before the argument commences, the counsel on each side shall submit to the judge in writing such propositions of law as they propose to rely on, which shall constitute the requests to charge: Provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall prevent either counsel at the close of the argument from submitting such additional requests as may be suggested by the course of the argument.

Rule XIV. is amended by striking out the word "private," in the first line, and by inserting at the end of the rule the following: "Or unless made in open court and noted by the presiding judge." So that rule XIV. now reads:

Rule XIV. No agreement or consent between the parties or their attorneys, in respect to the proceedings in a cause, shall be binding, unless the same shall have been reduced to the form of *an order by consent and entered; or unless the evidence thereof shall be in writing, subscribed by the party against whom the same shall be alleged, or by his attorney or counsel; or unless made in open court and noted by the presiding judge. Adopted May 13, 1885.

*605

Rule LXXI., as heretofore numbered, was changed to No. LXXII. on December 14, 1882, and the following additional rule adopted by the convention of the judges:

Rule LXXI. No action for malicious prosecution, based upon an indictment tried by the Court of Sessions, shall be commenced unless a copy of the indictment has been first obtained by order of the judge before whom the case was tried. Adopted December 14, 1882.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT

TO

JUDGE THOMAS WORTH GLOVER

22 S. C. *606

*While the Supreme Court was in session on Tuesday, November 25, 1884, it being the first day of the November term, the Honorable Ch. Richardson Miles, the attorney general, rose and said:

May it please your honors: Another link which bound the present to the past has been broken—the Honorable Thomas W. Glover, the last but one of the law judges of South Carolina under the constitution of 1790, has died since the last term of this court.

Judge Glover's connection with the legal profession extended over the unusually long period of sixty-six years. Admitted to the bar in 1818, he was at the time of his death the oldest surviving member of the bar of South Carolina. After thirty-four years of active and useful professional life, he was elevated to the bench in 1852, and served most usefully, faithfully, and acceptably until he was, under the constitution of 1868, deprived of the office which he was entitled to hold for life. Although he had then long passed the age at which men feel privileged to withdraw from the active pursuits of life, he immediately resumed the active practice of his profession, with intellect undimmed and vigor undaunted, until the year 1878, when he was appointed master for Orangeburg County—an office which he held, and the duties of which he most thoroughly performed, until his death.

The mental and moral qualities of Judge Glover made him useful in all the responsible positions which he filled, and won for him the confidence and respect of all, while his amiable and affectionate nature, and gentle and courteous manners, secured to him the warmest esteem and affection. In the private and domestic relations of life, he was singularly happy. And after an active and useful life, prolonged far beyond the allotted span, supported by the conscience of "duties well performed and days well spent," in his loved home surrounded by all which should *accompany old age—as honor, love, obedience, troops of friends—he has been gathered to his rest. For him we feel no regret, but only sorrow for those in whose hearts the loss of their loved one has left a void.
*607

I have been requested by the bar of Orangeburg to present to this court the tribute of respect offered by that bar to the memory of Judge Glover, and to ask that the same be entered on the journal of the court. And as a further mark of respect, I move that this court do now adjourn.

The tribute of the Orangeburg bar, presented to the court by the attorney general, was as follows:

On the night of the 2d day of October, A. D. 1884, Thomas Worth Glover, by the decree of the Almighty and All-wise Judge, was called from the field of his earthly toils. By the mercy of that Eternal Judge, he had been continued on earth for the fulfillment of his useful life beyond the period allotted to mortal man (which is three-score years and ten) and into those four-score years which we are told are full of "labor and sorrow." Removed after these later years, having faithfully performed the work set before him, and having undergone the "labor and sorrow" of those years, he, dying, has severed one more of the few last remaining links of that chain which connected the history of the old judiciary of the State of South Carolina with the living present.

At the feet of this our Gamaliel, we his younger brethren have had the privilege of sitting and drinking in the lessons of wisdom from his lips. It is but meet and proper that, according to a time-honored custom, we should express our regrets and deep sense of the great loss which his death has entailed upon us and our country. Therefore, be it

Resolved, That in the death of Hon. Thomas W. Glover we, in common with the State of South Carolina, mourn the loss of an upright, learned, and honorable judge—one who, upon a bench as pure as ever commonwealth knew, illustrated and enforced those principles of virtue, integrity, and justice which should ever adorn the judiciary, and which characterized that bench whose decisions are quoted and recognized in the courts of the civilized world. That as throughout the broad boundaries of *our state his public merit and judicial services were acknowledged and pre-eminent, so in that portion which was his home for so many years his private life, virtue, and integrity have erected an imperishable monument before his own people, to stimulate to higher aims and nobler aspirations—feeling that "the good that men do lives after them" and its influence never dies, and knowing that the grandest example left for their emulation is that of the Christian gentleman who has passed from among their lives.

*608

Resolved, That his honor be requested to order these resolutions spread upon the journal of the court, and that a blank page thereof be dedicated to his memory.

Resolved, That the members of the bar do wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That in respect to the memory of Hon. Thomas W. Glover this court do now adjourn.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be furnished the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That these resolutions be presented to the Supreme Court and that court requested to have the same entered upon its journals.

In seconding the motions of the attorney general, Mr. W. H. Parker spoke as follows:

May it please your honors: I ask permission to make a few brief remarks in support of the tribute of respect just offered by the attorney general to the memory of Judge Glover. At the time he, with his distinguished associates, passed off the bench of the state, in the great upheaval of 1868, nearly twenty years ago, I had practised so little before him as a judge, that in this presence, and before gentlemen who knew so much more of him, and are so much more competent to do the subject justice, I will not presume to eulogize his character, measure his capacity, or speak of his peculiar qualifications and attainments for the high office which the state with confidence entrusted to him. I often saw him on the bench, and cannot forget the impression he made. It seemed to me that in the discharge of his responsible, arduous duties, he mingled, in the happiest manner, the suaviter in modo with the fortiter in re; always courteous, gentle, and kind, but in the discharge of duty, as firm and inflexible as steel. For six*teen years he discharged the duties of his office with promptness, fidelity, and marked ability.

*609

It is, however, as a citizen and friend that I would crave indulgence to say one word, not in the hope of entwining another shining garland, worthy of his character and fame, but simply to drop a tear over the memory of one who was, undoubtedly, the ornament of the society in which he moved, the very idol of his immediate family, and the loved, consistent, and life-long friend of those to whom I am bound by all the ties that make life desirable. In private and domestic life, Judge Glover was universally respected and beloved.

It has sometimes occurred to me that though he did not seem physically strong, long life was vouchsafed to Judge Glover, beyond the allotted period of "three-score years and ten," probably for the reason that he did not wear out his frame, or break down his constitution, by fretting at little annoyances, or pining over inevitable misfortunes. He was, in the best sense, a philosopher, and met all the vicissitudes and cares of life with a gentle temper and a cheerful, resolute fortitude.

I have known no one to whom could be applied, with more truthful propriety, the beautiful language of Mr. Legaré in speaking of another upon an occasion similar to this: "With the blandest manners, the most affectionate temper, the most considerate toleration of dissent, the most patient acquiescence in the decisions of authority, even where he had most strenuously exerted himself to prevent them, his life seemed to me a beautiful pattern of all that is lovely, winning, and effective in the charity of a Christian gentleman. I say effective, for his was no 'fugitive and cloistered' virtue, which gave no offense because it shunned all contest, and maintained its purity only by avoiding the contaminations of the world. He lived, on the contrary, in the very midst of the passions, the struggles, and the warfare of active and even public life; he omitted no opportunity of doing good, which either chance or design afforded him; and his patriotism and philanthropy vied with each other in turning to account every moment of his time which was not engrossed in the cares of his fireside, or the business of his profession."

The genial companion, the hearty and cordial friend, gentle, dignified, and polished in manner, possessing, in an eminent de*gree, those qualities which distinguish the cultivated and elegant gentleman, joined to literary culture and high legal attainments, he was a citizen of whom any state might be proud; and after a long and pure life, he has left to his family the imperishable inheritance of an illustrious name, and to his surviving countrymen an example worthy of all imitation, and which must exert its influence for good to future generations.

*610

At the conclusion of Mr. Parker's remarks, Mr. Edward McCrady, Jr., rose and said:

May it please your honors: It has been well observed by a great writer that those who compare the age on which their lot has fallen with a golden age, which exists only in their imagination, may talk of degeneracy and decay, but that no man who is correctly informed as to the past will be disposed to take a morose or desponding view of the present. I have always coincided with this view, have felt little sympathy with those who exalt the past at the expense of the present, and have supposed that human nature was the same yesterday as it is to-day, and, given the same circumstances, I have imagined that those who have gone before us would probably not have greater virtue and fortitude than those of us who live to grapple with the difficulties and temptations which now surround us.

But on such occasions as this, when truth not only warrants but requires our cordial assent to the virtues which have so feelingly been paid to one of the last of a generation that is now nearly gone, is it not a fitting moment for us to pause and ask ourselves whether we of to-day, soiled and worn as we are with the present struggle, are preserving the honor and character of the bar, which formerly stood so high? Is it not well for us to dwell upon the high characteristics of the distinguished jurist, whose memory we honor to-day, that we may in some degree measure our own standard thereby, whether we hold it up as high as of old?

Judge Glover was an eminent type of the character which in the time of his judicial career demanded the respect and support of our people. He was learned, but it was his truthfulness and fearlessness in the discharge of duty upon which they more relied. He was laborious and painstaking, but the people valued *still more his fairness and sense of justice. He was firm in the maintenance of the dignity of his court, but he was courteous to all, and gentle and considerate with the young and diffident. Are we of the bar of to-day moulding men fit to be his successors, and the successors of the other great and good men who adorned our bench? Are we teaching them to despise the mean and paltry tricks of the pettifogger as Judge Glover would have done? To battle for the true and just as did our great lawyers of old? If, as has been said by another great writer, the bar may be considered on most subjects a fair exponent of the educated opinion of the people, is not the whole community interested in the study of such a life as that of Judge Glover, that its virtues may be impressed upon the bar, and exhibited by its members to the honor of those whom they represent?

*611

Yes; and the close of that life will teach a noble lesson. Judge Glover had enjoyed high offical position. He had been elevated, as it were, above his fellow-citizens in the dignity of his official office; but when the overthrow of our institutions came, with how much still greater honor and dignity did he return to the bar and bear with his people her share of the struggle to resist wrong and oppression. He did not sit down and uselessly moan the days when he had been a judge over them; but, without complaint, he quietly and earnestly set himself to do his duty in the new state of affairs in which his state was involved. And when his people returned to power, how modestly did he accept a position lower than that which he had formerly so well adorned, bringing to the lesser office all the store of learning and experience he had gathered in the higher.

I have esteemed it a privilege indeed, on behalf of the bar of Charleston, which so honored and admired Judge Glover, to ask your permission to join in the resolutions which have been so appropriately and feelingly offered in his memory.

The Chief Justice responded in eloquent and fitting terms, commending the character of the illustrious jurist to the bar of the state, and granted the request and motion of the attorney general.

The court was then adjourned.

WEST PUBLISHING CO., PRINTERS, ST. PAUL, MINN.

THE LIBRARY
UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA
LOS ANGELES

UC SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY
D 000 455 521 5